

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

0000420421

33.

394.

BIBLIOTHECA CLASSICA:

OR,

A CLASSICAL DICTIONARY.

BIBLIOTHECA

£

BIBLIOTHECA CLASSICA:

OR,

A CLASSICAL DICTIONARY,

ON A PLAN ENTIRELY NEW,

CONTAINING AN AUTHENTIC AND MINUTE ACCOUNT OF THE PROPER NAMES

WHICH OCCUR IN ~~GREEK~~ AND LATIN AUTHORS,

RELATING TO

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, MYTHOLOGY, GEOGRAPHY, AND ANTIQUITIES.

BY

JOHN DYMCK, LL.D.,

AND

THOMAS DYMCK, M.A.

LONDON:

LONGMAN, REES, ORME, BROWN, GREEN, & LONGMAN.

EDINBURGH:—ADAM BLACK.

DUBLIN:—JOHN CUMMING.

MDCCCXXXIII.

394.

Entered in Stationers' Hall.

GLASGOW:

EDWARD KNULL, PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY.

P R E F A C E.

OF the plan which has been adopted, or of the time which has been spent, in composing the following sheets, it is not necessary to give any particular account. The chief object which the Authors had in view, was to supply what has long been considered a desideratum, by furnishing to the classical student, the information wanted with respect to proper names, in a form not easily mistaken. Throughout the whole historical articles, the dates are inserted, whenever they could be accurately fixed, an advantage which, though in general disregarded, every School Book ought to possess. When certainty was unattainable, recourse was never had to conjecture. In proper names, the quantity of every syllable, which the most laborious research could ascertain, is distinctly marked, not only at the commencement of each separate subject, but wherever they occur. Besides accurately pointing out both the genders and inflexions, the adjectives and other derivatives are likewise given. Passages of the classics, in which there is an allusion to the article under discussion, are frequently quoted, or explained. In this way, their full meaning is perceived at a single glance, without the reader's wasting time in useless inquiry, or having recourse to Commentators.

On a slight perusal, the learned reader will discover, that the statements in many of the articles differ considerably from those of similar publications. But as no fact is advanced, which will not be found in some of the pages of antiquity, the Authors confidently expect, that the classical scholar will not disapprove, before he has looked into the authority on which the narrative is framed. Every facility is given for ready consultation, by references to the particular passages in the originals. It would have been easy to multiply the authorities, by adding, in some instances, the names of twenty or thirty ancient authors. This parade of research has been studiously avoided, for it would not have increased the value of the book, and would have swelled the volume, which is larger than was anticipated.

BIBLIOTHECA CLASSICA :

OR,

A CLASSICAL DICTIONARY.

Entered in Stationers' Hall.

GLASGOW:
EDWARD KNULL, PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY.

P R E F A C E.

OF the plan which has been adopted, or of the time which has been spent, in composing the following sheets, it is not necessary to give any particular account. The chief object which the Authors had in view, was to supply what has long been considered a desideratum, by furnishing to the classical student, the information wanted with respect to proper names, in a form not easily mistaken. Throughout the whole historical articles, the dates are inserted, whenever they could be accurately fixed, an advantage which, though in general disregarded, every School Book ought to possess. When certainty was unattainable, recourse was never had to conjecture. In proper names, the quantity of every syllable, which the most laborious research could ascertain, is distinctly marked, not only at the commencement of each separate subject, but wherever they occur. Besides accurately pointing out both the genders and inflexions, the adjectives and other derivatives are likewise given. Passages of the classics, in which there is an allusion to the article under discussion, are frequently quoted, or explained. In this way, their full meaning is perceived at a single glance, without the reader's wasting time in useless inquiry, or having recourse to Commentators.

On a slight perusal, the learned reader will discover, that the statements in many of the articles differ considerably from those of similar publications. But as no fact is advanced, which will not be found in some of the pages of antiquity, the Authors confidently expect, that the classical scholar will not disapprove, before he has looked into the authority on which the narrative is framed. Every facility is given for ready consultation, by references to the particular passages in the originals. It would have been easy to multiply the authorities, by adding, in some instances, the names of twenty or thirty ancient authors. This parade of research has been studiously avoided, for it would not have increased the value of the book, and would have swelled the volume, which is larger than was anticipated.

In a work of so great extent, it is scarcely possible to avoid errors; but, from the frequent revisals of the manuscript, and the care with which the press has been corrected, the Authors willingly allow themselves to think, that the inaccuracies are as few as could be reasonably expected; where accents, references, and dates are so numerous. Although their best exertions may have failed to exclude every error, yet they are conscious, that the defect cannot be attributed either to the want of unremitting carefulness, or of ardent desire to promote the improvement of the juvenile student. They will hold themselves under great obligations to all, who may do them the favour to point out mistakes, of whatever kind, and shall take care that these do not again appear, should public favour require a second edition. Every hint, by which the work can be improved, and rendered more useful to young scholars, shall be gratefully received and readily adopted.

Many articles in the BIBLIOTHECA CLASSICA are discussed in very few words, whilst others are extended to considerable length—the natural consequence of subjects varying in importance, as well as of the materials, in some instances, being scanty, and, in others, superabundant. It may, however, be stated, that the Authors had seldom to complain of deficiency; on the contrary, it required considerable self-denial to suppress numerous facts, and much valuable information, the necessary result of many years spent in the perusal of the writings of the Greeks and Romans. But the design of the work did not admit of further enlargement.

Of the writings which came under review, the Authors have expressed their own unbiassed opinion, formed on a careful examination of the different works. They are well aware, that they possess no superior powers of discernment, and that they fall greatly short of many who have written on these subjects; but it was more pleasant to state the ideas which had arisen in their own minds, from a familiarity with the works of the ancients, than either to consult or copy the sentiments of others. Besides, it has been their object to avoid filling their pages with what is already before the public, or incurring the charge of unjust appropriation. Regard for the purity of the young mind, made them censure with severity whatever is gross or indelicate, and, for the same reason, they have studiously avoided giving a detailed account either of the worship or character of the Heathen deities.

Geographical knowledge respecting the places mentioned in the volumes of antiquity, has, of late years, been considerably extended by various scientific travellers. From their publications, the Authors have received much interesting knowledge, and many important particulars, of which they have availed themselves, for the benefit of their readers. Subjoining the modern to the ancient name, whenever that could be accomplished, will be found of considerable advantage, as it connects ancient with modern Geography, besides exciting a greater degree of interest in the mind of the learner. Modern names are distinguished throughout the whole work, by Italic characters. It may be proper to guard the young reader against the false opinions, in reference both to general and particular Geography, which occur in classic poets and historians, particularly in Herodotus. The limits prescribed to this work did not permit, in every instance, of noticing these errors, or the writers by whom they have been committed.

A particular list of the Roman consuls has been rendered unnecessary, by subjoining to their names, the years during which they were in office. The minuteness of the articles on Antiquities and Geography, will supersede the use of separate treatises on these subjects.

The Authors have now only the pleasant duty of returning their most grateful acknowledgments to the very Rev. the PRINCIPAL, and other Members of the SENATUS ACADEMICUS, in the University of Glasgow, for facility of access to many valuable editions of the Greek and Latin writers, which were of great use in determining the true readings of disputed passages. The obligation was greatly heightened, by the very kind and friendly manner in which it was conferred.

For uniting the letters of the diphthongs ei and eu (as in "Petr^{us}" and "Pers^{us}"), the Authors are indebted to the ingenuity and politeness of ALEXANDER WILSON, Esq., whose superiority as a typefounder is acknowledged, wherever elegant printing is known. By this improvement, the reader is unavoidably led to pronounce the two vowels together. When printed in the ordinary way, he is apt to separate them into different syllables, and consequently to misname the word in which they occur.

Glasgow, 1st March, 1833.

Geographical names are arranged in the volume of alphabetical index in the order in which they are found in the text. It was the intention of the Authors to have given much interesting information and many important facts of which they have availed themselves for the benefit of their country, and to the modern to the ancient name, which they could be so conveniently will be found in alphabetical arrangement in the volume of alphabetical index. Besides exhibiting a general history of interest in the mind of the learner, Modern names are distinguished throughout the whole work by Italic characters. It may be proper to guard the young reader against the

ABBREVIATIONS.

Adj.	.	.	adjective.	ib.	.	.	in the same place.
Adv.	.	.	adverb.	id.	.	.	the same.
al.	.	.	elsewhere.	ind.	.	.	indeclinable.
A. M.	.	.	year of the world.	q. v.	.	.	which see.
B. C.	.	.	before the Christian era.	rar.	.	.	seldom.
c. g.	.	.	common gender.	rect.	.	.	better.
con. cal.	.	.	consular calendar.	sep.	.	.	oftener.
dim.	.	.	diminutive.	sc.	.	.	to wit.
e. g.	.	.	for instance.	seq.	.	.	and the following.

PRÆNOMINA, OR FIRST NAMES.

A.	.	.	AULUS.	M.	.	.	MANIUS.
Ap.	.	.	APPIUS.	P.	.	.	PUBLIUS.
C.	.	.	CAIUS.	Q.	.	.	QUINTUS.
Cn.	.	.	CNEIUS.	Ser.	.	.	SERGIIUS OR SERVIUS.
D.	.	.	DECIVS OR DECIMVS.	Sp.	.	.	SPVRIUS.
L.	.	.	LVCIVS.	T.	.	.	TITVS.
M.	.	.	MARCVS.	Tib.	.	.	TIBERIVS.

As it was usual among the Romans, for each man to have two or more names, it has been thought proper to arrange them under the second; thus, C. Julius Caesar will be found under Julius; M. Porcius Cato, under Porcius; M. Tullius Cicero, under Tullius; P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, under Cornelius, &c.

AUTHORS.

Albrie.	.	ALBRICIUS.	Lucil.	.	LOCIVS.
Amn. Mar.	.	AMMIANVS MARCELLINVS.	Lucret.	.	LOCRETIVS.
Ap.	.	APPIANVS.	Macrob.	.	MACROBIVS.
Apol.	.	APOLLODORVS.	Manil.	.	MANILIUS.
Apol. Rhod.	.	APOLLONIUS RHODIVS.	Mart.	.	MARTIALIS.
Arrian.	.	ARRIANVS.	Orph.	.	ORPHEVS.
Athen.	.	ATHENÆVS.	Ov.	.	OVIDIVS.
Aur. Vic.	.	AURELIUS VICTOR.	Paus.	.	PAUSANIAS.
Auson.	.	AUSONIUS.	Pers.	.	PERSIVS.
Boch.	.	BOCHARTVS.	Phaed.	.	PHÆDRVS.
Cæs.	.	CÆSAR.	Pin.	.	PINDARVS.
Cat.	.	CATVLLVS.	Plaut.	.	PLAVTUS.
Cic.	.	CICERO.	Plin.	.	PLINIUS.
Claud.	.	CLAUDIANS.	Plut.	.	PLVTARCHVS.
Cluv.	.	CLAVERIVS.	Poet. Lat. Min.	.	POETE LATINI MINORES.
Colum.	.	COLVMBELLA.	Polyb.	.	POLYBIUS.
Cor. Nep.	.	CORNELIVS NEPOS.	Pom. Mel.	.	POMPONIUS MELA.
Curt.	.	CVRTIUS.	Prop.	.	PROPERTIVS.
D'Anv.	.	D'ANVILLE.	Quint.	.	QVINTILIANVS.
Dio Cas.	.	DIO CASSIVS.	Sal.	.	SALLVSTIVS.
Diod. Sic.	.	DIODORVS SICVLVS.	Sen.	.	SENECA.
Diog. Laert.	.	DIODENES LAERTIVS.	Sil. Ital.	.	SILIUS ITALICVS.
Dion. Hal.	.	DIONYSIVS OF HALICARNASSVS.	Sollin.	.	SOLINVS.
Eurip.	.	EURIPIDES.	Stat.	.	STATIVS.
Eust.	.	EVTACE.	Steph.	.	STEPHANVS.
Eutrop.	.	EVTROPIVS.	Strab.	.	STRABO.
Fest.	.	FESTVS.	Suet.	.	SVETONIUS.
Flor.	.	FLORVS.	Tac.	.	TACITVS.
Fulgen.	.	FVLGENTIVS.	Ter.	.	TERENTIUS.
Gel.	.	GELLIUS.	Theoc.	.	THEOCRITVS.
Herod.	.	HERODOTVS.	Thuc.	.	THVCYDIDES.
Hes.	.	HERIODVS.	Tib.	.	TIBVLLVS.
Hirt.	.	HIRTIVS.	Val. Flac.	.	VALERIUS FLACCVS.
Hom.	.	HOMERVS.	Val. Max.	.	VALERIUS MAXIMVS.
Hor.	.	HORATIUS.	Var.	.	VARRO.
Hyg.	.	HYGINVS.	Veget.	.	VEGETIVS.
Just.	.	JUSTINVS.	Vel. Pat.	.	VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS.
Juv.	.	JVVENALIS.	Virg.	.	VIRGILIUS.
Lact.	.	LACTANTIUS.	Vitruv.	.	VITRVIVS.
Liv.	.	LIVIVS.	Xen.	.	XENOPHON.
Luc.	.	LVCANVS.

The figures in the quotations always denote the common divisions of the different authors, unless in three instances. In Appianus, the reference is to the page of the edition by Stephanus; in Plinius, to the volume and page of the quarto edition in five volumes; and in Strabo, to the page of the folio edition in two volumes, printed at Oxford in 1807.

BIBLIOTHECA CLASSICA.

A

ABA

Abā, arum, v. Abē, ex, f. Exarcho, a city of Phœcis, from which some derive the name Abantis; but others, with more probability, from Abas, the grandfather of Elphēnor.

Abāla, ae, f. a port to which Augustus fled with only his armour-bearers at the time he contended with Sextus Pompeius (Ap. Bel. Civ. 736).—2. A town of Africa (Plin. i. 738).

Abānni, orum, m. a people of Africa, adjoining to the Caprarienses (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Abāntis, idis, v. Abāntias, iadis, f. an ancient name of Eubœa, derived from the Abāntes, who possessed the greater part of it. Hômērus always mentions the people of this island by the name of Abāntes, never by that of Eubœans. Stēphānus refers the name to Abas, an Argive, or to Abas, a son of Nēptūnus and Arētūsa, and quotes Hēsiodus, who writes, that Jupiter called the island Eubœa from the Greek word signifying a cow or ox. Hômērus mentions the Abāntes having long hair behind (Il. ii. 542). Abāntiāde, arum, m. Eubœans (Stat. Th. vii. 370). Adj. Abāntius, a, um.—2. Part of Thēssalōtia, a district of Epirus, so called from being peopled by Abantes from Eubœa (Paus. v. 22).

Abārthra, æ, f. a Naiad, who, by Bucollon, son of Lāomœdon, became the mother of Æscēpus and Pēdāsus, twins (Hom. Il. vi. 22).

Abāris, is, m. one of the Rūtūli (Rūtūlus), of mean extraction, killed by Eurŷalus (Virg. Æn. ix. 344).—2. The armour-bearer of Hannibal, a man of great bravery, who distinguished himself in the battle of Cannæ (Sul. Ital. x. 134).—3. A native of Cyzicus, Chizico, left half-dead by Jason in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Placc. iii. 152).—4. A man born near Caucasus, who was killed by Pērsēus (Ov. Met. v. 86).

Abāria, æ, f. a town of Mēsōpōtāmia, at which there were warm baths of a salubrious nature (Amm. Mar. xviii. 9).

Abāriāda, æ, f. a town or district of the Troad (Orph. 481).

Abas, antis, m. a son of Eurŷamas and brother of Pōlyidas, killed by Diōmēdes

ABB

(Hom. Il. v. 148).—2. A Trojan in the fleet of Æneas, whose ship was almost wrecked in the storm which Æolus, at the request of Jūno, raised to destroy the Trojan fleet (Virg. Æn. i. 121).—3. A Grecian, whose brazen shield Æneas had taken in the Trojan war, and afterwards fixed up on the coast of Actium (Virg. Æn. iii. 286).—4. A general of the Etrusci, whom Virgilius calls stern. He was a native of Pōpūlōniā, had six hundred youth experienced in war, and three hundred more from the island Ilva, Elba (Virg. Æn. x. 170).—5. The father of Cānthus, one of the Argonauts (Val. Placc. i. 453).—6. A man in the Theban war killed by Phēres (Stat. Th. viii. 446).—7. Son of Lyncēus, others say of Bēlus, was king of Argos. He was the father of Prætus and Acrisius. Abāntiādes, æ, m. Acrisius, a son of Abas (Ov. Met. iv. 606); also used for Pērsēus his great grandson (Ov. Met. iv. 672 seq.). Adj. Abāntēus, a, um.—8. A man who, at the nuptial feast of Pērsēus, mortally wounded Pēlātes in the side, whilst he was hanging by the door-post to which Cōrŷthus had fixed his right hand with a spear (Ov. Met. v. 126).

Abātus, i, f. an island in the Nile, on which priests only were allowed to walk, and at which the annual swell of the Nile was first observed. The Greeks called the island by this name; but the appellation which it bore among the Egyptians is unknown (Luc. Phar. x. 323).

Abba, æ, f. a city of Africa near to Carthage, at which ambassadors from that town met Syphax, after he had fled to his own country on the defeat of the Carthaginians under Hannibal by P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio (Liv. xxx. 7. Polyb. xiv. 6).

Abbāni, orum, v. Abbāne, arum, m. a people of Africa adjoining to the Caprarienses (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Abbāssus, i, f. a city of Phrygiā on the confines of the Tolistōboii (5 syl.), at which the Roman consul Cn. Mānlius Vulso remained for some days (191 B. C.), when he marched against the Gallōgræci (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Abdagēses, is, m. a Parthian of great influence, who brought the treasures of Artābānus to Tiridātes. To this measure he had been induced by the advice of his son Sinnāces. He seems, by his authority, to have had a considerable sway in the country, and to have been disliked by the nobles (Tac. Ann. vi. 36—44).

Abdēra, æ, f. v. Abdēra, orum, n. Polystilo, or, Astrizza, a town of Thrācia, Romania, on Nestus, the Mesto, a free state at the time Plinius wrote (i. 439). Dēmōcrītus, the philosopher, was a native of Abdēra, which Stēphānus derives from Abdērīta, a son of Erīmus, a favourite of Hercūles; but Sōlinus states that it was built by Abdēra, a sister of Diōmēdes, who called it by her own name. Inh. Abdērītē, arum (Sing. Abdērītēs, æ), m. Cassander assigned them lands in the most distant part of Mācēdōnia when they quitted their country on account of a great number of frogs and mice (Just. xv. 2). They sent ambassadors to the senate (172 B. C.), to complain of the cruelty of L. Hortēnsius, prætor, which appearing to the senate well founded, it was decreed that commissioners should be sent to restore their liberty to the Abdērītē, and to inform Hortēnsius and the consul, that the senate considered the war against them unjust (Liv. xlii. 4). Adj. Abdērītānus, et, Abdērītēus, a, um. Abdērītāna plebs (Mart. x. 25). Abdērītēica mens, a proverbial expression, from the Abdērītē being reckoned uncommonly stupid.—2. Adra, or, Almeria, a town of Spain near Sēlambīna, Salobrena (Plin. i. 290). This town is sometimes written in the neuter gender Abdērūm, and in the plural Abdēra, orum (Steph.).

Abdolōnīmus, v. Abdolōnīmus, et Abdolōnīmus, i, m. a man appointed king of Sidon, v. Sidōnia, in 331 B. C. His previous employment had been cleaning ditches and watering gardens (Just. xi. 10).

Abdus, i, m. a Parthian eunuch of high rank who joined Sinnāces in sending a secret embassy to Rome, requesting Phrāates, son of the Parthian monarch who bore the same name, then at Rome, to be restored to the throne of Pārthia. Artābānus, the second, having obtained information of the plot, gave Abdus, whom he had invited to an entertainment under the pretence of friendship, poison which operated slowly, but accomplished the murderous design for which it had been administered (Tac. Ann. vi. 31, 32).

Abēlla, æ, f. Avella, a town of Cāmpānia near the sources of Litērnus, or, Clānius, the L'Agno, on a soil which produced good fruit, but bad grain. (Sil. Ital. viii. 543). Inh. Abēllāni, orum, m. originally from Chalcis (Just. xx. 1).

Abēlux, ūcis (rect. Abilyx, icis), m. a Spanish nobleman, first a steady friend of the Carthaginians, whom he deserted, and delivered up to the Romans, the hostages whom he had received from Bostar to conduct back to their relations in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 22).

Abgārus, i, m. See Acūrus.

Abii, orum, m. a Scythian nation who lived on the borders of the Black Sea. Others think the word an epithet of the Scythians (Hom. Il. xiii. 6).

Abisāres, æ, m. an Indian king, who was making war on Omphis at the time Alexander the Great reached the territories of the latter. The territory of Abisāres was on the other side of the Hydaspes, as also was that of Pōrus, by whom he was joined against Omphis. Both surrendered to Alexander the Great in 327 B. C. and Abisāres died ten years after (Curt. viii. 12 seq.).

Abistamēnes, is, m. a man whom Alexander the Great appointed Governor of Capadōcia at the time he marched against the Persian king. Applānus calls him Sabictas (Curt. iii. 4).

Ablērus, i, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Antilōchus (Hom. Il. vi. 32).

Abnōba, æ, m. the Black Mountain, stands in the South West extremity of Germany, in which the Danube has its source (Tac. Ger. 1).

Abōras. See Chabōras.

Abōrigīnes, um, m. the first inhabitants of Lātium, whom Livius calls first Abōrigīnes, and afterwards adds that Ænēas called the Abōrigīnes and Trōjāni united, Lātīni, probably from respect to their king (i. 1, 2). They had the name Abōrigīnes, according to Festus, because they were wanderers when they took possession of that part of the country which afterwards fell under the dominion of the Romans. In this opinion Festus is supported by the author of the Origin of the Romans, who, after mentioning the same circumstances, adds, that they were first called Abērrīgīnes, which, by the change of one letter and the suppression of another, was afterwards written Abōrigīnes, and derives this name, ante res æque (Aurel. Vic. Or. 4). Diōnysius of Hālicārnāssus states, that they lived at first on the mountains, without towns, drove out the Sicilians, whom he calls an Indigenous nation, and occupied the whole territory between Liris, the Garigliano, and Tiber, the Tevere, and retained that name until the reign of Lātīnus, who lived during the Trojan war, and under whom they began to be called Lātīni. The same historian admits that some considered them the first inhabitants of Italy, although he seems to withhold his assent from that conjecture, considering them as wanderers, and the same with Lēlēges or Nōmādes, having accidentally met and lived in fortified places by robbery and pasturage. Lēlēges appears to have been a common appellation of banditti of this kind, consisting of various nations from various places. He ridicules the idea of their being Ligurians, and seems to adopt the opinion of M. Pōrcius Cāto, C. Sēmpronius, and many others, who maintained that the Abōrigīnes were originally Greeks, according to some, from Achāia, and, according to others, from Arcādia. With considerable probability, their origin may be referred to a colony of the latter district, who migrated to Italy, under Ænōtrus, a son of Lŷcāon, and settled in the south-east coast of that country many years before the Trojan war. It must be allowed that the statement of these writers is too deficient in minuteness to warrant its certainty. Still there seems ground for believing them to be descendants of the Ænōtri; and that in migrating westward they might remain, for a considerable time, in the Apennines, and there acquire the predatory habits peculiar to mountaineers, whose fastnesses afford them protection, and to these practices their ancestors in Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, were perhaps no strangers. Here it may be easily conjectured by whom they would be joined, and hence their character, when they made their descent on the district above mentioned. Had the Romans believed them the first possessors of Italy, or natives of the soil, according to ancient fiction, they would have called them Indigènes not Aborigines; as Tacitus has done with respect to the Britons. "Britanniam qui mortales initio coluerint, indigènes an advēti, ut inter barbaros, parum compertum" (Tac. Agric. 11). But to this appellation, neither their history, nor a single feature of their character, seems to afford the slightest pretence. Ammianus Marcellinus, on the authority of Timagènes, says they were first seen in France (xv. 9).

Abraham, a son of Terah, was born in Ur of Chaldaea; but Justinus makes him a king of Damascus, and succeeded by Israhel (xxxvi. 2).

Abrupolis, is, m. an ally and friend of the Roman people, whom Persēs, king of Mæcedonia, banished from his kingdom, and maintained he had done it because Abrupolis had desolated his frontiers as far as the city Amphipolis (Liv. xlii. 41).

Abasrus, v. Apsōrus, i. m. a river of Colchis, on which stood a cognominal town, now Makria (Ap. Bel. Mith. 240).

Abasinthi, orum, m. a people of Thræcia (Herod. vi. 34).

Absyrtus, v. Apsyrtus, i. m. a son of Æetes, king of Colchis and Idyia, or of Æetes and Astérodea, a Caucasian nymph before his marriage with Idyia (Apol. Rhod. iii. 241). When his sister Mædea fled with Jason from Colchis, to elude her father's pursuit, she tore him in pieces, and strewed his mangled body in different parts of the country. And, whilst Æetes gathered the scattered members of his son, the lovers escaped. Different authors give different accounts of the murder of Absyrtus, and some maintain that he arrived safely in the Gulf of Venice, by sea, with armed associates. Hyginus states that Æetes sent his son Absyrtus with armed attendants and a ship to pursue Jason and Mædea, that he overtook them in Mære Hædratiæum, the Gulf of Venice, that king Alcinoüs interposed to prevent bloodshed, and the parties appointed him umpire betwixt them. He followed the direction of his wife Arête, and adjudged Mædea to Jason since she had become his wife. Jason afterwards killed Absyrtus whom Mædea buried, and the Colchians, dreading the displeasure of Æetes, settled there and built the town in Histria, which they called Absyrtus, afterwards Absōris, v. Apsōrus (23).

Absyrtus, i. m. a river which flows into Mære Hædratiæum, the Gulf of Venice, which probably had this name from Absyrtus, son of Æetes, king of Colchis, being thrown into it after Jason had deprived him of life, or from the town on its banks called by his name (Luc. Phar. iii. 190).—2. A river of Colchis according to the Scholiast; but it does not occur in ancient authors. The Scholiast likewise mentions two towns of this name, of which nothing certain is known, in his Commentary on Luc. Phar. iii. 190. Absyrtides, um, f. islands in Mære Hædratiæum, the Gulf of Venice, so called by the Greeks from Absyrtus, brother of Mædea, being killed there (Plin. i. 387). Absyrticum, i. n. an island in Sinus Flæaticus, the Gulf of Quarnero. The name of this island has probably the same derivation, with the Absyrtides (Plin. i. 380).

Abūdius Rūso, Abūdi Rūsōis, m. was banished from Rome because he wished to bring Cn. Cornélius Lentulus Gætulicus into danger, merely on account of a proposed marriage between his daughter and a son of Scjānus. He had held the office of ædile, and had commanded a legion under Cornēlius. From being mentioned along with informers, it is probable he had degraded himself by engaging in that detestable employment (Tac. Ann. vi. 30).

Abūlites, is, m. the præfect of Sūsāna under Darius in 331 B. C. Thinking perhaps the plunder of that district would detain Alexander the Great, and give his Sovereign a better chance of escape or success, he sent his son Oxathres to the Macedonian king, offering to surrender to him that country (Curt. v. 2).

C. Aburius, C. Aburii, m. one of the three Roman ambassadors sent to Māsiniæ and the Carthaginians in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 35).

M. Aburius, M. Aburii, m. held the office of a plebeian tribune at Rome, in 189 B. C. By his interference, the triumph of M. Fulvius, proconsul, for his military achievements in Ætolia and Cephallēnia, was delayed. He was afterwards elected foreign prætor (Liv. xxxix. 4 seq.).

Abūdum, i. n. v. Abūdus, i. f. Madfune, a town of Thēbais in Egypt, in which was a palace of Memnon, now in ruins (Amm. Mar. xix. 12).

Abūdus, i. m. a town on the eastern shore of Hellēspōntus, the Dardanelles, not far from Nagara, nearly opposite to Sestos, Zeminie, on the European coast. It is now in ruins. Both in ancient and modern times, the neighbourhood of Abūdus has abounded with oysters (Virg. G. i. 207). Inh. Abūdēni, orum (Sing. Abūdēnus, i), m. displayed astonishing bravery in defence of their town which Philippus, king of Mæcedonia, besieged in 202 B. C. When a part of the wall had been broken down, and the enemy had driven mines to an inner wall hastily raised on the occasion, the people of Abūdus offered to capitulate on certain conditions, but Philippus refused to treat unless they would surrender at discretion. Exasperated almost to madness, they shut up their matrons in the temple of Dīana, their free-born children with their nurses in the place of exercise, and put their gold and silver on board two ships which were then in the harbour. As soon as the defenders of the breach were cut in pieces, the persons set over the matrons and children had orders to slay them, the sailors were to throw the gold and silver into the sea, and others were stationed to set the town on fire in various places. An awful curse repeated by the priests bound all capable of carrying arms, either to die in battle or to return victorious. The Macedonian king overpowered them by numbers, but not one came into his hands alive, unless prevented by chains or some other restraint from self-destruction (Liv. xxxi. 17 seq.). Adj. Abūdēnus, a, um. Abūdēnus tōrus (Ov. Ep. Her. xix. 100).

Acadēmia, æ, f. a place about three quarters of a mile from Athēne, Athens, anciently the property of a private man, Acādēmus, from whom the name is derived. When Pausānias wrote, it had become a Gymnāstium adorned with groves and beautiful walks contained within walls. Cimon ornamented it with fountains, and in other respects added to the beauty and convenience of the place. Pīnīus mentions that some of the trees had grown to a remarkable size. Sūlla not only robbed the place of this ornament but used the wood in besieging the city, or rather the harbour Piræus. The road from Athens to Acadēmia had on each side the tombs of those who had fallen in the battle at Mārathon (Paus. i. 29). In it Plāto taught, and on this account his scholars or followers were called Academics. The term Acadēmia afterwards denoted learning, or a seat of learning, hence Claudīanus, In Lātium sprētis Acadēmia migrat Athēnis (xvii. 94). Adj. Acadēmīcus, a, um. Acadēmīcus philōsophus (Aurel. Vic. de II. Vir.).

Acādēra, æ, f. a town of India, the site of which is unknown (Curt. viii. 10).

Acāmas, antis, m. a Thracian, son of Eusōrus, who commanded part of his countrymen in the Trojan war. He was a man of great bravery, and Mars assumed his appearance when he roused the Trojans to battle. Acāmas was killed by Telamonian Ajax (Hom. II. v. 462).—2. A son of Antēnor, killed by Mēriōnes (Hom. II. xi. 60: xvi. 342).—3. A son of Aslas, an eminent commander among the Trojans (Hom. II. xii. 140).—4. A son of Thēsēus, was one of the Greeks who were conveyed into Troy by the stratagem of the wooden horse (Virg. Æn. ii. 262).—5. A native of Ætōlia, killed by the tigers which Bāchus broke for his chariot. Long harmless and tame, they roamed about Thēbæ, Thēba, but the Fury rekindled their natural ferocity which sent them against the Argive army. Acontēus transixed them both after they had torn in pieces the charioteers of Amphīlārus, Idas and Acāmas (Stat. Th. vii. 589).—6. One of the Cyclops whom Vālērīus Flāccus describes as inhabiting Hiēra (i. 583).

Acānthīs, Idis, f. the name of a pimp, a character which cannot be too much despised and detested (Prop. iv. v. 561).

Acānthūs, i, f. Æriaso, a maritime town of Macēdōnia, taken by storm, and plundered by the combined fleet of the Romans, Issēi, and Attālūs, king of Asia, 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 45). Inh. Acānthīi, orum, m. The sea adjoining is called by their name (Herod. vii. 22). There were various other cities of this name.

Acarnānia, æ, f. Karltli, or Karnia, a country which some make part of Græcia, Greece, others not, bounded on the E. by Ætōlia, on the N. by Sinus Ambrāciūs, the Gulf of Arta, part of Epirus, Lower Albania, and Thēssālīa, Thessaly, and on the other side, by that part of the Mediterranean called Māre Ionīum, the Ionian Sea. This country is said to have received its name from Acārnas, the son of Alemæon and Cālīrhōē. It abounded with soothsayers (Herod. i. 162). Inh. Acārnānēs, um (Sing. Acārnās, antis), m. the Acarnanians. It is most probable this appellation was derived from Acarnas; but Strābo supposes it originated from their not cutting their hair. Long hair being found very inconvenient, particularly in war, many of them cut it from their forehead, and were, on that account, known by the name of Cūrētæ, oftener Cūrētēs, and from them the country was called Cūrētis, f. The common Greeks still shave the forepart of their head, the neglect of which they consider as irreligious, and Hōmērus, according to Plūtārchus, has attributed the origin of this fashion to the Abantes, by whom it was introduced, to prevent their enemies seizing them by the forelocks. Strābo says the Cūrētī had the same custom, and Hōmērus calls the Abantes ῥοπαλοειδῆς, long haired behind, which is still characteristic of the modern Greeks. This too is the practice with the Arnauts. Justīnus states that they were the only Grecian people who did not send auxiliaries against the Trojans (xxviii. 1). Adj. Acarnan, an, an, ānis; et. Acārnānīcus, v. Acārnānus, a, um. The last occurs only in some editions of Cornelius Nepos, and seems unauthorized. The reading doubtful, now generally Hālicārnāssēus, a, um (Themis. 1). Acarnan annis, Achēlōns, the Aspro-potamo (Sil. Ital. iii. 42).

Acāstus, i, m. one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar, distinguished for his dexterity in throwing the javelin (Ov. Met. viii. 306).—2. A king of Iōleōs, son of Pēllās and Anāxībia, or, Philōmāchē, one of the Argonauts, who purified Pēlēus from the murder of his brother. After the death of his father, he expelled Jāson and Mōdēa from Iōleōs. He married Astydamia, by whom he had one daughter, Stērōpē (Apol. i. 9 seq.). Hamōnius Acastus (Ov. Met. xi. 409).

Acbārus, i, m. a king of Arābia, who joined Mēhērdātes, and afterwards deserted him. Levy, treachery, and inconstancy form the principle features in his character (Tac. Ann. xii. 12—14). Acbārus seems to have been a common name of the kings of Arābia, as Ptolēmaus was of the Egyptian monarchs. Appiānus mentions one (called a phylarchus of the Arabians), who came to M. Licīnius Crassus at the beginning of the Parthian war with the view of deceiving him, not however with success (Bel. Par. 140). The word is differently written.

Acca, æ, f. the companion, confidant, and faithful friend of Cāmilla, whom that heroine entrusted with her last advice to Turinus, after she had been mortally wounded by Arruns (Virg. Æn. xi. 820).—2. A woman mentioned by Propertius, i. 21. 6. The readings here are various.—3. The wife of Satriūs, and mother of Sōlīmus and Mancīnus, q. v. (Sil. Ital. ix. 117).

Acca Laurēntia, v. Lārēntia, Accæ Laurēntiæ, f. wife of Faustūlus, and nurse of Rōmūlus and Rēmus (Ov. Fast. iv. 854). According to Sābinus Massurius she had twelve sons, and, losing one by death, adopted Rōmūlus, who called himself and the other eleven fratres arvales. She appears to have led a very vicious life (Gel. vi. 7).

Accius, i, m. the name of a comedian or actor of pantomimes (Juv. Sat. vi. 70).

Accius Navius. See Attus Navius.

Accius Lābēo, Accii Lābēonis, m. a silly poet, at whom Persius sneers. He translated the Iliad and Odyssey of Hōmērus into wretched Latin verse. Some have inju-ditionally supposed him the same with L. Accius, which the language of Persius confirms; Venerius liber Brisei Accii, the vein (old, shrivelled) book of frantick Accius (Sat. i. 76). See Briseus. Iliad Accii seria verūtri, the Iliad of Accius drunk with hellebore (id. 30).

L. Accius (v. Attilius), L. Accii, m. a Roman tragic poet of great eminence. His verses were keen and harsh, recommended by the excellence of the sentiment rather than by the elegance of their diction. Velicius Paterculus says that he was thought equal to the best writers of Greek tragedy. In force, dignity and discrimination of character, he excelled; but of the graces of a polished style he knew nothing, a refinement reserved for a later age. Of his works, which appear to have been numerous, not one has been transmitted to modern times. From the quotations which Cicero has made from his works, we may safely infer that the Orator considered him no mean poet, and Decimus Junius Brutus, who was his intimate friend, adorned the approaches to the temples of the gods with his verses. Neither his age nor the year in which he was born or died has been transmitted, and the period in which he lived can only be ascertained by that of his friend Decimus Junius Brutus who was consul (138 B. C.) with P. Cornélius Scipio Africanus the younger. (Tac. Or. xx. 21. Cic. Arch. 10). Accius animūsi oris, who wrote in a grand or sublime style (Ov. Amor. i. 15. 19).

M. Accius Plautus, M. Accii Plauti, m. a comic poet, was a native of Sarsina, Sarsina, a town of Umbria on the left bank of Sapis, the Savio. According to A. Gellius, he flourished in the time of Cato, in whose censorship he died, 186 B. C. and was in such great poverty that he wrote his plays in his bake-house, in the interval of labour. His language, though ancient, is pure and correct; yet his wit is often coarse, and his ideas are frequently indelicate. In comic humour he surpasses all the Roman writers, and few of the moderns approach the merit of this celebrated author. He deserves to be carefully read, not only in order to know the true genius of comedy, but the colloquial mode of expression peculiar to the Romans. Twenty of his comedies remain, some of which are imperfect. Gellius has recorded his Epitaph which does little credit either to the judgment or taste of the poet, although written by himself (i. 24). Adj. Accianus, et. Plautinus, a, um. Plautini nūmēri et sales, the numbers and wit of Plautus, which Horatius says their ancestors admired too tamely, not to say foolishly (Art. Poet. 279).

Acco, ōnis, m. a general of the Gauls, who was at the head of the confederacy formed against the Romans by the Sennones and Carnutes. Caesar, by the rapidity of his marches, prevented the execution of his plans, and ordered a general assembly of Gallia, France, to enquire into the conduct of these nations, in which he pronounced sentence of death on Acco, who was instantly executed. (Ces. B. G. vi. 4 seq.)

Accia, v. f. perhaps Foggia, a town of Apulia taken by storm (216 B. C.) by L. Fabius, prætor (Liv. xxiv. 20). Inh. Acciæci, orum, m.

Acē, es, f. the original name of Ptolemais q. v. (Cor. Nep. Dat. 5).

Acēphāli, orum, m. a people of Libya, who had their eyes in their breasts (Herod. iv. 191).

Acerbas, v. m. the maternal uncle and husband of Elissa, more commonly called Dido. Virgilius calls him Sycheus, q. v. (Just. xviii. 4).

Acērra, arum, f. Gera, a town of the Insubres Gālī at the junction of Sērius, or Umatius, the Serio, and Addūa, the Adda. Misera Acērra (Sil. Ital. xii. 422). Inh. Acērrāni, orum (Sing. Acērrānus, i), m. received the privileges of the Roman state without the power of voting, 332 B. C. Hannibal could not prevail on them to make a voluntary surrender, but being unable to defend their town they quitted it during the night, and went to the town in Campania which had not revolted. The Carthaginians first plundered and then burned Acērra (218 B. C. Liv. xxiii. 17). Appianus states that the senate having surrendered to Hannibal, on promise of protection, were cast into wells and buried (Bel. Pun. 33). At an after period the senate allowed the Acērrānians to rebuild their town (Liv. viii. 17 seq.).—2. Acērra, a town of Campania.

Acērrōnia, v, f. daughter of Cn. Acērrōnius Prōcūlus, a companion of Jūlia Agrippina, whom she attended on her visit to Nēro when he pretended reconciliation. They both escaped unhurt from the stratagem by which that monster intended to destroy them. But the sailors employed in that murder, killed Acērrōnia with their oars, in consequence of her having called out that she was Agrippina, with the view of obtaining assistance and protection. Agrippina q. v. preserved her life by swimming (Tac. Ann. xiv. 5). Dion calls her Acērrōnia Polla.

Cn. Acērrōnius Prōcūlus, Cn. Acērrōnī Prōcūli, m. was the consular colleague of C. Pōntius Nigrinus in the year 37. Acērrōnius was the father of Acērrōnia whom Nēro's ruffians killed at the time that monster had formed a stratagem for drowning his mother (Tac. Ann. vi. 45).

Acērsēcōmes, is, m. a vicious youth (Juv. Sat. viii. 128). The word properly denotes unshaven; hence, in Greek poetry, a common epithet of Apōllo and Bāchus.

Aces, is, m. a river of Persia, which has its rise in the hills which were possessed by the Hyrcanians, &c. (Herod. iii. 117).

Acēsines, is, m. the Chunab, is joined by Hydāspes, the Behat, before it pours its waters into Indus, the Sind. Curtius confounds it with the Hydāspes (ix. 4). Hiacensāne, arum, m. a people who lived on the banks of this river (Just. xii. 9).

Acēsīnus, i, m. a river of Taurica Chersonesus, the Crimea, near Panticapæum, Kerchē. Adj. Acēsīnus, a, um. Acēsīna oymīna (Val. Flacc. vi. 69).

Acēsāmēnus, i, m. the father of the beautiful Pērībōa wife of Axius, the Vardari (Hom. Il. xxi. 142).

Acēsta, v, f. a city of Sicily, built, according to Virgilius, by Acēas, and given to Acestes who was of Trojan descent (Trōjana Acēsta, Sil. Ital. xiv. 220). It had hot springs which are still in some repute. Strābo says that Acēsta was built by those who came into the territory of the Crōtōniātæ with Philōctētes who sent them with Ægēstus, a Trojan, into Sicily, 393. The name is variously written, Egesta, Sēgēsta, &c. Agāthōcles, tyrant of Sýracūsē is said to have destroyed it. Inh. Acēstēi, orum, m.

Acēstē, es, f. the companion and guardian of the two daughters of Adrastus, king of Argos, by whom they were trained to virtue, delicacy, and propriety (Stat. Th. i. 529).

Acēstes, is, m. a king of Sicily, who treated Ænēas and his companions with great kindness, when they landed on that island, as they sailed from Troy to Lātium. His mother was a Trojan, and bore him to Crimēsus, the Calabellotta, or, Piumica. According to Diōnysius of Hālicārnāssus, Ægēstus and Elymus had fled from Troy before the destruction of the city, sailed to Sicily, and received lands near the river Crimēsus from the Sicāni, in consequence of Ægēstus having been born and brought up in that island. His grandfather incurred the displeasure of Lāōnēdon, king of Troy, and was killed by that monarch who, considering it disgraceful to kill his daughters, gave them to merchants to be conveyed to most distant countries, and one of them having married a nobleman on board the ship afterwards lived in Sicily where she bore Ægēstus. After the death of his parents, he was allowed by Priāmus to come to Troy during that memorable war (Virg. Æn. i. 199 seq.).

Acētes, is, m. a soldier in the Theban war (Stat. Th. viii. 444).

Achēmēnes, is, m. son of Ægēus, the first king of Pērsia and grandfather of Cýrus. From him descended all the kings of that country till Dārius (Herod. i. 125). Achēmēnides, is, m. a descendant of Achēmēnes. Achēmēnia, is, f. a district of Pērsia, so called from Achēmēnes. Adj. Achēmēniūs, a, um, of Achēmēnes; of Pērsia, Persian. Achēmēnium costūm, Persian spikenard (Hor. od. iii. l. 44). Achēmēnius rex, the Persian king (Claud. xxxvi. 264). Achēmēnia gens (Stat. Th. i. 718). According to that poet they called the sun Titan (ib.).

Achætus, i, m. a river of Sicily, which Ptōlēmeus calls Acithius (Sil. Ital. xiv. 268). Here the readings vary.

Achāia, is, f. a district of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, bounded on the N. by Sīnus Cōrinthiācus, the Gulf of Lepanto, on the W. by that part of the Mediterranean sea which was anciently called Mære Iōnium, on the S. by Elis and Arcādia, and on the E. by Sicýōnia. From its ancient inhabitants, Iōni, orum, it was called Iōnia, and on their being dispossessed by the Achæi, or, Achivi, it received this appellation from the conquerors. It was also known by the name of Hellas, a term, like Achāia, frequently employed to denote Greece in general. At a very early period some of the Achæi went to war at Troy, and afterwards being driven into Pontus Euxinus, by contrary winds, were obliged, by the cruelty of the natives, to fix their residence on the mountains, where they lived by plunder (Amm. Mar. xlii. 8). Appianus states that from their countrymen refusing to give them ships to return to Greece, they sacrificed first all the Greeks who fell into their hands, afterwards the most beautiful (Bel. Mith. 241). Achāias, āidos, et, Achāis, idos, f. Grecian, of Greece, with relation to a female or to a noun feminine. Adj. Achæus, Achāius, et, Achāicus, a, um, of Achāia, of Greece, Grecian. Achæa oppida (Stat. Th. ii. 164). Achāia dextēra (Ov. Met. xii. 70). Achāicum bellum (Flor. ii. 16). Achāicus tractus, the district of Achāia (Amm. Mar. xv. 8).—2. A district of Thessālia, to which the name Phthiōtis is frequently added (Liv. xli. 22 seq.). Inh. Phthiōtæ Achæi (Liv. xxxvi. 15. Polyb. Exc. 10).

Achaichala, orum, n. a fort on an island in the Euphrātes (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 2).

Achārna, arum (seldom Achārna, a, v. Achārne, es), f. Forty Saints, a town of Attica, about seven miles and a half from Athens. Its ruins, which are still visible, present nothing remarkable. Inh. Acharnenses, ium, m. Adj. Achārneus, Acharnānus, et, Acharnicus, a, um.

Achārne, es, f. a town of Thessālia, on Othrys, Kata V' Othry (Plin. i. 431).

Achārre, arum, f. a city of Thessālia, on the Phoenix, which unites its stream with the Apidānus at a considerable distance to the south of Pēnēus, the Salampria (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Achātes, is, m. a Trojan of great bravery, the faithful companion and confidant of Ænēas (Virg. Æn. i. 120 seq.).

Achātes, is, m. the Drillo, a river of Sicily, between Hippāris, the Camerina, and Gela, the Terra Nova. The gem of this name was first found on the banks of this river (Sil. Ital. xiv. 228: Solin. v. 25).

Achēlōus, i, m. the Aspro-potāmo, a river of Græcia, Greece, which formed the boundary between Ætōlia and Acārnānia. It is said that Achēlōus was the first river which brake out of the earth, on which account the ancients often used Achēlōus simply to denote water, particularly on solemn occasions in oaths, prayers, and sacrifices. According to Thūcýdides, it takes its rise in Pindus, Mezzozoro, runs through the territories of Dōlōpia, Agrāia (3 syl.), Amphilōchia, the plain of Acārnānia, passes near the city Stratos and that of the Cenlāde, then entering the sea through a space which is between these two cities, overflows its bed and surrounds the latter with marshes. Aristōteles mentions, that it frequently changes its course, which it continues to do still. Strābo says it was once called Thōas, and Plūtarchus asserts its first name was Axēnus which went into disuse, and it then received that of Thēstius, because the son of Mars and Psidice drowned himself in it, and, for the same reason, it afterwards took that of Achēlōus, son of Ocēānus and a Nereid. Ætōlus Achēlōus (Prop. ii. 34. 33). Achēlōis, idis, f. of Achēlōus, with respect to a female, or noun feminine. Achēlōiādes, et, Achēlōides, um, f. a patronymic of the Sirens, the daughters of Achēlōus and Stērōpē (Claud. xxxvi. 254). Adj. Achēlōius, a, um. Achēlōia pōcūla, Acheloian cups, i. e. cups of water from that river, which Tellus, according to Virgilius, first mixed with the juice of the newly discovered grapes (G. i. 9).—2. The Stiria, a stream near Lamēa, Zetoun.—3. A river of Phrygia, near mount Sipylus (Hom. Il. xxiv. 616).

Achēmēnides, is, m. son of Adāmāstus, a native of Ithica, who accompanied Ulysses to the Trojan war, and whom that hero left in the cave of Polyphēmus, one of the Cyclopi. He was found on the eastern coast of Sicily, Sicily, by Ænëas, to whom he gave an excellent description, both of the cave and of its monstrous inhabitant (Virg. Æn. iii. 613—654).

—Achëron, ŏntis, acc. ta, m. a river of Egypt.

—2. A river in the Infernal Regions. According to some of the poets, Achëron was the son of Cëres without a father. For fear of the Titans, he concealed himself in these regions, and was changed into the bitter stream which bears his name. Others say that Achëron was the son of Titan and Terra, whom Jüpiter changed into a river in the Infernal Regions, because he had given water to his enemies, the Titans, when thirsty. Apollōnius Rhōdius places Achëron, Achërusius, and the entrance to Orcus, in the territory of the Märiādýni, near the southwest extremity of Pontus Euxinus, the Black Sea (ii. 355); Ammiānus Marcellinus, near the eastern extremity (xxii. 8).

There was a river of this name in Epirus, a maritime district on the west of Greece, now the River of Suli; another in Elis, in Pélōponnëus, the Morea; another, called also Achëros, the Copaniano, in the territory of the Brüttii, near the south west extremity of Italia, Italy (see Alexander, king of Epirus); another in the Rhipëan mountains, &c. Achërois, idis, f. the poplar-tree, so called from growing on the banks of Achëron (Paus. v. 14). Adj. Achërontæus, Achëronticus, Achërintius, Achërinticus, et, Achërusius, a, um. Achërontai fontes, the sources of Achëron (Claud. xxxv. 351). Achërois (Æas) (Plin. i. 406), which Valerius Flaccus calls Achërosis, idis, f. (v. 73).

Achërontia, a, f. Acirezza, a town of Italy, in Apulia, near the top of a hill, hence Höratius, nidus Achërontia, from its resemblance both in situation and in appearance to a nest (Od. iii. 4. 14).

Achërras, m, m. son of Iarbas, and brother of Asphëd, was one of the commanders of the Carthaginian forces under Hannibal, and was killed by the consul Paullus, at the battle of Cannæ (Sil. Ital. iii. 299: x. 76).

Achillas, a, v. Achillëus, ei (Vel. Pat. ii. 55), m. a general of Ptolëmæus, king of Egyptus, Egypt, who, with the assistance of Sëptimius, a Tribune, murdered Pompey by order of his sovereign, hence Lucanus says Achillas delectus scëleri, i. e. cœdi Pompeii (Phar. viii. 538). He was afterwards commander of all the Egyptian forces; but a difference having arisen between him and Arsinoë, Ptolemy's youngest daughter, each endeavouring to engross the supreme authority, she, by means of her governor, Gânymëdes, supplanted him, and soon after put him to death.—2. A slave, who, having fled from his master, attached himself to Misiäus. Martial describes him as distinguished both for his beauty and wickedness (iia. 91). The same poet says that Gábiniä made him Castor from being Pollux, i. e. from being a boxer made him a good horseman, by which the poet means she raised him to the rank of a knight (vii. 56).

Achillëos drōmos. See Achilles.

Achilles, is, et, Achillëus, ëos, m. the son of Pëleüs, king of Thëssaïa, Thessaly, and of Thëtis the goddess of the sea. He received his education under Chiron, and had Patrōclus for his schoolfellow (Val. Flacc. i. 267 seq.). Hence originated that friendship which Hömërus has rendered so interesting. Endowed with the gift of prophecy, Thëtis knew that her son would lose his life at Trōja, Troy, and therefore to prevent his going to the war, sent him privately to her brother, Lÿcōmëdes, king of Scÿros, with whom he continued disguised in a female dress, until he was discovered by Ulysses.

As Trōy could not be taken without him, and as he was naturally fond of arms, and ambitious of military glory, he immediately joined his countrymen, and sailed for the Trojan coast. He was the bravest and most beautiful of all the Greeks who fought in that tedious, bloody, and destructive contest.

After giving many proofs of astonishing bravery and military prowess, he quarrelled with Agamënon, Commander-in-chief of the Grecian army, and, in disgust, withdrew his men from the war to his ships. In this sullen retirement, he remained a considerable time, obstinately rejecting the earnest solicitations of his countrymen to support the cause of Greece. During the absence of Achilles, the Trojans were victorious. But his friend Patrōclus, clad in his armour, having rashly encountered Hëctor, fell by the hand of that hero. Achilles, to revenge his death, resolved instantly to take the field. For this purpose, Vulcānus, at the request of Thëtis, made her son a complete suit of armour, of which Hömërus (Il. xviii. 469 seq.) has given a minute and masterly description. With these celestial arms, many of the Trojans were put to death. At last, he engaged in single combat with Hector, whom he killed, and having first, in barbarous triumph, dragged the lifeless body at his chariot-wheels thrice round the walls of Troy, and the tomb of Patrōclus, he then sold it to the venerable Priāmus for a large ransom. Achilles, falling afterwards in love with Pölÿxëna, a daughter of the Trojan King, whilst soliciting her hand in the temple of Minërva, was wounded by her brother Pãris in the heel, which caused his death, to which Virgilius refers (Æn. vi. 57). The achievements of this hero that poet exhibits to Ænëas in a painting at Carthage (Æn. i. 468 seq.).

In the opinion of Pausānias, none of the Greeks at Trōy equalled Achilles, Miltiades at Märañon, and Lëonidas at Thërmōpyle (iii. 4). Achillides, a, m. Pÿrrhus, the son of Achilles. Adj. Achillëus, et Achillëus, a, um. Achillëus cōthurnus, the buskin of Achilles, i. e. the style of writing which Hömërus employed in celebrating the merits of that hero (Prop. ii. 34. 41). Achillëi pëdes, the swiftness of Achilles (Mart. ii. 14). Hömërus celebrates him for this quality.

Achillëa cōme, beautiful hair, such as that of Achilles (Mart. xii. 84).—Achillëos drōmos, (Ἀχιλλεύς δρόμος; Lat. Achillis cursus) a peninsula in the form of a sword, or rather, long narrow beaches uniting and terminating in a point between the mouth of Bōrÿsthënes and Sinus Carcinites; thus forming creeks on which Achilles was said to have celebrated games (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). Achillëus cursus (Herod. iv. 55 seq.).

Achillëum, i, n. Fidonisi, a town near the promontory of Sigæum (Herod. v. 94).

Achillëus, i, m. a Roman prefect in Egypt, who rebelled and assumed the government of the country (Aurel. Vic. Ces. 39). That author states that he was easily conquered; but Eutrōpius relates, that Diōclētianus besieged him in Alēxāndria, and that he held out for eight months. On falling into the hands of Diōclētianus he atoned for his rebellion by his death (Eutrop. ix. 22, 23).

Achivi, orum, m. the inhabitants of Achāia but frequently employed to denote the Greeks in general. See Achāia. Adj. Achivus, a, um. Achiva turma (Stat. Th. x. 229). Achiva cornus, an Argive spear, made of the cornel tree (Stat. Th. vii. 647).

Achōlla, æ, e. Acilla, æ, f. a free town on the sea coast of Byzācium, Tunis, a district of Africa, to the east of Africa Propria.—2. A town in Zeūgitāna (Hirt. Bel. Af. 33). Inh. Achollitāni, orum, m. Adj. Achollitānus, a, um. Achollitānum (oppidum) (Plin. i. 539).

Achōrēus, ēos, m. a priest of advanced age, born at Mēmphīs, Moushe a Dashoo, whom C. Jūlius Cēsār consulted respecting the sources of the Nile, the springs of which he wished to explore. His answer contains the principal opinions which the ancients entertained on that subject, than which it would be difficult to advance any thing more at variance with reason and truth. To the different hypotheses which he enumerates, he adds his own, which discovers no greater ingenuity nor geographical knowledge of Africa than the exploded conjectures which he had previously described. The whole goes to prove the impracticability of the conqueror's accomplishing his wish, and the necessity of acquiescing in the appointment of Fate, which had decreed the springs of that noble river to remain for ever unknown! (Luc. Phār. viii. 475 seq.).

Achradina, æ, f. one of the divisions of Sīracūse, Saragossa, which surrendered to M. Claudius Mārcellus in 214 B. C. (Liv. xiv. 21 seq.).

Achyrōna, æ, f. a public villa near Nicōmēdia, at which the Emperor Cōnstāntinus died (Aurel. Vic. Cēs. 41).

Acidālus, i, m. a fountain near Orchōmēnos, Screpū, a town of Bēōtia, in which the Graces, who were sacred to Vēnus, bathed themselves, and hence she was called Acidālīa, æ. Adj. Acidālīus, a, um. Virg. Æn. i. 720. Acidālīa arundo, the pencil of Vēnus (Mart. ix. 14).

Acidas, āntis, m. a river of Arcādīa, into which the waters of a fetid spring descending from Lāpitha enter, destroying every kind of animal life. Its ancient name was Iār-dānus (Paus. v. 5).

Acilius, a, um. Acilia gens, the Acilian clan, who were of plebeian extraction, of which there were two families, Bālbi and Glābrīōnis.

Acilius Avīōla, Acilii Avīōle, m. a lieutenant-general in the Roman army, who kept in check the Andēcāvi, q. v. From the scanty information afforded by the pages of Tacitus (Ann. iii. 41), little of his history is known. Valērius Māximus mentions that his relations having supposed him dead placed him on the funeral pile, where he revived; but the violence of the flames prevented their approaching him and consequently he was burned alive (i. 8).

Acilius Glābrīo, Acilii Glābrīōnis, m. a senator of distinguished sagacity, supposed to have been the father of Acilius Glābrīo, a youth of great eminence, celebrated for his virtues, who held the office of consul under Dōmītiānus, and, imitating the example of Brūtus, to escape the cruelty of that tyrant, pretended idiocy, and fought with wild beasts. That monster dreaded both the powers of his body and mind, drove him into banishment, and in the fifth year after his consulship put him to death (Suet. Dom. 10). Pī-nius mentions him with great respect (Epis. l. 15. 6). Other Acilii lived about that period.

Acilius Strābo, Acilii Strābōnis, m. accused by the Cūrēnenses that he had usurped the authority of a prætor, when only sent by the Emperor Claudius to enquire into the lands which had formerly belonged to king Apis, and left by him to the Roman people. On an appeal to the Emperor he confirmed the decision of Acilius Strābo (Tac. Ann. xiv. 18).

C. Acilius, C. Acilii, m. a Roman historian who wrote in Greek. He lived during the second Punic war, and Q. Claudius Quadrigārius not only translated his work into Latin, but brought it down to his own times. Adj. Aciliānus, a, um. Aciliāni Annāles (Liv. xxv. 39).—2. A lieutenant-general of Cēsār, to whom he gave three cohorts, to protect the town of Oricum and the ships which he brought from Italy to that port. In a sea engagement at Marseilles he seized a ship of the enemy with his right hand, which was immediately cut off, and he instantly leaped into the ship bearing down all who opposed him by his shield (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 68). Valērius Māximus calls him Atilius (iii. 2).

L. Acilius, L. Acilii, m. commanded the left wing of the allies and six thousand provincial auxiliaries against the Celtiberians in 183 B. C. when their camp was taken, to which his merit contributed (Liv. xl. 31).

Mānius Acilius Avīōla, Mānii Acilii Avīōle, m. a Roman consul in the year 54, who had for his colleague M. Asinius Marcellus (Tac. Ann. xii. 64).

Mānius Acilius Glābrīo, Mānii Acilii Glābrīōnis, m. held the office of tribune of the Commons at Rome in 203 B. C. and joined Q. Minūcius Thermus in opposing the consul Cn. Cornēlius Lentulus, who attempted to obtain Africa for his province, and thus supersede L. Cornēlius Scīpio Africānus in the command of the army against the Carthaginians. The matter was referred to the Senate, who decreed that the consul to whose lot a fleet of fifty ships fell, should sail to Sicily and might, if the war continued, cross over to Africa and retain the command at sea, and Scīpio on land. After he had been appointed a decemvir sacrorum in room of M. Aurēlius Cotta and had been a plebeian edile with C. Lælius he was elected prætor peregrinus, and at the head of the city legions marched into Etruria, Tuscany, quelled an insurrection of the slaves, killing a great number and taking many prisoners. The ringleaders he scourged and crucified, some he restored to their masters. He and P. Cornēlius Scīpio Nāsica failed in their canvass for the consulship (194 B. C.), but both gained their election next year. Greece fell to his lot, and on arriving in Thessaly, he took Linnæa and Pēllinæum, and gained a complete victory over Antiochus, king of Sýria, supported by the Rētoī, at Thermō-pyla. The cities in that part of Greece immediately surrendered except Hēraklēs Trāchīnā, which, after a siege of twenty-four days, he carried, partly by force and partly by stratagem, and the citadel soon after surrendered. This loss dispirited the Aetoli, who sued for peace, which he offered to grant, but on such severe terms, that the Apocleti, or select council, seem to have refused their acquiescence. After disposing of the spoil, partly by giving it to the soldiers and partly by sale, he marched against the Aetoli, sacrificed to Hercules at Pýra on mount Eta, Banisa, and laid siege to Lámia, which he soon took, and then advanced against Amphissa, but before it surrendered he was superseded in command by L. Cornélius Scipio, with his brother Africānus, on which he quitted the province and returned to Rome. The senate with great unanimity granted him a triumph, which the number of standards, and the quantity of precious metals taken from the enemy, added to many noble captives, rendered very brilliant. P. Sēmprōnīus Grāchus, and C. Sēmprōnīus Rūtilus raised a prosecution against him when candidate for the censorship, alleging that he had neither exhibited in the triumph nor lodged in the treasury part of the booty and money taken in the camp of Antiōchus. Cato, whose integrity stood so high in the public opinion, appeared as a witness against him, but his being a rival candidate weakened his evidence; still sentence passed against Acilius, ordaining him to pay a fine of a hundred thousand asses, which was never levied, because he ceased, from disrespect to Cato, to be a candidate, and because the people disapproved of the sentence (Liv. xxx. 40 seq.). To him Justinus alludes (xxxii. 6).—2. Son of the former, who dedicated a temple to Pīetas, which his father had vowed on his defeating Antiōchus, king of Syria, at Thermōpyla. To his father, Acilius erected a gilded statue, the first which was set up in Rome (Liv. xl. 34).

M. Acilius, M. Acili, m. a Roman ambassador to Ptolemæus, king of Egypt, in 212 B. C. Two years after the senate adopted his opinion respecting Tārentum (Liv. xxvii. 4, 25).

Q. Acilius, Q. Acili, m. a decemvir for planting colonies on the Po in 220 B. C. There is a doubt about the names of the Commissioners appointed for that purpose (Liv. xxi. 25).

Acimēum, v. Acumīcum, i. n. Slanke-mex, or Peterwarden, a town of Lower Pannōnia (Amm. Mar. xix. 11).

Acināces, is. m. a kind of sword or scimitar used by the Medes, hence Hōrātius, Mēdus acināces (Od. i. 27. 5).

Acineum, i. n. Buda, a town of Pannōnia near Ofen (Amm. Mar. xxx. 5).—2. Acin-cum Contra, Pest, a town in the vicinity of the former.

Acis, is. acc. Acin, m. son of Faunus and the nymph Sýmēthis, who fell in love with Galāda, and had for his rival Pōlyphēmus, who crushed him with a stone, on which the nymph changed him into a river (Ov. Met. xiii. 750—895), under the same name, now the Jaci or Chiaci (Cluv.). Fluvius Acis (Claud. xxxvi. 332). From his mother he is called Sýmēthis hēros (Ov. Met. xiii. 579).

Acithūs, i. m. a river of Sicily, which Sil- lius Itālicus calls Achætus g. v.

Aclys, idis. f. a kind of dart, resembling what the Latins called verūm (Sil. Ital. iii. 363).

Acme, es. f. a girl beloved by Sēptimīus (Catul. xiv. 1).

Acmon, ōnis. m. a native of Lyrnēssus (Lyrnēssius), son of Clýtius and brother of Mēnēstheus. He appears to have been a man of great strength, and was in the army of Aenās (Virg. Aen. x. 128).—2. A native of Pleuron (Pleurōnius), a Greek, the companion of Diōmēdes, who was changed into a bird (Ov. Met. xiv. 497).

Acmonides, is. m. one of the Cyclops, who had this name from acmon, an anvil (Ov. Fast. iv. 288). Virgilius calls him Pýracmon.

Acenōnōētus, i. m. a fictitious name of a boy's guardian, or conductor to school (Juv. Sat. vii. 218). The reading and meaning of the word is disputed, the necessary result of the various derivations of the term.

Acetes, æ. m. a native of Mæōnla, a province of Asia Minor, Natolia, and a chief man among the crew of Tuscan pirates, who, without his consent, carried away Bāchus, whom they had found asleep on the coast of Dia, promising to land him on the same island. But love of plunder made them steer in a different direction, for which act of perfidy they were all, except Acetes, changed into Dolphins. When Bāchus allowed himself to be seized by the servants of Pēnthēus and carried before that prince, he assumed the appearance and name of Acetes (Ov. Met. iii. 582 seq.).—2. Sometimes written Acētes, Acētas, et. Acēstes, a man who, in early life, had been armour-bearer to Evander, and when of an advanced age had accompanied Pallas, the son of that monarch, who joined Aenās in the war against Turnus, king of the Rūtūli. Virgilius describes him as overwhelmed with grief at the death of Pallas, who fell by the hand of Turnus (Aen. xi. 30 seq.). Statius commends him for his fidelity (Syl. ii. 1. 93).

Acōna, æ. v. Acōnē, es. f. a port in Mārīāndyna (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Acōnitum, i. n. wolfsbane, or. monkshood, Ovidius derives the name from its growing on hard rocks (axini). According to Plinius this was the most active of all poisons, and first dropped from the foaming mouth of Cerbērus, when Hercules dragged him from the Infernal Regions by Achērūsia in Hēraklēs Pōntica, the Crimea, one of the imaginary entrances to the subterranean abodes of departed spirits. That naturalist adds, when wolfsbane is applied in a particular manner to the bodies of animals death immediately ensues (iv. 503). Monkshood, or. wolfsbane, is a plant of which there are ten species. Except one, they are all natives of Alps, the Alps, and rise to the height of from three to six feet.

Acōntēus, ēos. v. Acōntēus, i. m. a Latin, who drove his horse against that of Tyr-rhēnus with such force as burst the breasts of both animals. He was thus precipitated to the ground with great violence, and lost his life by the fall (Virg. Aen. xi. 612).—2. A soldier of Persēus, who, from accidentally looking at the head of the Gorgon, Mēdūsa, was changed into stone (Ov. Met. v. 201).—

3. An Arcadian, who excelled in hunting and killed the two tame tigers which Bacchus had broke for his chariot, and then strayed about the town of Thēse, Thēse, quite harmless. Impelled by a Fury, they resumed their ferocious nature and tore in pieces some of the Argives, on which account Acontēus transfixed them with his javelins. In revenge, Phēgeus attacked him, and, by a well-aimed thrust with his sword, deprived him of life after he had exhausted all his weapons (Stat. Th. vii. 590—609). Thus commenced hostilities between the Argive and Theban armies.—4. A Spaniard, who excelled in hunting. He was one of the competitors for the prize given by P. Cornēlius Scipio Africānus, at the conclusion of the Spanish war, for excelling in throwing the javelin (Sil. Ital. xvi. 563).

Acōntius, i, m. a young man, a native of Cēa, Lango, an island in Mārē Ēgēum, the Archipelago, who went to the sacred rites of Dīana, performed by virgins in Dēlos, and, having fallen passionately in love with Cēdippē, threw an apple at her feet, on which, in her name, he had written a promise of marriage, which she incautiously having taken up and read, became bound, from having spoken these words in the temple, to marry him. Her father, knowing nothing of this, afterwards betrothed her to another, on which she was seized with fever, and Acōntius wrote to her, that Dīana had punished her with that disorder, for not fulfilling the promise which she had made in the presence of the goddess. This letter induced her to oppose the wishes of her father and comply with those of Acōntius, to whom she wrote in return, and her epistle follows that of her lover (Ov. Ep. Her. 20).

Acræ, arum, f. a town of Sicily, built by the Syracūsāni, seventy years after their own city, near Pāchynus, Cape Passaro, on an elevated situation, whence the name. No vestige of it now remains (Sil. Ital. xiv. 206). Inh. Acræi, orum, v. Acreses, ium, m. (Plin. i. 346).

Acræa Jūno, v. Promontōrium Jūnōnis Acrææ, a promontory of the Isthmus of Corinth, jutting into Sinus Cōrinthiācus the Gulf of Lepanto (Paus. ii. 24).

Acræus Jūpiter, had a temple at no very great distance from Argīthēa (Liv. xxxviii. 2).

Acræphīa, æ, f. Proscina, a town of Bœōtia, at which a number of the Roman soldiers were privately murdered 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 29).

Acrāgas, v. Agrāgas, ūtis, m. Girgenti, a mountain in Sicily, on which the town Agrigēntum was built, hence the town is frequently known by this name. The Latins called it Agrigēntum. It was founded by a colony of the Rhōdi, and contained two hundred thousand inhabitants according to Diōdorus Siculus, and eight hundred thousand according to Diōgēnes Lāertiū. It had two rivers, one on each side, Acrāgas and Hýsas, besides an artificial lake of seven stadia in circumference, which abounded with every kind of fish to gratify its luxurious inhabitants. Here too was the famous brazen bull of Phālāris, invented by Périllus. From its lofty situation it was seen at a considerable distance, and was the largest city in Sicily, except Syracūse. Himilco, commander of a Carthaginian fleet, took it (216 B. C.), when Syracūse was in possession of Hippocrātes and Epicydes. Adj. Acragāntinus, a, um. Acragāntinus Empēdōcles (Lucret. i. 717).

Acrātus, i, m. a freedman of the Emperor Nēro, whom that prince sent into Greece and Asia with Carinas, to take from the temples the statues of the gods, and to receive as presents whatever appeared valuable. Their rapacity and violence corresponded with the wishes of the Emperor, whilst the outrages which they committed, disgraced the Roman character (Tac. Ann. xv. 45).

Acrææ, arum, f. Sapiki, a town of Lāconiā (Liv. xxxv. 27). Inh. Acræitæ, arum, m. (Paus. iii. 22).

Acrilla, æ, v. Acrillæ, arum, f. a town of Sicily, which appears to have stood between Acræ and Hybla, but its exact position is unknown from no vestige remaining. Near this city M. Claudius Mārcellus cut off the Carthaginian infantry under Hippocrātes, on which the cavalry fled to Acræ 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 36). According to some Acrilla not Arbēla should be the reading in Sil. Ital. xiv. 271.

Acrisius, i, m. a son of Abas, king of Argos, and Océla. He was the twin brother of Prætus, with whom, on his reaching manhood, he disputed the right of succession, in many a violent struggle. At last, after coming to a pitched battle, which terminated in equal success, they entered into a treaty which secured to Acrisius the crown of Argos, and to Prætus the sovereignty of Tirynthus. According to Ovidius, Prætus expelled Acrisius, and was in possession of the citadel of Argos at the time Persæus, with Andrōmēda, his wife, entered his native city. Being informed by an oracle that he would be put to death by his daughter's son, he confined Dānæ in a tower to prevent her having children, to which Hōrātius alludes (Od. iii. 16. 5); but without effect. See Dānæ and Persæus. The fame of his grandson, after his remarkable adventures, having reached the ears of Acrisius, he went to Lārisa on purpose to see him, at the time Teūtāmis was celebrating funeral games in honour of his father. To this city Persæus had repaired with the view of distinguishing himself among the combatants. Here he accidentally killed, with a cast, an old man, who was found to be his grandfather Acrisius, and thus fulfilled the oracular prediction. Acrisīōnē, es, f. a patronymic applied to females, and appears to denote Dānæ (Virg. Cat. xi. 33). Acrisīōnēis, idis, f. Dānæ (Virg. Æn. vii. 410). Acrisīōniādes, æ, m. Persæus, Acrisius' grandson. Adj. Acrisīōnēus, a, um. Acrisīōnēi mūrī, Ardæa; from being founded by Dānæ, daughter of Acrisius (Sil. Ital. i. 661). Acrisīōnēæ arces (Ov. Met. v. 239). Acrōcēraunia. See Cēraunia. Acrōcōrinthus, i, f. the citadel of Cōrīnthus, Corinth. Strābo estimates its perpendicular height at three stadia and a half, and its ascent from the base, at thirty stadia, which, if the circuitous inflexions be included, is not far from the truth. Stātus, alluding to its great height, says, that it alternately covers both seas with its shade (Th. vii. 106). The ancient Greeks resembled Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea, to an ox, and looked upon Acrōcōrinthus as one of its horns, and Ithōmē, Bolkano, as the other.

When these were secured, they reckoned the peninsula safe. Before the invention of artillery, this fort was deemed impregnable, and there is only one place from which it can be battered with cannon.

Acton, ōnis, r. ōntis, m. a Grecian from the territory of Cortous, killed by Mēnētus (Virg. Æn. x. 719–731).—2. A king of the Cæcinenses, slain by Rōmulus, by which he obtained the Spōlia Opima. Prōpētus calls him Hercūlēs, either from his great strength, or from his reckoning himself a descendant of that hero (iv. 10. 9).—3. A Theban who, with Alimēnides, shut one of the gates of Thebe, Thera, which confined some of the enemy within the walls, but excluded part of their townsmen (Stat. Th. x. 463). His name does not occur again in that poem.—4. The father of Psamis (Pin. Cl. v. 18).

Actœus, ēos, m. a competitor at the games exhibited by Alcīnōus before Ulysses (Hom. Od. viii. 111).

Actōpōlis, is, f. the citadel or fort of Actœus (Herod. viii. 52).

Actōta, m. son of Tiberinus, and brother of Rēmulus, whom he succeeded on the throne of Alba (Ov. Met. xiv. 619). Prose authors call him Agrippa q. v.

Actōthōon, i., m. a town on the top of Atlas, Monte Senecio. This name is variously written (Herod. vii. 22).

Actœ, es, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. Il. viii. 41).

Actœon, ōnis, acc. na, m. a Boeotian, the son of Aristæus and Autōnōē, a daughter of Cōmus, hence Nepos Cadmi (Ov. Met. iii. 174). He was a famous huntsman, and kept a number of dogs for the chase. Of these Ovidius has given the names of thirty-five, which are all expressive of their nature, colour, or country (Met. iii. 206–233). For having accidentally seen Dīana, and her nymphs bathing, he was, by the goddess, changed into a stag, and afterwards torn in pieces by his own dogs. To him the Boeotians offered an annual sacrifice (Paus. ix. 36).

Actō, es, f. a freed woman of the Emperor Nēro, to whom he formed an attachment of that kind, which does not require to be described. She was a native of Asia, and Nēro pretended that she was a descendant of king Attalus (Tac. Ann. xiii. 12 &c.).

Actō. See Attica.

Actium, i., m. a town of Acarnānia, at the entrance into Sinus Ambrācius, the Gulf of Acta, of which no vestige now remains. Livius calls it a port of Acarnānia (xlv. 1). The site of it is disputed and uncertain, although the spot fixed on by D'Anville seems supported by the modern appellation, Actio, but some late travellers say the natives know no such name. Augustus established a colony there (colōnia Nicōpōlitāna), with certain immunities, and built a town, which Strābo calls Nicōpōlis. Pretenza, to commemorate his victory over M. Antonius, off Actium præmantiūrium, Capo di Egitolo, in 33 B. C. In that engagement Augustus had four hundred ships, and Antonius only two hundred, those of the latter had from six to nine banks of oars each, and those of the former only from three to six banks of oars (Flor. iv. 11). Adj. Actius, et Actiæus, a. um. Actius Phæbus, so called from Augustus building and dedicating a temple to Apollo at Actium (Prop. iv. 6. 67). Actia litōra (Claud. xxvi. 183. Virg. Æn. iii. 280). Actiæum mārē, that part of the Mediterranean, adjoining to Actium (Prop. ii. 15. 44). Actiæa cārīna, her Actæan keel, i. e. her galley at Actium (Juv. Sat. ii. 109). Actiæi lūdī, games appointed by Augustus to be celebrated at Actium every fifth year. To them Stātiūs alludes (Syl. ii. 2. 6 seq.).

Actius, i. m. a centurion, who committed to writing every particular respecting Drusus, and who appears to have assisted at his murder (Tac. Ann. vi. 24).

Actor, ōris, m. the father of Mēnētus, and grandfather of Patrōclus (Hom. Il. xi. 784). Actōrides, a. m. Mēnētus (Val. Flacc. i. 407).—2. The father of Cteātus, prince of the Elēi (Hom. Il. ii. 621). He appears to have been likewise called Mōlios, so that, contrary to the Greek practice, he had two names. His sons are called Mōliōnes, which some conjecture to be instead of the patronymic Mōliōnides. This supposition is preferable to deriving the patronymic from Mōliōne, supposed to have been their mother's name, since Hōmērus never forms patronymics from mothers. Others consider Mōlios as an epithet derived from Molos, a battle.—3. The father of Echēclus. Actōrides, a. m. Echēclus (Hom. Il. xvi. 189).—4. Son of Hippasus, and a native of Pēlōponnēsus, the Morea, one of the Argonauts.—5. A Trojan, who, at the suggestion of Ithōcus and Iulus, carried, with the help of Idæus, the mother of Eurýalus into her own house, as the troops were becoming dispirited by her wailing in consequence of her son's death (Virg. Æn. ix. 500).—6. One of the Aurunci (Auruncus), from whom Tūrnus had taken his spear (Virg. Æn. xii. 94).—7. A man who fought in the Theban war, distinguished by his powers of persuasion and his martial bravery. He saw the earth swallow up Amphiarāus, and reported it to Adrastus (Stat. Th. viii. 152: x. 244 seq.).—8. One of the Lāpithæ (Val. Flacc. i. 146).

Actōris, idis, f. the chamber maid of Pēnelōpē, who slept in the bed of her master during his absence, and alone knew the secret of that bed. Hōmērus makes her the mean of convincing Pēnelōpē, that the person who called himself Ulysses, after returning from Troy, was really her husband (Od. xxiii. 227 seq.).

M. Actōrius Nāso, M. Actōrii Nāsonis, m. a tribune of the prætorians, whom Galba cashiered from his being suspected of disaffection (Tac. Hist. i. 20). This historian calls him Antōnius Nāso, but Suetōnius gives him the name above written (Suet. Jul. Cas. 9). On his authority and that of Cūrio, Suetōnius states that C. Jūlius Cæsar entered into a conspiracy with Cn. (Calpurnius) Piso q. v.

Actuārius, i. m. the clerk of a legion (Eutrop. ix. 9). The Actuārii appear to have had their name from the rapidity with which they wrote. They received, from the farmers of the public revenue, provisions for the army, for which they granted a receipt, and afterwards served them out to the soldiers. In a court of law the Actuārii took down in short notes the pleadings of counsel, hence called Notārii q. v.

Actūla, a. f. wife of P. Vitellius who was accused of treason by Lælius Bálbus and condemned in the year 37 (Tac. Ann. vi. 47).

M. Acútiús, M. Acúti, m. elected a tribune of the people in 400 B. C. by the influence of the patricians, in order to weaken the influence of the Trebonian law (Liv. v. 10).

Adámás, ántis, m. son of Aslús (Aslades), wounded and would have killed Antílochus, had not Neptúnus prevented. Mériónes killed Adámás (Hom. Il. xiii. 560 &c.).

Adámästus, i, m. a native of Itháca, father of Achéménides (Virg. Æn. iii. 614).

Adärchias, æ, m. the commander of a thousand men in the army of Alexander, whose bravery at Hálícárnássus, Budran, that monarch rewarded with the highest distinction (Curt. v. 2).

Adáspli, orum, m. a people who lived at the foot of Mount Caucásus, and were conquered by Alexander the Great in 328 B. C. (Just. xii. 5).

Adbücillus, i, m. a nobleman of great influence among the Allöbröges, the father of Röscillus and Ægus (Cæs. B. G. iii. 59).

Adcántiánnus, i, m. the chief man, for many years, among the Sötiates (Cæs. B. G. iii. 22).

Adcénsi, orum, m. soldiers who were added after the legion had been completed, and had this name, quia ad censum adjiciebantur. Afterwards they were called supernumeraries (supernumerarii), sometimes adscriptivi, from their being merely enrolled, and had no arms until they were put in the places of those who had been killed, whose arms they received (Liv. i. 43. Fest. Veget.).

Addüa, æ, m. the Adda, a river of Italy, which has its source in a lofty ridge of Alpes Rhetias, now called Monte Brailo, runs along a valley, passes Lärus lacus, the lake of Como, and afterwards falls into Päidus, the Po. Cærius Addüa (Claud. xxviii. 195).

Addüus, i, m. the governor of Artaxáta, who wounded C. Vipsianus Agrippa, grandson of Augustus, near the town Artagëra (Vel. Pat. ii. 102).

Adgündëstrius, i, m. a prince of the Catti, who promised, by letter, to the Roman Senate, to murder Arminius, if poison were sent him, in the year 19. The Senate replied, that the Romans revenged themselves on their enemies, not clandestinely, and by fraud and treachery, but openly, and by arms (Tac. Ann. ii. 88).

Adhërbal, älis, m. a Carthaginian prætor, with whom C. Lælius had an engagement in Frëtum Gäditánum, the Strait of Gibraltar, in 208 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 30).—2. A son of Miciäsa, king of Nümídiä, Algiers. At his death this monarch divided his kingdom into three parts, of which he gave one to Adhërbal, another to his son Hiëmpsal, and a third to Jügürtha, who was an illegitimate son of his brother Mästánäbal. Ambition formed the strongest passion in the breast of Jügürtha, and his want of principle induced him to adopt every measure likely to gratify his favourite inclination. He hired assassins to murder Hiëmpsal, on which Adhërbal went to Rome, whither Jügürtha sent ambassadors. The senate having fixed a day for hearing the parties, Adhërbal delivered a most elegant speech, calculated to excite the sympathy and secure the protection of that assembly. The deputies of Jügürtha scarcely attempted a reply, depending solely on the money which they had brought with them, and the avarice of the Romans. Thus, by the united influence of bribery and favour, Jügürtha obtained the one-half of Nümídiä from the Roman senate, and Adhërbal the other. In place of punishment, this decree rewarded his crime by an increase of territory, and the injustice of the commissioners, appointed to settle the boundaries between him and Adhërbal, adjudged to him the preferable part of the Numidian territory. This additional grant did not satisfy Jügürtha, who had set his mind on the whole kingdom, and, therefore, he used every mean to induce Adhërbal to take up arms. The latter, conscious of his inferiority as a soldier to the former, submitted to his encroachments and hostilities for some time; but at last levied troops, joined battle, and was defeated. He took refuge in the town Cirta, Constantina, sent ambassadors to Rome, begging the protection of the senate, and endeavoured to hold out against Jügürtha until their return. The Italians, whose bravery protected the place, advised him to surrender, and, being entirely in their power, although he distrusted the promises of his enemy, he assented. Jügürtha put him to death by torture (Sal. Jug. 5–26). Claud. ännus touches slightly on the history of Adhërbal (xv. 409).

Adhërbes, is, m. a man in the army of Hänníbal, killed by Q. Fäbius Máximus, at the time when the Carthaginian general had surrounded the troops of M. Minúcius Rūfus, the colleague of Fäbius in the dictatorship. He appeared conspicuous from the uncommon bushiness of his locks (Sil. Ital. vii. 601).

Adiäbas, æ, m. a river of Assýria, from which the province was called Adiäbënë (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Adiäbëna, æ, f. a country of Asia, on the confines of Arménia. Plinius writes Adiäbënë, and adds that it was anciently called Assýria (i. 564). Inh. Adiäbëni, orum, (Sing. Adiäbënus, i), m. the Adiabeniensians. Adj. Adiäbënus, et, Adiäbënicus, a, um. Adiäbënum rëgimen, the government of the Adiäbëni (Tac. Ann. xv. 1).

Adimäntus, i, m. a king of Phlius, Staphica, a town of Achäia Propria, a district of Pélö-pönnësus, the Merçä. Nothing further respecting him is known (Ov. Ib. 327).—2. One of the colleagues of Alcibiades in the government of Athens (Cor. Nep. Alc. 7).

Admëtus, i, m. son of Phëres, king of Phëre, Velesina, in Thessaly, whose herds Apöllo kept for nine years. That god obtained from the Fates exemption from death to Admëtus, on condition that some one should die for him. When no person was found willing to lose their life for his sake, his wife, Alcëstis, died for him, and soon after was restored to life again (Virg. Cul. 263). He joined Iäson in his expedition to Cölchis (Val. Flacc. i. 445). From his father he was called Phërëtiädes.—2. A king of the Mölössi, a people of Epírus, a district on the west coast of Greece. Thëmistöcles sought protection at the court of this monarch, after he had been banished by his countrymen (Cor. Nep. Themis. 8).

Adminius, i, m. son of Cinobellinus, a British king, compelled to quit his native country by his father. He fled to Cälgüla who considered it a surrender of the whole island, and dispatched letters to the consuls to that effect, although a small number of troops only accompanied the royal youth (Suet. Cal. 44).

Adónis, is, v. Idis, m. son of Cinyras, king of Cyprus, by his daughter Myrrha. Some say that he was the son of Thōas, king of Assyria, by his daughter Myrrha, and Hecuba, of Phœnix and Alphœbea. He was of great beauty, and beloved by Vênus, who, on his being killed by a boar, turned him into a flower called Anemōnē. Ovidius calls him Cinfrēus iuēnis, and Cinfrēus adāros (Met. x. 712: 730). Adj. Adonius, um. Adōniā (sacra) (Amm. Mar. xxii. 119).

Adōres, is, m. a king of Dāmāscus, according to Justinus (xxxvi. 2). Here the statements of Justinus are very inaccurate.

Adōrēus, i, m. a mountain of Phrygia, in which the river Sangarius has its rise (Liv. xxxviii. 18).

Adrāmītēum, i, n. Adramitti, a town of Mysia, to which Antiochus, king of Syria, marched in a hostile manner 192 B. C., and L. Æmilius Regillus, and Eumenes, king of Asia, sailed to Adrāmītēum, to protect the city (Liv. xxxvii. 19). Andriscus, who pretended that he was a son of Persēus, said that he was brought up at Adrāmītēum (Liv. Ep. 49). Inh. Adrāmītēni, orum, m. Adj. Adrāmītēnus, a, um. Adrāmītēnus Sinus, now called Ydrumit.

Adrāna, æ, m. the Eder, a river of Germany (Tac. Ann. i. 56).

Adrānum, i, n. Aderno, a town of Sicily, at the foot of mount Ætna. Diōdorus Sicilius informs us, that Diōnysius built it, and gave it this name from a remarkable temple or grove. Inh. Adrānīte, arum, m. whom Plinius calls Adrānītāni, orum. Adj. Adrānīus, a, um. Adrānīus annis, Fiume d'Aderno (Cluv.).

Adrastē, es, f. an attendant of Hēlēna (Hom. Od. iv. 123).

Adrastia, æ, f. the daughter of Jūpiter and Necessity. She had a temple at Cyzicus, and was the same goddess with Nēmēsis. There was a district of this name in the Troad, which Callisthēnes says was so called from King Adrastus, who first built a temple to Nēmēsis. The city stood between Priapus and Pārūm, adjoining to which was a plain of the same name, through which the river Grānīcus flowed. There was also a mountain of this name. Adj. Adrāstius, a, um. Adrastii campi (Just. xi. 6).

Adrastus, i, m. a king of Argos, was the son of Tālāon and Eurynōmē. His daughter Argia was married to Pōlynīces who had been banished from Thēbe, Thēba, by his brother Etōcles, and had taken refuge at the court of Argos. Adrastus espoused the cause of his son-in-law, was one of the seven leaders in the famous war against Thēbe, and the only one who survived. If Stāsius intended, in the character of Adrastus, to exhibit the lively portrait of a good king, justice must allow that he has succeeded. His circumstances bear a considerable resemblance to those of Lātīnus in the Æneid. He has no son to succeed him on the throne, and an oracle directs him with respect to the marriage of his daughter. From his father he is called Tālāonides (Stat. Th. v. 18). Genus Adrasti, Diōmēdes, who was the grandson of Adrastus. Adrastis, Idis, f. Argia, daughter of Adrastus (Stat. Th. xii. 678). Adj. Adrastæus, a, um. Adrastæus Arion (Stat. Syl. i. 1. 52). Adrastæus pallor, which became proverbial.—2. A Phrygian exile, who accidentally killed Atys, son of Cræsus, king of Lydia, and, though pardoned by that monarch, killed himself on the tomb of the young prince.—3. A soothsayer, son of Mērops, in the Trojan war. In Greek this name is written Adrestus.

Adrēstæ, arum, m. an Indian nation, conquered by Alexander the Great (Just. xii. 8). Cūrtius calls them Præsti, and Arriānus, Adrastæ.

Adria, æ, m. son of Ion, who, according to some, gave his name to the sea which separates Itālia, Italy, from Græcia, Greece, as his father did to the adjacent part of the Mediterranean, which it still retains. Authentic history does not confirm either of these statements, and, therefore, they must be regarded as fictitious, or at best uncertain.

Adria, æ, m. See Hadria.

Adriānus. See Ælius Adriānus.

Adrūmētum, i, n. Mahometa, the capital of Byzācium, a district of Africa, which, Sallust says, was built by the Phœnicians. It had a good harbour. To this town Hannibal fled after the battle at Zāma (Liv. xxx. 35), from which it is three thousand stadia distant (Ap. Bel. Pun. 26). Inh. Adrūmētāni, orum, m.

Advocātus, i, m. a friend whom we call to us (vocāmus ad nos), to consult respecting our law-suits, who, from respect, sits along with us during the trial, or comes with us to the trial; or Advocati are present friends who, if need require, will assist by counsel, labour, wealth, intercessions, or opposition (Liv. xxvi. 48). See Patrōni.

Adūātūca, æ, f. a fort, according to Cæsar, nearly in the middle of the country possessed by the Ebūrōnes, or, according to others, a town, now known by the name of Tongres. The latter appears to have been the idea of Ptolemy. A small part of the town only may have been built when Cæsar was in that country. Hence he mentions it merely as a castle, or fort (B. G. vi. 32 seq.). It stood near the river Mōsa, the Meuse, between Leige and Mastricht. From this town to Gessoriacum, Boulogne, a military road, according to Brotier, may still be traced.

Adūātūci, orum, m. a people of Gallia Belgica, whose country lay on the west bank of Mōsa, the Meuse, between Namur and Leige (Cæs. B. G. ii. 4 seq.). See Atūātūci.

Adyrnāchidæ, arum, m. a Libyan nation, who bordered on Egypt (Plin. i. 546). From Silius Itālicus, they appear to have been nearly black, which he ascribes to the violent heat of the sun (ix. 224).

Æa, æ, f. a nymph, with whom the river Phāsīs fell in love (Val. Flacc. v. 426).

Æa, æ, f. a city of Cōlchis, sometimes used to denote Colchis, about fifteen miles from the sea; but Stēphānus makes the distance three hundred stadia, washed on two sides by the rivers Hippos and Cyanēos which form a peninsula. Plinius makes these rivers fall into Phāsīs, the Fazs, on different sides. From this city, Apōllōnīus Rhōdius calls Mēdēa Æa, and Virgilius gives Circē the same name. Adj. Ææus, a, um, of Æa; of Circē; also magical. Æa puella, Cōlypsō, perhaps Cīrē (Prop. iii. 12. 31).—2. A fountain in Mācēdōnia.

Æcīdas, v. Æcīdes, m. a king of the Mōlōssi, the father of Pērrius and Dēdāmia (Just. xiv. 6).

Æacus, i. acc. on, m. the son of Jūpiter and Ægina, daughter of Asōpus, was king of Cēnōpia, an island in that part of Mārē Ægeum, the Archipelago, called Sārōnīcus Sinus, the Gulf of Ægina. To this island, in honour of his mother, he gave the name of Ægina. On account of his integrity and justice, Æacus was made one of the Judges in the Infernal Regions, hence, quas torquēat umbras Æacus, what ghosts Æacus may be tormenting, i. e. what ghosts are suffering punishment in consequence of his sentence (Juv. Sat. i. 10). Miltiades was a descendant of this Æacus (Herod. vi. 35). Æacīdes, m. (plur. æ, arum), m. a descendant of Æacus; Achilles, &c. Adj. Æacīdēs, et, Æacīdinus, a, um, of Æacus, of Achilles, or their descendants. Æacīdēs regna, Ægina (Ov. Met. vii. 472).

Æas, antis, m. called by Livy Aōus, i. the Polonia, a small river of Epirus, which fell into Mārē Iōnium. On the banks of the Polonia, Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, was defeated by the Romans. The modern name is evidently derived from Apōllōnia, a town of some note which stood near it; but of which scarcely a vestige now remains. Pārus Æas (Luc. Phar. vi. 361).

Æbura, æ, f. a town of Carpētānia, in Spain, to which Q. Fūlvius Flāccus, proprætor, led his army, in consequence of the Celtiberi having brought into the field thirty-five thousand men (183 B. C. Liv. xl. 30).

Æbūtia, æ, f. an old woman of great respectability, who lived on Mons Avēntinus, the aunt of P. Æbūtius q. v. (Liv. xxxix. 11 seq.).—2. The wife of L. Mēnēnius Agrippa (Val. Max. vii. 8).

Æbūtius Libērālis, Æbūtī Libērālis, m. a man mentioned by Sallūstius (Frag.).

L. Æbūtius Elva, L. Æbūtī Elvæ, m. a Roman consul in 463 B. C. (Liv. iii. 6). The historian writes only L. Æbūtius.

M. Æbūtius Elva, M. Æbūtī Elvæ, m. one of three commissioners appointed to conduct a colony to Ardēa in 441 B. C. In executing their duty, which was only doing justice to the Ardēates, they incurred the displeasure of the Commons, who summoned them to answer a charge of misconduct, and not being favoured by the principal patricians they avoided all vexatious litigation, by enrolling themselves as settlers in the colony, which could not fail to bear evidence to their integrity and justice (Liv. iv. 11).—2. A tribune of the soldiers in the second legion (Liv. xli. 1).—3. Elected prætor in 171 B. C. when he obtained the government of Sicily (Liv. xlv. 17).

Postūmus Æbūtius Elva, Postūmī Æbūtī Elvæ, m. appointed master of the horse, by A. Sērvilius Priscus, r. Structus, in 434 B. C. (Liv. iv. 21).

Postūmus Æbūtius Elva Cornēcius, Postūmī Æbūtī Elvæ Cornēcius, m. was appointed consul with M. Fābius Vibulānus, in 442 B. C. They exerted themselves to erase entirely from the minds of men the infamy of the sentence of the people, with respect to the ground disputed by the Ardēates and Aricini, by proposing that a colony should be conducted thither, as a barrier against the Volsci; but privately agreeing between themselves to enrol a much greater number of the Rūtūli than of the Romans, and that no other land should be distributed, except what had been obtained by that nefarious sentence. In following out this idea, they resolved that no Roman should obtain a single inch, until every one of the Rūtūli had received his share. By these means the territory returned to the Ardēates (Liv. iv. 11). See M. Æbūtius Elva.

P. Æbūtius, P. Æbūtī, m. a Roman, whose father was of equestrian rank, and died when he was young, as did also his guardians, so that he was educated by his mother, whose name was Durōnia. Her conduct, and that of T. Semprōnius Rūtīlus, whom she afterwards married, naturally led them to wish his death, or to obtain such a command over him as to prevent his seeking legal redress for the embezzlement of his property. With this view, his mother attempted to initiate him into the rites of the Bacchanals, from which infamy Hīspāla Fecēnia saved him. Driven from the house of his mother and stepfather, he went to live with his aunt Æbūtīa q. v., and by her advice gave intimation of the affair to the consul, Sp. Postūmus Albinus, who adopted such measures as put an end to these execrable rites, in 188 B. C. The senate decreed him a large sum of money, and exempted him from military service (Liv. xxxix. 9—11).

T. Æbūtius, T. Æbūtī, m. was consul with C. Vetusius in 499 B. C., and the same year, master of the horse to A. Postūmus q. v., the dictator, and in the battle at Rēgillum wounded Octāvius Māmillius in the breast; but his antagonist pierced his arm through, which obliged him to retire from the fight (Liv. ii. 19, 20).

T. Æbūtius Cārus, T. Æbūtī Cārī, m. appointed a commissioner for planting a colony at Mūtina, Modena, and Parma, Parma, on lands which the Boii (2 syl.) lately, and the Tuscans formerly possessed, in 185 B. C. When prætor he had the government of Sardinia (Liv. xxxix. 55 seq.).

Æcē, arum, f. Accadia, a city of Apūlia, besieged and taken by Q. Fābius Māximus, the Roman consul 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 20). Inh. Æcāni, orum, m. (Plin. i. 336).

Æcūlānum, i, n. Fricento, or Mirabella, a town of the Hirpini, distant about twenty miles from Bēnēvēntum. Inh. Æcūlānenses, ium, m. (Vel. Pat. ii. 16).

Ædlis, is, m. an Edile, an inferior Roman Magistrate. The duty of the Tribunes of the people increasing with the population of the city, to relieve them from the inferior parts of their office, two Ediles were chosen in 493 B. C. and the election naturally fell on their own order. Besides the power of judging in trivial matters, it belonged to these new magistrates to inspect all buildings, both public and private, to see that the former were in complete repair, and that the latter did not project into the streets, or, from decay, endanger the lives of the citizens. From this part of their duty, the name is evidently derived. Common sewers, streets, roads, aqueducts, markets, provisions, weights and measures were subject to their jurisdiction. The Ediles had the charge of the grain (Liv. xxxiii. 41); and had the power of clearing the streets (Liv. xxv. 1). In some instances, the authority of the Ediles coincided with that of the Censors. They fined, or banished, women of infamous characters, restricted extravagance at funerals, set bounds to the avarice of usurers, and subjected to punishment not only for immoral actions, but even for impertinent and abusive language. It also formed part of their duty to prevent the introduction of new gods, and adding to the number of religious observances. To the care of the Ediles were committed the resolutions of the people, and the decrees of the senate. Lewd women procured exemption from the penalties of law, by entering themselves as prostitutes in the registers of the Ediles. From Tacitus, this rule appears to have been of ancient date, and Vestilia claimed that privilege in the year 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 85). Suetonius states, that it commenced in the reign of Tiberius, which stands directly opposed to the account of Tacitus, and can only be reconciled with the statement of the Historian, by supposing that the Biographer alluded only to women of rank (Tib. 35).

Whilst the authority of the Ediles continued of small extent, the office would be neither very honourable, nor eagerly solicited. In proportion as their jurisdiction extended, the Edileship would rise in the estimation of the public. Hence we find that in 366 B. C. patricians were ambitious of this honour, and the poverty of the plebeian Ediles secured the object of their wishes. The senate ordered a thanksgiving to the gods, and appointed the Ediles to celebrate it with numerous sacrifices, and splendid games. Their fortunes being unequal to the expense, the people agreed to the appointment of two patrician Ediles for that purpose; and Cn. Quinctius Capitolinus and P. Cornélius Scipio were the first who held that office. These had honours denied to the plebeian Ediles. Besides wearing the prætexta, they had the right of images, sat, when administering justice, on an ivory chair (Sella Curiatilis), and had a distinguished seat in the senate. From their chair, they were called Ediles Curiatiles, and to mark the superiority of their rank, Majores. To exhibit the solemn games, and to administer justice, seem to have been the principal parts of their duty. But some have asserted that their office, as to extent, was the same with that of the plebeian Ediles. If A. Gellius be correct, none of the Ediles were preceded by Lictores, or Victores, but only by public slaves. Others think, this refers to the plebeian Ediles. The election of the Curule Ediles, was not restricted to the Patrician order. Plebeians were sometimes appointed.

C. Julius Caesar added other two, called Ediles Cereales, to take care of provisions; hence the name. It is not however improbable, that this institution was a consequence of the multiplicity of business from the increased population of the city, which the other four could not overtake, and that this was merely enlarging their number by a new appellation. Except in a few particulars, it is supposed, the powers and jurisdiction of all the Ediles were the same. The age at which a man became eligible to the Edileship appears, from Cicero, to have been thirty-seven. Edilitas, âdis, v. Edilitia, æ, f. et Edilitatus, ûs, m. (not much used), the office or dignity of Edile, the Edileship. Curiatilis Edilitas (Tac. Ann. i. 3). Adj. Edilitus, v. Ediliticus, a, um; of, or belonging to, an Edile, or the Edileship. Edilitus, i, m. one who has borne the office of Edile.

Ædon, ônis, f. a daughter of Pandarus, who was changed into a bird of the same name (Hom. Od. xix. 518).

Ædûi, orum (sing. Ædûs, i), m. the Æduans, one of the most powerful and wealthy nations of Gallia Cæltica, who lived on the W. of Arar, the Saone, between that river and Ligëris, the Loire, a little to the N. of the junction of the former with Rhodanus, the Rhone. They, at an early period, became the allies of Rome; to which, in some degree, their influence among the other nations of Gallia, France, may be attributed. The Æduan noblemen obtained admission into the Roman senate before those of any other tribe in Gallia Cômata (Tac. Ann. xi. 25). See Séquani. Adj. Ædûleus, et, Ædûs, a, um.

Ætëa, æ, v. Ætes, æ, m. the son of Sol and Persëis, a daughter of Océanus and Tethys. He was king of Cólchis, and married Idÿa, one of the Océanides, by whom he had two daughters, Mëdëa and Châlciôpë, and one son, Absÿrtus. Vallërius Flaccus makes Châlciôpë his daughter, not by Idÿa, but by another wife, whose name is unknown. He must have lived before the time of Hômërus, who mentions him (Od. xii. 70). To Phryxus, son of Athamas, king of Thëbæ, who, to escape the cruelty of his stepmother Ino, had fled to his court, Ætes gave a hospitable reception, and afterwards his daughter Châlciôpë in marriage. After she had born him four sons, Ætes put him to death, either to prevent his aspiring at the crown, or to get possession of the golden fleece. See Iäson. How long Ætes lived after the murder of his son-in-law is not known. The genealogy of Ætes explains part of Iäson's oath, Perque patrem sôcëri, i. e. Solem (Ov. Met. vii. 96). Persëia prôles flammigëri sôlis, Ætes (Val. Flacc. v. 582). Ætëinë, es, f. a daughter of Ætes (Ov. Ep. Her. vi. 103). Ætëus, âdos, v. Ætis, idis, f. a patronymic of Mëdëa. Adj. Ætëus, et, Ætëus, a, um. Ætëia tellus, the land of Ætes, i. e. Cólchis (Val. Flacc. vii. 565), which Catullus calls Ætëai fines (lxiv. 3).

Æga, æ, f. a town of Pallênë, a district of Mæcëdônïa.

Æga, arum, f. (called also Hÿpërcëia), Akio, a town of Eubœa, Negropont, mentioned by Hômërus (Il. xii. 21), and Stätius (Th. vii. 371). From this town Sträbo derives the name of Märrë Ægëum. When Pausanias wrote, it was a deserted village. There appears to have been likewise an island of this name on the coast of Eubœa, where Neptünus received uncommon adoration.—2. Ægæ, v. Ægæe, arum, f. Aias, a town of Cillëia, at the mouth of Pÿramus, the Geihoun (Tac. Ann. xiii. 8). Inh. Ægëatæ, arum, m. (Tac. Ann. ii. 47).—3. (formerly Edessa q. v.), Vodina, in Mæcëdônïa, called also Mëlôbôtira, a name derived from its excellent sheep-walks (Cor. Nep. Reg. 2. Just. vii. 1). Inh. Ægëadæ, arum, m.—4. Acrata, in Archäia, celebrated for the worship of Neptünus as early as the days of Hômërus. There was also a town of this name in Lÿdia; in Löris; and in Ætölia.

Ægeæ, arum, f. a town of Æolia (Herod. i. 149).

Ægeon, ōnis, m. the son of Cælus, or Pōnus, and Terra, who by the gods, Hōmērus says (Il. i. 403), was called Brīārēus, a giant who had fifty heads, and an hundred hands. Ovid and others describe him as a sea deity. It is probable that he was a notorious pirate, having a number of men under him, which gave rise to the fable of his fifty heads, and hundred hands (Ov. Met. ii. 10).

Ægeus, v. Ægēus, a, um (Mārē), or simply Ægēum, i, n. the Archipelāgo, that part of the Mediterranean Sea, which separated Græcia, Greece, from Asia Minor, Anatolia or Natolia, so called, either from Ægēus the father of Thēseus, who threw himself into it and perished, or from the number of its islands appearing like goats (Αἶγες), or from Ægēā, a queen of the Amazons, being drowned in it, or from a small rocky island to which the Greeks gave the name of Αἶξ, Latin, Æx, because to people sailing from Achāia to Andros the first sight of it bore a considerable resemblance to that of a goat rising suddenly up. It was particularly sacred to Nēptūnus, who was fabled to have had his residence there; hence Virgilius calls him Ægeus Nēptūnus (Æn. iii. 74). Ægai tūmultus, storms in the Archipelago (Hor. Od. iii. 29. 63), which Claudīanus calls Ægææ hiemes (xxxii. 12). The ancients reckoned sailing in it dangerous, and that it was subject to storms, particularly about the Cyclādes (Liv. xxxvi. 43).

Ægālūs, i, m. a mountain of Attica, from which Xerxes beheld the naval engagement near Sālāmis (Herod. viii. 90).

Ægan, ānis, v. Ægon, ōnis, m. a name of Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago. En quanto frēmītu se sustulit Ægan (Val. Flacc. i. 629). Innūmēris (insulis) quas spūmifer adsilit Ægon (Stat. Th. v. 56).

Ægātes, v. Ægades, ium, et, Ægūsæ, arum, f. three islands to the west of Sicily, and nearer to that island than the African coast. The most western had in ancient times the name of Mārītima, v. Sacra, Marctimo; the second was called Phōrbāntia, v. Bucina, Leranza, and the most eastern, which gave name to the other two, Ægātes, Favagana. These islands occur in history most commonly under the general name Ægātes. Near them the Roman consul, C. Lūtātius Cātulus, gained a complete victory over the Carthaginian fleet under Hānno, which, added to their other defeats, put an end to the first Punic war (244 B. C. Liv. Ep. 19). (Hānnibal) avet abolēre Ægātes, wishes to blot out the remembrance of Hanno's defeat off the Ægātes (Sil. Ital. i. 61).

Ægū, v. f. See Edess.

Ægēus, ōos, m. a son of Pāndion, king of Athens. He married Æthra, daughter of Pittēus, king of Trœzēnē, Damala, by whom he became the father of Thēseus. He banished from Athens his brother Lycus q. v. (Herod. i. 173). Minos, king of Crēta, Candia, having conquered the Athenians, compelled them to send annually seven boys and as many girls, of the choice of the youth, to be devoured by the Minotaur. Thēseus, at his own request, having been included in that number, before he left his native city, had promised to his father that if he returned in safety, the ship would have, instead of black, white sails. The youth, however, failed in his promise, and Ægēus, on descrying the ship with her black sails as she approached the Athenian port, concluded that his son was dead, and, in the agony of his grief, threw himself into Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, and was drowned. From Ægēus some derive the name of this Sea. Ægides, v. m. a patronymic of Thēseus (Ov. Ep. Her. xvi. 325. Hom. Il. i. 265). Ægidae, arum, m. the descendants of Ægēus (Ov. Ep. Her. ii. 67).—2. Son of Oiōlycus. Ægidae, arum, m. a Spartan tribe, whose name is derived from Ægēus (Herod. iv. 149).

Ægīālē, es, v. Ægīālēa, v. f. daughter of Adrastus and Amphithēa. Diōmēdes, king of Ætōlia, married her, and, during the Trojan war, in the absence of her husband, she lived in gross licentiousness, violating her conjugal fidelity with her own domestics. Diōmēdes, after the destruction of Troy, having returned, and hearing of her infamous conduct, quitted his native country, crossed Mārē Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, and settled in Daunia. Fabulous history palliates her guilt, by alleging that Vēnus impelled her beyond the power of resistance to this scandalous impurity, in resentment for Diōmēdes having wounded her at Troy. Stātius represents her complaining at having been left by her husband, whom she wished to accompany to that memorable war (Syl. iii. 5. 48).

Ægīālenses, ium, m. a Sicyonian tribe, so called from Ægīālēus (Herod. v. 68).

Ægīālēus, ōos, m. son of Adrastus, who died in the second Theban war (Pin. Pyth. 8).—2. A brother of Mēdēa, killed by Iāson (Just. xlii. 3). Apōllōdōrus and others call him Absyrtus, q. v.

Ægīlē, v. f. an island of the Styrēnses or Styrēi (Herod. vi. 107).

Ægīlia, v. f. a town near Eretria in Greece (Herod. vi. 101).

Ægīlios, i, f. a city of Thēssālīa, taken by Attālus, king of Asia, at the time he and the Romans under L. Apustius were carrying on the siege of Orēus (201 B. C. Liv. xxxi. 46).

Ægīnius, i, m. one of the descendants of Hercules, who was the father of Pāmphylus, the founder of the Gens Pāmphylorum (Pin. Pyth. i. 124 seq.). Ægīmidēs, v. m. a descendant of Ægīnius (Pin. Ist. vii. 21). Here the good copies have Ægīdæ, which is probably the true reading.

Ægīmūrus, i, m. Zowamoore, or Zimbra, an island which shuts in the bay on which Carthage stands, and distant from the city about thirty miles. Prōmōntōrium Apōllinis, Cape Zibeeb, or Zebibi, and Prōmōntōrium Mērcūrii, Cape Bon, or Ras-adder, form Sinus Tūnitānus, the Gulf of Tunis, on which Carthage stood (Liv. xxx. 24). Here M. Fābius Būtō destroyed the Carthaginian fleet 247 B. C. (Flor. ii. 2).

Ægīna, v. f. daughter of Asōpus and Mētōpē, whom Jupiter carried off from her father, conveyed her to Cēnōne for fear of Jūno, and had by her a son named Æacus. When this event came to the knowledge of the queen of the gods, she, by means of a serpent, poisoned the waters, which proved fatal to every person who drank of them. Æacus, deprived of his companions, prayed Jupiter to transform a number of ants (αἰγία) which he accidentally saw, into men, a request with which Jūpter complied, and in commemoration of their origin they were called Mýrmidōnes q. v. From that period the island had the name of Ægina (Hyg. 52). Stātilus sings in animated strains the story of Jūpter and Ægina (Th. vii. 319—329).

Ægina, w. f. Egina (Ἔγινα by modern Greeks), Echino (Leake), an island in that part of Mārē Ægeum called Sārōnicus Sinus, the Gulf of Egina, in circumference about twenty-two miles. According to Ovidius, its ancient name was Enōpia, and Æacus, the only king of this island of any note, whose history has reached modern times, called it by his mother's name Ægina q. v. To the north of Ægina are several small islands, now called Angistri, Moni, Perdica, Metopi, and Darusa; besides other nameless rocks. It was the emporium of ancient Greece. Inh. Æginæte, arum, v. Æginenses, ium, m. originally from Epidaurus, were industrious, rich, and powerful, and, in modern times, they are kind and hospitable. The Athenians cut off the thumbs from the hands of their youth, to render them inferior in naval combat (Val. Max. ix. 2). Æginētis, idis, f. of Ægina, applied to females or nouns feminine. Adj. Æginēticus, a. um. Æginēticum es, reckoned second only to that of Dēlos (Plin. v. 91).

Ægīnium, i. n. a town on the confines of Thessālīs, Thessaly, and Mācēdōniā, generally included in the former district, although that does not appear to have been the idea of Cæsar (B. G. iii. 79). It stands on Ion, a branch of Pēnēus, the Salampria. Ancient historians mention Ægīnium as a place of great strength, which a moderate garrison was supposed to render almost impregnable. Inh. Æginīenses, ium, m. (Liv. xlv. 46).

Ægiōchus, i. m. an epithet of Jūpter, from his being suckled by a goat. After the animal became old and died, he took its skin and covered his shield with it. This epithet frequently in the writings of Hōmērus.

Ægīra, w. f. Vlagoka, the Hýpērēsia of Hōmērus, a town of Achāia, on Sinus Cōrīnthiācus, the Gulf of Lepanto (Paus. vii. 26). Ægirātis, idis, f. the district around Ægīra. Inh. Ægirātes, arum, m.

Ægīsthus, i. m. son of Thýēstes by his daughter Pelōpēa. Soon after his birth, Pelōpēa exposed him, when he was found by the shepherds and nursed by a goat, hence his name. He murdered his uncle Atrēus, and afterwards seduced Clytemnestra, when her husband was absent at the Trojan war. On his return after the destruction of Troy, Agāmēmon fell by the hand of Ægīsthus, but his son Orēstes revenged his death by killing both his mother and her paramour.

Ægīum, v. Ægion, i. n. Vostitza, or Bostitza, the chief town of Achāia on Sinus Cōrīnthiācus, the Gulf of Lepanto, on a fertile plain, raised a little above the sea. Here a council was held to settle the differences between the Ætōli and Philippos, king of Mācēdōniā 210 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 30). Hōmērus mentions it as one of the cities which supplied ships for the Trojan war, and Stātilus, as sending troops to the Theban war (Th. iv. 81). Bostitza may be reckoned a large village rather than a town, having lost its former greatness, and scarcely retained any vestiges of its public buildings. Inh. Æglēnses, ium (Sing. Æglēnsis, is), m. surpassed the natives of the Bālēares in throwing to a greater distance, with surer aim, and more powerful effect (Liv. xxxviii. 29, 30). Adj. Æglēnsis, is, e. Æglēnsis ciuitas (Tac. Ann. iv. 13).

Æglē, es, f. one of the Naiads, and of the greatest beauty (Virg. B. vi. 21).—2. A woman of bad character (Mart. xi. 82).

Ægles, w, m. a Samian, who, by a powerful effort to speak, broke a ligament by which his tongue was fettered, and afterwards retained the use of speech (Gel. v. 9).

Ægōcēros, ōtis, m. the Greek name of the ninth sign of the Zodiac, which the Latins translated Cāpricōrnus (Lucret. v. 614). Gēldus Ægōcēros (Sen. Thyest. 864).

Ægon, ōnis, m. a shepherd, probably a native of Lýtus, Lassiti, or, Lieto, a town of Crēta, Candia, or at least of that island, on which account he is called Lyctius (Virg. B. v. 72).

Ægos potāmos, Ægos potāmi (i. e. the goat's river), m. a river in Chersōnēsus Thrācia at which Lýsander captured the Athenian fleet (Cor. Nep. Lysan. 1). Plinius translates it Ægos flūmen (i. 212).

Ægus, i. m. a son of Adbūcillus, who, with his brother Rōscillus, in consequence of being privately reprimanded by Cæsar, for defrauding the Gallic cavalry of their pay, and making false returns, went over with a party of their friends to Pompey. He was killed in an engagement of the cavalry before the battle of Phārsālā (Cæs. B. G. iii. 59 seq.).

Ægýpsus, i. m. one of the Caspians, a nation of Asia, who lived on the sea which from them received the appellation of Mārē Caspium, the Caspian Sea. He built a city in Thrācia, Romania, which he called by his own name (Ov. Ep. Pont. i. 8. 13).

Ægýptius, i. m. a nobleman of Ithāca (Hom. Od. ii. 15 seq.).

Ægýptus, i. f. Egypt, a large country of Africa, bounded on the E. by that part of Arābia Pētræa, Stony Arabia, called the Isthmus of Suez, and Sinus Arābiens, the Red Sea, which separate it from Arabia; on the S. by Æthiōpia; on the W. by Libýa, Barca, and the eastern part of the Desert of Sahara; and on the N. by the Mediterranean. Its length from N. to S. was about 600 miles, and its breadth from 100 to 200. Egypt was divided into Upper, Middle, and Lower. The first, Thēbāis, idos, f. so called from its chief city Thēbae, or Ægýptus Sūpērior, included all the country to the south of Hēr-mōpōlis; the second, Hēptānōmis, extended from Thēbāis nearly to the city of Mēmphīs; and the last, Ægýptus Infērior, stretched from Hēptānōmis to the shore of the Mediterranean, comprehending the Delta, and was the most beautiful and valuable part of Egypt. The Egyptians, like the Chinese, lay claim to the highest antiquity, and pretend to have records for 20,000, and even 50,000, years. This absurd chronology involves their early history in fable. That they are one of the most ancient nations in the world, cannot be questioned, and that many of the arts and sciences originated among them, is equally certain. It is allowed that the Greeks were indebted to the Egyptians for their first acquaintance with both.

Several of the founders of colonies in Greece were natives of this country. For some rude notions of astronomy, the Egyptians were under obligations to the Chaldeans. The pyramids have been the wonder of every succeeding age, and could not have been erected without considerable knowledge of the mechanic powers. The famous labyrinth which stood near the lake Mœris, and contained, according to Herodotus, twelve palaces and three thousand houses, all under ground, built of marble, and communicating with each other by innumerable secret winding passages, is an additional proof of their skill both in Mechanics and Architecture. Egypt now forms part of the Turkish empire. Hómērus calls the Nile Ægyptus (Amm. Mar. xxii. 15). Iuh. Ægyptii, orum, m. whose minds, according to Cicero, imbued with the errors of depravity, would undergo any degree of torture sooner than injure the Ibis, the asp, the cat, the dog, or the crocodile; and, if they had unknowingly done injury to any of these, there was no punishment to which they would refuse to submit (Tusc. Disp. v. 27). The Egyptians are seasoned, says a late traveller, to withstand the disorders of the country, which is by no means healthy, in consequence of the pestilential exhalations from stagnant water, after the inundation of the Nile, and they can bear with indifference all sorts of noxious animals. To them mud and mosquitoes, or dust and vermin, are alike indifferent. They go almost in a state of perfect nudity, and have never experienced one comfortable feeling in the midst of their highest enjoyments, nor a single antidote to sorrow in the depth of their wretchedness. About the beginning of May, certain winds cover over the sands of the deserts with the most disgusting vermin. These local disadvantages and total neglect of cleanliness, added to extreme poverty, arising from a tyrannical and oppressive government, have sunk the unhappy natives of a country once distinguished for learning and refinement almost to the lowest degree of wretchedness and barbarity. Adj. Ægyptius, Ægyptiæcus, et, Ægyptinus, a, um, Ægyptian, of, or belonging to, Egypt. Ægyptium mare, the part of the Mediterranean Sea which washes the coast of Egypt (Flor. iii. 6: Just. ii. 1). Ægyptiæci libri (Gel. x. 10). Adv. Ægyptiæce, after the manner of the Egyptians.

Ælia, æ, f. a woman to whom Martiālis addresses an Epigram (i. 20).

Ælia Galla, Æliæ Gallæ, f. wife of Pōstūmus, whom Prōpērtius praises for her conjugal affection and fidelity (iii. 12. 1).

Ælia Petina, Æliæ Petinæ, f. was in early life married to the Emperor Claudius, by whom she became the mother of Antōnia. Claudius divorced her on purpose to marry Mēssalina (Tac. Ann. xii. 2). Suetōnius makes her father of consular rank, although the family of the Tübērōnes, from which she was descended, was plebeian (Claud. 26).

Æliānus, i, m. a man mentioned by Martiālis (xi. 41).—2. One of the two leaders who headed, in the beginning of the reign of Diocletianus, an insurrection of the peasants in Gallia, France, known in history by the name of Bāgaude g. v. (Eutrop. ix. 20).

L. Æliānus, L. Æliāni, m. a man who attempted a change of government in Gallia, at the time Posthūmus was killed in a mutiny of the soldiers (Eutrop. ix. 9). Here inaccurate copies have Lōliānus.

Ælius, a, um. Ælia gens (called by Claudianus, Ælia series), an illustrious plebeian clan at Rome, which consisted of a number of families, Galli, Lāmīæ, Ligūres, Pætī, Sējāni, Tübērōnes, &c. The Lāmīæ pretended to be descended from Lāmus, son of Nēptūnus, who, according to some, built Fōrmīæ, Mola, and reigned over the Læst-rīgōnes. From Vālērīus Māxīmus the Ælian clan appear to have been long very poor (iv. 4), which explains Ælia pauper (gens) (Juv. Sat. vi. 72). Others understand Ælia here to be a woman's name.

Ælius, i, m. a celebrated gladiator mentioned by Martiālis. The poet describes him as inferior only to Hērmes q. v. (v. 25).

Ælius Adriānus, Ælii Adriāni, m. son of Ælius Adriānus Afer, cousin to the Emperor Trājānus, was born at Itālica on the twentieth of January in the year 54. The family quitted his native city soon after his birth and settled in Italy, where his father died, and he was only ten years of age. At Nerva's death he served as a tribune in the army in Lower Mœsia, and was deputed to congratulate Trājānus, who was both his relation and guardian, on his accession to the empire. Through the interest of Plōtina, the Empress, he obtained in marriage Jūlia Sābīna grand-niece of Trājānus, and this connexion strengthened their intimacy and probably suggested the idea of succeeding him in the empire, as Trājānus had no child. His temper, extravagance and jealousy of another's merit injured him in the opinion of the Emperor, to whom his love of literature did not recommend him, for the Emperor neither had nor esteemed learning. Having been appointed quæstor, he felt severe mortification at the ridicule incurred by his provincial accent and vulgar pronunciation, which induced him to study the Latin language with so great attention, that he became one of the first orators of his age.

The Empress, by means of a forged letter, persuaded the community that Trājānus had adopted Adriānus, and he caused the army then at Antiochia, Antakīæ, to proclaim him Emperor, to which the senate readily gave their assent. In war he had no delight, and did not possess a mind calculated to enlarge the boundaries of the empire, even although military glory had been his favourite pursuit. From the barbarians who made frequent inroads in the Roman territory, he procured peace by money rather than by arms. To lessen the public hatred which he had provoked by putting to death four senators who had conspired against him, he diminished the taxes, made presents to every citizen, and showed the highest respect for the senate, both by his unwillingness to raise to that rank, and by conferring honourable distinction on the senators. His strong understanding kept in due subordination his vicious inclinations, and his familiarity secured the friendship of all with whom he was intimate. The magnificence and number of public works erected by this prince, raised him above all the Emperors of Rome. He visited every part of the empire, and there are few cities which did not receive unquestionable evidence of his attention to the advantages and comfort of its inhabitants. To the administration of justice, to the conduct of governors, to the interests of orphan families, to the enactment of judicious laws for the prevention of fraud, to the regulation of the police, and to matters connected with the security and tranquillity of the state, he devoted much of his time most beneficially for the empire. Love of knowledge kept his active genius in perpetual study, and he valued himself on his profound attainments in the arts and sciences. His temper was naturally severe, which the continual jarring, if not mutual hatred between him and his wife, greatly aggravated. The weakness of his title to the empire prevented a divorce, but she at last preferred a voluntary death to perpetual vexation.

In travelling Adriānus spent many years, benefiting the nations whom he visited, and quelling disturbances, particularly in Jūdea, where he subdued the turbulent dispositions of that people strongly inclined to revolt, and rebuilt Jerusalem, or perhaps rather built a new town which he called Ælia Capitolāna. When the Jews next took up arms, he recalled from Britain *Jūlius Sēvēr*us who in three years put an end to the war, destroyed their country, and killed upwards of half a million of the natives. Great numbers, besides, perished by famine, sickness, and other causes. The Emperor sold the survivors for slaves, and the Jews never again obtained possession of the country which God had given to their fathers. Adriānus having no children, adopted L. Cēsionus Commōdus, son-in-law to Tigrinus who had formerly conspired against him. Not long before he expired, he wrote an "address to his soul," a beautiful little poem which has been frequently translated into English. He died at Rome on the 10th of July in the year 136, and was ranked among the gods. Suetonius and Flōrus flourished under Adriānus, whose reign would probably have obtained greater praise, had it not fallen between those of Trājanus and Antoninus.

Ælius Gallus, Æli Gallus, m. a friend of Sējanus, who, on the death of that favourite of Tiberius, sought security in the gardens of Pōmpōnius Sēcundus, which formed ground of impeachment against the latter (Tac. Ann. v. 8). From Pīnius he appears to have been of equestrian rank, and the only Roman who invaded Arabia (i. 730). Strabo, the geographer, his intimate friend, has related a number of particulars respecting the Arabian expedition.

Ælius Gracilis, Æli Gracilis, m. a lieutenant-general in Gallia Belgica, who dissuaded L. Antistius Vetus from joining Arar, the Saone, with Mosella, the Moselle, by means of a canal in order to form a communication between the Mediterranean, and that part of the Atlantic Ocean now called the German Sea (Tac. Ann. xiii. 53).

Ælius Lāmia, Æli Lāmiae, m. the husband of Dōmītia Lōngina, whom the Roman Emperor Dōmītiānus took from him and married, and afterwards put himself to death for some jocular expressions which were both harmless and of an old date (Suet. Dom. 1, 10). To this murder Jūvenālis alludes (Sat. iv. 154).—2. A governor of Germania, Illyricum and of Africa, with L.

Aprōnius in the year 23. Ælius afterwards was appointed to the government of Syria, but never went to that province. He died in the year 33, and was honoured with a splendid funeral (Tac. Ann. iv. 13. vi. 27). Adj. Lāmianus, a. um. Lāmiani horti (Suet. Cal. 59).

C. Ælius, C. Æli, m. a military tribune of the third legion, who, with T. Ælius distinguished himself in the recovery of the Roman camp from the Istri 180 B. C. (Liv. xli. 4).

L. Ælius, L. Æli, m. a man of learning, whose name frequently occurs in the writings of Cicero, and is mentioned among eminent grammarians by Suetonius, who says he had two surnames Præconius and Stilo (Il. Gram. 3).

L. Ælius Lāmia, L. Æli Lāmiae, m. consul with L. Servilius Gēmīnus, in the year 3 (Val. Max. i. 8).

L. Ælius Pietus, L. Æli Peti, m. a Roman who, with C. Fulvius Curvus his colleague in the plebeian edileship, exhibited games, and placed golden bowls in the temple of Ceres, out of the fines paid by the farmers of the public pastures, who had been convicted of misconduct in 298 B. C. (Liv. x. 23).

L. Ælius Sējanus, L. Æli Sējani, m. a native of Volsinii, Bolsena, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, son of Scius Strābo, a Roman knight. He was a great favourite of the Emperor Tiberius, who appointed him præfect of the prætorian guards, and colleague to Scius Strābo his own father, and sent him to Pannonia with his son Drusus, of whose person he gave him the charge. His natural acuteness, added to his unbounded ambition, soon discovered every circumstance connected with the dispositions, opinions, and measures of the Emperor, who, to all others, was most reserved and uncommunicative. Perceiving that Tiberius was jealous of the conduct of Agrippina, he artfully increased his suspicions, but buried the seeds so deep under ground, that they might be unobserved and spring up, yielding the expected fruits at the proper time. A son of Claudius was matched to a daughter of Sējanus, a marriage of which the public greatly disapproved, considering that it would pollute the nobility of the family. It raised the spirit of that ambitious favourite whom they already suspected of entertaining hopes of the highest dignity. When the Emperor promised to rebuild, at his own expense, the theatre of Pompey accidentally burned down (since the poverty of that family put it out of their power), and that it should continue under the same name, he highly commended on that occasion the merit of Sējanus, whose vigilance and exertion prevented the spreading of the flames to the adjacent buildings. On this account, the senate voted him a statue, which should be erected in that theatre. As a further mark of his respect, Tiberius granted to Jūnius Blæsus, proconsul of Africa, a triumph, declaring that he bestowed that honour upon him for his being the maternal uncle of Sējanus. He formed into one camp all the different companies of soldiers formerly scattered up and down the town, which both increased the courage of the military and the terror of the citizens. From this concentrated force, after he had gained the favour both of the officers and men by his familiarity and caresses, he might be said to command the empire. A powerful influence in the senate necessarily resulted from this measure, and he conferred honours and provinces on his creatures, as ambition or caprice dictated. Tibérius applauded his conduct, called him, in all his speeches to the senate and people, his assistant in the empire, and allowed his images to be worshipped in the theatres, the market places, and at the head of the legions.

As a previous step to his obtaining the imperial dignity, he resolved to remove all the heirs to the throne, and to begin with Drusus who had, in a contest, struck him on the face. To accomplish this plan he debauched Livia, the wife of Drusus, who was a sister of Germānicus, and prevailed upon her, after the loss of her innocence, to consent to the murder of her husband, in expectation of her being the companion of his bed and crown. See Livia. He next forced from his house Apicata, his wife, who had born him three children, on purpose to remove all suspicion from the mind of Livia, who discovered to her paramour, Sējānus, the most secret plans and sentiments of her husband, the avowed enemy of that unprincipled favourite. Soon after the violation of his wife, Drusus was carried off by a slow poison administered, at the command of Sējānus, by Lȳgdus, a eunuch. Sējānus had adopted this plan that it might have more the appearance of a natural death. See Drusus. The success of this stratagem impelled Sējānus to attempt the destruction of the children of Germānicus, the natural heirs of the crown. He found the fidelity of their governors and the impregnable virtue of their mother, powerful obstacles to the success of this scheme, and therefore endeavoured to make the Emperor apprehensive of her ambition, by incessantly dimming his ears with the city being divided into two parties, as in a civil war, one declaring for him, and another for Agrippina. Sējānus, on this pretext, cut off many nobles of Rome, and prevented Dōlābēlla from the honour of a triumph, lest he should surpass the fame of his uncle Jūnius Blesus. Every plan succeeding to his wish, and Livia urging him to accomplish the marriage, he wrote the Emperor, begging he would not deny him that honour, which, however, Tibérius refused to grant, and mentioned several circumstances, from which it may be inferred, that the ultimate object of Sējānus was to be his successor. Alarmed at this refusal and dreading the suspicions of Tibérius, he conjured him not to believe the calumnies of enemies, nor the false rumours of the city. To avoid the malice of those who wished his destruction, and to get the Emperor wholly into his own hands, he advised him to retire from the splendour of a court and live in the country, and that thus by losing the mere shadow of dignity, he would, on easy terms, retain the substance. Tibérius now aged and fond of ease, agreed to this proposal, and retired to Caprēe, Capri. From this period Sējānus governed the empire, and his audacity and presumption brought him under the suspicion of the Emperor, who ordered him to be arraigned before the senate, by whom he was condemned to lose his life, and the executioners immediately strangled him in prison. The populace dragged his dead body through the streets, and after treating it with every kind of indignity, threw it into Tiber, the Tevere. The Emperor caused not only his children, but also all his connexions and favourites to be put to death, and confiscated his property. Jūvénālis has chosen Sējānus as an instance of the caprice both of popular and court favour, which he has depicted with inimitable humour, vivacity, and truth. The rapidity of his destruction, and the infamy of his disgrace, formed a just compensation for the activity of his malice, and the insatiableness of his cruelty. Vellēus Pātēreſus, who wrote when he was in the zenith of his power, after mentioning the nobility of his mother, states that he was a man of consummate industry, activity, and uprightness, joining vigour of mind to strength of body, and uniting cheerfulness with gravity. He seemed unengaged when most actively employed; claimed nothing, yet obtained every thing; undervalued his own merits, and showed his calmness of temper by serenity of countenance, which remained unaltered by a ceaseless exertion of mind (ii. 127). In the following chapter that historian enlarges on the virtues of Sējānus, in which he particularly refers to his political talents and fitness for the high office which he then held. To him Phædrus alludes (prol. 3).

P. Ælius, P. Ælii, m. a plebeian, and among the first of that rank who obtained the office of quaestor. Two of his colleagues were likewise plebeians. The fourth was a patrician. The nobles expressed great indignation at the honourable offices being lost to themselves, after they had held them for a long series of years. The plebeians obtained this advantage in 408 B. C. (Liv. iv. 54). —2. An ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria, in 195 B. C. His colleagues were P. Villius and P. Sūlpicius (Liv. xxxiv. 49). —3. A triumvir for planting a colony at Lūna in 179 B. C. The commissioners assigned to each, fifty-one acres and a half of land (Liv. xli. 13).

P. Ælius Ligus, P. Ælii Līgūris, m. was elected consul with C. Pōpillius Lēnus in 174 B. C. They were both plebeians, if confidence can be placed in the consular calendar. In consequence of the senate wishing to reconsider the matter of the Līgūres which his colleague opposed, on account of the senate having censured with severity the cruelty of his brother, M. Pōpillius Lēnus, towards that nation, during his consulship in the former year, he joined Pōpillius in resisting this procedure, and the result was, that they and the senate were at variance the whole time they held that office. Their ferocity of temper and disregard of the orders of the senate, must have sunk them in the opinion of every patriotic citizen. They did not go to their provinces until threatened with a fine by two tribunes of the people, and neither performed that year any thing memorable (Liv. xlii. 9–26). Five years after, Ælius was sent ambassador to Illyricum (Liv. xlv. 17).

P. Ælius Pætus, P. Ælii Pæti, m. a Roman who was elected consul with C. Sūlpicius Lōngus in 86 B. C. A consideration of the power of the Romans, added to their generous conduct, induced the neighbouring nations to cultivate peace with them. A dispute between the Sidicini and Aurunci who were allies of Rome, obliged the Romans to take up arms, and the senate, displeased with the inactivity of the consuls, ordered a dictator to be nominated (Liv. viii. 15).—2. The master of the horse to Q. Fabius Ambustus in 321 B. C. Some irregularity annulled their appointment. At the distance of nineteen years, Livius mentions his election to the office of an augur, and he was one of the first plebeians who attained that appointment (ix. 7 seq.).—3. Obtained the praetorship when he was plebeian edile, and his colleague P. Villius Tappulus was elected in the same circumstances, which, from the way it is mentioned by Livius, appears to have been uncommon. C. Servilius Gémilus, the dictator, nominated him master of the horse, and he obtained the consulship with Cn. Cornélius Léntulus in 203 B. C. At the end of the second Punic war, the praetor of the city appointed him and other nine to distribute among the veterans of P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus, in the territory of the Samnites and Apūli, the lands which belonged to the Roman people. The consul named him and Sextus Ælius Pætus to regulate the colonists at Narnia, and to fill up their number. He had the honour of being chosen censor with P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus in 201 B. C., a proof both of his great respectability and influence, since his countrymen preferred him to many illustrious men who, at that time, stood candidates for the same office (Liv. xxix. 38 seq.).—4. An augur, who fell a victim to a pestilential disease which swept off an immense number of the Roman people in 176 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 36 seq.).

P. Ælius Tübëro, P. Æli Tübëronis, m. was elected a plebeian edile with L. Letōrius, and after they had entered on their office, some irregularity in their appointment compelled them to abdicate. Next year he obtained Sicily for his province, but nothing memorable occurred during his praetorship. A man of the same name obtained the office of city praetor in 179 B. C. It appears rather improbable that the historian referred to the same person, since a period of twenty-four years elapsed between the two elections. Commentators, however, suppose the same individual is mentioned in both instances (Liv. xxx. 39 seq.).

Q. Ælius, Q. Ælii, m. a tribune of the people, who opposed an order for obliging A. Manlius, the consul, to resign his office before the last of the Ides of March. Two of the tribunes keenly supported that proposal, yet the resistance of Ælius prevented its being passed (Liv. xli. 6).

Q. Ælius Lāmīa, Q. Æli Lāmīæ, m. a Roman of considerable eminence, to whom Horātius addresses several of his odes.

Q. Ælius Pætus, Q. Æli Pæti, m. an augur who stood candidate for the consulship in 218 B. C. The caprice of the Romans passed by Ælius, with other four candidates, and elected C. Attilius Serrānus q. v. alone (Liv. xxii. 35).—2. A pontiff who fell in the battle at Cannæ in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 21).—3. Chosen augur in room of P. Ælius Pætus, who died of the mortal epidemic which prevailed in 176 B. C. On being elected consul he obtained Gallia, France, for his province, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xli. 21 seq.). Valérius Máxi-mus seems in error with respect to Pætus (iv. 3).

Q. Ælius Tübëro, Q. Æli Tübëronis, m. a tribune of the people who proposed to the commons that two Latin colonies should be planted, one among the Bruttii, and another in the territory of the Thūrinii in 196 B. C. The people gave their sanction to this measure, and commissioners were appointed to transact the business, of whom he himself was one (Liv. xxxiv. 53).—2. A man to whom Përsëus, on his arrival in Italy, was given in charge as a state prisoner (Liv. xlv. 7, 8).—3. An annalist mentioned by Livius (iv. 23 seq.).

Sextus Ælius Cato, Sexti Æli Cātōnis, m. held the office of consul in the year 4, with C. Sentius Sātūrninus (Vel. Pat. ii. 103).

Sextus Ælius Pætus, Sexti Æli Pæti, m. obtained the curule edileship with M. Claudius Marcellus in 202 B. C. A vast quantity of grain from Africa put it in their power to sell it to the people at two asses a peck. Livius does not mention his praetorship, but relates that he obtained the consulship with T. Quinctius Flami-nius in 200 B. C. The first act of the new consuls was to convene the senate in the capitol, who fixed Macēdōnia and Itālia for the provinces of that year, and ordered the consuls to settle them by lot. Italy fell to Ælius, and he set out for Gallia, i. e. the north of Italy, where he performed nothing memorable, having spent the summer in compelling the people of Crēmōna and Plācēntia to return to their colonies, whence they had been driven by the calamities of war. In 196 B. C. he was elected censor with C. Cornélius Cēthēgus (Liv. xxxi. 50 seq.).

T. Ælius, T. Ælii, m. a military tribune of the third legion, who, with C. Ælius, distinguished himself in the recovery of the Roman camp from the Istri 180 B. C. (Liv. xli. 4).

Ællo, ōnis, m. (Storm), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 219).

Ællo, ūs, f. one of the Harpies mentioned by Ovidius (Met. xiii. 710).

Æmāthia. See Emāthia.

Æmilia, æ, f. wife of P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus (Liv. xxxviii. 57).—2. A vestal virgin who, with Licinia and Mārēla, was condemned for incest 116 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 63).

Emilia Lēpida, Emiliæ Lēpidae, f. a Roman lady whom the Emperor Augustus intended to marry to L. Caesar, one of his adopted sons. The death of the prince prevented the completion of that union. After being oftener than once married, her last husband, P. Quirinius, divorced her on account of her immoralities, and, after a lapse of many years, accused her of imposing upon him a supposititious child, of attempting to poison him, and of high treason. During the investigation she appeared at the public games with a number of Roman ladies, on purpose to excite the commiseration of the public; but the examination of the slaves discovered her crimes, and the senate pronounced against her sentence of banishment. She was the grand-daughter both of L. Cornélius Sulla and Cn. Pompeius Magnus (Tac. Ann. iii. 23, 24).—2. Daughter of Mānius Lēpidus, and wife of Drusus, son of Germānicus and Agrippina. L. Ælius Sē-jānus had an adulterous commerce with her, and she consented, at his suggestion, to carry a false charge against her husband to the Emperor Tiberius, who confined him to prison, where he died. Her crimes and immoralities made the public detest her, yet she escaped punishment, and even prosecution, during the lifetime of her father, who had no sooner expired than the informers brought her to trial for adultery with a slave. Her guilt appeared unquestionable, and in place of attempting a defence she executed justice on herself (Tac. Ann. vi. 40).—3. Granddaughter of Augustus, first contracted to the Emperor Claudius, by whom she was divorced a virgin, and afterwards became the wife of Ap. Junius Silanus, and mother of L. and M. Junius Silanus (Suet. Claud. 26. Tac. Ann. xiii. 1).

Æmilia Mūsa, Æmiliæ Mūsæ, f. a rich woman who died at Rome without heirs and without a will, in the year 17, whose property having fallen to the crown, the Emperor Tiberius gave to Æmilius Lepidus, from her appearing to belong to his family (Tac. Ann. ii. 48).

Æmiliānus, i. m. a surname derived from Æmilius, of which the first who bore it was L. Æmilius Paullus, whom the son of P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus adopted. See P. Cornēlius Scipio Æmiliānus, and C. Jūlius Æmiliānus.

Æmiliānus, i. m. a man of wit, of which Martialis has given a specimen (i. 51).

Æmilius, a. um. Æmilia gens, a clan of Romans, which included a number of families, viz. the Barbūlæ, Lēpīdī, Māmērci, Paulli, and Scauri. This clan traced their descent from Æmilius, son of Ascānus, but Plutarchus makes Māmērcus, son of Pýthāgoras, their founder, and adds, that he had the surname of Æmilius, from αιμιλος (blandus, lepidus). Could this definition be relied on, the word should be spelt Æmýlus. Æmilia dōmus (Manil. i. 794). Æmilia via, is a continuation of Flāminia via, from Arimīnum, Rimini, to Plācēntia, Placenza. It was made (187 B. C.) by M. Æmilius Lēpīdus, consul, hence its name. There was another road of this name which Strābo at the same place mentions, running through Pisæ to Sābāta and Derthon, Tortona, in Ligūria, the work of M. Æmilius Scaurus (307). Æmilia tribus (Liv. xxxviii. 36). Æmilius ludus, a school of gladiators, the property of Æmilius Lēpīdus (Hor. Art. Poet. 32). Æmilia rātis, the ship of L. Æmilius Paullus Mācēdōnīcus, in which he sailed to Rome after the conquest of Mācēdōnia (Prop. iii. 3. 8).

Æmilius, i. m. a man of bad morals, to whom Cātullus addresses his 97th poem.—2. A glutton described by Martialis (xii. 19).—3. A lawyer of great riches, whose magnificent appearance procured him much business, for which he received whatever sum he demanded, although both his abilities and pleading were very inferior to those of many of his poor brethren. He had, in the entrance to his house, a chariot of bronze, drawn by four stately horses, and a statue of himself blinking, seated on a spirited war-horse, in the act of throwing a javelin, and meditating battle. By blinking, Jūvénalis must have meant either that he had shut one eye to take a more certain aim, or that Æmilius had only one eye (Sat. vii. 124).—4. A Roman, who had been primipilus in the army of Germānicus in Germany in the year 16, but nothing of his personal history, or any other circumstance in his life, is known, unless Tacitus refers to the same person, (Ann. ii. 11 and iv. 42). In the latter instance he is described as bearing evidence against the Emperor Tiberius, and appears to have been a man of fortitude, whom the bawlings of the Emperor's friends could not silence. Adj. Æmilius, et, Æmiliānus, a. um. Æmilia monumenta (Tac. Ann. iii. 72). Æmiliūm gēnus secundum bonōrum civium (Tac. Ann. vi. 27). Æmiliāna prædia (Tac. Ann. xv. 40).

Æmilius Æliānus, Æmili Æliāni, m. a native of Cōrdūba, who was accused of speaking disrespectfully of Caesar. The Emperor only said, that if he heard it he would return it in kind, and in a higher degree (Suet. Aug. 51).

Æmilius Lēpīdus, Æmili Lēpīdi, m. a noble Roman, to whom the Emperor Tiberius gave the property of Æmilia Mūsa, who had died intestate, from her appearing to belong to his family (Tac. Ann. ii. 48).—2. Was the brother of Æmilia Lēpida, whose defence he undertook, when accused by her husband, P. Quirīnius. Æmilius, with L. Piso and Līvinīus Rēgūlus, became the advocates of Cn. Calpurnius Piso, in the year 20 (Tac. Ann. iii. 11, 22).

Æmilius Lōngīnus, Æmili Lōngīni, m. a Roman deserter from the first legion, whom Clāssicus sent to despatch Vocūla q. c. A body of the Picēntes killed him on account of that murder (Tac. Hist. iv. 59—62).

Æmilius Mācer, Æmili Mācri, m. a Roman poet born at Vērōna, Verona, was contemporary with Ovidius, and died in Asia, perhaps in the expedition which Tibullus mentions (ii. 6). He wrote a poem on the power of herbs, entitled Bōtānica, some books on ornithology, on serpents, and on the gods, besides annals, and a poem called Thēriaica, all of which are lost, except a few fragments.

That on the power of herbs, now existing, is the work of a modern author. Ovidius calls him Illūcus Mācer, from writing on Troy (Ep. Pont. iv. 16. 6). Mācer's name frequently occurs in the writings of Ovidius.

Æmilius Māmērcus, Æmili Māmērci, m. the first questor, according to Tacitus, who had Vālērīus Potitus for his colleague. In this statement Tacitus differs from Līvius and Diōnysius (Tac. Ann. xi. 22).

Æmilius Pācensis, Æmili Pācensis, m. one of the officers whom Otho appointed to command the army sent against Gallia Nārbonēnsis. Antōnius Nōvellus and Suedius Clēmēns were his colleagues. Otho had deprived Æmilius of his tribuneship, but from what cause history does not mention. Æmilius does not appear to have had the troops under proper discipline; for Tacitus informs us they bound him. This usage did not result from his timidity, since he was one of the few of any distinction who resisted the favours of Vitellius, when they broke into the capitol and burned it to the ground in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 87—iii. 73).

C. Æmilius, C. Æmili, m. was elected tribune of the soldiers with consular power, in 393 B. C., and carried on war against the Æqui when the troops under his command acted in a cowardly manner. Two years after, his countrymen elected him to the same office, and he had for his colleague

L. Lūcrētius. The Volsinīenses against whom they marched, made no resistance (Liv. v. 26 seq.).

L. Æmilius L. Æmili, m. obtained the consulship with Kæso Fābius in 482 B. C. Æmilius overthrew in battle the Volsci and the Æqui who had renewed hostilities. In his second consulship he compelled the Veīentes humbly to sue for peace. Livius says he obtained the consulship for a third time with Opiter Virgīnius, and the consular calendar agrees with him, only seems doubtful whether Opiter Virgīnius or Vōpiscus Jūlius was his colleague, and the historian himself appears uncertain (Liv. ii. 42—54). In the consular calendar he is called L. Æmilius Māmērcīnus.—2. A tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, first elected in 388 B. C. and was at four subsequent periods appointed to the same office. The nobles had gained such an ascendancy over the commons at the last comitia, that they continued to exert their influence by declaring war against the Lātini and Volsci, and placed L. Æmilius and P. Vālērīus at the head of the army. A heavy rain put a stop to their first engagement with the enemy, next day the battle being renewed the Romans gained a complete victory, but not without considerable loss occasioned by the bravery and vigorous exertion of these confederate forces (Liv. vi. 1—32).—3. An interrex in 355 B. C. (Liv. vii. 17).—4. The fourteenth interrex in succession, who appointed C. Pētēlius Libo and L. Pāpīrius Mugillānus consuls in 325 B. C. (Liv. viii. 23).—5. One of the five ambassadors sent to Carthage to require an explanation, whether Hānībal had attacked Sāgūntum of his own accord, or by an order of the senate. The result of this embassy was a declaration of war, and both parties made vigorous preparation for hostilities in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 18).—6. An officer in Cæsar's army, who commanded a part of the Gallic cavalry.

L. Æmilius Lēpīdus Paullus, L. Æmili Lēpīdi Paulli, m. a Roman of high rank, who, in early life, commenced a prosecution against L. Sērgius Cātīlina upon Lex Plantia de vi (Sal. Cat. 31). See M. Plautius Silvānus. He was the brother of M. Æmilius Lēpīdus, who formed with Augustus and M. Antōnius that conspiracy against the state, which is usually denominated the SECOND TRIUMVIRATE. In consequence of his rank and influence, he made a considerable figure about the time the man whom he had arraigned raised the standard of rebellion in Italy. Æmilius held the consulship with C. Claudius Mārcellus (52 B. C.), the year that the censors expelled C. Crispus Sālūstius, the historian, from the senate. He has no title to be ranked among patriots, since C. Jūlius Cæsar bought him over to his interest with a large sum of money (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 29). In the infamous confederacy already mentioned, his brother M. Æmilius Lēpīdus allowed him to be included in the proscription 45 B. C. and M. Antōnius acted in the same manner to his maternal uncle L. Jūlius Cæsar (Liv. Ep. 120).

L. Æmilius Māmērcīnus, L. Æmili Māmērcīni, m. obtained the consulship with L. Sēxtius the first plebeian who held that office. Their election took place in 365 B. C. Three years after, he was re-elected consul.

A general sickness pervaded the people that year, and, to put an end to the pestilence, they appointed L. Mānlius Impēriōsus, dictator, to drive the nail into the right side of the temple of Jūpiter. The senate appointed Æmilius, master of the horse to C. Jūlius nominated dictator on a false alarm of war with the Etrurians in 351 B. C. (Liv. vii. 1—21).—2. Master of the horse to M. Vālērīus Corvus in 341 B. C. Afterwards he obtained the consulship, an office to which he was again appointed, a considerable time after the expiry of his second consulship (Liv. vii. 39 seq.).

L. Æmilius Papus, L. Æmili Papi, m. obtained the consulship with C. Atilius Rēgulus in 227 B. C. and conquered the Gauls under Britōmārus whom he disarmed, and the other Gallic princes in the capitol. Before he was appointed one of three public bankers, he had likewise been censor (Liv. xx. 36 seq. Flor. ii. 4).—2. Appointed prætor and obtained Sicily in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 38).—3. A decemvir Sacrorum who died in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 28).

L. Æmilius Paullus, L. Æmili Paulli, m. who had formerly been consul with M. Livius, and conquered Dēmētrius, king of the Illīrii, is by a powerful exertion of the patricians appointed colleague to C. Tērēntius Vārro, a plebeian, whose ignorance and rashness Q. Fābius Māximus, the late dictator, perceived, and against which he earnestly exhorted him to contend. Having, on their receiving the command of the army, formed very different plans, their opinions scarcely in any thing agreed. Hence they resolved that each should have the full command of the forces for one day alternately. His object was to adopt the plan of Q. Fābius Māximus, that of his colleague to engage the enemy as soon as possible. The battle of Cānne was the consequence of this thoughtless impetuosity, in which Æmilius displayed great bravery and generalship, but the ignorance of his colleague rendered both useless. After an immense carnage and a total retreat of the Romans, C. Lentulus a military tribune, having seen Æmilius sitting on a stone, covered with blood, offered him his horse. The consul refused the generous grant, desired him to save his own life, to request the senate to fortify the city, and to tell Q. Fābius Māximus that he approved of his directions, and died in the observance of them. As he thus spoke, a party of the enemy came up, and not knowing the consul, overwhelmed him with their weapons. He had held the office of pontifex, to which office Q. Fābius Māximus was elected in his stead (Liv. xxii. 35—49. Eutrop. iii. 10).—2. A Roman of great distinction, whom Livius first mentions on his appointment with C. Platorius and Cn. Octāvius, to plant a colony at Crōto, Cotrone, 196 B. C. When plebeian edile with M. Æmilius Lēpīdus in the following year, he placed gilded shields in the highest part of the temple of Jūpiter out of the fines paid by the farmers of the public pastures, built a colonnade on the east side of the gate Trīgēmīna, another from the gate Fōntinālis to the temple of Mars, that it might serve as a passage to Campus Mārtius, and erected a wharf on Tiber, the Tevere. Two years after he was elected prætor, and obtained the south of Spain for his province,

The Lusitani in the country of the Västiani defeated him near the town Lyeon, but he afterwards in a pitched battle routed the Lusitani, killed eighteen thousand, made upwards of three thousand prisoners, and carried their camp by storm. In 187 B. C. he failed in his canvass for the consulship, which he had also done before, and he did not carry his election till 184 B. C. when he had Cn. Baebius Tamphilus for his colleague. The senate decreed Ligúria a province for both consuls, and, during that year, nothing memorable occurred. Having been continued in the command, he obtained a complete victory over the Ligúres Ingauni, and three days after the battle the whole tribe surrendered, sued for peace, and gave hostages. At his request the senate allowed him to disband the army, and to enter the city in triumph. In the procession he carried twenty-five golden crowns, without any other gold or silver, had a number of Ligurian princes led before his chariot, and gave each soldier three hundred asses. On obtaining the consulship a second time Mæcêdônia fell to his lot as his province. He ascertained the true state of that country before he left Rome, and, on arriving at the Roman camp, he effected considerable improvement in the military exercises, addressed the army, and even the veterans bore evidence to his military knowledge, by confessing that they had been instructed by what he had said. Every movement of the army in this difficult country, was the result of cautious inquiry and consideration. C. Octāvius, prætor, who commanded the fleet in the Archipelago, cruised along the coast, alarming the enemy, and ready for active operation, wherever his services might be required. The Macedonians disputed the ground as he advanced, and it was not without considerable loss that he at last brought on a general engagement, and gained a complete victory, killing twenty thousand, and taking five thousand prisoners whom he found straggling over the country. Six thousand who had escaped to Pydna, fell likewise into his hands. The joy of the consul sunk into sorrow on returning to the Roman camp after the victory, for the loss of his younger son, P. Æmilius Scipio afterwards called Africanus q. v. Eagerness of pursuit had carried the youth to a great distance, and the evening was far advanced when he presented himself in safety to his father. On the third day after the battle, Persens reached Amphipolis, Jenikeu, whence he sent ambassadors with the rod of peace to the consul. Meantime Hippias, Mædon and Pantauchus, chief of the king's friends, surrendered Beroa, Cara-Veria, to which they had fled from the battle. Thessalonica, Pella, Allahkilissia, and almost every city of Mæcêdônia opened their gates, and owned submission to the Romans. In obedience to the order of the senate who continued him in command, he adjusted the affairs of Mæcêdônia, made a tour of Greece with his son Scipio, and Athénæus, brother of king Eumènes. He visited almost every town and place of any note in that country, returned to the army, and received the children of Persens whom he had ordered to be brought from Samothrace to Amphipolis, and treated the whole with kindness. Seated on the tribunal, he published the regulations appointed by the senate in the Latin language, which Octāvius translated into Greek. He divided Mæcêdônia into four districts, and announced the form of government to be adopted in that country. With such judgment and propriety did he frame the laws, that when Livius wrote nearly two hundred years after, time and experience had suggested no improvement. Setting out for Italy he arrived at the Tevere in a royal galley of prodigious size, which had sixteen tiers of oars, and was ornamented with Macedonian spoils. The senate readily granted him a triumph, of which the personal enmity of Ser. Sulpicius Gálba, a military tribune of the second legion, had nearly deprived him. The soldiers joined in that opposition, partly from the strictness of his discipline, and partly from their not being allowed to share in the royal spoil, which he had deposited in the treasury. M. Sereñus Genucius addressed the people in his behalf, and secured him that well merited distinction. No accurate description of the triumph has been transmitted, as the chapter of Livius in which it was recorded, is imperfect. Of his four sons, one died a few days before, and another a few days after, his triumph; the other two were adopted into other families. He describes in a speech to the people his own situation with great simplicity, manliness and interest. He died in 163 B. C. so poor that, notwithstanding his great conquests, he scarcely left property enough to repay his wife's fortune (Liv. xxxiv. 45—Ep. 46. Eutrop. iv. 6, 7).—3. One of the ten ambassadors sent to adjust the affairs of Asia in 191 B. C. He opposed the claim of Cn. Mânlius for a triumph over the Ambracians, which, however, after great opposition, he at last obtained (Liv. xxxvii. 55 seq.).—4. Was consul in 52 B. C., the year in which Sallustius the historian, was expelled the senate. Caesar found it impossible to bribe his colleague C. Claudius Mârcellus, but a gift of fifteen hundred talents overcame the opposition of Æmilius who had formerly been violently inimical to Caesar (Ap. Bel. Civ. 443).

L. Æmilius Rêgillus, L. Æmili Rêgilli, m. obtained the prætorship and the command of the fleet in 193 B. C. At this time, the Romans were engaged in war with Antiochus, king of Syria, who had a considerable number of ships. Æmilius visited several of the islands in the Archipelago, attacked the cities in alliance with that monarch, and gained a signal victory over the Syrian fleet at Myonæus. This successful engagement gave him the dominion of the sea. At Chios he refitted the ships damaged in the battle, despatched L. Æmilius Scaurus to the Dardanelles with thirty ships to carry over the consul L. Cornélius Scipio, who marched against Antiochus with a powerful army, and gave a part of the spoils to the Rhodians, whose bravery had enabled him to crush the naval power of the enemy. By force of arms he took several towns, and obliged several states to sue for peace, which weakened the strength of Antiochus and added greatly to the conveniences and resources of his countrymen. The senate unanimously decreed him a triumph for his important and valuable services, and he exhibited in the procession forty-nine golden crowns, and an immense quantity of coin (Liv. xxxvi. 45—xxxvii. 58. Flor. ii. 8). To him Justinus refers (xxxvi. vi).

L. Æmilius Scaurus, L. Æmili Scauri, m. served under L. Æmilius Reginus in 192 B. C. By his commander he was sent with thirty ships to Hællspontus, the Dardanelles, to carry the army over that strait into Asia (Liv. xxxvii. 31).

Mamercus Æmilius, Mamerci Æmili, m. was appointed a military tribune with consular authority, 438 B. C., and soon after that nomination, in consequence of a war with the Veientes and Fidæates, had the honour of being appointed dictator. He named L. Quinctius Cincinnatus master of the horse, and ordered T. Quinctius Bærbatus Capitulinus and M. Fabius Vibulanus to attend him as lieutenant-generals in his expedition against these states, which he conquered, and had the honour of a triumph. He obtained the same office a second time, when all the states of Etruria were expected to take up arms against the Romans, at the solicitation of the Veientes. At this time he named A. Postumius Tübærtus, master of the horse, and made great preparations for the campaign; but the Tuscans having refused to join the Veientes, there was no war, and therefore he disbanded the soldiers. Æmilius carried a law restricting the censorship to one year and a half. Enraged at this limitation of authority, the censors degraded him to a lower tribe, and, increasing his taxes eight-fold, made him a Civis Ærurius, i. e. a citizen, so far only as he paid taxes. No influence in the state, except his own, would have deterred the common people from offering violence to the censors for this cruel and unjust treatment. A. Cornélius Cossus, when tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, 431 B. C., named him again dictator, on the army, commanded by the other three tribunes, having been defeated by the Veientes, in consequence of these three commanders disagreeing among themselves. The dictator named A. Cornélius Cossus master of the horse, and his bravery contributed greatly to the defeat of the enemy, over whom he obtained a triumph (Liv. iv. 16–34).

Mamercus Æmilius Lepidus Livianus, Mamerci Æmili Lepidi Liviani, m. held the consulship with Decius Junius Brutus in 79 B. C. When lieutenant-general twelve years before his consulship, he put to death all the Italians whom he found at Asculum, Ascoli (Liv. Ep. 76). To him Sallustius alludes (Frag. lib. 3).

Mamercus Æmilius Mamercinus, Mamerci Æmili Mamercini, m. a Roman consul, the colleague of C. Vælerius Põtitus 409 B. C. Livius mentions his election, afterwards his name does not occur in the writings of that historian (iv. 53).

Mamercus Æmilius Scaurus, Mamerci Æmili Scauri, m. an orator of great distinction, who excited the resentment of the Emperor Tiberius by a bold and sarcastic remark. Against C. Silanus, proconsul of Asia, he preferred a charge of rapine and extortion. Tacitus says he tarnished the lustre of his ancestors by degenerating into an informer, and prosecuting for constructive crimes like those against Silanus. The historian makes him of consular rank, and speaks in higher terms of his eloquence and nobility, than of his moral conduct. He wrote a tragedy, on which Macro, by a strained construction, founded a charge of disloyalty, on which two informers, by profession, accused him of adultery with the younger Livia, and of magical incantations. His wife Sextia, animated him to an act of bravery against his own life, and she died displaying the same resolution which she had recommended to her husband (Tac. Ann. i. 13–vi. 29).

Mamilius Æmilius Mamercinus, Mamili Æmili Mamercini, m. a consular tribune, who, with his colleagues, first invested Vei in 404 B. C. Two years after he was re-elected, and a third time in 400 B. C. (Liv. iv. 61 seq.).

M. Æmilius, M. Æmili, m. appointed a military tribune, with consular authority, in 390 B. C. (Liv. v. 32).—2. Was raised to the consulship in 303 B. C. A war with the Æqui excited such an alarm at Rome, that C. Junius Bubbæus was nominated dictator, who, in the first engagement, reduced the Æqui to submission, returned in triumph to Rome, and, on the eighth day, dedicated the temple to Health. Æmilius compelled the Grecians, who had arrived on the coast of Italy, under Clæonymus, and had taken Thuria, which then belonged to the Sallentinii, to flee to their ships, and to retire from Italy without hazarding a second engagement (Liv. x. 1, 2).—3. A Roman prætor, who had Sicily for his province in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 49).—4. Prætor Urbæus, appointed Cn. Papius, and Kæso Quinctius Flamininus, to contract for the building of the temple to Concord, in the citadel (Liv. xxii. 9 seq.).—5. The brother of L. Æmilius Reginus, prætor, who died at Sámos in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 22).

M. Æmilius Lepidus, M. Æmili Lepidi, m. obtained the consulship twice. He had for his colleague, M. Põbliciüs Mællæolus, in 234 B. C. His three sons, Lucius, Marcus, and Quintus, celebrated funeral games in honour of their father, which continued for three days, and, during that time, they exhibited twenty-two pairs of gladiators, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 30).—2. After holding the curule edileship, was appointed prætor Përëgrinus, and afterwards decemvir Sacrorum. Luceria became his province, and his judicial authority was assigned to M. Arillus q. v. (Liv. xxiv. 43 seq.).—3. The youngest of the three commissioners sent to Ptolæmeus, king of Egypt, to announce the conquest of Hæmibal, to thank him for his steady alliance to the Romans in times of great distress, and to request a continuance of the same conduct, should they be compelled to engage in war with Philippus, king of Mæcedonia. According to Justinus he was to act as tutor to the young king (xxx. 3). From Alexândria he went to that monarch, complained of his making war on Attalus, and other allies of the Romans, and spoke with a plainness which sounded strange in the royal ear. Philippus regarded the rights of an ambassador, and dismissed him without either insult or injury. The office of edile he and his colleague L. Æmilius Paullus discharged by minute attention to its various departments, fined the farmers of the public pastures, which enabled them to erect a wharf on the Tevere, two porticoes, one of which served as a road to Cæmpus Martius, and placed gilded shields in the temple of Jupiter. In his prætorship he obtained Sicily for his province, and had C. Flamininus for his colleague in the consulship 189 B. C. The contention and animosity which existed between these consuls, occupies more of the pages of Livius than their military achievements, although the latter gave evidence both of martial abilities and personal valour. Their cordiality in the censorship compensated, in some measure, for their unmanly disagreement in the consulship. Æmilius had six times the honour of being Prince of the senate. His activity and zeal for the public good raised him high in the favour of the citizens, who fined a tribune of the people for contending unjustly with this noble Roman, who, to his other dignities, added that of Pontifex Maximus. He restricted his funeral expenses to a very small sum, assigning as a reason, that great men should be decorated by a train of images, not by costly magnificence (Liv. xxxi. 2: xliii. 15). To him Juvénalis refers (Sat. vi. 264).—4. Son of the former, a military tribune in the army of Scipio Asiaticus (Just. xxxi. 8).—5. Surnamed Porcina, consul with C. Hostilius Mancinus 139 B. C. The Vaccæi defeated him in Spain (Liv. Ep. 56). Velleius Paterculus says he was severely fined by the censors, because he had hired a house at a high rent; but Valérius Máximus says, for building an expensive house in Alsénsis ager (Vel. Pat. ii. 10. Val. Max. viii. 1).—6. Consul 80 B. C., and attempted to rescind the acts of L. Cornélius Sūlla, which gave rise to a new war, in which his colleague, Q. Lutatius Catulus, drove him out of Italy. He lost his life in making every effort to excite a war in Sardinia (Liv. Ep. 90. Eutrop. vi. 5. Flor. iii. 23).—7. Held the consulship with L. Volcātius Tullus 68 B. C. During that year a prosecution was raised against the consuls elect, P. Autrōnius Pætus and P. Cornélius Sūlla (Sal. Frag.). This Æmilius must not be confounded with the subject of next article.—8. A Roman of an illustrious family, who, with Augustus and M. Antonius, formed the second triumvirate. His ambition was excessive, but he was equally destitute of mental abilities and military talents. His cruelty in the proscription was not less bloody than that of his ruthless colleagues; for he even consented to the death of his own brother, L. Æmilius Paullus. Africa was the division of the empire which fell to his share, but his soldiers wholly deserting him went over to the camp of Augustus, who obliged him to abdicate the power which he possessed as a triumvir. He afterwards withdrew, by order of Augustus, to Circē, Circello, an inconsiderable town on the coast of Lātium, where he passed the remainder of his days in obscurity and peace. But it does not appear from Suetōnius, that, as some have asserted, he was kept there as a prisoner under a military guard. From Tacitus it appears that Augustus acted with his usual insidiousness, for he states that Lēpidus was undone by treachery (Ann. i. 10). Adj. Lēpidānus, a. um. Lēpidānum bellum (Sal. Frag.).—9. Son of the triumvir and Jūlia, sister of M. Jūlius Brūtus, entered into a conspiracy against Augustus, attempted to make war, was overpowered and killed 31 B. C. (Liv.

Ep. 139).—10. Son of L. Æmilius Paullus and Cornēlia, daughter of Scribōnia by her former husband. By descent on his mother's side he was nearly allied to the Cæsars. From Tacitus it appears that Augustus considered him fit for the Roman government. Of his martial abilities Velleius Paterculus has given a decisive proof. That historian seems to have had a high opinion of his character and attainments (ii. 114).—11. A noble Roman, who married Drūsilla after the death of her first husband L. Cassius Longinus, and was condemned by the Emperor Cālgūla for entering into a conspiracy against his life (Suet. Cal. 24 seq.).

M. Æmilius Lēpidus Mnestor, M. Æmilius Lēpidi Mnestēris, m. an actor of pantomimes, mentioned by Suetōnius in his life of Cālgūla (36).

M. Æmilius Nūmida, M. Æmili Nūmidæ, m. a decemvir of sacred rites, at whose death, 213 B. C., M. Æmilius Lēpidus was elected to his office (Liv. xxvi. 23).

M. Æmilius Pāpus, M. Æmili Pāpi, m. was chosen dictator, in room of Q. Fabius Ambustus, in 311 B. C. L. Valérius Flaccus was master of the horse, but they did not hold the election, and recourse was had to an interrex (Liv. ix. 7).—2. Chief Cūrio, who died 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 6).

M. Æmilius Paullus, M. Æmili Paulli, m. was master of the horse to M. Valérius Máximus, in whose absence, going out to forage, he allowed himself to be surprised by the enemy, and fled shamefully to his camp with considerable loss, in 203 B. C. (Liv. x. 3).—2. A noble Roman, who held the consulship with Ser. Fūlvius Pætius Nōbīllor in 257 B. C. During their consulship M. Attilius Rēgulus was taken prisoner, in Africa, by Xānthippus, a Lacedæmonian general (Liv. Ep. 18). Both consuls sailed for the African coast, having under their command a fleet of three hundred ships, with which they defeated the Carthaginians in a naval engagement, and Æmilius sunk a hundred and four ships belonging to the enemy, besides taking thirty with soldiers on board. He either killed or made prisoners fifteen thousand of the enemy, and enriched his soldiers with the abundance of the spoils. A famine prevented the conquest of Africa, for the army could not remain longer in that country for want of provisions. On their passage home, a storm destroyed three hundred and eighty-four ships, and they, with difficulty, preserved the remaining eighty. This calamitous disaster diminished the joy of the victory, but did not dispirit the Romans, who immediately built two hundred new ships (Eutrop. ii. 22). Polybius attributes that great loss to the rashness of the consuls, rather than to the violence of the tempest, for the sailors had warned them of the danger they would run, on the coast of Sicily at that time; but, flushed with victory, they disregarded the counsel which might have saved the whole fleet.

M. Æmilius Rēgillus, M. Æmili Rēgilli, m. was nominated consul with T. Otacilius in 217 B. C. Q. Fābius made a powerful speech against their election, and called back the prerogative century to vote again, when Q. Fābius Máximus and M. Claudius Marcellus were elected. At that time Æmilius was Flāmen Quirīnālis, and he died Flāmen Mar-Gallis in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 7 seq.).—2. Brother to the prætor L. Æmilius Regillus, who died in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 22).

M. Æmilius Scaurus, M. Æmili Scauri, m. a Roman nobleman of great ability, who held the consulship with M. Cæcilius Metellus 116 B. C., having succeeded against P. Rutilius, when they mutually accused each other of bribery. He triumphed over the Carui, and made the road from Placentia, Placenza, to Parma, Parma, called via Æmilia. He had the honour of being appointed Prince of the senate, and would have ranked in history with the very first characters of the Roman state, had not his splendid talents been tarnished with avarice, and other degrading passions. When Jugurtha had murdered Hiempsal, he exerted his powerful eloquence in vain to persuade the senate to punish that iniquitous outrage. Adherbal having been driven from his paternal kingdom, and besieged in Cirta, Constantina, by the usurper, a deputation from the senate, among whom was M. Æmilius Scaurus, sailed for Africa, with instructions to threaten the vengeance of the Roman people, unless he discontinued the blockade. Sallustius states that Jugurtha waited on the commissioners, lest he should offend M. Æmilius Scaurus, whose displeasure he dreaded most, a proof of his high character and respectability. That commission failed in its object, and Adherbal surrendered, by advice of the Italians, who defended the town, to Jugurtha, who, in violation of the treaty, put him instantly to death by torture. For this murder, and for contempt of the order of the senate, war was declared against Jugurtha, and L. Calpurnius Bestia, consul, appointed to command the troops in Africa, in whose army Æmilius held the office of lieutenant-general. Jugurtha bribed to his interest both the consul and his lieutenant-general, who concluded a dishonourable treaty with him, which the senate hesitated to ratify from dread of the commons, and hostilities, chiefly through means of C. Memmius, recommenced. The influence of Æmilius procured his appointment as one of the three Commissioners, who were named to inquire into that disgraceful transaction, in which he had a principal share, and he, among others, agreed to the condemnation of L. Calpurnius Bestia (Sal. Jug. 15—40). He afterwards held the office of Censor, and the consulship a second time. His name occurs often in the writings of Cicero, who speaks in high terms of his virtues, abilities, and achievements. He wrote three books recording the principal occurrences and transactions of his life, which the Orator commends, and considers equal to Xenophon's life of Cyrus. To this Juvénalis alludes (Sat. ii. 35).

Paulus Æmilius Lepidus, Pauli Æmili Lepidi, m. a noble Roman, who held the censorship 32 B. C. The Emperor Claudius took upon himself the censorship, after it had been discontinued from the year already mentioned (Suet. Claud. 16).

Q. Æmilius Barbula, Q. Æmili Barbula, m. was elected consul with C. Junius Bubulcus 317 B. C., and six years after, he had the honour of being re-elected with the same colleague. In his first consulship, he took Nérulum, Rotondo, a town of Lucania, and in his second consulship the war against the Etrusci fell to his lot, when he marched to the relief of Sutrium, at that time besieged by the Tuscans. About sunrise the line of battle was formed on both sides, and the hostile armies continued to gaze at each other till noon, each waiting for the other party to begin. At last the Tuscans raised the shout, and a bloody battle ensued, in which Roman valour obtained the victory (Liv. ix. 20—30).

Q. Æmilius Cerrētānus, Q. Æmili Cerrētani, m. obtained the consulship with C. Sulpicius Longus (II.) in 323 B. C. The war against the Apulians fell to his lot, in which he desolated their country without coming to an engagement, for the enemy declined meeting him in the field. In his second consulship he had L. Papius Cursor (III.) for his colleague, and he conquered the Ferentini in a single engagement. The city to which the enemy had fled surrendered, and gave hostages agreeably to the terms of their capitulation. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, dictator, appointed him master of the horse in the war against the Samnites 315 B. C. Here his incautious bravery cost him his life, for having killed with a single stroke of his spear the general of the enemy, he roused the fury of the troops, who darted their weapons at him, when the brother of the fallen general, transported with grief and rage, dragged the master of the horse from his seat and slew him. The Samnites had retained possession of his body, from his having fallen in the midst of them, unless the Roman horsemen had dismounted and compelled them to retire (Liv. viii. 37 seq.). Some Annalists call him Q. Aulus Cerrētānus, Livius uses both names.

Tib. Æmilius Mamercinus, Tib. Æmili Mamercini, m. obtained the consulship with L. Valerius Publicola Potitus (II.), 470 B. C. He conducted the war in the country of the Sabines which he laid waste, the enemy not daring to give him battle, until roused by the burning, not only of the farm houses, but of the villages. They advanced against the troops employed in these depredations. Victory rather inclined to the side of the Romans, and Æmilius, considering the removal of their camp to a place of greater safety a proof of their being vanquished, withdrew his troops from their country without having accomplished any thing decisive. In his second consulship, only three years after, Æmilius recommended assigning certain lands to the commons, which his colleague, Q. Fabius, opposed, and terminated the desperate contests between the two orders of the state, by suggesting that a colony should be planted at Antium, to which all parties agreed (Liv. ii. 61 seq.).—2. One of the five appointed to enquire into the interest of money, which produced dissension between the two orders of the state. The Romans gave them the name of bankers, and Livius assures us that they acted with such equity and diligence, as rendered them deserving of having their names recorded with honour in every history of that period (Liv. vii. 21).—3. Obtained the consulship with Q. Publius Philo in 338 B. C. Over the Pedani, supported by the Tiburtes, Prenestini and Véliterni, he gained several battles. The senate decreed a triumph to his colleague, which Æmilius no sooner heard than he discontinued the war, marched to Rome, and demanded the same honour, which the senate refused from being offended at his conduct. Enraged at this disappointment, he deserted the senate, and made harangues against the patricians. To terminate his consulship, the senate ordered a dictator to be named against the Latins, who had commenced hostilities, and, to thwart that body, Æmilius named his colleague (Liv. viii. 12).

Æmon, ðnis, m. the father of Lærces q. v. Æmônides, æ, m. Lærces (Hom. II. xvii. 467).

Æmônia, v. Hæmônia, æ, f. an ancient name of Thessalia, Thessaly, from Æmon, v. Hæmon, a native of Thèbe, Theba, who, on being informed that Antigônè, daughter of Ædipus, king of that city, with whom he was passionately in love, had been put to death by her father's orders, killed himself on her tomb. Bætilus Hæmon, so called from the place of his birth (Prop. ii. 8. 21).

Nivâlis Æmônia, snowy Thessaly; from its northern situation (Hor. Od. i. 37. 20).

Some have applied Æmônia in this place to Thræcia, deriving the name from Hæmus the mountain, but both against analogy and universal practice. Æmônidæ, arum, m. Thessalians (Val. Flacc. iv. 506). Æmônis, Idis, f. of Æmônia, applied to females or nouns feminine. Carmen Æmônidum, the incantation of Thessalian women, who excelled in sorcery (Luc. Phar. vi. 480). Adj. Æmônus, v. Hæmônus, a, um, Thessalian.

Æmônâ arcus, the Thessalian bows, i. e. the sign Sagittarius q. v. (Ov. Met. ii. 81).

Æmônus vir, Achilles (Prop. iii. 1. 26).

Æmônus equus, a Thessalian horse, such as Achilles used (Prop. ii. 10. 2).

Æmus, v. Hæmus, i. m. a Grecian comedian, to whom Juvénalis applies the epithet soft (Sat. iii. 99), perhaps from his being suited to the performance of female character, or from his soft and delicate manner of repeating lascivious speeches (Sat. vi. 197).

Æmus, i, m. a mountain of Thræcia. See Hæmus.

Ænâria, æ, f. an island off the coast of Cæpônia, Campagna, called also Iuârimè and Pithècusa q. v. (Stat. Syl. iii. 5. 104).

Ænâ, v. Enia, æ, f. a town of Mæcêdônia, built by Ænêas, at which a stated sacrifice was yearly performed with great solemnity, in honour of the founder. It was about fifteen miles distant from Thessalônica, Saloniki, on Sinus Thèrmâicus, the Gulf of Saloniki. Inh. Ænêates, um, m. (Liv. xl. 4 seq.).

Ænêas, æ, m. an illustrious Trojan Prince, the son of Anchises and Vênus. He married Crêusa, a daughter of Priâmus, king of Troy, by whom he had a son, Iûlus, afterwards called Ascânus; according to some, two sons, probably making Iûlus and Ascânus different (Aur. Vic. Or. 9). Ancient authors are not agreed in opinion respecting the character of this prince. His bravery and patriotism are extolled by some, whilst others charge him with betraying his country to the Greeks, and preserving his life by that traitorous conduct. This accusation rests perhaps on no better ground than the surmise of Homer, that he was at variance with his father-in-law. He displayed great bravery in the night in which the Greeks took Troy, and, after making many gallant but unsuccessful efforts, he quitted his native city, having his aged father on his shoulders, his son Ascânus in the one hand, and the household gods in the other, hence Ovidius calls him pénütiger (Met. xv. 450). Diômêdes, in his speech to the ambassador of the Rutulians, affirms that if there had been two such other men as Hector and Ænêas within the Trojan walls, they would not only have defended their native city, but would have conquered Greece (Virg. Æn. xi. 285—290). The achievements of Ænêas, from the destruction of his native city, to his settlement in Lâtium q. v. have been celebrated by Virgil, the Prince of Latin Poets. From the Hero, the immortal Bard has called his poem Ænêis, Idos, f. On arriving at Lâtium, he entered into a treaty with Lâtinus, defeated the Rutulians, married the daughter of that king, and built a city which he called Lâvinium in honour of his wife. He afterwards fell in a war against Mészentius q. v. (Liv. i. 2. Just. xliii. 1). Ænêades, æ, m. Ascânus (Virg. Æn. ix. 653). Pâreûlas Ænêas, a little Ænêas, i. e. a son of Ænêas (Virg. Æn. iv. 329), of which Juvenal makes a humorous application (Sat. v. 139). Ænêadæ, arum, m. the Trojans, or, the Romans. Adj. Ænêus, a, um. Ænêia nutrix, Caiëta (Virg. Æn. vii. 1).

Ænêas Silvius, Ænêe Silvii, m. the son of Silvius, and father of Lâtinus Silvius. Lâvius says, that all the Alban kings, after him, had the surname of Silvius (l. 3). According to Diônýsius of Hâlicarnâssus he reigned thirty-one years.

Ænêia, æ, f. Ænê, a town situated upon a river falling into the Mæander, about twelve miles distant from Binarbashy, retaining the name of Ænêas. Near it is a stupendous tumulus called Ænê Tep, literally Ænêas' tomb.

Ænêsidâmus, i, m. a man celebrated by Pindârus (Ol. ii. 84).

Ænêsidêmus, i, m. called Dýmaus from Dýma q. v., commanded the garrison of the Achæi, which was in Argos at the time that city was betrayed to Philôcles, a general of Philippus, king of Mæcêdônia. To save his soldiers, overpowered by numbers, who seemed resolved to die in defence of the place, he entered into a treaty with Philôcles, that they should be allowed to retire in safety. After the agreement was concluded, Ænêsidêmus and a few adherents stood with their arms in the same posture without offering to depart. Philôcles enquired what he meant, and he immediately replied, to die in defence of the city of which he had obtained the command. By order of Philôcles some Thracians instantly discharged their javelins at them, on which Ænêsidêmus and all his men fell (Liv. xxxii. 25).

Ænêus, ðos, m. the son of Apollo and Stîlbê, quitted his native country Thessalia, Thessaly, and settled on Hellêspôntus, the Dardanelles, where he married Ænêtê, daughter of Eüssôrus, king of Thræcia, by whom he had Cýzicus q. v. Ænêidæ, arum (sing. Ænêides, æ), m. the Cýziceni, so called from the father of their king (Val. Flacc. iii. 4).

Ænlânes, um, m. a people who seem to have inhabited different places at different times. When they assisted the Ætôli, and Philippus, king of Mæcêdônia, destroyed their crops, they lived on Sinus Mâllæus, the Gulf of Zeiton, likewise called Sinus Ænlânium (Liv. xxviii. 5).

Ænippē, es, f. daughter of Endōrus, distinguished by her beauty (Orph. 498).

Ænios, i, m. a Pæonian, killed by Achilles (Hom. II. xxi. 210).

Ænus, i, f. Enō, a town of Thrācia, Romania, built by Ænēs, which bravely resisted the attack of Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia (202 B. C.), but of which, at last, he got possession by the treachery of Gānēmēdes, a prefect of Ptōlēmēus, king of Egypt (Liv. xxxi. 16). From this town Q. Fabius Lābēo, commander of the Roman fleet in the Archipelago, ordered the garrison of Antiochus, king of Syria, to depart, that the state might be left free (Liv. xxxvii. 60). The Romans afterwards plundered Ænus, in consequence of the inhabitants continuing obstinately in arms. Inh. Ænēi, orum, m. (Liv. xxxi. 31), probably the same with Ænii (Liv. xxxvii. 33).—2. A town of Æolis (Herod. iv. 90).—3. m. the Inn, a river which takes its rise in the Alps, in the country of the Grisons, traverses Tyrol and Bavaria, and, after passing Kufstein, Etingen and Braunau, falls into the Danube at Passau. In ancient times it formed the boundary between the Rheti and Norici (Tac. Hist. iii. 5).

Æōlia, æ, v. Æōlis, Idis, f. anciently called Mýlia, of which the part adjoining to Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, had the name of Trōas from its chief city Trōja; was a considerable district of Asia Minor, Natolia, bounded on the north by Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, on the east by Bithynia, on the south by Lydia, and on the west by Mæcē Ægēum, the Archipelago, and Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles. Inh. Æōlii, orum, et Æōles, um, m. originally called Pēlāsgēi. Strābo informs us that the inhabitants of all Græcia, Greece, north of the Isthmus of Corinth, were known by the name of Æōles, except the Mēgārēnses, Athēnienses and Dōriēnses; hence Lūcānus calls the ancient Thesaliāns, Æōlida (Phar. vi. 384). Others account for this appellation by stating that Æōlus, a son of Hellen and Orseis, settled in Thessaly. From him the inhabitants were called Æōles or Æōlii, and a part of that country, Hellas. The Æōlii built Smyrna, Cyane, Poia Nova, Lārissa, L'Arza, Myrina, Sēbastōpōlis, Mitylēne, Mitylēni, and other cities in Lesbos (Vel. Pat. 4). Adj. Æōlius, et Æōlicus, a, um. Æōlium mārē, the Gulf of Smyrna. Æōlium carmen, lyric poetry, chiefly from Alceus and Sappho natives of Lesbos, Mitylēni (Hor. od. iii. 30. 13). Æōlica gens, the people of Æōlis (Plin. i. 651). Æōlium, i, m. a part of Chersōnēsus, on Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles (Plin. i. 445), but Stēphānus makes it a town.

Æōlus, i, m. the god of the winds, was the son or the grandson of Hippōtas and Mēlātippē, and king of the islands which lie between Itālia, Italy, and Sicilia, Sicily. From him, they were called Æōlia Insula, and from Lipāra, the largest of them, Liparæorum Insulae. Some have supposed that he was called the god of the winds, because from his skill in predicting changes of the weather, he seemed to his ignorant subjects to have the winds and clouds under his power; and others, from his knowledge of astronomy, and being the inventor of sails. But as the art of navigation was discovered by the Phœnicians, the more probable conjecture is, that these islands were fabled to be the residence of the winds, on account of the loud subterraneous noise often heard by the inhabitants, and occasioned, most probably, by the volcanic eruptions to which they are subject. They are now called the Lipāri, or the Liparæan Islands, and form part of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. From his father or his grandfather Hippōtas, Æōlus was called Hippōtādes. Æōlides, æ, m. a son or descendant of Æōlus; Sisypheus (Hor. Od. ii. 14. 20); Phrixus (Val. Flacc. i. 286). Æōlis, idos, f. applied to females or nouns feminine; Hāleyōnē, the daughter of Æōlus (Ov. Met. xi. 444). Æōlides insula (Just. iv. 1). Adj. Æōlius, a, um. Æōlii venti, winds of Æōlus (Tib. iv. 1. 58). Æōlia cēvernæ, caverns of Æōlus, in which he detained the winds (Claud. xxvi. 224).—2. The father of Athāmas, who is hence called Æōlides. Adj. Æōlius, a, um. Pastes Æōlii, the gates of Athāmas, the son of Æōlus (Ov. Met. iv. 486). Æōlium vellus, the golden fleece (Mart. viii. 51).—3. A man killed in the Theban war by Parthēnōpeus (Stat. Th. ix. 765).

Æpēa, æ, f. Koron, one of the cities on the sea coast, belonging to Agamemnon, which, with other gifts, he promised to Achilles, if he returned to the war (Hom. II. ix. 150 seq.).

Æpūlo, ōnis, m. a prince or chief of the Istri, who killed himself at Nēsātium, rather than fall into the hands of the Romans, in 179 B. C. (Liv. xli. 11).

Æpy, ȳos, n. a town of Mēssēnia, which stood on the summit of a mountain, whence its name (Stat. Th. iv. 180. Hom. II. ii. 592). Æpȳtes, æ, m. an inhabitant of Æpy.

Æpȳtus, i, m. youngest son of Cresphontes and Mērōpē, daughter of Cȳpsēlus, king of Arcādia. The nobles killed his father, on account of his favouring the commons, and all his brothers. On his arriving at manhood, he obtained aid from the Mēssēni, punished the murderers of his father, ingratiated himself into the favour of the nobles by obsequiousness, and that of the common people by largesses. Æpȳtīdæ, arum, m. the descendants of Æpȳtus, in honour of whom they had this name; formerly his nation were called Hērāclīdæ. Adj. Æpȳtius, a, um. Æpȳtius ager (Stat. Th. iv. 296).—2. One of the five sons of Elātus, an ancient king of Arcādia, and Lāōdicē. His brothers were Pērēus, Cyllen, Ischys, and Stȳmphālus. Æpȳtus succeeded to the government of the Arcadians, and was killed in hunting, by a serpent. Pausānias gives a description of this animal, which he himself had seen and examined (viii. 4). Æpȳtis, Idis, f. the district of Arcādia under his dominion.

Æquānus, i, m. a man born near Sōrāctē, Sant Oreste, distinguished for the elegance of his person, and for his bravery in arms (Sil. Ital. v. 176).

Æquēnsis, is, f. a village near Sūrrentum, Sorrento, a town of Cāmpānia. Adj. Æquānus, a, um. Æquāna (ȳuga) felicia Baccō (Sil. Ital. v. 466).

Æqui, orum, called also Æquāni, Æquicūli, v. Æquicōli, orum (Sing. Æquicōlus, i, m. Ov. Fast. iii. 93), v. Æquicōle, arum, m. a people of Lātium, who sent auxiliaries to the Sāmmites against the Romans; but the consuls, P. Sūlpicius Sāvērrio and P. Sēmpronius Sōphus, burned and razed forty-one of their towns, and almost extirpated the whole inhabitants, for which success they had the honour of a triumph (305 B. C.) Enraged at a colony being sent to Alba, which was in their territory, they again took up arms, endeavoured to seize it, but were repulsed by the colonists. C. Junius Bubulcus, having been nominated dictator, in consequence of that attack, easily subdued them, and returned to the city in triumph. From that period their opposition to the Romans was very inconsiderable, and at last they formed a part of the state, retaining nothing of their ancient condition except their ferocious tempers. Adj. Æquicus, Æquiculus, v. Æquiculus, a, um. Æquicum bellum (Liv. iii. 4). Æquicula gens (Virg. Æn. vii. 747).

Æquimælium, i, n. a place near the capitol in Rome, so called because the house of Mælius, which was levelled with the ground, stood there. Upon it the censors, T. Quinctius Flamininus and M. Claudius Marcellus, contracted for what Livius calls substructio, which, from its vicinity to the capitol, was probably a kind of facing or outside wall, to bring it to a sort of level, that buildings might be erected on it, or the earth or rock prevented from falling; or it might be a range of pillars raised to a certain height, on which a building was afterwards to be erected, 191 B. C. Æquimælius vicus, a street in Rome, the houses in which were burned in 215 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 47).

Æquinœctium, i, n. (from Æquus, equal, and Nor, night), the Equinox, or time when the days and nights are equal over all the globe. This happens twice a-year, on 22d March, and 22d September. The former is called the Vernal, the latter, the Autumnal, Equinox. The circle which passes through the place of the sun at these two periods of the year, has, from the phenomenon above mentioned, received the name of the Equinoctial, or Equinoctial Line, and is directly over the Equator.

Ærarium, i, n. (Sanctus), the twentieth part of the value of slaves who had obtained their freedom. It was paid at the time of their manumission, and reserved in the inner treasury for exigencies of the most urgent necessity (Liv. xxvii. 10). Julius Cæsar pillaged it (Cæs. B. G. i. 14).

Æria, æ, f. the ancient name of Ægyptus, Ægypt, and also of Cræta, Candia (Gel. xiv. 6).

Ærias, æ, m. a king of Cyprus, who built the temple to Vénus Paphia. Tacitus mentions that some reckoned it the name of the goddess, which was probably the idea of Pausanias, who calls her Urânia, i. 14 (Tac. Hist. ii. 3).

Ærôpê, es, f. wife of Atræus, who had intercourse with his brother Thyestes, which has formed a fruitful subject for writers of tragedy (Ov. Trist. ii. 391).

Ærôpus, i, m. a prætor of the Epirôtæ, who met Philippus, king of Macædonia, at Phenicæ, in Epirus, to mediate a peace with him, the Romans, and Etoli, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 12).—2. A king of Macædonia, who succeeded his father Philippus, in 609 B. C. (Just. vii. 2). Others of this name occur in Herodotus (viii. 137 seq.).

Ærôpus, i, m. Melchior, a mountain of Illyricum, separated from Asnæus by the river Adas. From this mountain T. Quinctius Flamininus, the Roman consul, drove Philippus, king of Macædonia, who had pitched his camp upon it, and Athênagôras had possession of Asnæus. The consul gained this advantage by reaching the summit of a height which commanded it, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 5).

Ærûli, v. Hérûli, orum, m. a people of Gothic descent, who formed a settlement on Vâhâlis, the Waal, and afterwards in Gâllia (Amm. Mar. xx. 1).

Æsæcus v. Æsæcos, i, m. a son of Priâmus, king of Troy, and Alexîrhôê, who, from grief at the death of Hespêriê (Asterôpê, Apol. iii. 12), whom he ardently loved, threw himself headlong from a rock into the sea; but Têthys, having pitied the violence of his sorrow, prevented him receiving injury from his fall, and changed him into a water-bird (Ov. Met. xi. 762—795).

Æsar, âris, v. Esârus, i, m. the Esaro, a river in the south of Italy, on which Crôto, Cotrone, stood (Ov. Met. xv. 23). Adj. Esârêus, a, um. Æsârêum flûmen, the Esaro (Ov. Met. xv. 54).

Æschînes, is, m. an Athenian orator, was, according to some, son of Chârinus, and, according to others, of Lysânias. His strong attachment to Socrâtes kept him constantly in the company of that great philosopher; and Idômæneus writes that he, and not Crîto, advised Socrâtes to make his escape from prison. In oratory Æschînes excelled, and Cicero frequently mentions this eloquent speaker in his writings on that subject. Of this name Diogènes enumerates other seven, reckoning this the first.—2. Wrote the art of oratory.—3. The rival of Demôsthênes.—4. An Arcadian, the scholar of Isocrâtes.—5. A native of Mitÿlênê, Mitÿlenê, called the scourge of orators.—6. A philosopher of the Academy, a native of Nêâpôlis. He was the scholar of Mèlanthius, the Rhodian, and greatly esteemed.—7. A Milesian who wrote on political subjects.—8. A statuary.

Æschÿlus, i, m. an Athenian tragic poet of great celebrity, was the son of Euphôrion and born about 525 B. C. Nature endowed him with poetic talents of the very highest order, by which he improved and almost perfected tragedy. In that branch he could scarcely be said to have had a predecessor, for the mountebank exhibitions of Thêspis do not merit that honourable appellation. He invented the mask, the flowing robe, and the buskin worn by ancient tragedians. A permanent stage or theatre must also be referred to the improvements of Æschÿlus. Nor did he stand high in the estimation of his countrymen by his poetry alone. He displayed his bravery and love of his country at Mârathon, Marathona, Sâlâmîs, Colouri, and Artêmisiûm, three of the most celebrated battles ever fought by the Athenians. He is said to have composed ninety tragedies, of which seven only remain, Promêtheus vinc-tus, Persæ, Agamêmnon, Chaphûri, Eumênides, Supplices, and Septemvices apud Thêbas. Vehemence and sublimity distinguish these tragedies, which have been less read than their merits claim, in consequence of his successors, Sôphôcles and Euripides having polished their numbers with greater care, and conveyed their sentiments in language more easily understood. Æschÿlus spent the latter part of his life in Sicily, where he died. For this change of residence, at an advanced period of life, no certain reason has been transmitted by ancient authors. It has been recorded, that a prophet informed him of the day on which he would be killed by something falling upon his head, and, in order to avoid an accident of that kind, he quitted the town and retired to the fields, where an eagle dropped a tortoise on his head, probably mistaking it for a stone, as he was very bald. This stroke instantly deprived the poet of life. Philus and Valerius Maximus narrate the account of the death of Æschylus with all the gravity of truth, and, however improbable it may appear, there can be little doubt but both believed in the accuracy of what they stated. Plutarchus has, in his writings, mentioned a number of particulars of the life of Æschylus, which would require to be confirmed by other testimony before they are admitted as authentic history.—2. A native of Rhodus, whom Alexander the Great appointed joint-governor of Egypt with Peucestes a Macedonian in 331 B. C. (Curt. iv. 8).—3. A man of vicious practices, to whom Martialis addresses two of his Epigrams (ix. 5, 69).

Æsculāpius, i. m. was the god of medicine. Of this name Cicero and others mention eight; but Æsculāpius who received divine honours at Rome was the son of Apollo, and Circeis, daughter of Phlegias, a Thessalian. Taciturnus says, that he was of uncertain parentage, that he was exposed soon after his birth, and accidentally found by some hunters, who nourished him with canine milk, and afterwards committed him to the care of Chiron. To escape the fury of her father, Circeis fled to Epidaurus, Malvasia Vecchia, a city on an island, joined by a bridge or mound to the district of Argolis in Peloponnēsus, the Morea, where Æsculāpius was born, and where he had a famous temple. Some assert, that Apollo appointed a crow to watch the conduct of Circeis, hence this bird is called Phœbæus ales; that the crow gave information of her infidelity; that Diana, or Apollo, put her to death by lightning; that Mercury, or Apollo, preserved the infant from dying with his mother; and that he was given to be brought up by Trygônē. On arriving at the proper age, he was sent to the school of Chiron, the Centaur, where he made such astonishing progress in the study of medicine, that he afterwards passed as the inventor and god of that science. He accompanied the Argonauts, to whom his knowledge of the virtues of plants, and treatment of wounds, were of singular benefit. Not satisfied with curing almost all diseases, he brought to life the dead, for which Jupiter, at the request of Pluto, put him to death by a thunderbolt. In revenge, his father, Apollo, killed the Cyclops g. v. After death he received divine honours. Særvius says, he was placed in the sky, and forms the sign Serpentiarius. The ancients sometimes worshipped him under the figure of a serpent, in which shape some have said he was born from the egg of a crow; but more commonly they represented him as a man sitting on a throne, holding in one hand a staff, and the other resting on a serpent's head. A dog lay near his feet. Sometimes rays of light, and, at other times, laurel encircled his head, both expressive of his descent. At first, like his father, he had no beard; but afterwards all his statues had long beards, generally of gold. When Dionysius, king of Sicily (Valerius Maximus says Hiero, i. 1), had conquered Peloponnēsus, the Morea, he ordered the golden beard to be taken from Æsculāpius at Epidaurus, Malvasia Vecchia, for which he gave this sarcastic reason, "that it was unbecoming and unjust for the son to have a beard, when the father had none." In consequence of a pestilence at Rome, the books were consulted, and there it was found that Æsculāpius must be brought from Epidaurus, and commissioners were immediately sent thither, who carried off a serpent which had gone on board their ship. A firm belief prevailed that the deity resided in this serpent, which quitted the vessel on arriving at Rome, and remained on the island in the Tevere, now called Isola Tiberina, on which the Romans built a temple to Æsculāpius in 294 B. C. He had likewise a temple at Carthage, and must have received divine honours there (Liv. x. 47—xli. 22). Some ancient philosophers understood Æsculāpius to denote air, and many reckoned Apollo the sun, which regulates the seasons, and has great influence on the atmosphere, rendering it salubrious or noxious. To Æsculāpius, the cock, the serpent, the crow, and the goat were deemed sacred. The first two are emblems of vigilance and prudence, necessary qualifications in a physician; the third may be easily accounted for, by the double meaning of Cōrōnis in Greek; and the fourth, as well as the dog lying at his feet, must be referred to the fiction of his being exposed immediately after his birth, and nursed by a goat of the flock of Arēsthānas, whilst a dog stood near to protect the infant from harm. According to Pausanias, all serpents or dragons, especially those of a yellow colour, were sacred to him. Within the enclosure of his temple at Epidaurus, no one was allowed either to be born or to die (Paus. ii. 27 seq.). He married Epionē, by whom he had two sons, Mæchæon and Pōdāfirius, both eminent for their medical skill, and four daughters, of whom Hÿgēa, v. Hÿgēia the goddess of health, was the most distinguished. Phœbigēna, v. m. Æsculāpius; called also by Virgilius, the inventor of medicine (Æn. vii. 773). Ovidius calls him adēna, a stranger; a foreign god, i. e. one of the Adsciti, in opposition to the Indigites (Met. xv. 745). The Greeks write his name Asclēpius, from which comes the patronymic Asclēpiades, v. m. (Hom. II. iv. 204).

Æsēpus, i. m. the Boklu, or, the Sataldere, a river which takes its rise in mount Ida, opposite to the rivers Scāmānder and Simōis, and, running northward, falls into Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora. Lucillus, pursuing Mithridates, made this river and Grānceus red with blood (Flor. iii. 5). Some copies here incorrectly read Esapus. Adj. Æscēpius, a. um. Æscēpia flūmina (Val. Flacc. iii. 420).

Æsērnā, v. f. Isernia, or, Sergna, a town of Italy, not far from the left bank of Vulturnus, the Folturno. The Romans established a colony at this town 264 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 16), probably to protect the district against the incursions of the Sāmmites, by whom it had been plundered about twenty-three years before (Liv. x. 31). Inh. Æsērnūi, orum (Sing. Æserninus, l.), m. Adj. Æserninus, a. um. Æserninus ager, the territory of the Æsernini. Æsernina turba (Liv. xlv. 40).

Æserninus Mærcellus, Æsernini Mærcelli, m. was the grandson of C. Asinius Pollio, mentioned by Suetonius in his life of Augustus, one of his legs broken in the game of Troy, of which Pollio bitterly complained in the senate, on which account Augustus ceased to encourage such sports. Tacitus mentions that he refused to act as an advocate of Calpurnius Piso (Ann. iii. 11).

Æsis, is, f. Jesi, a town of Umbria, washed by Æsis, the Esino. It was built by Æsis, king of the Pelāsi, to whom the name must be referred. Inh. Asili, orum, m. (Sil. Ital. viii. 445).—2. Æsis, is, m. the Esino, a river of Italy, which separates Umbria from Picenum, and falls into the sea near Ancōna (Sil. Ital. viii. 444). Adj. Æsinus, a. um. Æsinum flumen.

Æson, ōnis, m. a king of Iōlchos, i. f. a town of Mægnēsia, a district of Thēssālīa, Thessaly. He was the father of Iāson, who is hence called Æsonides (Val. Flacc. i. 98). Æsōne nātus, Iāson (Stat. Th. v. 416). Æson fought in the battle between the Centaurs and Lāpithæ, and killed himself by drinking the blood of a bull, to which Vālerius Flaccus alludes (i. 816 seq.). Adj. Æsonius, a. um. Heros Æsonius, the Æsonian Hero, i. e. Iāson (Ov. Met. vii. 156).

Æsopus, i. m. a native of Phrygia, the celebrated writer of fables, is said to have been born a slave, but his genius procured him his liberty. No authentic account of this author has been handed down to modern times, nor can it with certainty be maintained that a single fable of his writing is now extant. Those published under his name were probably written by different persons and at different times. Phædrus pretends to have done little more than have translated the fables of Æsopus, and had the purity of his sentiment equalled the elegance of his diction, his works would have been entitled to higher approbation than their present form would warrant. Adj. Æsopæus, et. Æsopius, a. um. Æsopæa fābula (Phæd. Prol. 5).

Æstus, ūs, m. the tide, a rising and falling, or flux and reflux of water, observable on the shores of the ocean. There is no doubt that the phenomena of the tides are occasioned by the moon. Nor is this a discovery of modern times, but must be referred to a very remote period of antiquity. The space of time which elapses between two successive tides is subject to considerable variation. When the motion of the water is free, as on the shores of the Atlantic Ocean, the period is never less than 12 hours and 18 minutes, nor more than 12 hours and 42 minutes. Hence, Cæsar is not quite accurate, when he states (B. G. iii. 12) that they take place twice in 24 hours. The same mistake occurs in Plinius (i. 243), where he says, that the tides flow twice, and ebb twice, every 24 hours. The local situation of the Romans was unfavourable for obtaining a correct knowledge of the tides, although in this respect they excelled the Greeks. Sēneca affirms that the tides were highest at the equinox (N. Q. iii. 28). In bays, creeks, and arms of the sea, the tides are very different; and often very irregular. Inland seas have no tide. The greatest swells are at new and full moon, which are distinguished by the name of springtides. Cæsar is again inaccurate in asserting (B. G. iv. 29), that the highest tides are at full moon, since those at the change are of the same altitude. The height of the tides at the time the moon completes her first and third quarters, though less than that at the change and when full, is still very considerable. These are called neaptides. Except on these four days, the tides are nearly equal.

Æstyi, v. Æstiei, orum, m. a people of Germany, who lived on the coast of Mære Suevicum, the Baltic Sea. Their country included the kingdom of Prussia, besides the duchies of Samogitia and Courland, the palatinates of Livonia and Esthonia. Tacitus informs us, that they adopted the manners and customs of the Suevi; that their language bore a near resemblance to that of the Britons; and that they worshipped the mother of the gods. The badge of their national superstition was, wearing forms of wild boars, which, according to their belief, was a protection against every kind of weapon, and rendered the worshippers of the goddess secure in the midst of enemies. The historian adds, that the use of weapons of iron among them was uncommon, that of clubs frequent. Some idea of their civilization may be formed from their both cultivating the soil, and searching the sea and rivers for amber, which they called Glesum q. v. whence, perhaps, glass (Tac. Mor. Ger. 45).

Æsūla, æ, f. v. Æsulum, i. n. a town in the neighbourhood of Tibur, Tivoli, built on the declivity of a hill, to which Hōrātius alludes (Od. iii. 29. 6). Adj. Æsulanus, a. um. Æsulana arx (Liv. xxvi. 9).

Æsytēs, æ, m. father of Alcathōus q. v. (Hom. II. xiii. 427).

Æsŷma, æ, f. a town of Thrācia, of which Cāstianira was a native (Hom. II. viii. 304). It was afterwards called Emāthia q. v.

Æsŷmnus, i. m. a Grecian chief killed by Hector (Hom. II. xi. 303).

Æthālīa, æ, f. Elba, an island off the coast of Etruria, Tuscany. Stēphānus, quoting from Pōlybius, says it was likewise called Lemnos, and Virgilius makes the name Ilva q. v. Æthālis, idis, f. of Elba, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Æthālis Ilea (Ov. Ep. Pont. 2. iii. 84).—2. An ancient name of Chios q. v. (Plin. i. 619).—3. An island in the Archipelago (Liv. xxxvii. 13). What island the historian here meant, seems doubtful, although it could be at no great distance from Sāmos, and could not be Chios, which occurs frequently in his pages, and always under that name.

Æthālidēs, is, m. the son of Mērcūrius, and Eupōlēmīa, daughter of Mŷrmīdon, a native of Lāriŷsa, Lerissa, and one of the Argonauts, celebrated for his skill as an archer. By his mother he was related to Iāson. Pisidice, daughter of Æōlus, and sister of Crēthōus, married Mŷrmīdon to whom she bore Eupōlēmīa (Val. Flacc. i. 437).

Æthāllon, ōnis, m. one of the Tuscan pirates, whom Bācchus, for their perfidy, turned into dolphins (Ov. Met. iii. 647).

Æthālios, i. m. supposed to be the name of a play (Ov. Ib. 621).

Æthē, es, f. a mare belonging to Agāmēnnon, hence called Agāmēnnoīa (Hom. II. xxiii. 295).

Æthlon, Ætis, m. a man endowed with the gift of prophecy, whom Persæus killed at his nuptial feast (Ov. Met. v. 146).

Æthiopia, æ, f. a large country of Africa, the exact boundaries of which are unknown. Strabo, and Plinius seem to comprehend under Æthiopia, the whole of Africa, south of Egypt and the Barbary States. The latter derives the name from Æthiops, a son of Vulcan (l. 741); but others suppose the term to be compounded of two Greek words (Æth, æ, and -os, vultus), from an idea that the blackness of a negro's skin was a consequence of the violent heat of the sun. Sallustius places Æthiopia to the south of the Gétuli, but to the north of the Equator (Jug. 19). Herodotus says it is contiguous to Arabia, the extremity of the habitable world, and that the inhabitants were distinguished for their size, beauty, and length of life (iii. 113 seq.). Adj. Æthiopes, um (sing. Æthiops, ipis), m. the Ethiopians, who, from the great extent of their country, probably varied much both in complexion and manners, as the nations inhabiting these parts of Africa do in modern times. According to Ovidius, their skin first became black in consequence of the heat to which they were exposed, and by which a great part of Africa was burnt to sandy deserts, at the time Phæthon attempted to drive the chariot of the sun. Under the name of Æthiopes, Roman authors, particularly the poets, included the inhabitants of the southern parts of all Africa, and also of Asia, to the west of the Ganges. Æthiops, idis, f. an herb which grew in Æthiopia, supposed to have some magical virtue (Plin. iv. 360 seq.). Adj. Æthiops, æ, æpe, et, Æthiopes, a, um. Æthiopes flum. lakes of Æthiopia, the waters of which, when drunk, produced either madness or sleep (Ov. Met. xv. 320). Æthiopes imbres (Amm. Mar. xxii. 15).

Æthos, Ætis, r. Ætis, m. a fictitious name assumed by Ulysses, in giving his history to Penelope, after his return from Troy, before he had discovered himself (Hom. Od. xix. 100 seq.).—2. A man, of whom Martial gives a description, somewhat ludicrous, but not recommended by purity. It is probable Æthos indulged to excess in eating, which might cause the offence which the poet ridicules (xii. 78).—3. One of the Cupids or loves, attendants of Venus (Cland. xxxi. 140).—4. The horse of Pallas, which Virgil represents as weeping at the funeral of his master (Æn. xi. 89), an idea sufficiently absurd, but which has the authority of Homer.—5. A horse of Hector (Hom. Il. vii. 183).—6. One of the horses of Sol (Ov. Met. ii. 153).

Æthra, æ, f. daughter of Pittheus and wife of Egæus, to whom she bore Theseus. She was one of the attendants of Helena, at Troy (Hom. Il. iii. 144). Filius Æthra Pithæides, Theseus (Ov. Ep. Her. x. 191).

Ætna, æ, et, Ætnæ, es, f. Monte Gibello, or, Mount Etna, (from Monte, Italian, and Gibel, Arabic, both denoting a height or mountain), a mountain of Sicily, Sicily (Trinacria Ætna, Virg. Æn. iii. 534), the most remarkable Volcano in the world. Writers are generally agreed that the distance from the bottom to the summit of this mountain, is not less than thirty miles; but respecting its circumference at the base, and its perpendicular height, there is the greatest diversity of opinion. Ætna is of a conical shape, and its height is unquestionably very great, though it must be acknowledged that its true dimensions are unknown: circumference at the base, according to a late traveller, a hundred and eighty miles, height, thirty miles, and the average of five different measurements, makes the level above the sea, eleven thousand seven hundred and thirty feet. It is divided into three regions, of which the lowest, eighteen miles in breadth, is all excellent rich land, in a high state of cultivation; the next, six miles broad, is woody, covered with old oaks and chestnuts, towards the highest part, firs are seen here and there amidst stunted oaks; and the highest, which is likewise of the same breadth, is barren, and, towards the summit, always covered with snow. The inhabitants of the fertile region, are estimated at three hundred thousand, one fourth of the inhabitants of all Sicily. The ancients supposed that Vulcanus had his workshop in this mountain, where the Cyclopes forged thunderbolts for Jupiter, which Virgil has beautifully described (G. iv. 170 seq.). They are called Ætnæi fratres (Virg. Æn. iii. 678). Adj. Ætnæus, a, um, of, or like, Ætna, et, Ætnensis, is, e, dwelling on, or belonging to, Ætna. Ætnææ flammæ, flames of Monte Gibello (Tib. 4. i. 196). Ætnæum fulmen, the lightning of Ætna, i. e. the thunderbolts forged there for Jupiter, by the Cyclops (Prop. iii. 17. 21). Ætnæus dæus (Val. Flacc. ii. 420).—2. A town at the bottom of mount Ætna, formerly called Inessa. Inh. Ætnæi, orum, m. (Just. xxii. 1).

Ætnæ, es, f. a ship captured by the Romans in an engagement with the Carthaginians, off Sicily, in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 578).

Ætolia, æ, f. Despotato, a very fertile country of Greece, bounded on the S. by Sinus Cœrinthiæus, the Gulf of Lepanto, on the W. by Acarnania, Karltli, on the N. by Thessaly, and on the E. by Thessaly, Dœris, and Locris. Inh. Ætoli, orum (sing. Ætulus, i), m. the Ætolians. During the flourishing state of Greece, the Ætolians were little known; but after the destruction of Athens, Athens, and Sparta, Misitra, they made a formidable resistance against the Romans. Ætulus, i, m. Diomedes, king of Ætolia, who built Argyræa, which Virgil calls Ætola urbs (Æn. xi. 239). Ætolis, idis, f. of Ætolia, applied to females, or to nouns feminine. Adj. Ætulus, Ætollus, et, Ætollus, a, um. Ætola urbs (Stat. Th. iv. 101). Ætollus heros, Diomedes (Ov. Met. xiv. 461). Ætollum bellum (Flor. ii. 9).

Ætulus, i, m. the horse of Tydeus, in the Theban war. After the death of Tydeus, Hippomedon rode him until he received a deadly wound (Stat. Th. ix. 284).

Ætulia, æ, et, Ætulanæ, es, f. a part of Armenia Minor. In Justinus, it is called Ætolia, unquestionably a false reading (xiv. 1).

Afranius, i, m. the commander of the Latini in the Social war (Flor. iii. 18).

C. Afranius, C. Afranili, m. a Roman, sent with C. Cæcilius Spolætinus from the garrison in Uscana in 171 B. C., to treat with Persæus about a surrender, which they accomplished on their own terms, but the monarch violated his faith with them (Liv. xliii. 18).

C. Afranius Stellio, C. Afrānī Stēllōnis, m. elected praetor in 187 B. C. Two years after, he was one of the three commissioners who settled the colony of Sātūrnīa (Liv. xxxix. 23 seq.).

L. Afrānīus, L. Afrānī, m. son of L. Afrānīus, held the consulship with Q. Caelius Metellus Celer (62 B. C.), the memorable year in which Cn. Pompeius Magnus, and C. Julius Caesar, embroiled the Roman state in all the miseries of civil war. Afrānīus espoused the interest of Pompeius, and, with M. Petreius, commanded seven legions in Spain, who remained faithful to Pompeius. These lieutenant-generals although greatly inferior to Caesar, as soldiers, displayed both fortitude and activity. After a considerable time, Caesar compelled them to surrender without striking a single blow, to which Lucianus alludes (Phar. iv. 338), and dismissed both the commanders and the troops in safety; but Afrānīus afterwards took up arms, when Caesar defeated him, P. Cornēlius Scipio Nāsica, praetor, and Juba, at Thapsus, when Afrānīus was killed (Liv. Ep. 114. Flor. iv. 2). Adj. Afrānīānus, a, um. Afrānīāni (milites) (Ces. B. G. i. 47).—2. An eminent comic poet at Rome, who took his subjects from the manners, habits, and peculiarities of his countrymen, hence they were called fabula togata. He formed his plays on the model of Menander, and such was their excellence, that Quintilianus has bestowed on him high commendation, as a writer of comedy (Hor. Epist. ii. 1. 57).

Afrānīus Quinctiānus, Afrānī Quinctiāni, m. a Roman of senatorian rank, who entered into a conspiracy against the Emperor Nero, which he at first denied, afterwards confessed, and was put to death. On the discovery of the plot, he gave up his intimate friend Gaius Gallus (Tac. Ann. xv. 49—70).

Africa, a, f. Africa, called by the Greeks Libya, a, f. was commonly reckoned the third division of the ancient world. But the ancient geographers were not agreed on this point. By some, the world was divided into four parts, Europe, Asia, Africa, and Egypt; and by others into two, Europe and Asia, including Africa in Europe. In general, Africa, which seems originally to have been the name of but a small part of the country, was reckoned a third part. Respecting its eastern boundary, we also find a diversity of opinion. According to some, Egypt formed part of Asia; but it was more naturally, and therefore, more commonly, considered as belonging to Africa. On the E. Africa is bounded by Mārē Rubrum, v. Sinūs Arābicus, the Red Sea and Isthmus of Suez, which separate it from Asia; on the N. by the Mediterranean, called by the Romans Nōstrum Mārē, by the Greeks, Mārē Intērnum, an appellation which also occurs in Latin authors, and by the Jews, the Great Sea, which divides it from Europe; on the W. by Ocēānus Atlānticus, sapius, Mārē, v. Æquor Atlānticum, the Atlantic Ocean, and on the S. by the Indian Ocean. This immense peninsula is situated between 34° 30' S. and 36° 30' N. latitude. Its greatest length, which is from north to south, is 4,656 miles, and its greatest breadth about 3,500. Except Egypt and the countries along the south coast of the Mediterranean, comprehending what are now called the Barbary States, this prodigious tract of land was almost unknown to the ancients. Even in modern times, the interior of Africa is unexplored. The population is reckoned at 30,000,000. Ultima Africa, far distant Africa (Hor. Od. ii. 18. 4). The poet means Nūmīdia, the marble of which the Romans at that period highly valued. In extrēmā Africā, in the extremity of Africa, i. e. the eastern boundary of Africa (Sal. Jug. 78). Juvēnalis calls Africa, nutricula causicorum, nurse of lawyers; either from the Africans encouraging eloquence at that time, or rather from their being litigious, and giving larger fees to those who pleaded their causes at Rome, than the Romans (Sat. vii. 149). Inh. Afri, orum (sing. Afer, ri), m. the Africans. Adj. Afer, Afericus, et, Africānus, a, um. Afra avis, the Guinea hen (Hor. Epod. ii. 53). This bird is likewise called Nūmīdica, et, Africāna avis. Africum Mārē, that part of the Mediterranean Sea between Sicily and Africa (Sal. Jug. 28). Africāna panthēre (Liv. xlv. 18. Plin. ii. 164). Africus (ventus) (Liv. xxvi. 42).

Africa Prōpria, a district of Africa, washed by the Mediterranean on the N.; but respecting its eastern and western boundaries, ancient geographers are not agreed. Under this name Pom. Mela includes the whole country between Promontorium Metagōnium and Arē Philēnorum; while Pliny restricts the term to a small part of that extensive tract lying between Nūmīdia, Algiers, and Byzācium.

Agābāna, orum, n. a fort in Mēsōpōtāmīa (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 11).

Agāclēus, eos, m. a nobleman of Būdium, father of Epigēus and Echcles. Having killed a near relation, he fled to Pēlēs, and his sons accompanied Achilles to Troy (Hom. Il. xvi. 571).

Agāmēdē, es, f. eldest daughter of Augias, son of Amycus, and wife of Mūlius. She had an astonishing knowledge of herbs (Hom. Il. xi. 799). See Pērimēdē.

Agāmēmmon, ōnis, acc. na (Agāmēmmon, ōnis, m. Stat. Ach. i. 553), m. the elder son of Atreus, king of Mycēne, a town of Argolis, a district of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, and Commander-in-Chief of the Grecian army which fought against Troy. He was both a brave soldier and an able general. On his returning home, after the destruction of that city, he was murdered by his wife Clētēmnestra, and her adulterer Ægisthus. Agāmēmmonīdes, a, m. Orēstes, the son of Agāmēmmon. Crimen Agāmēmmonīdē, the crime of Orēstes, i. e. the murder of his mother (Juv. Sat. viii. 215). Adj. Agāmēmmonīus, a, um. Agāmēmmonīa Mycēnē (Sil. Ital. i. 27). Agāmēmmonīa classis, the fleet of Agāmēmmon, consisting of a thousand ships (Liv. xlv. 27).—2. Son of Pēlops (Herod. vii. 159).

Agānīppē, es, et, Agānīppis, idis, f. a fountain of Bœōtia, at the foot of Mount Hēlicon, Zagara, sacred to Apōllo, and the Muses, who, from this spring, were called Agānīppides, dum, f. Abia Agānīppē (Virg. B. x. 12). It gushes out of the ground, and forms a small clear stream at a place called Tātēza. Adj. Agānīppēus, a, um. Agānīppēa lyra, the lyre of the Muses (Prop.

ii. 3. 29). Agänpēra anda (Claud. xxix. 8).

Agäpēnor, ōris, m. king of Arcādia, who accompanied Agāmēnnon, with a number of Arcadians, to the Trojan war. He was the son of Anceus, grandson of Lȳcūrgus, and great grandson of Amphidāmas, who was the son of Arcas, and grandson of Jūpiter.

Agāri, orum, m. a Scythian people, part of whom were in the army of Mithridātes (Ap. Bel. Mith. 231).

Agārīsta, a, f. daughter of Hippocrātes and Agārīsta, wife of Xanthippus, and mother of Pēricles (Herod. vi. 131).

Agāssa, a, r. Agāsse, arum, f. a town of Thēssālia, which surrendered to the Roman consul, Q. Mārcius Philippus, in 170 B. C. From Lāvius (xiv. 7), it appears to have been possessed by Macedonians. L. Āmilīus Paulus plundered it after he had conquered Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, because the inhabitants had revolted to that monarch, after having voluntarily solicited the alliance of the Romans 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 27).

Agāsthēnes, is, m. son of Augias, and prince of the Elci (Hom. II. ii. 624).

Agāstrōphus, i, m. a hero in the Trojan war, wounded and stripped by Diōmēdes. From the latter circumstance, it is probable the wound was mortal. Pēon was his father's name (Hom. II. xi. 383 seq.).

Agāthīnus, i, m. a man celebrated by Mārīllis on account of his agility and swiftness (ix. 39).

Agāthōcles, is, m. a native of Sicily, of mean birth, who, by his bravery as a soldier, rose from the ranks to the highest preferment, rendered himself master of Sȳracūse, Saragossa, and afterwards extended his conquests over all Sicily. At Himēra, Termini, the Carthaginians obtained a victory over him, on which he invaded their territories in Africa, and forced to submission a considerable extent of their country. He afterwards made a descent on the south of Italy, took Crōton, Cotrone, and died in the seventy-second year of his age, in 289 B. C., after a reign of twenty-eight years. Of his early life and morals Jūstinus gives a horrible account (xlii. 1). Agāthōcleus, a, um. Agāthōclea tropaea (Sil. Ital. xiv. 652).—2. The father of Lȳsimāchus, of whose history nothing is known.—3. The son of Lȳsimāchus, who bore the name of his grandfather, and distinguished himself by his martial bravery. Arsīnōē, his stepmother, put an end to his life by poison, administered by order of his father (Just. xvii. 1).—4. Son of Cēnanthē, and brother of Agāthōclia, a man of infamous character, for which he was put to death (Just. xxx. 2).

Agāthōclia, v. Agāthōclea, a, f. a woman of lewd character, whose allurements captivated Ptolēmaeus Philōpāter, king of Egypt. She was the daughter of Cēnanthē, and sister of Agāthōcles. On the death of Ptolēmaeus, her brother was killed, and she and her mother were affixed to a cross (Just. xxx. 1, 2).

Agāthou, ōnis, m. one of the nine sons of Prīamus, who survived the Trojan war (Hom. II. xxiv. 249).—2. An officer, whom Alexander the Great appointed governor of the citadel in Bābȳlon (Curt. v. 1).—3. Another mentioned by the same author (x. 1).

Agāthȳma, a, f. v. Agāthȳnum, i, n. a town of Sicily, Sicily, the site of which is doubtful, from no vestige remaining. It appears to have been, at one period, among the chief towns of the island (Sil. Ital. xiv. 259). At it, a rabble of exiles, criminals, and debtors from different countries, had assembled, to the number of four thousand, and M. Vālērius Lāvīnus carried them with him to Rhēgium, Reggio, in 212 B. C., to plunder the country of the Brūtīi, as they had been accustomed to support themselves by acts of robbery and violence (Liv. xxvi. 40).

Agāthȳrsi, orum, m. a people whom Pōmponius Mēla seems to place on the northern coast of Pālus Māōtis, the Sea of Azoph. Plinius gives them a more northern position, which appears likewise to have been the opinion of Ptolēmaeus. In Hērōdōtus, their situation is more southern. They painted their skins, to which Virgilius alludes (Ān. iv. 146); and from the adjective used by Plinius it is probable they also stained their hair. The Latin poets seem to have used this term to denote a northern nation, as in the instance quoted from Virgilius. Their name has been derived from Agāthȳrsus, a son of Hērclēs.

Agāvē, es, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. II. xviii. 42).—2. A daughter of Cādmus and Hērmiōnē, married Echion, a Theban, by whom she became the mother of Pēnthēus. Whilst employed in celebrating the orgies of Bāchus, she and her sisters, Inō and Autōnōē, having accidentally met with Pēnthēus, who denied the divinity of that god, instigated by the Furies, tore him in pieces, and thus fulfilled the prediction of Tircēlas. On regaining her senses, Agāvē fled from Thēba to Thēssālia, Thessaly, where she performed funeral rites to her son, and built a town, which, in honour of her native city, she called Thēba. After her death, she received divine honours (Ov. Met. iii. 725).

Agāvus, i, m. one of the nine sons of Prīamus who survived Hector. Some make his name Dīus, which others consider an epithet (Hom. II. xxiv. 251).

Agazāca, a, f. a town of the Paropamisāte (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Agbārus, i, m. See Acbārus.

Agēlāus, i, m. son of Phrādmon, killed by Diōmēdes (Hom. II. viii. 257).—2. The son of Dāmāstor, one of the lovers of Pēnēlōpē, who was more favourable to Tēlēmāchus than the other suitors. He considered eating and drinking as the highest enjoyment, and was the last of the lovers of Pēnēlōpē who was killed.—3. A Grecian chief killed by Hector (Hom. II. xi. 302).

Agēma, ātis, plur. Agēmāta, um, n. picked soldiers, frequently horsemen, and the very best of the troops. They were sometimes infantry, for which Pōlybius may be quoted as an authority (v. 25).

Agēndicūm, i, n. Sens, the chief city of the Sēnōnes, a brave and powerful people of Gallia, France, who inhabited the left bank of Sēquāna, the Seine. It stood below the confluence of the Vanne and Icenna, v. Itumna, the Yonne, a southern branch of the Seine (Cæs. B. G. vi. 43 seq.).

Agēnor, ōris, m. a Trojan chief, son of Antēnor. He engaged with Achilles as he advanced against the city Troy, and owed his preservation to Apollo, probably from his having some knowledge of medicine (Hom. II. xxi. 545).—2. The father of Echēclus (Hom. II. xx. 474).—3. A man in the Argive army, who, to regain the body of his brother Sages, mortally wounded by Hýpsēus, and floating down the river Ismēnus, leaped into that stream. The weight of the body and force of the current overpowered him, and rather than part with the dead body, he preferred sinking at the same time. In these warriors, Státus has given a proof of brotherly love, at once powerful and tender. He plunges his reader into the deepest distress, and rouses that sensibility and sympathy which add to the dignity of human nature, and evince a generous and feeling heart (Th. ix. 272 seq.).—4. The father of Píthou q. v. (Just. xiii. 4).—5. The father of Phineus, king of Thrace. Adj. Agēnōreus, a, um. Agēnōrēa tecta, the house of Phineus (Val. Placc. iv. 522).—6. A son of Nēptūnus and Libya, and the brother of Bélus, was king of Phénicia. He married Telēphassa, by whom he had Eurōpa, Cilix, Phœnix, and Cādmus. Agēnōrē nāta, Eurōpa (Ov. Met. ii. 858). Agēnōrē nātus, Cādmus, who, from his father, is frequently called Agēnōrīdes, ie. (Ov. Met. iii. 51). Agēnōrīdē, arum, m. the Thebans (Stat. Th. xii. 736); likewise the Carthaginians, from their being of Phœnician descent (Sil. Ital. viii. 1). Adj. Agēnōrēus, a, um, of Agēnor, Phœnician, or Tyrian; also Carthaginian, from Carthage being built by a colony of Phœnicians. Agēnōrēa arces, the Carthaginian citadel (Sil. Ital. i. 15). Agēnōrēus bos, the bull which carried off Eurōpa, and afterwards was changed into a constellation of that name (Ov. Fast. vi. 712). Agēnōrēum dēnum, the chaldron or vat of Agēnor, i. e. Phœnician purple (Mart. x. 16). Agēnōrēa dōmus (Ov. Met. iii. 308).

Agēpōlis, idis, m. the chief of a Rhodian embassy to the Roman senate in 170 B. C. (Liv. xiv. 3).

Agērinus, i, m. a freedman of Agrippina, whom she sent to her former son, the Emperor Nēro, to inform him that she had escaped, when the vessel went to pieces, on board of which she had been taken with the view of procuring her death (Tac. Ann. xiv. 6). See Agrippina.

Agēsias, ie. m. a son of Sostrātus, a Sicilian. His mother was an Arcadian, and he lived in Elis, where he acted as the priest of Jūpiter. On gaining the prize at the Olympic games, he caused himself to be designed a Syracusan (Pin. Ol. vi.).

Agēsīdāmus, i, m. a Locran, whose success at the Olympic games Pindārus has celebrated (Ol. x. xi.). The poet has likewise immortalised his son (Nem. i. 42 &c.).

Agēsīlāus, i, m. a native of Lācēdæmon, who was in habits of closest intimacy with Xēnōphon, and is highly commended by that author. On the death of his brother Agis, he had a dispute with Lēōtychides, owned by Agis, on his deathbed, as his son. Through the interest of Lysānder, he succeeded to the crown. He had no sooner obtained the sovereignty, than he advised the Lacedæmonians to make war on the king of Persia, in Asia, rather than in Greece. Here he out-generalled Tissāphēnes, the viceroy of that country, who had solicited a truce for three months, as the Lacedæmonian forces had found him unprepared. This treaty Agēsīlāus kept with the strictest integrity, and the Persian violated, by spending the whole time in the most active preparations for war. Both in forming and executing his plans, he showed his inferiority to Agēsīlāus, who succeeded in every enterprise, inspirited his forces by victory, enriched them with plunder, and would have carried the war into Persia, had not his countrymen recalled him, in consequence of the Athenians and Boeotians declaring against the Lacedæmonians. Although elevated by his success, and confident of overrunning that kingdom, he instantly obeyed the order and returned by Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, with such expedition, that he finished, in thirty days, a march which required Xerxes a whole year. He defeated the enemy at Cōrōnēa, Granizza, where they attempted to stop him, and afterwards, near Corinth, gained a decisive victory, leaving ten thousand of the allied forces dead on the field. More anxious for the welfare of Greece than for military fame, he refused to besiege Corinth, to which many of his friends urged him, assigning as a reason, that his judgment approved of forcing offenders to return to their duty, not of taking the noblest cities of Greece. He declined to take any part in the expedition to Lēuctra, Leftra, where Epāminōndas defeated the Spartans with great slaughter, but he afterwards prevented that general from taking Sparta. From this period, the power of the Lacedæmonians declined, still Agēsīlāus employed his utmost efforts to support his native country. At the age of eighty he went into Egypt, to assist Tachus, but the Egyptians despised him, from the meanness of his appearance and seeming poverty. Nectanēbis showed his sense of the valuable services of Agēsīlāus, by presenting him with two hundred and twenty talents, when about to depart for his native country. He fell into a disease at the port Mēnēlāus, where he died, in 361 B. C., in the forty-ninth year of his reign, and his body, having been wrapped round with wax, was carried to Sparta. Nature compensated for the smallness of his stature, and lameness of one foot, by the noblest qualities of mind. Strangers looked at his person with contempt, but his friends, who knew his excellencies, could never sufficiently admire him (Just. vi. 2).

Agēsīmāchus, i, m. a native of Sicily, who had three sons conquerors at the Grecian games (Pin. Nem. vi.).

Agēsīmbrōtus, i, m. commanded the twenty Rhodian ships, which joined the Roman fleet under L. Apūstius, lieutenant-general, in 202 B. C., in conjunction with Attālus, king of Asia, after that combined fleet had taken Andros (Liv. xxxi. 46).

Agēsīpōlis, idis, m. son of Agēsīpōlis, and grandson of Clēōmbrōtus, one of the Lacedæmonian exiles, who joined T. Quīnctius Flāminīnus when he was marching against Nābis, tyrant of Lācēdæmon. The crown of Lācēdæmon belonged to him in right of his family; but when an infant he had been driven out by the tyrant Lēcūrgus, after the death of Clēōmēnes, who was the first tyrant of Lācēdæmon (Liv. xxxiv. 26).

Aggrammes, is, m. the king of the Gāgāridæ and Phārrāsī in 327 B. C. To Alexander the Great the number of his troops appeared formidable, and he found it necessary to address the soldiers in a very studied speech, in order to persuade them, that they were more than a match for the enemy. Exhausted by long warfare, his army resisted his arguments, and he found it necessary to desist from farther conquests (Curt. ix. 2).

Aglaia, Idia, m. a native of Lycia, overcome by Valerius (Virg. Æn. x. 751).—2. A king of Sparta, Mistra, and elder brother of Agestus, on whose death the latter succeeded to the throne (Cor. Nep. Ag. 1). Alcibiades had a criminal connexion with his wife Timaea, who informed her gallant of her husband's intending to revenge the injury, by causing him to be put to death. This discovery saved the life of Alcibiades (Just. v. 2).—3. Grandson of Agestus, and king of Sparta, killed in 330 B. C. fighting with great bravery against Antipater (Just. xii. 1).—4. A native of Argos and a versifier of the very lowest order, yet Alexander the Great carried him in his train to celebrate his victories in Asia (Curt. viii. 5).

Aglaia, m. Aglaia, es. f. the wife of Chæron and mother of Nireus, the most beautiful man in the Grecian army except Achilles (Hom. Il. ii. 672).—2. One of the Graces who were three in number, the daughters of Japhet and Eurymedea (Virg. Cat. xi. 60). Aglauros, f. daughter of Cærops, king of Athens. When Minerva entrusted to her and her two sisters, Pandrosos and Hæres, Erichonius, in a close basket, with instructions not to look into it, Aglauros laughed at the timidity of the other two, satisfied her curiosity by examining its contents, and found the child with a serpent stretched beside him. Her morals merit reprehension, for she pacted with Mercury for the immorality of her sister Hæres. Either the sun was more than the god wished to give, or more than he could command, for she compelled him to quit the house for not complying with her terms. Minerva, enraged because she had pried into her secrets, sent envy to torment her, and Mercury turned her into stone (Ov. Met. ii. 560—582).

Agna, m. f. a woman loved by Balbinus, who took pleasure even in the loathsome complaint under which she laboured (Hor. Sat. i. 3. 40).

Agonoides, is. m. a man who accused Phœdon of betraying Piræus to Nicænor (Cor. Nep. Phoc. 5). See Phœdon.

Agræi, arum. m. a people of Ætolia (Liv. xxxii. 34).

Agraria lex, Agraria legis. f. the Agrarian law, which originated with Sp. Cæsius, who held the consulship with Præcius Virginius in 496 B. C. The Romans had taken from the Hernici two thirds of their territory, one half of which Cæsius proposed to give to the Latins, and to divide the other half among the commons of Rome. To this he intended to add some land, which although possessed by individuals, he maintained was the property of the public, and this measure formed the commencement of the Agrarian law, one of the most injurious that was ever proposed in any state. During the continuance of the republic, it furnished to every political demagogue a plausible pretext for embroiling the state, and even endangering the constitution. Cæsius was, in this measure, boldly opposed by his colleague supported by the senate. He was soon after executed for treason, so that the law did not pass (Liv. ii. 41). See Lex.

Agræonites, arum. m. a people of Illyricum, who, with the Rhizonites and the Ocinlites, obtained one of the three districts of that country, into which L. Anicius Gallus divided it in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26).

Agre, es. f. (Huntress), one of Actæon's hounds. Agre narius utilis, Agre, useful for her nostrils, i. e. for her scent; quick-scented, or, staunch (Ov. Met. iii. 212).

Agræus, es. m. a native of Epidaurus, who bore arms in the Theban war. There appear to have been three of this name at that memorable siege, whom Stætilius distinguishes by the names of their towns, Epidaurius Agræus (Th. vi. 909), Calydæus Agræus (Th. viii. 441), and Paglus Agræus, who was killed by Meneceus before he mounted the battlements, and offered himself a victim for his country (Th. x. 676).

Agrænes, is. m. the Ergene, a river of Thræcia, one of the branches of Hæbus the Maritza. Before it falls into that stream, it joins its waters with Trærus, the Deira-dere (Herod. iv. 90).

Agrænes, um. m. a people of Thræcia, who probably lived on the banks of Agrænes, the Ergene. Their geographical position is not precisely known. Some suppose they lived on Strymon, the Strumona. From Livius they appear to have been a brave people. In the Macedonian war they fought under the standards of Philippus against the Romans, and to their valour that monarch owed great obligations (Liv. xxviii. 5 seq.).

Agræspas, arum. m. an Asiatic people, afterwards called Energætæ q. v. (Curt. vii. 3). Agricola. See Jullus.

Agrigentum, i. n. Girgenti, the name both of a city and mountain in Sicily, which Himilco, a Carthaginian commander, took when Syracuse, Suragossa, was in the possession of Hippocrates and Epicydes, 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 35). Before that time it had been in the possession of the Romans (Flor. ii. 2). Girgenti occupies the summit of Camicus. See Acragas.

Agrilodos, ontis. m. (rustic, or, ferocious tooth), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 224).

Agrippa, æ. m. the tenth king of Alba, was the son of Tiberinus, and father of Alalades (Dion. Hal.). Ovidius calls him Acröta (Met. xiv. 619).—2. Called also Hærodes Agrippa, and Agrippa Magnus, son of Aristobulus and Bérénice, was the grandson of Hærodes Magnus. He had three daughters, Bérénice, Maria, or Mariamne, and Drusilla, and one son Agrippa Minor, or Agrippa the second, to distinguish him from his father. Tiberius, to whose grandchild he had become tutor, imprisoned him on suspicion, and loaded him with a heavy chain. Caligula, on succeeding to the empire, released him from confinement, and appointed him king of the Jews, giving him the tetrarchies of Philippus, Lysanias, and Hærodes Antipas. Claudius enlarged his dominions by the addition of Judea and Samaria. The nation held him in great honour, and, when celebrating the games instituted in honour of the Emperor Claudius, they saluted him with the title of god, on which he was smitten with a loathsome and painful disease that terminated his life in the year 44, after a reign of fourteen years. He killed the Apostle James, and imprisoned St.

Peter (Acts Ap. xii), which formed the first persecution against the Christians.—3. Son of the former, who was at Rome, and only seventeen years old when his father died. The Emperor Claudius would willingly have bestowed on him the kingdom possessed by his father, had he not been prevented by his freedmen and advisers. Josephus informs us, that public opinion charged him with the crime of criminal intercourse with Bérénice, his sister, a woman infamous for her lewdness. See Bérénice. In the reign of Néro, he obtained part of Judæa, with instructions to collect troops, and to march against the Parthians. Of his military achievements we know little, and probably they did not merit the notice of the historian. At the suggestion of Bérénice, he quitted Rome without the knowledge of Vitellius, hastened to his country and joined Vespasianus. A happy consequence resulted from this prudent measure, the exemption of the Jews under his government, from the general punishment inflicted on those who had taken up arms, and his part of their once highly-favoured land was not annexed to the Roman empire till after his death. The Apostle Paul pleaded before him and Bérénice (Acts Ap. xxvi). To him Juvénalis refers (Sat. vi. 153).

Agrippa. See Vipsanius.

Agrippa Postumus, Agrippæ Postumæ, m. youngest son of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, daughter of the Emperor Augustus, whom, to satisfy the wishes of his ambitious wife Livia, he banished to the island Planasia, Pianosa. Tacitus describes him as ill-educated, vain of his bodily strength, but addicted to no apparent vice. In this island the Emperor visited him secretly, manifested great tenderness towards him, and their mutual affection excited a hope that he might be restored into the family of his grandfather. That Augustus acted unjustly to Agrippa, in adopting Tiberius, candour must allow, and that he yielded to the urgent solicitation of Livia, can scarcely be doubted. Irresolution marked the declining years of the Emperor, of which, this unnatural conduct to the only surviving son of his daughter, is a strong instance. The first act of Tiberius, was an order to murder Agrippa. The centurion appointed to execute that bloody mandate, had great difficulty in overpowering the young prince, who, though unarmed, from his uncommon strength, made a vigorous resistance. Tiberius pretended he had given no order for that purpose, and had not Livia, the bitter enemy of Agrippa, interfered, it might have cost the centurion his life. Instead of denying the order, Tiberius then pretended that he obeyed the injunction of Augustus, in putting his grandson to death, an assertion totally unworthy of belief (Tac. Ann. i. 3—6).—2. A slave of Agrippa Postumus, who, having found himself unable to protect his master, whom he much resembled in age, form, and countenance, attempted to personate him, but was after some time seized and put to death. When Tiberius asked him how he became Agrippa, he answered "just as you came to be Cæsar." No inquiry was made into his accomplices, nor to discover the persons who had given him money, either from aversion to the Emperor, or from believing him to be the grandson of Augustus.

Agrippina, æ. f. daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, daughter of the Emperor Augustus. Her grandfather married her to Germanicus, his sister's grandson, with whom she went into Gallia, France, and when the troops mutinied, her husband thought it prudent for her to quit the camp, and the soldiers were greatly affected at her departure. A false report reached Vétèra, Santen, in the duchy of Cleves, where Agrippina then happened to be, that the Germans, after defeating the Roman legions, were on their march to invade Gallia, and on that account, as a precaution, it was proposed to break down the bridge over the Rhine, a measure which Agrippina opposed and prevented. The legions returned diminished in number, covered with wounds, and in want of provisions, which their victory soon supplied. Agrippina received them at the bridge, and thanked them for their bravery, which she highly extolled. By this act she excited the jealousy of Tiberius, which L. Ælius Sëjanus inflamed, on purpose to accomplish his own ends. At Athens, Agrippina bore Julia, and accompanied her husband into Syria, where Piso caused his death by poison. From that country she returned to Rome, bringing along with her the ashes of her husband. The affection of the people towards this princess, excited the hatred of the Emperor, and his favourite Sëjanus, who plotted her destruction. In Livya, the widow of Augustus, she had a powerful and violent enemy. Bold and determined, Agrippina upbraided Tiberius for censuring Claudia Pulchra, and sternly told him, that he meditated her ruin in that trial. From the Emperor she demanded a husband, and he, apprehensive of her power increased by her union to a man who would head the discontents, did not give a direct refusal; but had recourse to his wonted dissimulation. Against both Agrippina and her son, Néro Tiberius complained to the senate, and he afterwards banished her to the island of Pandatária, on which her mother Julia had formerly been confined by Augustus, and Néro to Pontia, where, by order of Tiberius, one of her eyes was struck out by a centurion (Suet. Tib. 53). From this period, the Emperor treated Agrippina with the greatest cruelty, which neither depressed her spirits, nor diminished her resolution, and she reproached him to his face, whenever an opportunity offered. The cause of her death remains undetermined, some maintaining that food was denied her, and others that she starved herself. The Emperor attempted to ruin her character after her death, by the imputation of vices, to which Tacitus informs us, she could neither be allured nor impelled. By her husband she became the mother of nine children, and appears to have been one of the most distinguished female characters recorded in Roman history (Tac. Ann. i. 83 &c.).

Agrippina. See Julia.

Agrius, i. m. a Grecian, son of Parthæon, king of Etolia, called by Hómærus Pôrtheüs, brother of Enëüs, and father of Thersites, consequently the uncle of Méléager, and Tydeüs father of Diómèdes. He was the most inactive and ugly of all the Grecians who fought against Troy (Ov. Ep. Pont. iii. 9.9). He drove his brother (Enëüs, when childless and in poverty, from his kingdom, of which he took possession. Diomēdes, on returning from the Trojan war, and hearing of his grandfather's expulsion, came to Ætolia with Sthēnelus, engaged in battle with Lycopēus, son of Agrius, whom he killed, then forced Agrius to quit the kingdom, and restored the crown to his grandfather Eneus. After this ejection, Agrius laid violent hands on himself (Apol. i. 7 seq.). Pausanias states, that the sons of Agrius expelled their uncle Eneus, and that he fled to Diomēdes, who revenged his wrongs (ii. 25).—2. A boy whose arms Menecēus cut off, while grasping an elm, which overhung a river, to save his life, as he floated down the stream. On turning back his eyes, as the current bore him away, he saw his arms amongst the branches (Stat. Th. ix. 266 seq.).—3. A centaur, whom Hērēcles put to flight with burning torches (Apol. ii. 5).

Aggēūs (3 syl.), òs, m. a name of Apollo, from his presiding over streets (Macrob. i. 9). Lævis Aggēū, a beardless Apollo (Hor. Od. iv. 6. 28).

Aggēla, m, f. Cereteri, a town of Tuscany, built by the Pēlāgi, which was afterwards called Cerē q. v. The name is supposed to have been derived from Aggēlā, nymph of Trādmēnus lacus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 17). Virgil states, that the Lydians once possessed that place (Æn. viii. 480). Is. Aggēlini, n. Agillai, orum, m. Adj. Aggēlinus, a, um.

Aggēlūs, òs, m. a son of Hērēcles, by a daughter of Mōlōrchus of Clōnā, hence Hērēclūs Aggēlūs (Stat. Th. x. 243). He possessed uncommon strength, and boasted that he was not inferior in size and prowess to his father. Tēdēs, though little of stature, engaged him, and after a long and obstinate struggle, obtained the victory, at the games in honour of Archēmōrus. He distinguished himself against the Thebans in the attack made on them during the night after Hippōmēdon had fallen (Stat. Th. vi. 834—907. x. 254).

Aggērium, i, n. St. Filippo d'Agirone, or, Argirone, a town of Sicily, the birth-place of Diōdōrus Siculus. Is. Aggērii, orum, m. (Plin. i. 346). Adj. Aggēriensis, is, e, et, Aggērius, a, um. Aggēriamānus (Sil. Ital. xiv. 207).

Aggētes, is, m. a man slain by Pērcēus. He was called infāmis, for having murdered his father (Ov. Met. v. 148).

Abārnā, m, f. a town of Etruria, Tuscany (Liv. x. 25). The site of this town is unknown.

Abēōbārbus, i, m. a surname of a family of the Domitian clan. Of its origin Suetonius gives this account. Two young men of august appearance presented themselves to L. Dōmītiūs, desired him to inform the senate and people of a victory, the news of which had not then reached Rome. To convince him that they were more than mortal, they stroked his cheeks, on which his beard from black became of a ruddy colour, resembling brass (Chod. Ner. 1).

Ajax, v. Aiax, ācis, m. a son of Tēlāmōn and Hēsionē, a daughter of Lāomēdon, the fifth king of Troy. In bravery he surpassed all the Greeks, except Achilles (Ajax hērōs ab Achille secūndus, Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 193). After the death of that hero, he engaged in a dispute with Ulysses for his armour, and, on the Grecian chiefs adjudging them to his rival, slew himself. Agāmēmmon would not allow his brother Tēucer to bury him, because he had shown a hostile disposition towards the Greeks. Disappointment at not obtaining the arms of Achilles drove him to madness, and he killed a flock of sheep, supposing them to be Grecians, on which this refusal proceeded (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 193). Others say he slew two oxen, thinking one to be Agāmēmmon, and the other Ulysses (Juv. Sat. xiv. 286). From his blood sprung the flower Hyacinth, inscribed with the first two letters of his name. Hōmērus frequently mentions the uncommon length of his step. Tēlāmōne creātus (Ov. Met. xiii. 22 seq.), et, Tēlāmōne sātus (Ov. Met. xiii. 123), Ajax, whom Ovid calls clypei dominus septemplex, because his shield was made of seven folds of a bull's skin (Ov. Met. xiii. 2). Tēlāmōniādes, m, m. a patronymic of Ajax from his father Tēlāmōn.

Ovid has drawn the character of this bold and gallant soldier with great ability. The oration, which he has put into his mouth in disputing with Ulysses his right to the arms of Achilles, conveys a correct idea of his temper, manners, and education. It is abrupt, short, and violent. Indignant at Ulysses being even compared to him, he turns in disdain his face from the judges, and looks back on the ships. Like a brave but illiterate soldier, he rests his claims to preference on dignity of ancestry and feats of personal valour. A stranger to the nicety of language observed by military gentlemen in modern times, he treats Ulysses with contemptuous insult and vulgar reproach. Knowing that, in personal prowess, his opponent was his inferior, he is little solicitous about the terms which he employs, and even upbraids him with cowardice, treachery, deception, and meanness of birth. The topics which he pursues, though neither elegant nor winning, are remarkably suited to the character of a soldier, whose greatness depended solely on noble pedigree, and on the heroic deeds achieved by his own arm. The whole considered as the effusion of an untutored but dauntless and vigorous mind, must be considered as a master-piece of poetical composition.

Pallidus Ajax, a pale Ajax; in ridicule of the counterfeit eagerness and agitation of a lawyer, resembling the anger and zeal of Ajax in the dispute above-mentioned (Juv. Sat. vii. 115).—2. The son of Oilēus king of Lōcris, who, though an eminent warrior, was inferior to the son of Tēlāmōn, hence he was called Ajax Sēcūndus; but was of a milder temper, moderator (Ov. Met. xiii. 356). Still Virgil allows him to have been very fierce, acerrimus (Æn. ii. 414). Hōmērus states that he excelled in running (Il. ii. 527) which Hōrātius has also mentioned, Celerem sequi Ajācem, Ajax, swift in pursuit, (Od. i. 15. 18), and in throwing the spear (Il. ii. 530). As he was returning home from the Trojan war, Minērvā, because he had offered violence to Cāsāndra, a daughter of Priam, in her temple, wrecked his fleet, and sunk his ship in a storm. She lifted him up into the air by a whirlwind, and then dashed him against a pointed rock, which occasioned his death (Virg. Æn. i. 41 seq.). hence Hōrātius calls his ship impia rātis (Epod. x. 14). He was a native of Nārycia, hence Ovidius has Narjēus hēros (Met. xiv. 468). Virgilius probably referred to the dispersion of his fleet, when the Lōcri landed on the coast of the Brūtii, and built Locri Epizephyrīi, on that account called Narjēi Locri (Æn. iii. 399).

Alus Lōcūtius, Ali Lōcūtī, m. a temple was voted to, in the new street in Rome, above that of Vēsta, in consequence of M. Cædicius, a plebeian, declaring to the tribunes, that he had heard there, in the dead of night, a voice louder than that of man, ordering notice to be given to the magistrates that the Gauls were approaching (Liv. v. 32—50).

Alābānda, m. f. v. Alābānda, orum, n. Alabānda, or, Eclabānda, an inland city of Cārīa, anciently abounding in riches, consequently in luxury and extravagance. It was built by Alābāndus, whence the name. Near it Dinōcrates, and the troops of Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, suffered a complete defeat from the combined army of the Rhodians under their prætor Pausistrātus, 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 18). Inh. Alābāndenses, ium (Sing. Alābāndensis, is), et, Alābāndēni, v. Alābāndēi, orum (Liv. xlv. 25), m. worshipped the founder of their city with greater solemnity than they did any, even of the more noble gods (Cic. Nat. Deor. iii. 16). They sent ambassadors to Rome, informing the senate, that they had erected a temple to the city Rome, and had instituted annual games to her divinity. These ambassadors brought a golden crown of fifty pounds weight to Jupiter, with three hundred horsemen's bucklers, and requested they might be allowed to sacrifice in the capitol. An embassy so flattering to the pride of the Romans was necessarily well received. Adj. Alābāndensis, is, e. Alābāndēnsis ager, the territory of the Alābāndenses, or, Alābāndēni.

Alābārchēs. See Arābia.

Alābis, is, m. a man killed by C. Lælius in Spain (Sil. Ital. xv. 467).

Alābis, is, v. Alābus, i, et, Alābo, ōnis, v. Onobāla, æ, m. the Cantaro, a river of Sicily (Sil. Ital. xiv. 227).

Alālēcōmēne, arum, f. a small village of Bæōtia, at the foot of an inconsiderable eminence, said to have received its name from Alālēcōmēne, a native of that place, by whom Minerva was brought up. Others say Alālēcōmēnia was a daughter of Ogēges (Paus. ix. 33). There was a fountain in Arcādīa called Alālēcōmēnias. Adj. Alālēcōmēneus, a, um. Alālēcōmēneū agmīna (Stat. Th. vii. 380).

Alallia, æ, f. Torre d'Aleria, a town of Cōrsica, built by the Phœceans (Herod. i. 165). It is also called Alēria q. v.

Alāmānia, æ, f. a district of ancient Germany, comprehending Baden, Wirtemberg, &c. The Romans conquered it, to which Claudianus alludes (viii. 448). Later writers use this term to denote the whole of Germany (Amm. Mar. xiv. 10 seq.). Inh. Alāmāni, orum (Sing. Alāmānus, i), m. (Claud. xxv. 17). Adj. Alāmānicus, a, um. Alāmānica tentūria (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 2).

Alāuder, dri, m. the Alhaur, a river of Gālātia, one of the branches of Sāngārius, the Sakaria, near the source of that river (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Alāni, orum (Sing. Alānus, i), m. a Scythian nation, which Plinius supposes inhabited the country near Pālus Mæōtis, the Sea of Azoph. Neither Strābo nor Pōmpōnius Mēla mention them, and D'Anville places them towards the sources of Hūpānis, the Kuban. Like other Scythian nations, tribes of them were probably to be found in different parts, and at a considerable distance from each other. Lūcānus describes them as a nation perpetually engaged in war; but since none of the Roman commanders had penetrated so far into that country in the age of Cæsar and Pōmpēius, he, most probably, confounded the Alāni with the Albāni (Phar. viii. 223). Claudianus, who lived at a later period, describes the Alāni as short in stature, of great courage, with eyes fierce and stern. Adj. Alānus, a, um. Alāna gens (Claud. xxvi. 583).

Alāricus, i, m. a famous chieftain of the Goths, who, at the head of twenty thousand men, overran Thrāciā, Romanīa, marched through Mācēdōniā, and entered Thēssālīa; where he met with a powerful resistance, and lost three thousand of his army. The number of his troops enabled him to overrun Greece, which he pillaged as he went along, and, returning to Epīrus, where he continued for five years, he formed the design of invading Italy. The Romans had now lost the bravery which distinguished their ancestors, and offered little opposition to the inroads of this barbarian. In the year 409 he took Rome, which he gave up to his soldiers, by whom it was plundered. Not satisfied with ravaging the greater part of Italy, he resolved to cross into Sicily, but being driven back by contrary winds, he carried, by storm, Cosenza, where he died, eleven years after he had come into that beautiful, but ill-fated country. In English history he is generally called Alaric.

Alāstor, ōris, m. a companion of Sārpēdōn, killed by Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 257).

Alātrēus, v. Alāthreūs, ōis, m. son of Dirēdītis, a youth of great beauty and personal bravery, who distinguished himself in the Theban war. In size, features, and general appearance, he seemed the twin-brother of his father, who, from Stātilus, appears to have been very young (Th. vii. 300 seq.).

Alātrium, v. Aletrium, i, n. Alatri, a town of Lātium, on the river Cōsa. Inh. Alātrinātes, ium (Sing. Alātrinās, ātis), m. On the defeat of the Hērnci, the Romans restored to them their own laws, which they preferred to being enrolled as citizens of Rome, 307 B. C. (Liv. ix. 43). Adj. Alātrinās, as, as, gen. ātis. Alātrinās pōpulus (Liv. ix. 43).

Alāzon, ōnis, m. the Alazon, a river of Albāniā, one of the branches of Cŷrus, the Kur (Val. Flacc. vi. 101).

Alba, æ, f. Albe, a town of Lātium, on the north of Lācus Fūclius, the Lake of Celano, to which the Romans sent a colony of six thousand men, in 304 B. C. In later times it was used as a state prison for captive kings and nobles, who had been led in triumph through the streets of Rome, at the car of a successful general; and is singularly well fitted for such a purpose, being strongly fortified, both by nature and art. To distinguish it from Alba Lōnga, it is sometimes called Alba Fūclēntia, v. Fūclēntis, and Silius Itālicus has Alba infērior, from its being more inland than the other. Inh. Albēnses, ium, m. Ambassadors from this city, and eleven of the neighbouring people, declared to the Roman senate that they were unable to furnish the supplies of men and money ordered in 211 B. C. Their steady perseverance obtained for them an exemption from warfare during six years; at the end of that time, the senate then compelled them to furnish double the number of troops, and, to aggravate the punishment, obliged them to send the sons of the wealthier families (Liv. xxvii. 9). Adj. Albēnsis, is, e. Albēnsis ope (Liv. xxvi. 11).

Alba Lōga, Alba Lōgae, f. a city of Lātium, built by Ascānius, a son of Enēas (1192 B. C.). It is said to have received this name from its being erected on the ground where Enēas, agreeably to the prediction of Hēlénus, and also of the god Tiberinus, found a white sow with 30 young, and Lōga, from its extending along the ridge of the hill Albānus, which, probably, derived its name from the same circumstance. The descendants of Enēas reigned there, according to some historians, upwards of 14 generations. Alba Lōga may be considered as the mother of Rome, to which its inhabitants, after the famous combat of the Hōrātii, and Cūriātii, were carried (665 B. C.) by Tullus Hōstilius, who reduced the city to ashes. Livius states, that the temples of the gods were not injured (i. 29), and when Jūvénālis wrote, it appears that Alba, although demolished, preserved the fire and worship of Vesta, whom he calls less, in reference to the smallness of her temple there, compared with that at Rome (Sat. iv. 61).

Of Alba Lōga no vestige now remains, says St. Eustace; and Cadell maintains that Albano stands on the site of that ancient city, and retains considerable fragments of ancient buildings. It stood four hundred years (Liv. i. 29). Ital. Albāni, orum (Sing. Albānus, i), m. the Albans. Adj. Albānus, a, um. Albānus aquas, Alban stone. It resisted fire, and, therefore, in the year 65, a decree passed that all the buildings in Rome, at a certain height, should be vaulted with Alban or Gubian stone, which had the same property (Tac. Ann. xv. 43). Albāna cōmīssātio, an elegant and sumptuous entertainment (Mart. xii. 48). Albānus mons, much higher than the grove of Dīāna. On it Latīne feriæ used to be celebrated, and here Roman generals triumphed, both in opposition to the senate and tribunes of the people (Liv. xxxiii. 23). The Alban or Latin hills are volcanic eruptions, rising up from the plain, and not attached to the Appennines. Albānus lacus, the Lake of Albano, called likewise the Lake of Castello, is a sheet of water about five miles in circumference, of an oval form, entirely surrounded by mountains, abounding with excellent fish, and is said to be unfathomable in one place. The outlet of this lake, made by the Romans during the siege of Veii, in 397 B. C., is a mine, or tunnel, of five feet in height, driven through a volcanic rock for seven thousand nine hundred and seventy-five English feet.

Albānia, m. f. Cervan, or, Shirean, a country of Asia, on the western shore of Cāspium Mārē, the Caspian Sea, bounded on the south by Atropātēna (Plin. i. 670). Ital. Albāni, orum (Sing. Albānus, i), m. believed themselves descendants of the Thesaliāns, who accompanied Iāson to Cōlchis, when, on the death of Æetes, he took possession of the vacant throne (Tac. Ann. vi. 34). Justinus says, that they followed Hercules from Mons Albānus, in Italy, and, mindful of their Italian origin, saluted the army of Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus (Just. xlii. 3). Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus conquered them in battle, on their refusing him a passage through their country, 67 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 101). Adj. Albānus, a, um. Albānum Mārē, the Caspian Sea, to the north of Cýrus, the Kur (Plin. i. 670).

Albānus, i, m. a man in the army of the Roman consul Scipio, killed by Critias in the battle with the Carthaginians, at the foot of the Alps, when Hannibal made his descent upon Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 381).

Albas, v. Alba, v. m. the fifth king of Alba, son of Lātinius Silvius, and father of Cāpētus (Dion. Hal.).

Albia Tērēntia, Albis Tērēntia, f. wife of L. Sālvius Otho, by whom she became the mother of L. Sālvius Titianus and M. Sālvius Otho, the Emperor (Suet. Oth. 1).

Albici, v. Albicci, orum, m. a barbarous nation (barbaros homines, Cæs. B. C. i. 34) of Prōvincia, Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné, in ancient times had been under the protection of the Māssiliēnses, the inhabitants of Māssilla, Marseilles. They possessed the mountains (hence called Montani) to the north of that city. The history of the Albici is unknown. Caesar describes them as little inferior to the Romans in bravery (B. C. i. 57).

Albina, v. f. an old widow, rich and childless, whom Jūvénālis describes the pretor hastening along early in the morning to salute, in hopes of succeeding to part, if not to the whole, of her wealth (Sat. iii. 130).

Albingaunum, i, n. Albenga, a maritime town of Ligūria, on Sinus Ligūsticus, the Gulf of Genoa (Tac. Hist. ii. 15). Ital. Albingauni, orum, m. commonly written Albingauni Ligūres. Livius mentions them when the Carthaginian ships arrived on their coast to aid Māgo, in 207 B. C. (xxix. 5).

L. Albinus, L. Albinus, m. a tribune of the people in 494 B. C. with C. Licinius q. v. (Liv. ii. 33).—2. A plebeian, who, conveying in a waggon his wife and children from Rome, when threatened by the Gauls, observed the vestal virgins carrying the sacred things, and influenced by religious principles, caused his own family to come out of the waggon, took up the vestal virgins, with their burdens, and brought them to Cære, Cereveteri (Liv. v. 40. Flor. i. 13).

M. Albinus, M. Albinus, m. a plebeian, elected a military tribune, with consular authority, in 378 B. C. (Liv. vi. 30).

Albinovānus, i, m. a Roman who joined Sūlpicius, and they two threw their forces in the way of L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, to prevent his entering Rome, at the time he marched an army against C. Mārius and his abettors (Flor. iii. 21).

Albinovānus. See Celsus and Pido. Albinus, i, m. a man mentioned by Mārtiālis as indebted to Afer, who boasted of his riches (iv. 37).

Albinus. See Postūmus. Albi, is, m. the Elbe, a river of Germany, which has its source in the mountains of Silesia, runs south for about fifty miles, then turns northwest, and, after a course of upwards of six hundred and forty miles, falls into the German Sea, near Cuxhaven. The tide flows about two and twenty miles up this stream, on the banks of which stand the towns Dresden, Meissen, Wittenburg, Magdeburg, and Hamburg.

Albium Intemellum, Albii Intemelli, n. Ventiniglia, a town of Liguria, on Sinus Ligusticus, the Gulf of Genoa (Tac. Hist. ii. 13).

Albius Maximus, Albii Maximi, m. an indolent man, on whom Martialis writes an Epigram (xi. 107).

A. Albius Tibullus, A. Albii Tibulli, m. (the prænomen doubtful), was, by birth, an Italian, but whether he was a native of Rome, or of one of the municipal towns, is unknown. Ovidius and Tibullus entered life on the same day, 45 B. C. That he went with Messala his patron, to whom he continued firmly attached during life, against the Aquitani, we have his own authority, and as that general triumphed over the Gauls in 28 B. C., our poet would only then be sixteen years of age, which has induced some to dispute the year of his birth. Except the few particulars which may be collected from his own writings, and from some passages of Horatius and Ovidius, we know nothing of the life and character of Tibullus. The very names of his parents have not been transmitted, although his mother outlived him, whom Ovidius describes closing his eyes after death, in the presence of one of his sisters. He lost his patrimonial fortune, but in what manner is not recorded; it is, however, probable he espoused the party of Brutus, and his lands would consequently be divided among the veterans of Augustus. This conjecture receives some confirmation from his never mentioning the government of that Emperor. Both Horatius (Epis. i. 4) and Statius (Syl. i. 2. 255) have mentioned his wealth. He fell sick in Phœacia, when he was preparing to attend Messala on an eastern expedition, and, supposing himself dying, he composed the third elegy of the first book, of which he wished the two following lines to be engraved on his tombstone:—

"Hic faciet inmitti consumtus morte Tibullus, "Messallam terrâ dum sequiturque mari."

He recovered from this illness, and returned to Italy, where he died at the age of forty-four. From the general tenor of his writings, he appears to have been of a gay, lively, and cheerful disposition, and it cannot be denied that he made love and pleasure too much the theme of his muse. His favourites were Delia, whose real name was Plania, Næara, and Némësis. Like other writers on these topics, to follow either his advice or example would be to forget the dignity of man, by fixing the mind wholly on personal gratification, too often neither safe nor lawful. He contracted an intimate friendship with many great men of that age, among whom were Mæcenas, Virgilius, Ovidius, and Horatius. The last speaks in high commendation of his taste and abilities, and Ovidius, besides mentioning him frequently with great respect, laments his early death in some beautiful and pathetic passages. In the opinion of Quintilianus, Tibullus excelled all writers of elegiac poetry, a species of composition in which the Greeks yielded to the Romans, and he gives him the preference in elegance and terseness both to Catullus and Ovidius. Modern critics differ with respect to the comparative merits of these three poets, and as each has a number of admirers, who think him the first in excellence, it may, perhaps, be safely inferred, that although the beauties of each are by no means of the same kind, yet their writings, upon the whole, are entitled to rank nearly alike.

C. Albius Cillenus, C. Albii Cilleni, m. a common soldier and a ringleader of the mutiny at Sacro, in 208 B. C. C. Atrius Umber and he being appointed commanders of the army, assumed the badges of supreme power, the rods and axes, which were afterwards, on the mutiny being quelled, applied to their own backs and necks (Liv. xxviii. 24 seq.).

Albucilla, æ, f. a woman notorious for her immoralities, which, however, did not prevent Satrius Sécundus from marrying her. She, with three senators, her accomplices and adulterers, was brought to trial for disaffection to the Emperor. To avoid the disgrace of dying by the hands of a public executioner, she attempted to kill herself, but the wound being slight, she was, by order of the senate, hurried away to prison (Tac. Ann. vi. 47, 48).

Albucius, i, m. an old man whom Horatius censures for excessive nicety and preciseness (Sat. ii. 2. 67).

Albula, æ, f. the ancient name of Tiber, the Tevere, a corruption of Tiberinus q, æ (Virg. Æn. viii. 332).

Albuna, æ, f. a Sibyl, who was said to have carried a volume of prophecies through the midst of a river, without its being touched by water, the remembrance of which was preserved by a statue of the goddess erected in the temple at Tibur, Tivoli, holding in one hand a book, which probably gave rise to the fiction (Tib. ii. 5. 69). This statue, said to have been found in the pool of Anio, the Teverone, and her oracles were transferred to the capitol, by the Roman senate. Lactantius calls her Albunea, and makes her the tenth Sibyl. According to this author, she was worshipped as a goddess at Tibur, Tivoli (i. 6).

Albunea, æ, f. the nymph who presided over the river Albula. Domus Albunea, the house of Albunea, i. e. the spring, or source of Albula, because the presiding deity of each stream, was supposed to have her residence in its fountain (Hor. Od. i. 7. 12).

Albunea, æ, f. c. Lacus Albulus, Solfatara, a lake of Latium, strongly impregnated with sulphur, coats with a hard stony matter every thing which it touches, is nearly a mile in circumference, has floating islands of a sulphureous and bituminous substance, on each of which, two or three persons may stand, and move them about with a pole. It empties itself into Anio, the Teverone, by a small stream called from the colour of the water, Albula. Strabo says that the Albula rises from many springs, its waters are cold, and drunk as a cure for various diseases.

Alburnus, i, m. Alburno, a mountain of Lucania, near Silárus, the Selo (Virg. G. iii. 147).

Albūtus, i, m. the name of a grammarian (Virg. Cat. vii. 3).—2. The father of Cnida (Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 48).

C. Albius Silus, C. Albūti Sili, m. a native of Nōvāria, Nōvāra. At the time he held the office of edile in that place, he was dragged by the feet from the tribunal, by those against whom he had pronounced sentence. Instead of resenting the insult offered to himself and his office, he felt ashamed, hastened to the gate, and thence to Rome, where he was admitted into the house of Plancus, the orator. The training which he there received, improved the powers of his mind, gave him confidence in his own abilities, so that he established a school, where he declaimed in very different styles, probably adapting his language to the subject. In reviewing his life, there appears more talent than prudence. His admiration of Brūtus had nearly cost him his life. Returning to Nōvāria, on account of an imposthume, he procured his own death, by abstinence from food (Suet. Clar. Rhet. 5).

Alceus, i. m. an eminent lyric poet, who was born in Lesbos, Mityleni. This island belonged to the Æōlii, consequently the natives used the Æōlic dialect, in which Alceus, and other lyric bards to whom Lesbos gave birth, wrote. None of the writings of Alceus have reached modern times (Hor. Od. ii. 13. 27). In a severe engagement with the Athenians, who had the superiority, Alceus fled from the field, and the Athenians hung up his arms in the temple of Minerva, at Sigeum (Herod. v. 95).—2. The father of Amphitrūon, king of Thēbe, Thēba, from whom Hēracles is called Alcides (Paus. viii. 14). Alcides, x. m. Amphitrūon (Pin. Ol. vi. 115).

Alcander, dri. m. a Trojan killed by Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 767).—2. An attendant of Sarpēdon, killed by Ulyssēs (Ov. Met. xiii. 238).—3. A Lycian nobleman (Hom. Il. v. 678).

Alcandē, es. f. the wife of Pōlybus, prince of Egyptian Thēbē (Hom. Od. iv. 125 seq.).

Alcanor, ōris. m. a native of Ida, the father of Pāndārus and Bīlās (Virg. Æn. ix. 672).—2. One of the Rātūli, the brother of Māon and Nūmītor (Virg. Æn. x. 338).

Alcathōs, es. f. a name of Mēgāra, so called from Alcathōus, or rather a citadel of Mēgāra (Ov. Met. vii. 443).

Alcathōus, i. m. son of Pēlops, and builder of Mēgāra, hence Virgilius calls him Actæus, not that Mēgāra was, strictly speaking, in Attica; but because it was believed to have been formerly under the government of the Athenians (Cir. 106).—2. A Trojan killed by Cædīcus (Virg. Æn. x. 747).—3. A man whom Amphīdārus killed with a stone, at the siege of Thēbe. He and his family lived near Cārystus, where he procured a scanty subsistence by fishing (Stat. Th. vii. 718 seq.).

Alcē, es. f. a city of Cēltibēria, taken by Th. Scipronius Grāccus in 181 B. C. (Liv. xl. 48).

Alcē, es. f. (strength), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 217).

Alcē, es. v. Alces, in. f. an elk. According to Cæsar, this animal was peculiar to the forest Hērēnia q. v., and not unlike a fallow deer, except in having legs without joints (B. G. vi. 26). Piliy's account of the elk is very different. According to that naturalist, it can only be distinguished from the horse by the length of the ears, and height of the neck (ii. 154).

Alcēstē, es. v. Alcēstis, idis. acc. im. f. daughter of Pēllās and Anāxibīa, who married Admētus, king of Phēra, Belesian, and, to procure his exemption from death, she died, according to some, was restored to life again by Prōserpina, according to others, brought back by Hēracles (Virg. Cu. 261). Admēti conjux, Alcēstē (Prop. ii. 6. 23).—2. A tragedy, of which she formed the subject, and hence called by her name (Juv. Sat. vi. 653). Jūvénalis writes, that although the Roman women frequently saw that play acted, they were so far from following her example, that they would sacrifice their husbands to save the life of a lapdog.

Alcēstides, x. m. a mean tragic poet, to whom Euripides complained that he had, with great labour, only written three lines that day. The other replied that he had, with great care composed a hundred, on which Euripides said, "your verses will only live three days, but mine for ever" (Valer. Max. iii. 7).

Alcētas, x. m. brother of Pēdicēas q. v. (Just. xiii. 6).

Alcēus, ēos. m. a Boeotian. Alcēda, arum. m. a patronymic of Phīlēus, Hēlops and Bīlāpyx, sons of Alcēus, killed by Thēseus in the Theban war (Stat. Th. xii. 744).

Alcibiādes, is. m. an Athenian of noble birth, who, to external form of uncommon elegance, added a mind possessed of the highest endowments. The latter were cultivated and improved under the tuition of Sōcrātes. As an orator, he appears to have been almost without an equal, graceful, fluent, forcible, and argumentative. Besides, his manners were engaging, his address winning, and he adapted, with great art, his conduct to the times. His bodily strength and soundness of constitution enabled him to undergo great fatigue, and his wealth furnished him with the means of displaying his liberality, both in acts of munificence, and in the splendour of his equipage. To complete his character, he wanted only a steady regard for virtue, and this defect rendered him infamous for his vices. To enter into an enumeration, or to record particular instances of his debauchery, licentiousness, and extravagance, would be foreign and repugnant to the design of this Work. In his life by Cōrnēlius Nēpos, many proofs will be found, that the precepts of morality did not regulate either his plans or his conduct. To his merits, both as a naval and military commander, the ancient authors bear ample testimony. In the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians, by his influence, declared war against the Syracusans, and appointed him commander. During his absence on this expedition, his enemies arraigned him for profaning the mysteries, and the magistracy ordered him to return home to stand trial. This measure blasted his expectation with respect to his success, and having set out with the guards who carried him to Thūrii, El-Cupa, in Italy, he there privately withdrew from them, and went first to Elis, and afterwards to Boētia. Here he learned that his property had been confiscated, the Eumōlpidæ had cursed him, and sentence of death had been passed upon him. The Lacedæmonians afforded him protection, and by his advice, formed an alliance with the king of Persia, fortified Decella in Attica, which kept Athens under a blockade, and detached Ionia entirely from the confederacy of the Athenians. The benefits which the people derived from his knowledge of government, and from his skill in war, they treacherously attempted to repay with private assassination, and to preserve his life, he fled to Tissaphernes, viceroy of Darius, king of Persia. The power of the Lacedæmonians then began to increase, and that of the Athenians to diminish, at which his heart relented, and to repair the losses which his countrymen had sustained, chiefly through his agency, he offered to join the army under Pisander, who rejected his services, but Thrasybulus, son of Lycus, with better judgment, allowed him to join the army under his command. Theramenes soon after obtained a decree of the people permitting his return, on which he was appointed joint-commander with Thrasybulus and Theramenes. Victory then declared for the Athenians in every engagement, when Ionia, Byzantium, Hælespontus, and many cities of Asia Minor were again reduced to subjection. To his merit the citizens attributed all their success, and imagining that nothing was beyond his power, believed that he acted treacherously at Cymæ, on which account they superseded him in command. Instead of resenting this act of injustice on the Athenians, he raised a body of men, entered Thracia, and obtained great wealth by overrunning part of the country, where he formed friendships with some of the kings. Jealousy prevented Philocles, who commanded the Athenians, from adopting the counsel which the patriotism of Alcibiades had suggested, and the result was the destruction of his armament, and the termination of the war in a single engagement by Lysander. Necessity then compelled him to retreat, and he ventured northward among the Thracians, who attempted his life for the sake of his money, they failed in the former but secured the latter. Finding himself insecure, he fled to Pharnabazus, viceroy of Asia Minor, who, instead of yielding to his intercession in behalf of the Athenians, resolved to put him to death, and for that purpose sent men to murder him during the night. Afraid of his personal bravery, they set his house on fire, but he forced his way through the flames, and would have escaped, had not the ruffians at a distance discharged their weapons at him, and thereby deprived him of life.—2. A Lacedæmonian exile, who, together with Arcus complained to the Roman senate of the injustice and cruelty of the Achæi, who had condemned them to death. The opposition of the Romans induced the Achæi to comply with the will of the senate, and the sentence of death was reversed (Liv. xxxix. 35).

Alcidamas, antis, m. a native of Cæa, Lango, whose daughter, Ctisilla, was changed into a pigeon (Ov. Met. vii. 369).—2. A Lacedæmonian, one of the warriors against Theba, Theba, who had been taught the exercise of the palestra by Pollux, in whose favour he stood high. He engaged Capanus, whom he surpassed in wrestling, and in long continued effort. Statius has given a detailed account of the contest and dexterity of the combatants. He was killed on entering Theba, during the war between the Argives and Thebans (Th. vi. 737. x. 494).

Alcides, æ, m. a patronymic of Hærcules q. v.

Alcimède, es, f. the mother of Iason (Ov. Ep. Her. vi. 105).—2. A native of Lemnos, Stalimen, who murdered her father, and carried his head in triumph, at the time the Lemnian women put all the men of that island to death (Stat. Th. v. 236).

Alcimèdon, ontis, m. an ingenious carver (Virg. B. iii. 37).—2. Son of Lærces, commanded the fifth division of the troops of Achilles (Hom. Il. xvi. 197).—3. One of the Italian pirates, who carried off Bæchus from the island Naxos, c. Dia (Ov. Met. iii. 618).

Alcimus, i, m. a man whose death Mærtialis laments, and who appears to have been cut off in early life (i. 89).—2. A servant of the poet Mærtialis (v. 65).—3. The father of Mentor. Alcimides, æ, m. Mentor (Hom. Od. xxii. 235).—4. A favourite of Achilles. After the death of Patroclus, that hero showed the greatest respect to Automèdon and Alcimus (Hom. Il. xxiv. 574).

Alcinous, i, m. son of Nausithous and Pæribea, who was king of the Phæacians, and husband of Arête, daughter of his brother Rhæenor. He obtained distinction by his knowledge of agriculture and gardening. His orchards produced the choicest fruits twice a-year (bisfæra pômarta, Stat. Syl. i. 3. 81). He entertained Ulysses with great hospitality (Virg. G. ii. 87. Ov. Met. xiv. 565). Jæcetas Alcinou, the youth belonging to the court of Alcinous, who were devoted to luxury and effeminacy (Hor. Epis. i. 2. 28). Gænitla Alcinou, Nausicæe (Claud. xxix. 142).

Alcippæ, es, f. a servant girl (Virg. B. vii. 14).—2. An attendant of Hælena (Hom. Od. iv. 124).

Alcis, is, m. a German deity, supposed by the Romans to be the same with Castor and Pollux. Ernestius thinks that Alcis is the dative plural, according to him the nominative would be Alci (Tac. Mor. Ger. 43).

Alcithoë, es, f. a Theban, a daughter of Minyas q. v., king of Bæotia. She and her sisters denied the divinity of Bæchus and refused to join in his worship. Whilst the Theban women were employed in celebrating the orgies of that god, the daughters of Minyas continued at their looms. To enliven their hours of labour, one of them proposed that each in her turn should relate some amusing tale, to which the other sisters agreeing, she with whom the idea had originated was requested to begin. After hesitating for some time which of her numerous collection would be most agreeable, whether Babylonian Dercetis changed to a fish, or her daughter to a dove; or Nālas, who, by magic, transformed young men to fishes; or the tree, the berries of which were formerly white, but turned to purple by being stained with blood, preferred the last in consequence of its being little known. She then narrates the simple, but beautiful, tender, and affecting fable of Pylæmus and Thibæ. Læucōthoë next, after mentioning the exposure of Mars and Venus, relates the history of Læucōthoë, with whom Apollo fell in love, and afterwards turned into a rod of frankincense. To this she adds the fiction of Clÿtë, whom the same god changed into a sun-bower. Alcithoë, being then requested by her sisters to tell a story, despising, as too common, the fables of Daphnis, a shepherd on mount Ida, who, for violating his marriage-promise, was transformed into stone, of Scythion who changed his sex, of Celmis, a nurse of Jupiter, converted to adamant, and the nymph Smilax and her lover Cræceus turned into flowers, prefers the history of the fountain Salmacis, which conceived a violent attachment for Hermæphroditus, the son of Mercûrius and Vénus. These sisters, having discontinued their fictitious narratives, remained still obstinate in their contempt of Bæchus, who, in revenge, changed their limbs into vines and ivy, and themselves into bats (Ov. Met. iv. 1 seq.).

Alcmaeon, v. Alcmaeon, ònis, m. son of Amphiclarus, who put his mother Eriphylê to death by his father's orders, because she had discovered the place of his concealment. For this murder he was tormented by the Furies, until Phægeus purified him from that crime, according to ancient usage. He afterwards married Arsinôê, daughter of that prince, to whom he gave the necklace and a robe which his mother had received to betray his father's lurking-place. In consequence of a famine, he consulted the oracle of Apollo, which answered, that he must remove to Achelôus, from whom he would receive a city. Having been expiated by Achelôus, he married his daughter Cælinthôê, who, wishing to have both the necklace and robe, he returned to Phægeus, with whom, it appears he had left his wife, and stating that he would not be freed of the madness until he made a present of them to the oracle at Delphi, Castrî, received them from Arsinôê. Phægeus, on discovering the fraud, caused Alcmaeon to be put to death by his sons Téménos and Axion, who having been blamed by Arsinôê for that murder, put her into a chest, carried her to Tégæa, delivered her over to Agapenor, and falsely asserted that she had put Alcmaeon to death. His sons Amphiclerus and Acarnan, on reaching manhood, revenged his death by killing Prônôus and Agenor, sons of Phægeus, made an attack on the palace, and put also Phægeus and his wife to death (Apol. iii. 7 seq.). Adj. Alcmaeonius, a, um. Alcmaonia furia, the furies by which Alcmaeon was tormented for the murder of his mother (Prop. iii. 5. 41).—2. The last archon of Athens who held the office for life (Vel. Pat. i. 8).—3. The father of Mæcetes, the enemy of Pisistratus (Herod. i. 59).

Alcman, ònis, m. an eminent poet, a native of Sardes, Sart. In early life he went to Sparta, Mistra, and wrote in the language of Lacedæmon, on which account the inhabitants of that town considered him a Lacedæmonian, but unjustly, as Velléius Pâtérculus observes (l. 18). Pausanias mentions a poem of his in honour of Castor and Pollux, and remarks that his powers of composition overcame the asperities of the dialect in which he wrote. That author also mentions that he was buried on the right of Sebrus (iii. 15). Ancient authors describe him as voracious and gluttonous. None of his writings have descended to modern times (Stat. Syl. v. 3. 133).

Alcmena, æ, f. daughter of Electryon and Naxos, daughter of Alcaeus, was the wife of Amphitryon, and mother of Hércules by Jüpiter.

The latter having declared among the gods, at the time Hércules was to be born, that the offspring of Persæus who first entered life, would be king of Mæcæna, Jūno, from envy, prevailed on Ilithyia to retard the labour of Alcmena, and accelerate the birth of Eurystheus, who, accordingly, was born in the seventh month, and thus obtained the ascendancy over Hércules. She, at the same time bore to her husband Iphicles (Apol. ii. 4 seq. Ov. Met. viii. 543).

Alcon, ònis, m. a celebrated archer of Cræta, Candia, who pierced with an arrow a serpent entwined round the body of his son Phalærus, so dexterously, that he did not touch his son. Perhaps by Alcon Virgilius meant simply a shepherd, without reference to any particular person (B. v. 11).—2. A silversmith, distinguished for his skill in that art, a native of Myle in Sicily, hence called Mylæus (Ov. Met. xiii. 684).—3. One who made a statue of Hércules of iron (Plin. v. 147).—4. A servant. Alcon Chium, i. e. Alcon ferens Chium (vinum) (Hor. Sat. ii. 8. 15).—5. A native of Sicily, hence Stâtius calls him Sicjônus (Th. vi. 556).—6. A native of Săguntum, Muriedro, who, without the knowledge of his fellow-citizens, went to Hännibal, when besieging their town in 220 B. C., to petition him for terms of surrender. The conditions offered by the conqueror were so rigorous, that he remained with Hännibal, alleging that it would cost him his life, if he mentioned them to the Săguntini (Liv. xxi. 12).

Alcon, òntis, m. a surgeon, who operated on the most difficult cases of hernia, and set broken bones, occasioning less pain than Antiochus the barber, when he shaved and cropped (Mart. vi. 70. xi. 85).

Alcyônê. See Halcjônê.

Alcyônêus, eos, m. a giant of prodigious strength killed by Hércules. Apollodorus states, that he was immortal as long as he touched the earth, and that of all the giants Porphyrion and he were the most remarkable (i. 6). Claudianus represents him walking on the Tuscan Sea (xxxvi. 185).

Alcyônia, æ, f. a lake in Argolis, by which Bæchus, as the Argives maintain, descended into the Infernal Regions to bring back Sémelé (Paus. ii. 37).

Alcæ, æ, f. a town of Arcadia in Peloponnesus, the Morea, built by Alcæus, son of Aphidas. It contained temples of Ephesian Diana and Bæchus. On certain annual festival days, at the altar of this god, women were scourged, as boys among the Spartans at the altar of Orthia (Paus. viii. 23). Adj. Alcæus, a, um. Alcæ Minerva (Stat. Th. iv. 288).

Alceto, òs, f. one of the Furies, who were daughters of Nox. Her sisters were Mægara and Tisiphônê. She acts an important part in the Æneid, at the instigation of Jūno, who bore an inveterate hatred to the Trojans. Virgilius represents her not only as abhorred by Plūto, but by her own sisters (Æn. vii. 328). When Lätinus, prohibited by the oracles from marrying his daughter Lavinia to an Italian, refused his sanction to the nuptials of his daughter with her cousin Turnus, only son of Daunus, king of the Rutuli, Alceto infuriated Amata, wife of Lätinus, and all the Latin women against the Trojans. Virgilius has described the effect produced by the infernal malignity of this pest so forcibly, that the whole scene is distinctly presented to the mind of the reader, who feels the force of every word, and admires the conception of the poet who forms such an admirable picture, by uniting celestial, infernal, and human agency. Cœcilia virgo, Alæto (Virg. Æn. vii. 479).

Alæctor, ōis, n. a noble Spartan, son of Argivus, and grandson of Pēlops and Hēgēsandrē. His daughter was married to Mēgāpēnthes (Hom. Od. iv. 10).

Alæctryōn, ōis, m. the father of Lēitus (Hom. Il. xvii. 602).

Alēgēnor, ōis, m. the father of Prōmāchus (Hom. Il. xiv. 503).

Alēus, a, um. Alēia arca, a part of Lēcia, which, according to some, had this name from Bēllērōphon, after he had fallen from Pēgāsus, wandering there (Ov. lb. 257). Hōmērus describes Bēllērōphon as hated by the gods, shunning the society of men, and wandering forlorn on this plain. Perhaps he inferred the anger of the gods from the fate of his family, Isandrus being killed by Mars, and Lāōdāmia fell a victim to the anger of Diāna (Il. vi. 201).

Alēmōn, ōis, m. a native of Argos, who was the father of Myscelos, who is hence called Alēmōnides (Ov. Met. xv. 19 seq.).

Alēria, e. Alalia, e. f. Torre d'Aleria, a town of Corfica, near the middle of the eastern coast, where Sulla settled a colony (Flor. ii. 2). Here some copies inaccurately read Carula.

Alēsia, a, f. Alise (Alēsia, Strabo), a town of the Māndūbli, near the source of Sēquāna, the Seine, situated on the summit of Mount Aurois, which was of considerable height, and washed on two sides by that river. Caesar invested it, and obliged the inhabitants, and the confederate army of their countrymen, who made a brave resistance, to submit. The number of the surrendered must have been great, since Caesar presented to each soldier in his army one of the prisoners in name of booty. Tacitus states that the Gauls besieged Caesar in Alēsia (Ann. xi. 23). It was a place of some note, under the emperors; but laid in ruins in the ninth century. Adj. Alisiensis, is, e. Alisiensis pagus.

Alēsium, i, n. a town of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, near Olēnia (Hom. Il. xi. 756).

Alētes, is, m. a Trojan of great age, maturity of intellect, and fidelity. The name, but not the character, is taken from Hōmērus (Virg. Æn. i. 121).—2. The founder of Cōrinthus, one of the Hērāclidæ, being the son of Hippōtas, grandson of Phylus, and great-grandson of Antiōchus, who claimed Hēracles for his father. His descendants filled the throne of that city for five generations (Pin. Ol. xiii. 17 seq.).

Alēthes, is, m. a Theban of great age, who attempted to moderate the grief of his countrymen, when assembled to bury their relations, whom Tȳdēus had killed. Of this havoc he imputes the blame to the king, who, on that account, ought to suffer punishment (Stat. Th. iii. 178).

Alētrium, i, n. See Alatrium.

M. Alēus, M. Alēti, m. a man of prætorian rank, who was deputed to view and repair the ruins of the twelve cities in Asia, which an earthquake had overthrown in the year 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 47).

Alēxāmēnus, i, m. a nobleman of the Ætōli, sent at the head of a thousand foot, and three hundred chosen horse, on pretence to join Nābis, tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, against the Romans, but, in reality, to put him to death. Nābis fell in the very face of his own life-guards, by a furious charge of Alēxāmēnus and his horsemen. Love of gold prevented any beneficial consequences from the perpetration of this deed; for Alēxāmēnus spent a whole day in searching for the treasures of Nābis, and, during that time, the Lacedæmonians took such measures as accomplished the destruction both of him and his troops, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 34—36).

Alēxānder, dri, m. the original name of Pāris (q. v. (Lucret. i. 475)).—2. A king of Epirus, and brother of Olympeas, the mother of Alexander the Great. Love of conquest induced him to cross into Italy, where he defeated the Lūcāni, Brūtii, and Sānnites, taking a number of towns, and sending three hundred hostages of illustrious families to Epirus. Near Pāndōsia, a city overhanging the territories of the Lūcāni and Brūtii, he took post on three hills, and continued raised cut off all communication between the three divisions of his army. The enemy overpowered the two with which he was not present, and concentrated the forces against the other, which he commanded in person. Having, with great bravery, broken through the midst of the enemy, killed with his own hand the general of the Lūcāni, and collected his troops, he came to a river, where the ruins of a bridge, carried away by a flood, pointed out his road. Here, while his troops were crossing, a soldier, worn out with toil, and apprehensive, from the odious name of the stream, said, "Thou art well called Achēros." At this name the king stopped, appearing doubtful if he ought to cross, because he had been cautioned by an oracle to beware of the city Pāndōsia, and the waters of Achērūsia. This response, perhaps, even more than his love of conquest, operated powerfully on his mind, as an inducement to quit Epirus, where there were a river and town of the same name, not supposing that there were any other. Sōtinius q. v. advised him not to hesitate, as the Lūcāni were waiting for an opportunity of showing their treachery, on which he plunged into the stream, and was transfixed by an exile of the Lūcāni, in 325 B. C. The enemy mangled his body in a shocking manner, the remains of which were buried at Consentia, Cosenza, his bones sent to Mētāpōntum, Torre di Mare, and afterwards to Epirus, to his wife Clēōpatra, sister of Alexander the Great (Liv. viii. 3—24).—3. Son of Amyntas I. succeeded his father in the throne of Mācēdōnia, in 479 B. C., reigned with great celebrity during forty-three years, and increased the boundaries of the kingdom (Just. vii. 4).—4. The eldest son of Amyntas II. and Eurydicē, who purchased peace from the Illyrians, by money, and gave his brother Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, as a hostage. From these barbarians Philip could not derive much advantage, but afterwards, residing at Thēbe, in the same character, having acquired that knowledge of war and government which enabled him to conquer the Illy-greater part of Greece. Alexander fell a victim to the treachery of his own mother Eurydice, in 329 B. C. (Just. vii. 5).—5. A king of Phères, a town of Thessaly, commonly called Alexander Phèreus, to distinguish him from others of this name. From his excessive cruelty, the Thessalians requested the protection of the Thebans, and they sent to their assistance Pelöpidas, who gained important advantages over the tyrant, and forced him to submission. Pelöpidas, without effect, endeavoured to overcome the natural ferocity of his dispositions, and to render him a just and good prince. At a future period, Alexander abused the confidence of Pelöpidas, who had gone to him unattended, by putting him in prison, and adding to that unjust confinement great harshness of treatment. Epäminöndas, some time after, procured the release of Pelöpidas, whom the Thebans again sent to Phère, to protect the oppressed against this monster of cruelty. In their first engagement Pelöpidas fell, and was after Thebæ, wife of Alexander, accomplished his death by the agency of her brothers, one of whom had suffered injury from his unlawful inclinations. His dead body was exposed to all kinds of insult, licked and trampled upon by his own subjects, a punishment somewhat proportioned to the enormity of his crimes (Plut. Pelop.).—4. Son of Philippos, king of Mæcédônia, and Olympias, was born at Pella, in the memorable night that Erosträtus burned the magnificent temple of Diäna, at Ephesus, with no other view than to perpetuate his memory by its destruction, about 356 B. C. Prodiges and omens, as usual, foretold the birth of this great man, and ancient authors have recorded them with the utmost minuteness and solemnity. Fictions, the offspring of ignorance, and unquestionable proofs of a rude or superstitious people, ought to find no place in books written for the instruction of youth. Aristöteles conducted his education during a period of five years, and much of his success in future life must be attributed to the transcendent abilities of that great philosopher. In his early years he discovered his ruling passion, an inordinate ambition, which stimulated to constant and vigorous exertions. He could brook no superior, and he would have preferred death to inferiority. His talents must have been naturally strong, otherwise even the instruction of Aristöteles would not have produced the hero of Mæcëdon. Besides the lessons which he received in his youth, he had almost always the benefit of his advice, for the pupil and preceptor were seldom separated. Thus Alexander acquired an ascendancy over the minds and affections of all around him, by which he carried into effect whatever policy or ambition suggested. At the age of fifteen, he showed his talents for government by suppressing a dangerous insurrection in Mæcëdonia, of which his father had left him governor, on marching at the head of his army beyond his own territories. He afterwards joined his father, whose life he saved in battle; but at a future period he quitted the court in disgust, on the divorce of his mother, and lived with her in retirement. Amongst the first proofs which he gave of his cruelty of disposition, may be mentioned the death of At-tälus, brother of Cleöpatra the new queen, an act of unprovoked and wanton atrocity. When his father fell by the hands of assassins, he punished the murderers, and this proof of his filial affection merits high commendation. The wisdom of his measures, and conciliatory address soon commanded the affections and esteem of his subjects, by whose bravery he conquered Thräcia and Illyricum. The Greeks appointed him commander-in-chief, and willingly followed him against the Persians, who had made two destructive inroads on their native country. His army consisted of thirty-two thousand foot, and five thousand horse, with which he defeated Därius on the banks of Granicus, the Oostrola, and with the view of fulfilling oracular predictions, advanced to Phrygia, took Górdium, Sarilar, entered the temple of Jüpiter, and attempted to untie the Gordian knot. See Górdium. The art with which it was formed baffled his ingenuity, and, like all who had before made the same experiment, he would have failed, had not his impetuosity of temper overcome all regard for the sanctity of the place, when he daringly drew his sword and cut it asunder, by which the priests declared he had fulfilled the oracle (Just. xi. 7). Advancing eastward, he obtained possession of Týrus, Sor, after a brave and determined resistance for seven months. On the city falling into his hands, he massacred two thousand of the inhabitants, without the least provocation, and this horrid act of barbarity fixes a deep stain on his character. He afterwards overran Ägyptus, Egypt, visited the temple of Jüpiter Ammon, and bribed the priests to declare him son of that god, which they readily did, and ordered his army to pay him divine honours. In a letter to his mother, he assumed this pedigree, for which she rebuked him, as degrading her character, by making her a concubine of Jüpiter (Gel. xiii. 4). He founded Alexandria, at the western extremity of the Nile, a situation chosen with great judgment, for commanding the trade of almost the whole of the then known world. In prosecution of his plan, he next marched into Asia, conquered Media, Syria, Persia, and part of India. On returning to Bäbylon, he died suddenly, according to some by poison, and according to others, by excessive drinking, aged thirty-three years and one month. Justinus maintains that he died a violent death, and at the head of the conspiracy was his favourite Antipäter. Livius says that he reigned thirteen years, a statement probably near the truth.—In reviewing his character, we observe a mixture of tenderness and cruelty, a fondness of admiration and a regard to truth, great generosity and shocking ingratitude, plans devised by uncommon wisdom, and acts of the most thoughtless rashness. To say that he was fortunate, will not account for his continued success during a period of twelve years, and his conquering such an immense tract of country, as perhaps never before acknowledged subjection to any one man. He possessed the qualities which formed a great and enterprising commander, and that fearless contempt of danger and death which distinguishes a brave soldier. His officers frequently entered into conspiracies against him, but he suppressed them with the utmost facility, whenever they were known. Continued victory rendered him at times haughty and cruel, but reflection, either from natural feeling or sound judgment, seems generally to have given the ascendancy to his better affections. It cannot be denied that, both as a statesman and a warrior, Alexander is one of the most distinguished characters of all antiquity. Justinus draws his character, and contrasts it with that of his father with discrimination and truth (ix. 8). Pellæus iuvenis, the Pellean youth, i. e. Alexander (Juv. Sat. x. 168). Clara urbs Alexandri, Alēxandria (Ov. Trist. i. 2. 79).—7. A son of Alexander the Great, by Clēōphis, an Indian queen, who succeeded his mother in the throne (Just. xii. 7).—8. Son-in-law of Antipater, born in Lyncestis, hence called Lyncesta, who laid snares for Alexander the Great, for which he was thrown into prison and afterwards killed (Just. xi. 2—xii. 14).—9. Son of Cassander and Thēssālōnica, sister of Alexander the Great. According to some, he succeeded his father, but Justinus makes his brother Antipater ascend the throne on the death of Cassander. Dēmētrius cut him off by treachery (xv. 4 seq.).—10. Son of Pýrrhus, king of Epirus, whom his father carried along with him into Italy, says Justinus, for comfort on so distant an expedition. After he was grown up, wishing to revenge the death of his father, he depopulated the Macedonian territories; but his army deserted him. He lost the kingdom of Mācēdōnia, which his son Dēmētrius recovered. He had fled on his defeat to the Acarnānes, with whose assistance, added to the good-will of the Epirōtes, he regained the kingdom. He died the husband of his sister in 234 B. C. (Just. xviii. 1—xxviii. 1).—11. Master of the horse amongst the Epirōtes, whom Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, sent with Pausānias their prætor to bring about a peace with T. Quinctius Flāminius, the Roman consul, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 10).—12. A man of eminence among the Ætōli, who possessed considerable talents as an orator, and made a violent speech against Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, in the interview with that monarch at Nicæa in 199 B. C. Livius has recorded the sentiments of Alexander, and the impartial reader will readily acknowledge that he is entitled to commendation, both for his boldness of utterance and truth of statement. The same intrepidity and manly avowal of opinion characterized his speech before T. Quinctius Flāminius at a meeting of the deputies from different states of Greece (Liv. xxxii. 33 seq.).—13. A Megalopolitan, who boasted of his being descended from Alēxānder the Great, on which account he called his two sons Philippus and Alexander. In consequence of his vanity, the Ætōli, and Antiochus, king of Sýria, easily persuaded him to join them in 194 B. C., and likewise to prevail on his son-in-law, Amynder, the husband of his daughter, Apamēa, to enter into the confederacy, maintaining that he would thus obtain the crown of Mācēdōnia, because he was of the royal family (Liv. xxxv. 47).—14. The younger son of Alēxānder of Mēgālōpōlis (Liv. xxxv. 47).—15. An Acarnanian, once the friend of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, whom he deserted, and joined Antiochus, king of Sýria, received a mortal wound in the battle at Thērmōpylæ, in which Antiochus was defeated, sailed to Cenæum, and died there in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 20).—16. A native of Bēroa who, with the assistance of Thýrsis, suffocated Dēmētrius, the youngest son of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, after Didas had given him poison, in 183 B. C. In this murderous transaction, these miscreants acted by order of Philippus himself (Liv. xl. 24).—17. The son of Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, who, with his father, adorned the triumph of L. Æmilius Paullus, and after that ignominy was sent into custody at Alba in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 52 seq.).—18. A man unknown, and of unknown descent, who killed Dēmētrius, king of Sýria, and usurped the crown in 150 B. C. Dēmētrius, son of the deceased, put Alēxānder to death (Liv. Ep. 50—53). He has sometimes the surname of Balas. Justinus makes his original name Bala, and adds, that he was said to be a son of Antiochus (xxxv. 1). See Dēmētrius.—19. An Egyptian, who took the name of Alexander, pretending to be the son of the former; but whose real name was Zebenna q. v. (Just. xxxix. 1 seq.).—20. The younger son of Ptolēmæus Phýscon, by his niece Clēōpātra, whom his mother wished to make king, to the prejudice of his elder brother. Terrified by her cruelty, he left her, preferring a secure life to a dangerous throne. Afterwards she prevailed on him to return, intending to accomplish his destruction, which he no sooner discovered than he put her to death. See Clēōpātra. This destruction of his mother, rendered him odious to his subjects, who forced him into banishment, and recalled his elder brother, Ptolēmæus Lathūrus to the throne in 108 B. C. (Just. xxxix. 4, 5).—21. The younger son of M. Antōnius by Clēōpātra, queen of Egypt (Liv. Ep. 132).

Alēxānder Sēvērus, Alēxandri Sēvēri, m. afterwards M. Aurēlius Alēxānder (Aurēlius Alēxānder, Eutrop.), son of Gensius Marcianus and Mamaea, was born about the year 208 or 209. His parents were natives of Sýria. Of his father's history we know little, except that he attained the consulship. Eusēbius commends Mamaea for her great piety, and, on account of his being a Christian bishop, some infer that she had embraced the Christian religion. The uncommon strictness with which she educated her son, added to her favour for the Christians, and her inspiring him with the same sentiments, appears to justify that opinion. His grandmother prevailed upon Hēliōgābālus, who was his cousin, to adopt him for his son, although but four years younger than himself, the Emperor being seventeen and Sēvērus thirteen years of age. Immediately after the adoption, Hēliōgābālus honoured him with the title of Cæsar, and changed his name from Alēxiānus to Alēxānder, prefixing M. Aurēlius. The virtues of Sēvērus offended the vicious mind of the emperor, who, having, without success, attempted to vitiate the young prince, at first secretly, and afterwards openly, concerted plans to put him to death. Mamaea cooked all the victuals of her son, which prevented the use of poison, and the prætorian guards, strongly attached to Sēvērus, proved a security against public violence. Hēliōgābālus presented him to the troops in a splendid car, and enraged at the coolness of his own reception, and the demonstrations of joy at the sight of Séverus, ordered the most forward in expressing their gladness to be arrested. This rash act occasioned a fray, in which Heliogabalus lost his life at the age of eighteen.

Séverus under fourteen years of age succeeded to the empire, and governed with mildness and resolution, checking vice and encouraging virtue. He married first a lady of illustrious birth, whom he repudiated on her father being put to death for aspiring at the crown, afterwards contracted another marriage, and some say a third. He never had any child. His reign discovered a strong mind, good principles, and ardent zeal for the public welfare. He reformed the abuses introduced by his predecessor, conquered Artaxerxes, king of the Persians, and returned to Rome in triumph. Here he did not continue long, but marched against the Germans, and was killed near Mentz by Maximinus, whom, from being originally a shepherd, he at last raised to the rank of a general officer. Herodianus describes him as effeminate, luxurious and cowardly; but Lampridius extols him for almost every virtue, and the events of his reign and collateral testimony support his opinion that he was one of the best of the Roman Emperors. To him and L. Septimius Séverus, Claudius alludes (xxviii. 421).

Alexandra, æ, f. one of the nurses, or attendants of the Emperor Néro. Eclogé, Acté and she committed to the tomb the remains of that monster (Suet. Ner. 1).

Alēxāndria, æ, f. Alexandria, a city of Lower Egypt, which had the Mediterranean on the N. E. and the Lake about twelve miles west of the branch of the Nile, called Qattara Cānōpleam, now dry, on the S. E. founded 331 B. C. by Alexander the Great, from whom it had its name. The breadth of the city did not exceed one-third of a league, but its length extended to one and a half. The principal street, 2000 feet broad, and adorned with some of the most costly edifices and structures of marble which perhaps the world ever saw, was crossed in the middle of the city by another of the same breadth. Many of these ornaments afterwards beautified Rome and Constantinople. Alexander's object in building this city, was to reap the profit of the whole trade between Asia and Europe, which, from its situation, after the ruin of Tyre, he sagaciously foresaw it could not fail to engross. In consequence of a communication with the Nile by a canal, and a junction of that river with the Red Sea by another, it soon became the centre of commerce. Nor was it less celebrated as a seat of learning, and for its extensive Library, which, at one period, consisted of 700,000 volumes, which were burnt by accident in the Alexandrian war about 47 B. C. (Gel. vi. 17). It was long the capital of Egypt. Tibérius expressly prohibited senators or knights from entering Alexandria, without his permission, rightly judging, that whoever obtained possession of it, the key of the province of Egypt, both by sea and by land, might with a small force, make head against great armies, and distress Italy by famine (Tac. Ann. ii. 59). Though repeatedly destroyed, it was again rebuilt, until its resources were cut off by the Portuguese discovering, in 1499, a passage to the East Indies by the Cape of Good Hope. About this time, it fell under the dominion of the Turks, who destroyed the city, and used the Library for fuel to the baths, which, though 4000 in number, it is said to have supplied for six months. Pompey's pillar is now the only very remarkable relic of antiquity at Alexandria. According to the measurement of the French engineers, its height, including pedestal, shaft and capital, is 80 feet and 6 inches. It is not marble but granite. The distance between the centre of the old and modern town is 2 fathoms. The latter stands on the alluvions which join the island Pharos to the continent. The walls of the modern town are in some places 40 feet high, are flanked by 100 towers and inclose a circuit of nearly 5 miles, now for the most part a desert space covered with heaps of rubbish and fragments of ancient buildings. Scorpions and other vermin of the most loathsome kind abound in all the sandy deserts in the neighbourhood of Alexandria. Here, as in other parts of Egypt, the air is very bad, and the inhabitants not distinguished for cleanliness. This town is supplied with fresh water from the Nile by means of a canal not navigable, which is in length 14 leagues. From the country around being desert and producing nothing, the inhabitants obtain their provisions from the Delta, the coast of Syria, and the islands in the Archipelago. In 296, the Emperor Diocletianus, after a siege of eight months, took this town, slaughtered many thousands of the citizens, and on every suspected or guilty person pronounced sentence either of death or exile. Inh. Alēxāndrīni, orum (Sing. Alēxāndrīnus, i); m. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 60). Adj. Alēxāndrīnus, a, um. Alēxāndrina plebs (Tac. Hist. iv. 81).—2. Scanderoon, a town on Issicus Sinus, the Bay of Scanderoon.—3. A town built by Alexander the Great on Tanais v. Iartes, the walls of which extended to sixty stadia (six thousand paces, Just.) (Curt. vii. 6). According to Justinus, he completed the walls within seventeen days (xii. 5).—4. Eski Stamboul, a city of the Troad, which appears to have been a place of considerable strength from Antiöchus being unable to take it by assault, and spending a considerable time before he completed its reduction (Liv. xxxv. 42). From its situation, and to distinguish it from other cities of this name, Lāvius writes Alexandria Troas.—5. A town of Carmania (Ann. Mar. xxiii. 6).—6. Another in Asia (ib.).—7. Another in Bactriana (ib.).—8. Another in Sogdiana, to which the adjective ultima is generally added.

Alēxibīus, i, m. the father of Cārōtus. Alēxibīades, m, m. Cārōtus (Pin. Pyth. v. 59).

Alēxīdāmus, i, m. a man mentioned by Pindārus (Pyth. ix. 214).

Alexīrhōē, es, f. mother of Esācus, by Priāmus king of Troy (Ov. Met. xi. 768).

Alēxis, is, v. Idis (Gel. ii. 23), m. a handsome boy given by Macēnas, or Pollis, to Virgilius, whom the latter celebrates in Buc. 2 (Mart. v. 16).—2. A Greek comic poet, paternal uncle to Mēnāder (Gel. ii. 23).

P. Alfēnus Vārus, P. Alfēnī Vārī, m. a native of Crēmōna; who, according to Hōrātius, in early life maintained himself by exercising the trade of a shoemaker, or, according to others, of a barber, inheriting from nature considerable genius, he quitted that mean employment, became the disciple of Sērvius Sūlpicius, and obtained great knowledge of the Civil law. It has been stated, that he held the office of consul, but it must be allowed there is some degree of uncertainty respecting him. Hōrātius has Vafer Alfēnus, probably from his excelling in the quirks of law (Sat. i. 3. 130).

Algāsus, i, m. commanded two hundred horse of the Parthini, which joined the Roman pretor L. Anicius Gāllus when he marched against Gēntius king of the Illýrī, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 30).

Algīdum, i, n. Aglio, a town situated on Algīdus, a mountain of Lātium (Strab. 338. Liv. iii. 2). Adj. Algīdus, a, um, et, Algīdēnsis, is, e. Algīda terra (Ov. Fast. vi. 722). Algīdi sēcēssus (Mart. x. 30).

Algīdus, i, m. Selva d' Algieri, a mountain of Lātium, which must be of considerable height, since Hōrātius calls it cold (gēlidus, Od. i. 21. 6), from which circumstance (algēdo) some have derived its name. There was a valley between it and Mons Albānus (Strab. 342).

Alīgmon, ōnis, m. a native of Lerna, whose appearance Apollo assumed in the Theban war, when he took the reins and drove the chariot of Amphīlārēus in place of his charioteer, Hērēs, who had fallen (Stat. Th. vii. 739).

Alīātēs, i, m. (Alyattes, Herod.) a king of Lydia, was the successor of Sadýātes, and father of Crēsus. He fought with Cyaxāres, grandson of Delōces, forced the Cimmeri from Asia, took Smýrna and carried on war for many years against the Milēsii, and died after a reign of fifty-seven years. His subjects erected a large tomb to his memory, to which the Lydian young women contributed greatly, but in a manner which it is better to pass over than to describe (Herod. i. 16—93). Regnum Alīātēi, the kingdom of Lydia (Hor. Od. iii. 16. 41).

Alībida, a, m. supposed by some to be a name of Silēnus, but the reading is doubtful (Virg. Cop. 25).

Alīcodra, a, f. a town of Bactria (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Alīēnus Cēcīna, Alīēni Cēcīne, m. a native of Vicētia, Vicenza, a town in the territory of Venice, the commander of a legion in Germany in the year 69. Fābius Vālen and he, both men of daring resolution and excessive avarice, placed themselves at the head of the turbulent. The elegance of his form, dignity of manner, and a flow of eloquence, had attached the army to Alīēnus, and Gālba, whose interest he embraced among the first, had rewarded his good offices with this commission. The Emperor ordered a strict enquiry into his conduct, in consequence of its being reported that he had embezzled the public money. Rather than submit to such an investigation, Alīēnus preferred embroiling the state, and supported by others he induced Vitēllius to become a candidate for the empire, and received from him the command of an army, with orders to march over Alpes Pēnīne and enter Italy. Alīēnus marked his track with rapine and cruelty, plundered the territory of the Helvetians, and afterwards crossed Alpes Pēnīne in the midst of winter. Here his troops observed the strictest military discipline, and having fruitlessly attempted to act insidiously by the commanders on the part of Otho, who had the same designs against him; he resolved to besiege Plācēntia, Placenza. Failing in this enterprize, he marched back to Crēmōna, having been joined by Turullius Cērēālis and Jūlius Brigānticus. The disgrace of this failure had the effect of diminishing his army, on which account he resolved to make a desperate attempt in order to redeem his glory, but no better success attended it, and a tumult broke out in his camp. His general conduct secured the affection of the soldiers and enabled him in a short time to restore subordination. He afterwards marched against Vēspāsīanus, and instead of employing his best efforts for Vitēllius he betrayed his interest and joined his rival. Tacitus refers this conduct to his natural inconstancy, his habit of treachery, his disappointed ambition in being surpassed by Vālen in the esteem of Vitēllius, and therefore he preferred the ruin of the Emperor to that mortification. The senate, on the motion of L. Vitēllius, the Emperor's brother, pronounced judgment against him (Tac. Hist. i. 52—iv. 31).

L. Alīēnus, L. Alīēni, m. an edile of the people who joined C. Claudius Cicerō a tribune of the people in bringing to trial the consuls T. Rōmilius and C. Vētūrius q. z., in 454 B. C. (Liv. iii. 31).

Alīmēnus, r. Iālmēnus, i, m. a son of Mars, one of the Argonauts, and among the number of the suitors of Hēlēna (Apol. i. 9 seq.).—2. A native of Orchōmēnos, Scepi, who commanded his townsmen in the Theban war, and fell by the hand of Agylēus (Stat. Th. x. 299). Alīmēnides, u, m. a son of Alīmēnus, who with Acron closed the gate of Thēbæ, Theba, at which the Spartans had entered during the war (Stat. Th. x. 504).

Alīmē, es, f. a town of Phrygia, or Pamphylia, under the government of Moagētes (Liv. xxxviii. 14).

Alīna, et, Alīnda, a, f. plur. Alīnda, orūm, a. a town of Cāria. Ins. Halýdiēnses, ium, m. (Plin. i. 599), which ought unquestionably to be written Alīndēnses. Adj. Alīndēnsis, r. Alīndēnsis, is, e. Lūcērius writes Alīdēnsis, probably for the sake of the verse (iv. 1123). The common copies read here Mēlītēnsia.

Alīphēra, a, f. a town of Archādia, built by Alīphērus, a son of Lycōn, near the river Alphēus (Paus. viii. 26). Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, restored it to the Mēgālōpōlite, who proved that it stood on their territory (Liv. xxviii. 8).

Aliso, ōnis, f. Else, a fort near the Rhine (Tac. Ann. ii. 7). Ptōlēmaeus mentions a town of Germany called Aliso, and a river of Gāllica Bēlgica had the name of Aliso, now the Lise.

Alitrophāgi, orūm, m. a people in the territory of the Sēres (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Allādes, is, m. the eleventh king of Alba, son of Agrippa, and father of Avēntinus (Dion. Hal.).

Allectus, i, m. a companion of Cārausius, who attempted to raise a war in Britain, and who formed successful measures of defence against all the force sent against him. With the view of securing the succession to himself, Allectus killed his friend, and retained possession of the island for three years, when Asclēpiodōtus overpowered him, and restored Britain to the government of the Romans (Eutrop. ix. 22).

T. Allēdiū Sēvēri, T. Allēdi Sēvēri, m. a Roman knight, who approved of a law declaring marriage between uncles and nieces lawful. A wish to obtain the favour of Agrippina might induce him to recommend this statute, on purpose to justify her marriage with the Emperor, Claudius, who was her uncle (Tac. Ann. xii. 7).

Allia, n. f. the Rio di misso (Clav.), Torrente de Catino, or, according to Capmartinus S. Giovanni della Torre, a river which falls into Tiber, the Tevere, below Castel Giubileo. It has its rise in the mountains of the Crematini, whence it runs in a very deep channel to its junction with the Tevere. Here, at the eleventh stone from Rome, the Roman army was completely defeated by the Gauls under Brēnus in 389 B. C. The greatest part of those who survived fled to Vul, and those who went to Rome continued their flight into the citadel without even shutting the gates of the city. In consequence of this defeat, Allia seldom occurs but some word is added which has a reference to it. Et damnata diu Rōmānis Allia fastis (Lac. Phar. vii. 409). Adj. Alliēnsis, is, e. Alliēnsis dies, i. e. dies infestus, because on it the Fabii were slain at Crēmēra, and afterwards, on the same day, the fifteenth of the kalends of Sexilis, i. e. eighteenth of August, the fatal battle at Allia was fought, the consequence of which was the destruction of the city (Tac. Hist. ii. 91). Alliēnsis pugna (Cic. Att. ix. 5).

Alliāria, n. f. the wife of Tib. Sēmprōnius Gracchus, the supposed writer of the letter which Jūlia sent to her father, the Emperor Augustus, in which she inveighed with severity against Tiberius. When the latter came to the throne he sent soldiers to kill Sēmprōnius, who had for fourteen years been in banishment in Cērcina, Kerkeni. He only asked a few minutes to write his last letter to Alliāria, and, having finished it, offered his neck to his murderers, who severed his head from his body (Tac. Ann. i. 53).

Alliēni forum, Ferrara, a town of the Lingōnes on the southern bank of Pādus, the Po (Tac. Hist. iii. 6).

Allife, arum, f. Alife, a town of Samnium, taken by the Roman consul in 325 B. C. It is frequently mentioned by Livius in consequence of the battles fought there between the Romans and Samnites (viii. 25 seq.). Isa. Allifani, orum (Sing. Allifanus, i.), m. who were also called Allifates (Plin. i. 328). Adj. Allifanus, a, um. Allifanus ager, the territory of the Allifani (Liv. xxii. 13), which produced good wine, hence Allifanus Iacō David inamatus ager (Sil. Ital. xii. 526). Allifana (vāsa c. pōtula), large earthen jars or bottles, so called from the town at which they were made. Wine was taken from the cask into them, from which it was poured into the cup (sciāthus) out of which it was drunk (Hor. Sat. ii. 8. 39).

Allius, i. m. a native of Argyripa, killed by Mago and Māharbal in Hannibal's first engagement with the Romans in Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 554).

Allōbrōges, um, acc. us (sing. Allōbrox, is, acc. a, c. em), m. the Allobrogians, a people of Gallia, Fraser, whose country lay between Isāra, the Lere, and Rhōdānus, the Rhone. They bravely, and for a long time, resisted the power of the Roman legions, but were at last defeated by Pōmptinus. Cicero extols them for their fidelity to his countrymen, of which they gave a remarkable proof in the conspiracy of Cātilina. Livius says they were inferior to none of the Gauls in power and reputation (xxi. 31). Hōrātius censures them for their love of novelty, which seems characteristic of the inhabitants of that country, both in ancient and modern times. The chief town of the Allōbrōges was Viēna, Vienne, on the left bank of the Rhone, 13 miles below Lugdūnum, Lyons. Ager Allōbrōgum, the territory of the Allōbrōges (Plin. iii. 462). Dixit Cicerōnem Allōbrōga, called Cicero an Allobrogian, i. e. blamed him for writing bad Latin like an Allobrogian (Juv. Sat. vii. 214). Adj. Allōbrōgius, a, um.

Allūcius, i. m. a Celtiberian prince, whose betrothed wife, of remarkable beauty, was brought to P. Cōrnēlius Scipio, as a prisoner by the soldiers at the taking of Cārthāgo Nōva, in 212 B. C. On being informed of her situation, Scipio sent for her parents and betrothed husband, and on the latter arriving he addressed him in a speech distinguished for justness of thought, purity of ideas, and delicacy of feeling, and then delivered to him his bride in safety. The parents requested him to accept a great weight of gold which they had brought to purchase her liberty as a present, since he had not received it as a ransom. They pressed this with such earnestness that he allowed it to be laid at his feet, on which, addressing himself to Allūcius, said, "Besides the dowry which you are to receive from your father-in-law, accept this as a marriage-present from me," and ordered him to take it away and keep it for himself. Transported with the generous conduct of Scipio, Allūcius returned in a few days with fourteen hundred chosen horsemen, levied from among his dependants (Liv. xxvi. 50).

Alma, n. f. a mountain near Sirmius, which the Emperor Prōbus planted with vines (Eutrop. ix. 17).

Almāna, n. f. a city of Mācedōnia, near the river Axius, the Vardari (Liv. xlv. 26).

Almēnus, i. m. one of the Argonauts, according to Apollōdōrus, but the reading is much doubted.

Almo, ōnis, m. the eldest of the sons of Týrrhēus, who was killed by an arrow which stuck in his throat (Virg. Ēn. vii. 532).

Almo, ōnis, m. the Aquatuccio, or Aquia Santa, a muddy rivulet, of a very short course, rising in the spring Egēria q. v. and falling into Tiber, the Tevere, a little below Rome (Ov. Met. xiv. 329). The image of Cybēlē was washed every year in this stream, to which Vālerius Flāccus alludes (viii. 239), and Ovidius (Fast. iv. 337—340). Prelatōque locus Phrīgios Almōne lēones (Claud. xv. 119). Tēpidus Alma (Sil. Ital. viii. 363).

Alcēus, ēos, m. a giant, son of Titan and Tērra, married to Iphimēdia, who bore the giants Otus and Ephialtes to Neptūnus. To effect this intercourse the god had changed himself into the river Enipēus (Ov. Met. vi. 116). Alōidē, arum, m. Otus and Ephialtes, from their mother's husband. They were twins, hence Alōida gēmini (Virg. Ēn. vi. 582).

Alöpä, es, f. a town of Lœris (Liv. xlii. 56); of Phthiotis (Hom. Il. ii. 682).

Alopeconnesus, i, f. Alciaheui, a town in Thracian Chersonesus, Gallipoli, taken by Philippus, king of Macedonia, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 16).

Alor, ōris, m. (Ap. Bel. Man. 334), corrupted for Cælor q. v.

Alŏrcus, i, m. a Spaniard in the army of Hannibal, with whom he was in habits of friendship, sent by that general to the Sāgūntini, to persuade them to accept of the terms which Hannibal had offered. On hearing his speech the principal Sāgūntini first threw all their gold and silver, and then precipitated themselves, into a fire, suddenly kindled in the market place for that purpose, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 12, 13).

Alpēni, orum, f. a village at Thērmōpŷlæ, Therma (Herod. vii. 176).

Alpes, ium (sing. Alpes, is, acc. Alpem, v. Alpen), f. a vast chain of mountains, the highest, not only in Eurōpa, Europe, but in the world, the altitude of which has not yet been ascertained by correct measurement, lie in the form of a crescent, and separate Itālia, Italy, from Gērmānia, Germany, Hēlvētia, Switzerland, and Gāllia, France. From Strābo, Festus, and others, the name appears to have been originally Album, v. Albion, and may be referred to these mountains being perpetually covered with snow (Strāb. 283). They extend from Sinus Flanaticus, the Gulf of Carnaro, near the top of Māre Hādrīaticum, v. Adriaticum, quod et Sūpērum, the Gulf of Venice, and the sources of Cōlāpis, the Kulpe, to vāda Sābātia, Savona, on Sinus Ligusticus, the Gulf of Genoa; a distance, according to Livy, of only 250 miles. But Pliny says, measuring along their base on the Italian side, from Vārus, the Var, to Arsia, the Arsa, which separated Istria from Liburnia, the length is 745,000 paces, about 700 miles. This certainly exceeds the truth. Following their circular direction, the range of the Alps may be considered as extending to nearly 600 miles. They have been distinguished in ancient as well as in modern times by different names, of which, beginning at the western extremity, the principal were: Alpes Māritimæ, Mount Viso, evidently derived from bordering on the Mediterranean Sea; Alpes Cōttiæ, v. Cōttiānæ, Mount Genevre, from being the dominion of Cōtys, v. Cōtius, whom Augustus admitted into his alliance, and whose territories he enlarged; Alpes Graiæ, Mount Cenis, and Little St. Bernard, from Hercules being generally believed to have passed this way from Hispania, Spain, into Itālia, Italy; Alpes Pœninae (this is the original and proper name and spelling; not Pennina, a corruption of a later period), Great St. Bernard, from the general belief both of the natives of the place and Italians, that Hannibal's route was across this height; Alpes Rhætiae, Tyrol, from the Rhæti, who inhabited them, extended from Hēlvētia, Switzerland, eastward to Tridēntum, Trent, consequently they often included the greater part of the range denominated Alpes Tridēntini, from Tridēntum, Trent, a considerable town on Athēsis, the Adige, which gives name to a bishoprick in Tyrol; Alpes Nōricæ, from Nōricum, part of Austria; Alpes Cārnicae, Carniola, from their inhabitants the Cārni; Alpes Jūliae, either from Jūllum, v. Jūllum Cārnileum, Zuglio, a town in that chain of mountains, which received its name from Jūlius Cæsar, who conquered Pānnōnia, or from Jūlius Cæsar's passing this track on his march to Pānnōnia; Alpes Pānnōnicæ, from being situated in Pānnōnia, now part of Austria, Hungary, &c. Other parts of the Alps occur in ancient history, under names derived from their possessors, or from the countries of which they formed a part; as, Alpes Cēntrōnicæ, from the Cēntrōnes, a nation who lived on the west side of Alpes Graiæ, and whose capital Fōrum Claudii Cēntrōnum, Centron, was at the foot of that range; Alpes Dālmāticae, from their belonging to Dālmātia, now part of Hungary, and of Turkey in Europe. In the enumeration of these divisions of the Alps, their boundaries have not been mentioned, from the difficulty or impossibility of tracing them with geographical precision. The modern names do by no means correspond to the ancient, and are inserted with the view of forming some sort of connexion in the mind of the young scholar, between the appellations of former and present times.

Augustus first subjected the wild and barbarous inhabitants of the whole region of the Alps to the government of Rome. From this degradation he exempted Cottius, with whom he formed an alliance; but Nero annexed the territories of that prince to the Roman empire.

The prodigious height and ruggedness of the Alps have not rendered them every where impassable. They have been crossed in different places. 1. Alpes Māritimæ. 2. Alpes Graiæ. 3. Alpes Cōttiæ, v. Cōttiānæ. 4. Alpes Pœninae. 5. Alpes Rhætiae. 6. Alpes Tridēntinæ. 7. Alpes Cārnicae. 8. Alpes Jūliae. Besides the communications which have been opened over these parts of the Alps, and some of these are crossed by more than one road, there are others which do not merit description, from being seldom frequented. Even of the passes above enumerated, some are very difficult and dangerous, of course not often resorted to.

The route of Hannibal over the Alps has been subject of dispute, both in ancient and modern times. It may be inferred from Livy, for he does not declare which, in his opinion, was really the track, that he thought Hannibal crossed Mount Genevre, and Strābo maintains that idea. Some think he passed over Mount Viso, others over Mount Cenis, others suppose him to have gone by Little St. Bernard, and not a few have attempted to prove that his way was over Great St. Bernard. Livy, by his description, satisfactorily establishes the different inroads of the Gauls into Italy to have been by this last mentioned pass. Appian informs us, that Pompey, marching into Spain against Sērtōrius, traced back the steps of the Carthaginian general, and expressly mentions that he went about the springs of Rhōdānus, the Rhone, and of Pādus, the Po. Now of necessity he must have gone over Great St. Bernard. By it too Cæsar must have travelled when he went from Occlum, Exiles, by the nearest way over the Alps into Gāllia, France, against the Helvetians. There is little doubt that this was the pass which he wished to be opened, when he sent Sērvius Galba against the Nantuates, Veragri, and Seduni; because it was the road frequented by the merchants, of course the common road, and because the mountaineers imposed heavy taxes on them. The ancient name amounts almost to a proof of this being the road passed by Hannibal. The derivation of Pennine from Penni, is stated by Pliny and Marcellinus, and what is still of greater importance, by Livy, who labours to prove that Great St. Bernard was not in the route of that noble Carthaginian. It is, however, but just to add, that strong arguments have been advanced in support of his marching by other passes, particularly by that of Little St. Bernard, which was the opinion of the celebrated antiquarian, General Melvill. Let the advanced scholar, after consulting Livy, Strabo, Polybius, Marcellinus, Appian, and other authors who have treated of this subject, judge for himself. Sarva Alpes, rugged Alps (Juv. Sat. x. 166). Natura opposuit Alpen vicinque (Hannibali) (Juv. Sat. x. 152). Adj. Alpina, a, um, of the Alps, et. Alpina, a, um, living on the Alps. Alpinae gentes, the Alpine nations, who were, says Livius, without doubt of Tuscan origin (v. 33).

Alphēnor, ōris, m. one of the sons of Niōbē, killed by Apollo (Ov. Met. vi. 248).

Alphēnus Vārus, Alphēni Vāri, m. a praefect of the camp, a man of considerable ingenuity, who, by a stratagem, contributed to quell an insurrection of the soldiers under Valens. He joined Vitellius, commanded a body of Batavians, but did not display that steady propriety of conduct which marks an eminent soldier. After Vitellius had surrendered himself, and been killed, Alphēnus Vārus, although guilty of cowardly behaviour, and branded by infamy, was permitted to live (Tac. Hist. ii. 29. iv. 11).

Alphēsilbēa, æ, f. daughter of Bias and Pēro (Theoc. Id. iii. 45).—2. Daughter of Phēgeus, and wife of Alcmaeon, whom her father had purified from the murder of his mother. See Alcmaeon. Prōpērtius (i. 15. 15) states, that she put her brothers to death for the murder of her husband, whereas Apollodōrus only says that she disapproved of the murder. Pausanias relates that Alcmaeon fell by the hands of Tēmēnos and Axion. Ovidius writes, that her father killed her husband (Met. ix. 412).

Alphēsilbēus, i, m. a shepherd (Virg. B. v. 73).

Alphēos, et, us, i, m. the Roufia (so called below its junction with Lādon, above that place it is called the River of Karitena), a river of Elis, in Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea, which, running westward, falls into the Ionian Sea. It was first called Nuktimos, which was changed to that of Stymphelos, when the son of Mars and Dormothēa was drowned in it, and, for a similar reason, it also assumed that of Alphēus. It rises in Parthēnion, Barbenia, in Arcādia (at Phylacē, Leake), runs to Saranta Potamoi, and soon after it leaves that place, sinks in the ground. It appears again in the plain of Tēgēs, and, after having sunk in a chasm, rises anew at Franko-Brusi, after which it again disappears, and becomes visible for the last time, at Kephulo-Brusi, in the plain of Mēgālōpōlis. Its water is muddy, the channel broad and winding. It is about the breadth and colour of Tiber, the Tevere, at Rome. The god of this river, conceiving a violent passion for Arēthūsa, pursued her until she was changed into a fountain of the same name, in Ortygia, a small island on the eastern coast of Sicily, on which one of the parts, or divisions, of Syracuse stood. It was the opinion of the ancients, that this river passed under the sea from Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea, without mingling its waters with the ocean, arose again in Ortygia, and joined the fountains of Arēthūsa. Sēneca mentions, as a fact, that what was thrown into the river from the entrails of beasts, during the games at Olympia, polluted that fountain (N. Q. iii. 26). Alphēlas, ādis, f. the fountain Arēthūsa, or the river Alphēus, to which Cēres was indebted for information respecting her daughter (Ov. Met. v. 487). Adj. Alphēus, a, um. Alphēus Pisa, Pisa, a town of Tuscany (Claud. xv. 483). Suus Alphēus (Sil. Ital. xiv. 54).

Alphēus, i, m. a name assumed by Athēnagōrus before his marriage, according to Mārtialis (ix. 97).

Alphius, i, m. a usurer, into whose mouth Hōrātius puts the second Epode, with the exception of the last four lines. For beautiful imagery, and accurate description, this ode is not inferior to the finest pieces of lyric composition from the pen of Hōrātius. It is probable that Alphius is a fictitious character, invented by the poet to illustrate the powerful influence of avarice, and that, for the sake of gain, the miser sacrifices every convenience and comfort, however just an opinion he may form of their excellence and attraction.

Alpinus, i, m. a wretched poet, who wrote a tragedy on the death of Memnon, in a style so inflated, bombast, and extravagant, that Hōrātius says he murdered him. He attempted a heroic poem on the German wars, in which he described the Rhine in such very turgid and confused verses, that the same poet states he polluted the sources of that river (Sat. i. 10. 36). Some have supposed that Fōrtius q. v. is here designated Alpinus, from his contemptible description of the Alps, and this conjecture receives some support from Sat. ii. 5. 41.

Alpinus Mōntānus, Alpini Mōntāni, m. a Treviran, a partisan of Vitellius, who commanded a cohort in the year 69. From Tacitus we learn that Alpinus Mōntānus held the rank of senator among his countrymen (Hist. iii. 35. v. 19).

D. Alpinus Mōntānus, D. Alpini Mōntāni, m. brother of Alpinus Mōntānus q. v. called, by Flōrus, Alpinus (Tac. Hist. v. 19).

Alpis, is, m. a southern branch of the Danube (Herod. iv. 49).

Alstūm, i, n. perhaps Palo, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, on the sea coast (Plin. i. 320. Sil. Ital. viii. 475). Inh. Alstēnses, ium, m. Adj. Alstēnsis, is, e. Alstēnsē (prædium) (Cic. Fam. ix. 6).

Alsus, i, m. one of the Rūtūli, who was killed by Pōdālīrius (Virg. Æn. xii. 304).

Altes, æ, m. king of the Lélēges, and father of Lāōthōē (Hom. Il. xxi. 85. xxii. 51).

Althēa, æ, f. daughter of Thēstius and Eurythēmis, who was married to Cēneus, king of Cāllydon, by whom she became the mother of Mēlēāger q. v. On the birth of that son, the Parcae informed Althaea that he would live till the piece of wood, then burning on the fire, was consumed, on which account she preserved the faggot with the utmost care. When Mēlēāger killed two of her brothers, she, in revenge, threw the wood into the fire, and Mēlēāger expired on its being reduced to ashes, on which Althaea, from grief at occasioning her son's death, laid violent hands on herself (Ov. Met. viii. 446 seq.).

Altinum, i. n. Altino, a town of Italy, in what Plinius calls the tenth district, near the shore of the Gulf of Venice, on the river Silis, the Sile, to the north of Venice (Eutrop. viii. 10). Inh. Altinātes, ium, m. Adj. Altinas, as, as; ātis. Altinātes oves (Column. vii. 2).—2. Tolna, a town of Pannonia, near the Danube.

Altis, is, m. a temple of Jūpter Olūpius (Pin. Ol. x. 55).

Alus, i. e. g. a city of Phthiōtis, built by Athamas (Hom. Il. ii. 682).

Alŷatti, orum, m. a town of Galatia (Liv. xxxviii. 18). Stēphānus writes Alŷatta and makes it a city of Bithynia, and the inhabitants Alŷattēni, orum.

Alŷbas, antis, f. a city of Itālia, afterwards called Mētāpōntum, which Ulysses pretended to his father was the place of his residence (Hom. Od. xxiv. 303).

Alŷbē, es, f. the chief city of the Hālizōnes (Hom. Il. ii. 857).

Alŷmon, ōnis, Ov. Ep. Her. xix. 133. The readings exceedingly various, and the meaning doubtful.

Alxion, ōnis, m. the father of Cēnōmāus, in the opinion of Pausānias, who is generally considered a son of Mars, which that historian reckons fabulous (v. 1).

Amādas, ae, m. a general of Alexander the Great, whom he dismissed on account of his long services, in 326 B. C. (Just. xii. 12).

Amādōceus, i. m. a commander of the Thracians, whom Philippos, king of Mācedōnia, made prisoner in 186 B. C. It is probable that Amādōceus is one of the people called Amādōci, from Amādōca, orum, n. or Amādōci montes, mountains in European Sarmatia (Liv. xxxix. 35).

Amāsia Sēntia, Amāsia Sēntiā, f. a Roman woman, who pleaded, and gained, her own cause, before the praetor. From the strength of her mind, she was called Andrōgynē. Vālerius Māximus mentions other women who had distinguished themselves by judicial pleading (viii. 3).

Amālthēa, ae, f. called also Dēmōphīlē, or Herōphīlē, one of the ten Sibyls, surnamed Cūmāna, from her residence at Cūma. Of the ten she is the most celebrated in Roman authors. According to Lactāntius, she offered to L. Tāquinius Priscus nine books, for which she asked three hundred Philippēi, a sum which the king refused on account of its extravagance, and laughed at her madness. She burned three of the books in presence of the king, and demanded the same price for the remaining six, which she had formerly done for the nine, an act which the king considered an additional proof of her derangement. Throwing other three into the fire, and still requiring the same money, struck the king with surprise, as something uncommonly remarkable, on which he gave her the three hundred Philippēi for the three books, the sum for which he might have had the whole nine. These were afterwards increased by Sibylline prophecies collected from all the states of Italy and Greece, and particularly from the Erythraei, without regard to the Sibyl, by whom they had been uttered (Lactan. i. 6).—2. The nurse of Jūpter, who, some authors say, was a nymph, and others a goat. It seems to be agreed, that Jūpter was given in charge to Amālthēa, and that she fed him with the milk of a goat, which she called by her own name. Both the goat and the two kids which she had weaned at the time Jūpter was born, were changed into stars (Ov. Fast. v. 115).

Amāndus, i. m. one of the leaders of the Gallic peasants, who formed an insurrection against the Roman government, and assumed the name of Bāgaudae q. v. Māximius Hērētīlēs Caesar, in a few slight skirmishes, subdued the rebels, and restored tranquillity to the country (Eutrop. ix. 20).

Amāntia, ae, f. a city of Gracia, on Mārē Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, to the S. of Bullis (Cæs. B. C. iii. 40). Inh. Amāntes, um, Amāntiāni, et, Amāntini, orum, m.

Amānus, i. m. a man in the Roman army who killed Sarris in the battle of Zāma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 441).

Amānus, i. m. Al-Lucan, or, Baḡlas, a branch of mount Taurus, which terminates at Amānides Pylae, the Pass of Bylan, and overhangs the eastern frontier of Cilicia. Dūrus Amānus (Luc. Phar. iii. 244). Adj. Amānicus, a, um. Amānica pylae (Curt. iii. 8).

Amardus, i. m. the Kezil-Ozein, a river of Mēdia, which falls into Mārē Cāspium. The name is evidently derived from the Amardī, or Mardi, who inhabited the mountains through which it runs (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Amārŷillis, idis, f. a beautiful young woman, beloved by the shepherd Tītŷrus (Virg. B. i. 5).—2. The servant girl of a sorcerer (Virg. B. viii. 77).

Amārŷnceus, ēs, m. a prince of the Epēi (Hom. Il. xxiii. 630). Amārŷncides, ae, m. Diōres (Hom. Il. iv. 517).

Amārŷnthus, i. f. a city of Euboea. Amārŷnthiis, idis, f. of Amārŷnthus, applied also to Diāna (Liv. xxxv. 38).

Amāsēnus, i. m. the Toppia, a river of Lātium, which has its rise in the territory of the Volsi, above Sētla, Sezza, passes Prīvērnum, Piperno, below which it is joined by Ufens, the Aufente, and falls into the sea at Circēii, Circello (Virg. Aen. vii. 685).

Amāsīs, idis, m. a king of Egypt, who raised himself from the rank of a common soldier to that dignity. Egypt enjoyed its highest prosperity under this monarch, who enacted many salutary laws, built many magnificent temples, and governed with moderation, integrity, and justice. Sōlon adopted one of the regulations of Amāsīs, which obliged every man to give an account annually to the magistrate where he lived, of his means of subsistence; failure, or an inaccurate statement was punished with death. Amāsīs presented an offering at the shrine of Minerva at Līndus, Lindo, in Rhodes, a linen thorax of net-work, each thread consisting of as many filaments as there are days in the year. Mūcānus, in his third consulship, proved this fact by entrusting one of the threads, and stated, that little of the thorax then remained from the injury sustained from those who had made the same experiment with himself (Plin. iii. 52). Tacitus relates that the phoenix appeared first in the reign of Sesostris, next in that of Amasis (Ann. vi. 28).

Amastria, a, f. v. Mutistratum, i, n. Mistria, a town of Sicily, Sicily, on Alasus, the Pelorus (Sil. Ital. xiv. 267). Inh. Amestriai, orun (Stag. Amestratius, i), m.

Amastris, Idia, f. daughter of Oxyathras, brother of Darius, whom Alexander the Great conquered. She was married to Diosthenes, king of Heraclea, and formed four villages, Sesoimus, Cytorus, Cronna, and Telum, into one city, which took her name. See Amastria.

Amastriades, Idia, rur. is, f. Anasreh (D'Anv.), Femestre (Steph.), a town of Paphlagonia, situated on an isthmus, having a harbour on each side. Stephanius says it was anciently called Cronna, but Strabo, that the founder supposed a city of four villages, Cytorus, Cronna, Sesoimus, and Telum, from which it has been inferred that these four villages, when united, received the name Amastris, and that it did not belong to any one, but to the four collectively. Adj. Amastriacus, a, m. Amastriaca ora (Ov. Ib. 329).

Amastrius, i, m. a Trojan, son of Hippotus, killed by Caimilla. From his father he is called Hippotides (Virg. Æn. xi. 673).—2. A nobleman of Cyzicus, Chizico, killed by Nestor in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 145).—3. A commander of the Scythians, killed by Argus, son of Phrixus, in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. vi. 554).

Amata, m, f. wife of Lætinus, king of Lætinum and sister of Vénilla, wife of Daunus, king of the Rutuli. The union of her daughter Lavinia with Turnus q. v. engendered her every thought, and when the Fates had declared against her nephew, Turnus, she hanged herself, not to see Æneas her son-in-law (Virg. Æn. xii. 71 seq.).

Amathia, m, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. Il. xviii. 43). Some copies have improperly Amathia.

Amathus, i, m. the Fero, a river of Peloponnesus, the Mærea, on which the city Pylos stood (Hom. Il. ii. 77 seq.).

Amathusa, untis, f. Limassol (Limasol, Clarke), a town on the southern coast of Cyprus of very great antiquity, which had this name either from Amatheus, a son of Heracles, or from Amathusa, the mother of Cnifras. It is said to have been built by the eleventh son of Canaan, called in Hebrew Amathai (Genes. x. 18), which the Septuagint translate Amathus (Steph.). Here was an ancient temple of Venus and Adonis, hence she is called Amathusia, which was also one of the ancient names of Cyprus (Plin. i. 613). Inh. Amathusii, orun, m. (Herod. v. 104). Adj. Amathusiæus, a, m. Amathusiæa insula (Ov. Met. x. 227).

C. Amatius, C. Amatili, m. a man in the very lowest rank of life, who pretended that he was the son of C. Marius, and thus excited commotions among the credulous vulgar on the death of Caesar. He was put to death by M. Antonius, without trial, in 46 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 116).

Amazoon, omn. plur. Amazones, v. Amāzōnides, um, f. the Amazons, a nation of warlike women, originally the wives of a Scythian colony planted by Hyllinus and Scölöpitus q. v., who had a settlement on Thémodon, the Termeh. They did not allow men to live among them, and their male children they gave to their fathers according to some authors, and according to others killed them. They educated with great care their female children, whose right breasts they burned off, that they might not be impeded in the use of the bow. From this circumstance Justinus and Diódorus derive their name. Bryant maintains that they had this name from being worshippers of the sun, Zon, and that they had settlements in various countries. It is evident that Strabo considers the history of the Amazones as fabulous, other ancient writers were of the same opinion; but Herodotus, Plinius, Pömpönius Mela, &c. seem to have had no doubt of their existence. Their name in the Scythian language is Geopata, or men-killers (Herod. iv. 110). Virgilius has Thraciæ Amazones, Thracian Amazons, not that they lived in Thracia; but he uses that adjective referring to their origin and to their northern situation, in the sense of Scythian or Sarmatian (Virg. Æn. xi. 659). Adj. Amazoniæus, et, Amazoniæus, a, m. Amazonia scüris, an Amazonian axe, which they used in battle in place of a sword. Perhaps it resembled the Lochaber axe (Hor. Od. iv. 4. 20). Amazoniæus ritus, the manner of the Amazons, i. e. women ruling over men (Claud. xviii. 499). Amazonicum bellum (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Ambärr, orum, m. a people of Gallia, France, related to the Ædii, supposed to have lived on Arar, the Saone, a little to the N. of its junction with Rhodanus, the Rhone (Liv. v. 34).

Ambënus, i, m. a general of the Scythians, who possessed great bravery (Val. Flacc. vi. 251).

Ambënus, i, m. a mountain of Scythia (Val. Flacc. vi. 85).

Ambianum, i, n. anciently Samārobriva, now Amiens, a town of Gallia Belgica, on Samara, the Somme. Inh. Ambiani, orum, m. entered into a conspiracy against Caesar, and appear to have held a considerable rank among the Belgic tribes (Cæs. B. G. ii. iv).

Ambiätinus, i, m. Capelle, a village of Germany, at which, according to some authors, the emperor Caligula was born (Suet. Cal. 8).

Ambibäri, orum, m. a nation of the Celts (inter Armoricæ Civitates), who seem to have bordered with the Rhedones and Cadetes or Calètes. Their history and exact situation are unknown (Cæs. B. G. vii. 75).

Ambigätus, i, m. one of the Bituriges, was king of the Celts, and from an overgrown population, advised Bellövæsus and Segöväsus, sons of his sister, young men of spirit, to emigrate, and to take so great a number of men with them, as should prevent obstruction by any nation at which they might arrive (Liv. v. 34).

Ambiger, eri, m. an Indian king, who endeavoured to cut off the army of Alexander the Great, by using poisoned arrows, because it had been reported that this conqueror was invulnerable by iron (Just. xii. 10).

Ambiliati, orum, m. a nation of Gallia

Celtica, whose geographical position is not precisely ascertained. They are mentioned by Caesar along with the Osismii, Lēxōvii, Nannētes, &c. and therefore their country must have been included in the province of Bretagne or Normandy (B. G. iii. 9). Some editions have Ambiani.

Ambiōrix, Igis, m. king of one half of the Ebūrōnes, as Cativōlcus was of the other, had an inveterate hatred at the Romans. After many narrow escapes, he at last evaded the pursuit of Caesar's men who followed him closely, when only four of his attendants remained (Cæs. B. G. vi. 43). From Flōrus we learn that he crossed the Rhine, and baffled Roman vigilance by remaining in concealment (iii. 10). See Cativōlcus.

Ambivarētī, orum, m. a people of Prōvincia, Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné, who lived on the west bank of the Rhone. Very few particulars of their history have been transmitted to modern times (Cæs. B. G. vii. 75).

Ambivaritī, orum, m. a nation of Gallia, France, between Mōsa, the Meuse, and Rhēnus, the Rhine, who were subject to the Edūi (Cæs. B. G. iv. 9).

Ambrācia, æ, f. Arta, a town of Epīrus, Lower Albania, on Arēthon, the Arta, the capital of the district in which it stood, and taken by M. Fulvius Nōbīlior, in 180 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 4 seq. Flor. ii. 9). Inh. Ambrāciōte, arum, et, Ambrāciēnses, ium, m. (Gel. iii. 8). Adj. Ambrācius, a, um. Ambrācius Sinus, the Gulf of Arta, into which Arēthon, the Arta, falls, had this name from the town Ambrācia (Liv. xxxii. 14). It is about thirty miles in length, the scenery grand and beautiful, and the battle of Actium is supposed to have been fought in its entrance. Ambrācia frondes, the leaves of Arta, i. e. the palm of victory gained at the games at Actium (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 8).

Ambri, orum, m. an Indian nation, who lived on Hyp̄hāsis, the Beyah, whom Alexander the Great conquered (Just. xii. 9). Diōdōrus Sicūlus calls them Abrītē (ii. 241).

Ambrōnes, um, m. a German nation, confederates of the Tēutōni, together with whom they were utterly defeated, by C. Mārius, near Aque Sextilæ, Aix en Provence, in 105 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 68).

Ambrōsius, i, m. a native of Cŷciēus, whom Pēlēus killed in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 138).

Ambrŷus, i, f. a town of Phōcis, taken by the Roman consul, T. Quinctius Flāminius, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 18).

Amēnānus, i, v. Amēnas, æ, m. the Judicello, a river of Sicilia, Sicily. It takes its rise in Mount Ætna, runs through Cātāna, Catania, occasionally ceases to flow for a considerable length of time, and afterwards bursts forth, rendering the air unhealthy, and causing great damage to the town by inundation (Cluv.). Adj. Amēnānus, a, um. Amēnāna flūmina (Ov. Fast. iv. 467).

Ameūdes, is, m. a scribe of Dārius, who conquered the Arāchōsī for Alexander, in 329 B. C. (Curt. vii. 3).

Amēria, æ, f. Amelia, a town of Umbria. Inh. Amērii, orum, m. (Plin. i. 364). Adj. Amērinus, a, um. Amērina retinācula, twigs used to bind up the vines. The best willows in Italy are said to grow there, and are of a red colour, with slender twigs. Columella states, there are only three kinds of willow, the Grecian, of a yellow colour; the Gallie, of a dirty purple colour, with a very slender twig; and the Sabina, or Amērina salix, above described. Amērina pŷra, pears of Amēria, which were very late (Plin. iii. 188. Stat. Syl. i. 6. 18).

Amēriōla, æ, f. a town of the ancient Latins, taken by Tarquinius Priscus (Liv. i. 38).

Amestris, Idis, f. daughter of Otānes, and wife of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 61).

Amicenses, ium, m. a people of Moesia, according to Ptōlēmæus, others consider them Dacians (Amm. Mar. xvii. 18).

Amīda, æ, f. Diarbekr, by the Turks Kara Amid, the capital of a province of the same name in modern times, is situated on Tigris, the Dejilāh, towards its source.

Amillus. See Hamillus.

Amīnea, æ, f. a part of Cāmpānia, or a town of that district. Adj. Amīneus, a, um. Amīneæ vites ex quibus sunt firmissima vīna, Amīnean vines, from which are the best bodied wines (Virg. G. ii. 97).

C. Amīnŷus Rēblius, C. Amīnŷi Rēblii, m. a Roman, eminent for his knowledge of law, and for the greatness of his wealth, who opened his veins, and bled to death, in order to escape the infirmities of old age. His countrymen did not give him credit for such resolution, on account of his infamous practices with the worst of women (Tac. Ann. xiii. 30).

Amisōdārus, i, m. the father of Mars and Atŷmniŷus, a companion of Sārpēdon. He brought up the Chimæra (Hom. Il. xvi. 328).

Amisŷus, i, v. Amīsia, æ, m. the Ems, a river of Germany, which rises in Westphalia, and, running in a northwesterly direction, falls, after two hundred and ten miles, into the German Sea, below the town of Emden, which takes its name from the river. There was a station on the left bank of this river of the same name, now Wester Emden (Tac. Ann. i. 60. ii. 8).

Amisŷas, æ, m. a Megalopolitan, sent by Arīdæus, on an embassy along with Pērlŷaus and Pasas q. v. (Curt. x. 8).

Amisŷus, i, f. v. Amisŷum, i, n. Samsoun, a town of Pōntus, which Augustus made free after the battle of Actium, hence Plinius calls it Amisŷum libēram (i. 651), and Eutrōpius, "a very noble city" (vi. 8). Inh. Amīseni, orum, m. respecting whom Plinius writes a letter to Trājanus, and at that period they enjoyed their own laws (Epis. x. 93, 94).

Amītērnŷum, i, n. S. Vittorino, a town of the Sābini, of which Sallustius was a native. It was near the sources of Aternus, the Pescara. Inh. Amītērnŷini, orum, m. Adj. Amītērnŷus, a, um. Amītērna cohors (Sil. Ital. viii. 414).

Amīthāon, ōnis, m. a son of Crēthēus and Tŷro, and father of Bias and Mēlŷampus (Hom. Od. xi. 258).

Ammiānus, i, m. a man accused by Mārtiālīs of an unnatural crime (ii. 4). That poet addresses several of his Epigrams to him, and in all holds him up either to contempt or abhorrence.

Ammiānus Mārcēllinus, Ammiāni Mārcēllini, m. was born at Antiochia. In early life he chose the profession of arms, distingained himself as a soldier, and rose to a high rank in the Roman army. The fatigue of the camp did not divert his mind from the study of literature, particularly history, of which he gave a very creditable specimen, in the thirty-one books which he wrote, beginning where Suetonius ends, and continuing to the reign of the Emperor Valens. Unfortunately the first thirteen books are lost, nor have the remainder been transmitted entire to modern times. They contain little more than the reigns of Constantius and Jülíanus, beginning with the year 355, and ending with 378. In these books he does not always proceed in a continued narrative, but frequently enters into something resembling philosophical discussion, in which the accuracy of his information does not appear to great advantage. It would be unjust not to allow him the praise of historical truth, and his statements are the more entitled to respect, that he was a principal agent in the actions which he relates. Gibbon commends him for the accuracy of his geography, from which it may almost be inferred, that he had never read him throughout, or with due attention, since he names many towns, rivers, and mountains, not to be found in any other author, frequently, however, in opposition to Ptolemaeus, Notitia, Strábo, Plinius, &c. It is to be regretted that he continued a heathen, an enemy to Christianity, which he plainly appears in his pages, as well as in his partiality to the apostate Jülíanus. To the honours conferred on him by the Emperor, may be attributed the favourable light in which he represents his benefactor, whose cruelty and injustice have transmitted his name to the abhorrence of succeeding ages.

Ammon, v. Hámmon, ónis, m. a name of Jupiter, who was worshipped in Libýa, under this appellation, which is said to signify moist. When Bæchus and his army were distressed by thirst in these sandy deserts, Jupiter appeared in the form of a ram, and showed him a fountain, the waters of which, according to Ovid and Q. Cúrtius, were cold at noon and midnight, and warm in the morning and evening. Here Bæchus built to his father, whom he called Júpiter Ammon, a temple in which he placed an image of that god, resembling the figure of a ram; hence Corniger Ammon (Ov. Met. v. 17). Another reason for Júpiter being worshipped under that form, may be inferred from Ov. Met. v. 327 seq. The oracle of Ammon was long in great reputation. The ruins of the temple, in the Oasis of Siwah, shaded with a number of date trees, are still visible. According to Silius Italicus, women were not allowed to enter this temple, nor swine to approach the threshold. The priests wore only linen of one colour, had no shoes, kept their hair short, did not marry, and were bound to purity. The temple contained no statue nor resemblance of the god, and fire burned perpetually on the altar (iii. 21 seq.). A. fount. Ammónis, from the fountain (i. e. the oracle) of Ammon (Juv. Sat. vi. 554). Ammóni, arum, m. the inhabitants of the grove round the temple (Curt. iv. 7). Adj. Ammóniæcus, a, um. Ammóniæcus sal (Ov. Med. Fac. 94).—2. The brother of Brótens. Both were eminent for the Cestus, and both fell at the marriage of Pércus, by the hand of Palæus (Ov. Met. v. 107).

Ammónius, i, m. exercised the royal functions in Persia in 150 B. C., in consequence of the indolence and vices of the king. Besides, he put the king's friends, his queen Lædicæ, and Antigónus son of Démétrius to death (Liv. Ep. 50).—2. A Christian philosopher, who taught a school at Alexandria about the middle of the third century. Among his scholars were Origen and Plotinus. His treatise theologia has been transmitted to modern times. Ammianus Marcellinus calls him Saccas Ammónius, probably from the manner in which he earned his subsistence at one period (xxii. 16).

Amnisus, v. Amnisus, i, m. a river of Cræta, Candia, on the banks of which was a temple to Ilithýia, and that district was said to be favourable to women in labour (Hom. Od. xix. 188).

Amnisus, i, m. a river of Bithýnia, near which Mithridátes began the war with the Romans (Ap. Bel. Mith. 181).

Amœbeus, ëos, m. an Athenian who excelled in playing on the harp, to which Ovídius refers (Art. Am. iii. 399).

Amœnus, i, m. a covetous man held up to ridicule and contempt by Mártialis (xii. 67).

Amörgus, i, m. a man in the army of Hannibal, who killed Galba in the act of retaking a Roman ensign from a Carthaginian, whom he had just deprived of life, in the battle at Cænæ (Sil. Ital. x. 200).

Amörgus, i, f. Amorgo, an island in Máre Egéum, the Archipelago, one of the Cyc ládes. Vibius Sécúrus, proconsul of the South of Spain, was banished to Amorgo in the year 23 (Tac. Ann. iv. 13).

Ampelos, i, m. a Thracian youth beloved by Bæchus, who placed him among the stars. From him has been derived the Greek name for a vine (Ov. Fast. iii. 409).

Ampelos, i, m. Cape Samo, a promontory of Tórónë (Herod. vii. 122).

Amphílaüs, i, m. son of Pölyñëns, a competitor in the games exhibited by Alcímus, and gained the prize for leaping (Hom. Od. viii. 114 seq.).

Amphíaræus, i, m. son of Ecclëus, or Apollo, and Hypermnestra, a celebrated augur of Argos and priest of Apollo, who knew that if he went to the siege of Thèbe, Theba, he would not return, on which account he concealed himself. His wife Eriphýlë, bribed by her brother Adrástus with a golden necklace set with gems, betrayed her husband, who ordered his son Alcmeon to revenge his death. Apollo made every effort to save the life of Amphíaræus, and, although he could not obtain a reversal of the decrees of fate, he procured for his favourite, that he was not to fall by a mortal hand. When the period of his existence expired, the earth opened and swallowed him up, on which his son, mindful of his order, put his own mother Eriphýlë to death (Hyg. 73 seq.). The remote and barbarous period in which he lived, excuses, if it does not justify, this spirit of revenge. Státius represents him as a faithful and pious priest. Apóllodórus alone mentions him among the Argonauts. From his father he is called Ecclides. Amphíaræides, a, m. a patronymic of Alcmeon (Ov. Fast. ii. 43). Adj. Amphíaræus, a, um. Amphíaræa quadriga (Prop. ii. 84. 39). Amphicæa, a, f. a town of Phócis (Herod. viii. 33).

Amphiclus, i, m. a noble Trojan killed by Mēges (Hom. II. xvi. 313).

Amphictyon, ōnis, m. son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, who formed a general council for twelve of the Grecian states, viz., the Boeotians, Dolopians, Dorians, Ionians, Locrians, Magnesians, Malians, Etans, Perrhæbians, Phocians, Phthians and Thessalians. In this famous council, matters relating to the general interest of the states were discussed, and the whole confederacy united to enforce their decisions. The advantages necessarily resulting from this union induced other states to solicit admission, which gradually increased the number, till it amounted to thirty. From the founder it received the name of the Council of the Amphictyones, although Strabo states, that it was instituted by Acrisius, king of Argos. The deputies met twice a-year, in spring generally, at Dēlphi, Castri, and in autumn, at Anthēla, a village near the Strait of Thermopylae, Therma. Each deputy had two votes. Before the council met, each of the members took a solemn oath, that he would destroy no town included under the league, or divert its springs or streams from their proper channels, and that he would exert his utmost to crush the state which should attack or injure the Amphictyonic towns or lands, or attempt to seize the offerings in the temple at Dēlphi, Castri. The dread of vengeance from this association, restrained the more powerful communities from injuring the weaker, and preserved their rights and privileges inviolate. Instances occurred, when warlike and powerful cities refused obedience to their decision, that the other states uniformly took up arms in their defence, at least for many years after the first establishment of this famous institution (Tac. Ann. iv. 14). Justinus makes him king of Athens, and says that he first consecrated the city to Minerva, and called it Athēna, and that the deluge happened in his reign (ii. 6).

Amphidamas, antis, m. was a native of Cēthera, Cerigo (Hom. II. x. 269).—2. Son of Alcus and Cleobulē, an Arcadian. Apollodorus has not mentioned him, but other writers on the Argonautic expedition have recorded his name as one of the warriors (Val. Flacc. i. 376).

Amphigēnia, se, f. et. Amphigēnium, i, n. a town of Macistia in Elis, a district of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea. Some consider it as belonging to Messēnia. Here Lātōna had a temple (Strab. 508). Stātilius mentions its fertility (Th. iv. 178).

Amphilochi, orum, m. a people of Acarnānia, whose chief city was, according to Pliny, called Argos. Amphilochium stood on the south of Sinus Ambracius, the Gulf of Arta, near the top of the gulf. Their territory, Amphilochia, æ, f. appears to have been of considerable extent. The city was built after the Trojan war, by Amphilochus, the son of Amphiarus and Eriphylē, from whom these several appellations are derived. Adj. Amphilochius, a, um.—2. A people of Gallæcia, Galicia, a province of Spain (Just. xlv. 3).

Amphilochus, i, m. a son of Amphiarus and Eriphylē, and brother of Alcmæon. After the Trojan war he retired to Acarnānia, Karili, and built a city which he called Argos, after the town in which he had been born; and, to distinguish it from the capital of Argōlia, the adjective Amphilochicum is generally added, now Filologia. After death he received divine honours (Liv. xlv. 27).—2. A prophet who was worshipped as a god at Orōpus, a town of Attica, where he had an ancient temple, surrounded by delightful springs and rivulets (Liv. xlv. 27).

Amphimachus, i, m. son of Ctætus, in the Grecian army, killed by Hector (Hom. II. xiii. 185).

Amphimēdon, ōntis, m. one of the most distinguished of the lovers of Pēnelōpē, which cost him his life. Hōmērus relates a conversation between his spirit and that of Agamemnon in the infernal regions (Hom. Od. xxii. 242 seq.).—2. A native of Lihya, killed by Pērsēus. He and Phorbas had fallen in consequence of the place having become slippery by the quantity of blood with which it was covered. Pērsēus drove his sword through the ribs of Amphimēdon, and through the neck of Phorbas, as they attempted to rise (Ov. Met. v. 75).

Amphinomē, es, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. II. xviii. 44).

Amphinomus, i, m. son of Nisus and grandson of Arētus, hence Arētiades (Hom. Od. xvi. 395).—2. A native of Sicilia, Sicily. He and his brother Anapius preserved the lives of their parents when flames from mount Ætna had set their city on fire. Vālerius Māximus says they carried their father and mother on their shoulders through the midst of the fires of Ætna, a fiction probably of after ages, when posterity had consecrated their memories, and believed their filial piety preserved them safe in the midst of fire (v. 4). Claudianus thinks temples should have been raised to their honour (l. 41 seq.). According to Sōlinus the place in which these brothers were interred was called Campus pius (v. 15).

Amphion, ōnis, m. the commander of the Epēi at Troy (Hom. II. xii. 692).—2. Son of Jupiter and Antiōpē, who, with his brother Zēthus, founded Thēbæ. According to Hēginus he had this name from being born where two ways meet (αμφι ὁδου). He is said to have excelled in music, and, by this art to have moved the stones with which he built the walls of that city. Hōmērus mentions nothing of his having erected these walls by the magic of his lyre, on which account this fiction must be referred to a later period. With the assistance of Zēthus he tied Dirce, the wife of Lycus, king of Thēbæ, by the hair, to the tail of a fierce bull, Propertius says to the head, by which she died a miserable death. Amphion was the maternal grandfather of Nēstor (Hom. Od. xi. 261 seq.). From Dirce, a fountain near Thēbæ, he was called Dirceus. Amphion had the surname of Iāsides, and was the father of the beautiful Chlōris. Arces Amphiōnis. Thēbæ (Ov. Met. xv. 427). Adj. Amphiōnius, a, um, of Amphion, Thēban. Amphiōnia lyra (Prop. i. 9. 10).—3. A descendant of the former, and one of the commanders in the Thēban war. Stātilius insinuates that Antigōnē was in love with him. He appears to have commanded the troops assembled from Hēlicon and its vicinity. He first attacked Pārthēnōpēus, when cutting down the Thēbans with prodigious slaughter (Stat. Th. vii. 278 seq.).—4. Son of Hēpērāsus, and brother of Astērius, according to the Scho-

East on Apollōnius. Hyginus states that some considered him a son of Hippasus. Ancient authors are not agreed respecting the place of his residence, some making it Palēnē, and Valerius Flaccus, Pella, Palatise (l. 365). He was one of the Argonauts, and must not be confounded with the son of Jupiter and Antiope, who built Thēbe.

Amphipolis, is, acc. im, f. Jenikeui, a town of Mædōnia on the river Strýmon, the Strumona, by which it is nearly surrounded; hence its name. It was built by Cimōn, son of Miltiades (Cor. Nep. Cim. 2). Adj. Amphipolitānus, a, um. Amphipolitāna arx (Just. xiv. 65).

Amphissa (often improperly written Amphissa), æ, f. Salina, a town of the Lōcri Ozōlae, which had this name from being surrounded by mountains. Some derive the name from Amphissa, daughter of Mæcæus, son of Æolus. It stands at the northern extremity of the Crissean plain, about nine miles from Crissæus Sinus, part of the Gulf of Lepanto. The lofty mountains Kopinas and Elatos nearly encompass it, and to them the ancient name has been referred. It is the largest city of the Lōcri Ozōlae, and, although its situation renders it unhealthy, its modern population exceeds four thousand. The yellow leather manufactured here is much esteemed, and is cured in a copious fountain called Karminas, which is supposed to possess a quality superior to that of any other spring for preparing skins to receive a yellow colour; but neither the red nor the black leather of Salina is good. To this town Lucanus alludes (Phar. iii. 172). Inh. Amphissenses, fam (Sing. Amphissensis, is), m. (Strab. 607).—2. A town or promontory of the Lōcri Epizēphyrīi in the territory of the Brūtii, to which Ovidius alludes. Adj. Amphissius, a, um. Amphissia sara (Ov. Met. xv. 703).

Amphissus, i, m. a son of Apollō and Dryōpē (Ov. Met. ix. 356).

Amphistratus, i, m. the charioteer of Polux (Just. xlii. 3).

Amphithēa, æ, f. the wife of Autolycus, consequently the maternal grandmother of Ulysses (Hom. Od. xix. 416).

Amphithōē, es, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. Il. xviii. 42).

Amphitritē, es, f. the daughter of Oceanus and Tēthys, or rather, of Nereus and Dōris, was the wife of Neptūnus, by whom she had Triton, one of the sea Deities. Amphitritē is often taken for the sea itself. Nec Amphitritē porrexerat, nor had the sea stretched out (Ov. Met. i. 14).

Amphitryō, æ, Amphitryōn, ōnis, m. a Theban, son of Alceus and Hippodamē. His sister, Anaxo, was married to Electryōn, king of Mýcēnæ; whose children the Telēbōæ had killed in battle. Electryōn promised both his kingdom and his daughter Alcēmēna to the man who should avenge the death of his sons. Amphitryōn accepted the offer, and, while he was absent against the Telēbōæ, Alcēmēna became pregnant of Hērēkles by Jupiter. On his return he accidentally killed Electryōn, and Sthenelus, brother of that monarch, took possession of Mýcēnæ, and compelled Amphitryōn to quit Argolis, on which he and Alcēmēna went to Thēbe. Amphitryōnīades, æ, m. Hērēkles, from his mother's husband (Virg. Æn. viii. 103).

Amphitus, i, m. a Spartan, the charioteer of Castor. Aided by Cercus, or, Telchus, the charioteer of Pollux, he built the city Dioscūrias, Iskuriak (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Amphius, i, m. son of Sēlāgus, killed by Telamonian Ajax. He was very rich, lived at Pesus, and joined Priāmus, which cost him his life (Hom. Il. v. 612).

Amphoterus, i, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Patroclus clad in the armour of Achilles (Hom. Il. xvi. 415).—2. An officer of Alexander the Great, to whom he gave the command of a fleet with which he attacked the islands between Achāla and Greece, and reduced them under the power of that monarch. Of his success at Crēta, Candia, and against the pirates who infested the eastern part of the Mediterranean, Curtius has not left any account (iii. 1 seq.).

Amphrysos, et, us, i, m. the Amnyro, a river of Phthiōtis, a district of Thessaly, a sluggish and marshy stream, which, running by the foot of Mount Othrys, and through the Crocian plain, falls into the west side of Sinus Pāgāseus, v. Pēlāsgicus, the Gulf of Volo. On the banks of this river, Apollo, when banished from heaven for putting the Cyclopēs to death, fed the flocks of Admētus, king of Phēre. Adj. Amphrysus, et, Amphrysacus, a, um, relating to Apollo. Amphrysia vates, Sibylla. Some derive the adjective, when applied to this priestess or Apollo, from Amphrysus in Phōcis, near Delphi, so that Amphrysia vates is equivalent to Delphica vates (Virg. Æn. vi. 398). Amphrysacum grāmen (Stat. Syl. i. 4. 105).

T. Amplius, T. Ampli, m. an officer in the interest of Pompey, and a tribune of the people in 63 B. C., when he and T. Lāllēnus carried a law that Cn. Pompeius should, at the Circensian games, wear a crown of laurel, and all the ornaments of a triumph (Vel. Pat. ii. 40). He formed the design of seizing the treasures in the temple of Dīana at Ephesus, and had summoned the senators of that province to witness the amount. Caesar's arrival in the neighbourhood of that city, after the battle of Pharsālia, the plain of Pharsa, prevented the execution of that plan, and compelled him to consult his safety by flight (Cæs. B. C. iii. 105).

T. Amplius Flāvianus, T. Ampli Flāvianī, m. a rich old man of consular rank, who was the commander-in-chief in Pānnōnia in the year 70, and met with Antōnius Primus and Cōrnēlius Fuscus at Petau on the Drave, to deliberate on the plan of war which they ought to form in order to secure success to their own party. Amplius had been attached to Vitellius, on that account the soldiers had less reliance on him, and Vespasianus appeared preferable to Vitellius, therefore the troops joined themselves to the former. Timid and ambitious, Amplius destroyed confidence and excited suspicion that he would betray the party whom he pretended to serve. In an insurrection Antōnius Primus preserved his life at the hazard of his own; and of his future life history gives no account (Tac. Hist. ii. 86—iii. 10).

Ampycus, i, m. a priest of Ceres, who, at the bloody nuptials of Pērcēus, was killed by Phīnēus (Ov. Met. v. 116).—2. The father of Mopsus, the priest and augur of the Argonauts. Ampycides, æ, m. Mopsus (Val. Flacc. iii. 420).

Ampyx, ycis, m. a man who, at the marriage of Pärseus, attacked Lyncæides, and was turned into stone at the sight of the Gorgon's head (Ov. Met. v. 184).

Amasæctus, i. m. Moffitta, or Mesfitti (the word appears to be an adjective, Amasæctus, a. um), a valley and lake in the country of the Hirpini, having high hills covered with wood on both sides. The lake is not above fifty feet in diameter, and springs up in several places, sometimes to the height of five or six feet, emitting a very offensive and noxious smell, with a loud noise. On the hill, at no great distance from this pond, was a temple of Mēphitis i. e. Jūno, presiding over unwholesome air, hence the modern name. Plinius says whoever entered this place died, which must have been a consequence of the sulphuric exhalations. Virgilius has given a beautiful description of it, placing it as in the middle of Italy, by which he probably meant equidistant from Mārē Sūp̄erum, and Mārē Inf̄erum (Virg. Æn. vii. 563–571).

Amūlius, i. m. second son of Prōca, king of Alba Longa. He dispossessed his elder brother Nūmitor, for which Ovidius calls him Injustus Amūlius (Met. xiv. 772), murdered his male offspring, and, to cut off all hope of issue, made his only daughter, Rhēa Silvā, a vestal virgin. Having by these iniquitous measures secured, as he rashly supposed, the crown to himself and his children, he treated his brother with neglect, and enjoyed the undisturbed possession of the government for forty-two years. Rōmulus and Rēmus, sons of his niece, Rhēa Silvā, put him to death, on which his brother Nūmitor again ascended the throne of Alba (Liv. i. 3, 5).

Amūlius Sērēnus, Amūlii Sērēni, m. a centurion of the highest rank, who, with Dōmītiānus Sālūnus, received orders to assemble the German soldiers quartered near the temple of Liberty, when the commotion began, which ended in the death of Gālba, and in the succession of Otho, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 31).

Amusius, i. m. the chief of the Ausētāni, who fled to Hasdrūbal, a commander of the Carthaginians, when their capital was besieged by Cn. Cōrnelius Scipio (Liv. xxi. 61).

Amŷclæ, arum, f. Sclavo Chorio, Leake rather thinks Aia Kyriaki i. e. Saint Sunday, a city of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, in the immediate neighbourhood of Lācēdemon, whence a colony migrated to Italy and built a cognominal town among the Aurunci, between Tārācīna and Caiēta. Sclavo Chorio is now a mass of ruins. It was the birth place of Castor and Pollux, and at it Hŷacīnthus lost his life. This city was famous for an excellent breed of dogs (Virg. G. iii. 345). Of the destruction of Amŷclæ in Italy, there are two accounts, one that it was destroyed by serpents, which is the opinion of Plinius, another, by their neighbours, which is the statement of Cicero. It is called Tūcīta by Virgilius, either because the inhabitants silently submitted to injustice from their neighbours, which proved their ruin; or from their having embraced the opinions of Pŷthāgōras, who imposed five years' silence upon his scholars, and being prohibited from killing animals, they were at last destroyed by numerous serpents from the adjacent lake. Ital. Amŷclæi, orum, m. were famous for dyeing purple, but did not attain the excellence of the Tyrians, to which Ovidius refers (Rem. Am. 707). Adj. Amŷclæus, v. Amŷclānus, a. um, of either Amŷclæ. Amŷclæus lacus, afterwards Fundānus, Lago di Fondi. Amŷclæus Pōllux, from his being brought up at Amŷclæ, the residence of Tŷndārus (Virg. G. iii. 89). Amŷclæus ductor, Xanthippus (Sil. Ital. vi. 504). Amŷclæum cōcīnum, the dye of Amŷclæ, supposed by some to have been green, and by others to have been purple (Mart. viii. 23). Amŷclānum Mārē, the Gulf of Gela, that part of the Tuscan Sea adjoining to Amŷclæ (Tac. Ann. iv. 59).

Amŷclas, x. v. ōtis, m. son of Lācēdemon and Sparta, who built Amŷclæ, Sclavo Chorio. He married Dīōmēlē, by whom he had Hŷacīnthus q. v. Amŷclides, ie. m. a patronymic of Hŷacīnthus (Ov. Met. x. 162), according to Pausānias and Apollōdōrus, but others refer this name to his having been born at Amŷclæ, and make him not the son, but great-grandson, of Amŷclas.—2. The master of the vessel in which Cæsar sailed from Oricum, Ric. to Brundisium, Brindisi. His troops remained longer at the latter town than suited his impatience, on which account he crossed the Gulf of Venice in an open boat, in stormy weather, to hasten their embarkation. When Amŷclas wished to put back, thinking his vessel unable to weather the blast, Cæsar, who was in disguise, discovered himself and exclaimed "Quid times? Cæsarērem vehis" (Flor. iv. 2).

Amŷclē, es, f. the name of a servant girl (Prop. iv. 5. 35).

Amŷcus, i. m. son of Nēptūnus and the nymph Mēliē, king of the Bēbrŷces, who compelled strangers passing through his territory, to fight him at the cestus. Pollux at last surpassed him in that exercise and deprived him of life (Virg. Æn. v. 373).—2. A Trojan who excelled in hunting, and had an uncommon knowledge of applying poison to warlike instruments (Virg. Æn. ix. 772). This barbarous practice scarcely occurs in the Iliad of Hōmērus, but is mentioned in the Odyssey.—3. The brother of Diōres, killed by Tŷrnus. They were descendants of Prīāmus; according to some, sons of that monarch (Virg. Æn. xii. 509).—4. A centaur, the son of Ophīon, who lost his life in the battle with the Lāpithæ, at the marriage of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 245).

Amŷdon, ōnis, f. a city of Pōnōia, which sent auxiliaries to the Trojans. It was afterwards called Abŷdon (Hom. Il. ii. 849. xvi. 288). Jŷvēnālīs mentions it as one of the towns of which the inhabitants flocked to Rome (Sat. iii. 69).

Amŷmōnē, es, f. a daughter of Dēnāus and Eurōpa or Eŷphāntis, of uncommon beauty, who delighted in hunting. She killed her husband Encelādus, a son of Ægŷptus, on the first night of their nuptials. She was afterwards violated by Nēptūnus, and was changed into a fountain, near Argos, which bears her name. A rivulet issued from this fountain, called also Amŷmōnē, Amimone, which fell into the Lake of Lerna (Ov. Met. ii. 243). Under a plane-tree which grew on its banks, the Hydra was nourished (Paus. ii. 37).

Amŷnānder, dri, m. a king of the Athānānes. From being neighbour to the Etōlii, he exerted himself to effect a reconciliation between that people and Philip, king of Macedonia, in 210 B. C.; afterwards he met that monarch at Phenice, in Epirus, when the object of the interview was to adjust the differences between the Romans, Aetolians, and Philip. When the Romans declared war against the Macedonian king, he joined with the former, assisted in desolating the countries of the people who either joined Philip, or rejected alliance with the Romans. After desolating Thessaly, he again met with that monarch and others, in a council, to adjust the terms of peace, and was one of the ambassadors sent to Rome on that account. At the end of the war the Romans allowed him to retain possession of the forts which he had taken from Philip. Hitherto he had continued faithful to the Romans, but, having married Apamia, daughter of Alexander of Mægälopölis, he yielded to the advice of his father-in-law, and joined Antiochus, king of Syria, and the Aetoli. The result of this breach of faith was expulsion from his kingdom, which, however, he regained, by the assistance of the Aetoli. The Roman consul, L. Cornélius Scipio, and his brother Publius, seem to have admitted his apology, since the senate granted him peace. Having resided, during his exile, chiefly at Amphicta, Arta, he went thither at the time it was besieged by the Romans, and, anxious for its preservation, and the safety of its inhabitants, with some difficulty, prevailed on them to surrender, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 30 seq.).

Amýntas, æ, m. a king of Mæcædonia, who ascended the throne in 508 B. C. Justinus (vii. 2) makes him the successor of Aëropus, which cannot be accurate. See Aëropus.—2. A king of Mæcædonia, son of Mênclæus, who ascended the throne in 291 B. C., and reigned twenty-one years. He married Eurýdice, by whom he had Alexander, Perdica, and Philip, father of Alexander the Great, and a daughter, Eurýdônê; by Gygeia he had Archelaus, Archidæus, and Mênclæus (Just. vii. 4). To him Cornélius Nepos refers (Iphic. 3). Amýntilades, æ, m. a patronymic of Philip (Ov. Ibis 295).—3. A general under Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, who sent him to Asia, where he was killed by Alexander, although his own relation (Just. ix. 5 seq.).—4. Son of Andrémónes, an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, held an important command at the battle of Issus, and was afterwards sent to Mæcædonia to levy troops, where he was accused of forming a conspiracy against his sovereign (Curt. iii. 9 seq.).—5. Lyncestis, an officer under Alexander the Great, who was rewarded for his bravery, as was also the preceding Amýntas (Curt. v. 2).—6. Son of Nicolaus, who was governor of a province under Alexander the Great, and successful against the barbarians (Curt. vii. 2 seq.).—7. Son of Antiochus, was in the army of Alexander in his expedition to the East, appears to have deserted and fled to Egypt, where he was killed (Curt. iv. 1 seq.).—8. A relation of Alexander the Great, who formed a conspiracy against him in Macedonia, gave his sister in marriage to Attalus, an inveterate enemy of that hero, and wrote him tauntingly in answer to his letter, in which he stated that he had been declared a son of Jupiter Ammon, by the oracle of that god (Curt. vi. 9).—9. An officer in the army of Alexander the Great, who obtained Bactriana on the death of that conqueror (Just. xiii. 4).—10. The name of a shepherd (Virg. B. iii. 66).—11. A native of Cos, who lived at Rome, and, from Höratius, appears to have been the opposite of a respectable man (Epod. xii. 18).—12. A Theban, who, in the siege of his native city, killed Phædrius (Stat. Th. viii. 438).—13. A shepherd, mentioned by Märtialis; having climbed a tree to procure food for his cattle, the branches broke, on which he fell with them to the ground, and was killed (xi. 42).

Amýntor, ôris, m. son of Ormênus, and father of Phenix. He was king of the Dölöpes (Ov. Met. xii. 364). Amýntore natus, Phenix (Ov. Ep. Her. iii. 27).

Amýntorides, æ, m. a patronymic of Phenix (Ov. Art. Am. i. 357).—2. A combatant killed in Thêbæ, Theba, having been one of the Argives, who had rashly entered that city during the siege, and were prevented from escaping by the gate through which they had passed being shut (Stat. Th. x. 509).

Amýrteus, i, m. a king of Egypt, who distressed the Persians (Herod. ii. 114 seq.). He discovered the island called Elbo.

Amýrus, i, m. a river of Thessalia, Thessaly, which runs into Mæcædonia, the Archipelago (Val. Flacc. ii. 11).

Amýthion, ônis, m. the son of Crêtheus and Týro, who married Dorippê, by whom he had two sons, Bias and Mëlampus. Amýthiônê crêtus, Mëlampus (Stat. Th. iii. 452). Adj. Amýthiônus, n, um. Amýthiônus Mëlampus, Mëlampus, son of Amýthion (Virg. G. iii. 550). Amýthiônus vâtes, Mëlampus (Stat. Th. iii. 501).—2. A nobleman of Lemnos, whose house Fame filled with a false account of the infidelity of the husband (Val. Flacc. ii. 162).

Anâbesineus, ôs, m. a competitor in the games exhibited by Alcinoüs (Hom. Od. viii. 113).

Anâbüra, orum, n. Hergan, a town on the confines of Phrygia and Galatia, near the sources of Alexander (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Anâcharsis, is, m. a Scythian philosopher of great reputation, who flourished about 592 B. C. He studied at Athens, under Solon, where he acquired a thorough knowledge of the Athenian laws, and of the different systems of philosophy known at that time. To abilities of the highest order he added intense study, and thus acquired a fund of knowledge, which raised his name, not only among his countrymen, but also among the states of Greece. On returning to Scythia he attempted to establish the laws of Athens in his native kingdom, which exasperated his brother, who was then on the throne, beyond the power of suffering, and he deprived him of life. His writings have wholly perished, except two letters. His name occurs frequently in the history of Hêrôdotus, and the writings of Cicero. To the celebrity of his works Phædrus refers (Prol. 3).

Anâcrôn, ônitis, m. a lyric poet, who was a native of Têos, Sigagik, a town of Ionia. Love and wine formed the chief subjects of the Teian bard, and although he was subjected himself to censure, by impropriety of sentiment, yet the melody of his numbers, and elegance of diction, added to the sportive play of a fine imagination, place him high among writers of lighter odes. Pínius states, that swallowing the stone of a dried grape occasioned his death, when he was an old man (ii. 21). From Pausānias he appears to have been intimate with Pólycrātes, king of Sāmos. His statue at Athens was that of a man drunk and singing (Paus. i. 2 seq.).

Anāctōrīē, es, f. a native of Lēsbos, Mitylenē, a favourite with Sāpoph (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 17).

Anāctōrīum, i, n. a town of Acarnānīa, on a promontory at the entrance into Sinus Ambrācius, the Gulf of Arta. Adj. Anāctōrīus, a, um. Anāctōrīa ora (Sil. Ital. xv. 289).

Anāgnā, æ, f. Anagni, the capital of the Hērūci (Virg. Æn. vii. 684). Inh. Anāgnīni, orum, m. held an assembly in 306 B. C., in consequence of some of the Hērūci, who were taken prisoners among the Sānnītes, being kept in custody by appointment of the senate among the Latin states, when all the Hērūci, with the exception of the Alatrīnātes, Ferentinātes, and Vērūlāni, declared war against the Romans. To the Anāgnīni, after their defeat, which immediately followed, the Romans granted the freedom of the state, without the right of voting; but prohibited them from intermarriages, and from public assemblies (Liv. ix. 42, 43). Adj. Anāgnīnus, a, um. Anāgnīnus ager, the territory of the Anāgnīni (Liv. xxvi. 9).

Anāphē, es, f. Naxos, an island near Grēta, Candia (Ov. Met. vii. 461).

Anāpis, is, et, us, i, m. the Alfeo, a very deep muddy river of Sicily, which, after receiving Cýānē, falls into the greater harbour of Syracuse. It abounds with trout and eel, and its banks are covered with lofty reeds and aquatic plants. The papyrus grows naturally on the branch which descends from Cýānē. To the god of this river the nymph Cýānē was married (Ov. Met. v. 417).

Anāpius, v. Anāpus, i, et, Anāpis, is, m. brother of Amphīnōmus q. v. Valērius Maximus and Claudīanus have celebrated their filial affection, which every feeling heart must extol (Claud. i. 41).

Anārtes, iun, et, Anārti, v. Anārti, orum, m. a people of Dācia, who inhabited the eastern bank of the river Tibiscus, the Tisik, or, the Teyss, one of the northern branches of the Danube. Their country now forms part of Hungary (Cæs. B. G. vi. 25).

Anas, æ, m. the Guadiana, a considerable river of Spain, which has its source in some lakes or marshes, in that part of Hispānia Citerior, now New Castile, flows westward, passing through the province of Extremadura, and entering Lūsītānia, Portugal, traverses part of the kingdom of Algarva, in which changing its direction, and running south, it falls, after a course of 800 miles, into Māre Gādītānum, v. Beticum, the Gulf of Cadiz (Cæs. B. C. i. 38).

Anātha, æ, f. Anā, a fort in Mēsōpōtāmīa (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 1).

Anaurus, i, m. a small stream, a southern branch of Onchestas, a river of Thessaly (Luc. Phar. vi. 370).

Anausis, is, m. king of the Alāni and Hēmīchi, one of the lovers of Mēdēa, and fell by the hand of his rival, Sīrus, king of Albānia (Val. Flacc. vi. 43 seq.).

Anāxāgōras, æ, m. son of Hēgēsābulos or Eubulos, was a native of Clāzōmēnē, and scholar of Anāxīmnēs. He appears to have been born to wealth, which he disregarded, and voluntarily gave his patrimony to his relations. The study of nature engrossed his whole attention, and he treated with equal indifference, both his own concerns and those of the state. When blamed by his relations for negligence, he replied "why do not you attend to these matters?" To one enquiring if he had no regard for his native country, he replied "I have the greatest regard for my native country," pointing his finger to the skies. When Xērxes made his descent on Greece, he was in his twentieth year, and he lived to the age of seventy-two, others say seventy-eight. That he had early applied his mind to the study of philosophy, appears evident from his settling at Athens, about the time he completed his twentieth year. According to tradition, he continued there thirty years, teaching the different branches of science with which either his own industry or the information of others had made him acquainted. Amongst his scholars were Pēricles, Eurīpides, and many others distinguished in the history of Athens. Arraigned for his impiety, by which, must be understood, his notions respecting the heavens, and the solar system, he would have suffered death had not his pupil Pēricles defended him, and, by his eloquence and ingenuity, prevailed on his countrymen to pass from the capital punishment, and to restrict their sentence to banishment. Thūcydides gives a different account, making him oppose Pēricles in the government of the republic, and accused not only of impiety but treason, for which he was doomed to death in his absence. During his confinement, Anāxāgōras spent his time in attempting to ascertain the exact relation between the circumference of a circle and its diameter. He retired to Lāmpsācus, Lampskue, where he died; and the natives performed his funeral rites in the most honourable manner. Besides, they erected a tomb to his memory, with an inscription expressive of his knowledge of astronomy and natural philosophy. In proof of their respect for this eminent philosopher, they asked him immediately before his death, what he wished to be done, and he requested that the children should annually have the month on which he died for play, a custom which was observed when Diōgēnes wrote. In the philosophical opinions of Anāxāgōras, like those of most ancient philosophers, truth and fiction are strangely blended. A powerful mind struggling against natural ignorance, seems now to have almost reached the properties and true situations of things, now led entirely astray by flights of imagination, or by the false notions of the age. He maintained that the sun was burning iron, and larger than Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Moræ; that the moon was inhabited, and had her surface diversified by hills and valleys; that bodies were formed of similar particles; that mind was the origin of motion; that heavy bodies were attracted downward, light bodies upward; that the solar rays converted moisture into vapour; that winds were a consequence of the air being rarified by the heat of the sun; and thunder, of a collision of clouds. More of his opinions will be found

Alexander the Great appointed governor of Parthia, in 329 B. C., after the inhabitants had submitted to his arms. From him the kings of Parthia derived their descent (Just. xii. 4).—2. A prefect of Parthia, under Seleucus, king of Syria, whom Arsaces overpowered in 245 B. C., and became king of that country (Just. xii. 4).—3. A man who died suddenly, and whose death Märtialis attributes to his having seen his physician Hermocrates in his sleep (vi. 53).

Andranodorus, i. m. son-in-law of Hiero, king of Syracuse, and one of the tutors of Hieronymus, the grandson of that monarch. Having artfully dismissed the other fourteen conjoined with him in that office, he obtained the sole direction of the young king, whose crimes do little credit to the fidelity or morality of his guardian. The Carthaginians stood higher in his favour than the Romans. Damarata, his wife, full of royal pride, endeavoured to make him secure in the high station which he held on the murder of Hieronymus; but the populace being bent on liberty, he delivered the keys of the royal treasury to Theodotus and Sosias, two of the conspirators. In this action he was either insincere, or his wife's urgency had prevailed on him to alter his resolution, for he afterwards engaged in a conspiracy to obtain the crown, which was no sooner discovered than it cost him his life. In this criminal enterprise Themistius was his associate, and Ariston, a comedian, his confidant. Love of country induced the latter to reveal the secret (Liv. xxiv. 4–24).

Andrëmon, v. Andremön, önis, m. an illustrious Grecian, prince of Etölia. He was the husband of the nymph Dryöpe, and father of Thöas, who is hence called claröque Andrëmonë natus (Ov. Met. xiii. 357), and Andrëmonides (Hom. Il. vii. 168).

Andrëmones, is, m. the father of Amyntas, g. c. an officer of Alexander the Great (Curt. v. 1).

Andriscus, i. m. a Grecian, who falsely pretended that he was a son of Persëus, king of Macëdönia, and, in consequence of that unfounded declaration, Dëmëtrius, king of Syria, sent him to Rome in 154 B. C. From this city he effected his escape, changed his name to Philippus, and obtained possession of all Macëdönia. He pretended to have been the son of that monarch by a harlot, brought up by a woman of Crëta, Candia, and, after the death of his father, educated at Adramyttium until he was twelve years of age. During this period he believed himself to be the son of the person in whose house he lived. When at the point of death his foster-father declared to him his true birth, and discovered to him a considerable treasure by means of a certain writing to which the seal of Persëus had been affixed. At the request of the man's wife he kept it secret until he had escaped to a considerable distance, because she had assured him that Eumënes, his father's inveterate enemy, would cause him to be put to death. To save his life he had fled to Dëmëtrius, king of Syria, to whom he made known his parentage, and who, on that account, had sent him to Rome. When about to take forcible possession of Thessaly, the Roman ambassador, with the assistance of the Achæi, thwarted his design. By him P. Juvëntius, the Roman prætor in Macëdönia, was killed, and his army defeated. Q. Cæcilius Mëtellus not only conquered this pretender, but made him prisoner, and having recovered Macëdönia, triumphed over Andriscus, frequently called in history Pseudöphilippus, in 148 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 49–52. Eutrop. iv. 14).

Andröcles, is, m. a native of Magnësia, hence called Andröcles Magnës. Dätämes appointed him commander of the army, when he revolted from the king (Cor. Nep. Dat. 5).—2. A nobleman of the Acärnanes in the interest of Philippus, king of Macëdönia, who, with Echedëmus, prevailed on his countrymen to repeal the treaty into which they had entered with the Romans in 199 B. C. and to form an alliance with Philippus, which lasted only for a few days. The taking of Lëucas and the battle at Cynocëphälë obliged them to submit to the Romans (Liv. xxxiii. 16, 17).—3. A prefect of Persëus, king of Macëdönia, to whom he gave the command of Thëssälönicä in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 32).

Andröclus, i. m. a slave, who fled from the cruelty of his master in Africa, and having taken refuge in a cave was alarmed at the entrance of a monstrous lion, expecting to be instantly torn in pieces. The animal approached him gently, and lifted up one of his feet from which Andröclus extracted a thorn and pressed a quantity of putrid matter, on which the lion retired and brought him, for sustenance, the beasts which he had taken. In this manner Andröclus lived with the lion for three years, afterwards fled, was taken by the soldiers, conveyed to his master, and sent to Rome, where he was doomed to fight with wild beasts. Amongst others, his old Numidian acquaintance entered the arena, recognised his benefactor, and advanced towards him with every sign of blandishment, on which Andröclus related these circumstances, which procured him his life, and he afterwards led the lion up and down the city, when the people exclaimed "This lion was the man's entertainer; this man was the lion's physician" (Gel. v. 14).

Andröcötus, i. m. a king of the Indians, who lived on a river of that name, attacked by Seleucus. Their hostilities terminated on their becoming united by affinity (Ap. Bel. Syr. 123).

Andrögëus, ö, v. i (Andrögeon, önis, Prop. ii. 1. 62), m. a Grecian commander slain at Troy (Virg. Æn. ii. 392).—2. Son of Minos, king of Crëta, Candia, and Päsiphäë, killed by the inhabitants of Athëns and Mëgara, because he had surpassed them in all their exercises of activity and arms. In revenge Minos made war on these states, which he conquered, and compelled them to send seven of their noble youth, of each sex, to him yearly to be devoured by the Minotaur. Adj. Andrögëönëus, a, um (Catul. lxi. 77).

Andrögynus, i. m. a human being uniting both sexes; one born at Sinüëssa in 211 B. C. Another of this kind, two years after, entered life at Früsino, equal in size to a child four years old. Aruspices from Etrüria announced that it should not be allowed to touch the earth, but drowned in the sea. After being enclosed in a chest the infant was deprived of life in the manner prescribed by the aruspices (Liv. xxvii. 37).

Andrömächë, es, f. daughter of Eëtion, taking an oath, in the opinion of the Romans, others think it was the name of a boy, and that Martialis uses it in that sense (xi. 95).

Anchialus, i. f. Anchiale, a city of Thrace, Romania, on the western shore of Póntus Euxinus, the Black Sea. Plinius calls this town Anchialum, and places it on the site of Messa (i. 442).

Anchimólus, i. m. the son of Aster, sent to expel the Pisistratidae from Athens, but he fell in the attempt (Herod. v. 63).

Anchises, æ. m. son of Cápys and Thémis daughter of Ilus, king of Troy. To him Venus bore Ænéas, who carried him on his shoulders from Troy, during the night in which it was burned by the Greeks. He had considerable knowledge of omens, and, though not endowed with the gift of prophecy, his sagacity penetrated the obscurity of oracular responses, by which he benefited his son, whom he accompanied to Sicily, Sicily, where he died (Virg. Æn. ii. and iii.). Aurelius Victor makes Anchises arrive in Italy, with his son (Or. 11), and Pausanias relates he died in Arcadia, where a mountain is from him called Anchisia (viii. 12). Nutrix Anchisæ, Tisiphônê (Juv. Sat. vii. 234). The poet gives it as an instance of the silly and useless questions with which grammarians, in ancient times, used frequently to be teased, particularly by the Emperor Tibérius, to whom Juvénalis most probably alludes. Anchisiades, æ. m. a patronymic of Ænéas (Virg. Æn. vi. 126). Adj. Anchisæus, a. um. Anchisæus tumulus, the tomb of Anchises (Virg. Æn. v. 761).

Anchistœus, cos. m. one of the Argonauts. Anchila, um. n. (i. e. ab omni parte ancisa), shields, twelve in number, which seem to have had their name from their shape, of which the first and real one, Numa Pompilius feigned to have been thrown from heaven by Egéria, as the pledge of the Roman empire. Véturius Mâurilius caused the other eleven to be made as like it as possible, lest it should be stolen. From the description of these shields, they must have bent to the body, and their outside surface was not smooth, but jutted out in a conical form in a number of places (Liv. i. 20). In solemn processions the priests of Mars carried them through the city. See Salii.

Ancon, onis. v. Ancôna, æ. f. Ancona, a sea-port town on Mâre Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, belonging to the Picëni, whose country was between that of the Umbri and the Sâbini. It has this name from its harbour, or the site of the town, resembling an Elbow or Crescent. A colony of Greeks from Syracusæ, Saragossa, who fled from the tyranny of Dionysius, built this town, and gave it this name, hence Juvénalis calls it Dorica (Sat. iv. 40). It was directly opposite to Dalmatia, hence Lûcânus has Ancon obnoxia Dalmaticis fluctibus (Phar. ii. 402).—2. A river of Scythia, flowing into Pontus Euxinus (Val. Flacc. iv. 600).

Ancorârius, i. m. Mount Wannashreeze, a mountain in Mauritania (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Ancus Mârcius, Anci Mârcii. m. grandson of Numa Pompilius, by his daughter Pômpilia, was created king of Rome in 640 B. C. In disposition Livius considers him uniting the characters of Numa and Rômulus, inclined to peace, but not averse to war.

To him the Romans were indebted for a number of useful regulations, and for the improvement of their religious observances. From the Æquicôlae he borrowed the form of demanding restitution, and of declaring war, which he first carried into effect against the Latins, who refused compliance, on which he raised an army, took their city Pôstôrîum, and removed the whole inhabitants to Rome. This prince conquered all the states against which he took up arms, and, by removing the people to the capital, he greatly enlarged both the population and buildings of the city. To prevent Jânicûlum, Monte Gianicolo, from being occupied as a place of strength by the enemy, he connected it with the city by a wall, and opened a communication, by erecting a wooden bridge over the Tevere. The trench of Quirites was the work of this monarch, who afterwards built a prison, adjoining to the Forum, to deter from the commission of crimes, and extended the boundaries of his kingdom to the sea, where he built the city Ôstia, near which salt-pits were found. After a reign of twenty-four years he died, leaving Lûcûmo; afterwards called Târquinus Priscus, tutor to his sons. Having ingratiated himself with the people, Lûcûmo succeeded Ancus in the government, to the prejudice of the royal youth (Liv. i. 32—34).

Ancýra, æ. f. Angoura, a city of Gállia, built by Midas, son of Górdius, who gave it that name from finding an anchor there, which was preserved in the temple of Jupiter at the time Pausanias wrote (i. 4). It appears to have been the chief city of that district. In modern times it contains about forty-five thousand inhabitants, and carries on a considerable trade. Inh. Ancýrân, orum. m. Adj. Ancýrânus, a. um. Ancýrânî triûmphi (Claud. xx. 418).—2. A town of Illýricum, plundered by Pêrsêus, king of Mâcedônia, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 20).—3. A town of Phrygia (Plin. i. 625). Stêphanus seems to consider this town and that of Gállatia as the same, in opposition to the opinion both of Plinius and Strabo.

Anda, æ. f. a town in Africa, to which Hasdrûbal fled after being wounded in battle by the Romans (Ap. Bel. Pun. 13).

Anabilis, is. f. Anabil, a town of Căppadôcia.

Andánia, æ. f. Helliniko-Castro (Makry-plai, Leake), a small town of Mëssënia, or Arcadia, situated between Mëgâlôpôlis and Mëssênê, now in ruins (Liv. xxxvi. 31).

Andécavi, v. Andégavi, orum. m. a people of Gállia, France, mentioned by Plinius along with the Trecassæ, whose capital is now Troyes, on Sëquâna, the Seine, to the east and south of Paris (i. 486). Tacitus writes Andécavi (Ann. iii. 41).

Andes, ium (Sing. Andis, is). m. a nation of the Cëltæ in Gállia, France. Their territory lay on the north bank, and near the mouth, of the river Ligëris, the Loire (Luc. Phar. i. 439). Andis is probably the true reading here. This line, with the four before it and the one after it, are supposed spurious, and are not in the folio edition of 1514 or 1477.

Andôclides, is. m. an Athenian orator, son of Lëôgôras. Four of his orations are still extant (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 3).

Andrâgôras, æ. m. a noble Persian, whom

Alexander the Great appointed governor of Parthia, in 329 B. C., after the inhabitants had submitted to his arms. From him the kings of Parthia derived their descent (Just. xii. 8).—2. A prefect of Parthia, under Siliacus, king of Syria, whom Arsaces overpowered in 243 B. C., and became king of that country (Just. xli. 4).—3. A man who died suddenly, and whose death Martialis attributes to his having seen his physician Hermonites in his sleep (vi. 53).

Andanodorus, i. m. son-in-law of Hiero, king of Syracuse, and one of the tutors of Hieronymus, the grandson of that monarch. Having artfully dismissed the other fourteen equipped with him in that office, he obtained the sole direction of the young king, whose crimes do little credit to the fidelity or morality of his guardian. The Carthaginians stood higher in his favour than the Romans. Damarata, his wife, full of royal pride, endeavoured to make him secure in the high station which he held on the murder of Hieronymus; but the populace being bent on liberty, he delivered the keys of the royal treasury to Theodotus and Sosias, two of the conspirators. In this action he was either assassinated, or his wife's urgency had prevailed on him to alter his resolution, for he afterwards engaged in a conspiracy to obtain the crown, which was no sooner discovered than it cost him his life. In this criminal enterprise Themistias was his associate, and Ariston, a comedian, his confidant. Love of money induced the latter to reveal the secret (Liv. xxiv. 4—24).

Andramon, v. Andramon, ōnis, m. an illustrious Grecian, prince of Etolia. He was the husband of the nymph Dryope, and father of Theon, who is hence called claryque Andromache natus (Ov. Met. xiii. 357), and Andromache (Horn. Il. vii. 168).

Andromenes, i. m. the father of Amyntas v. c. an officer of Alexander the Great (Curt. v. 1).

Andronicus, i. m. a Grecian, who falsely pretended that he was a son of Perseus, king of Macedonia, and, in consequence of that unfounded declaration, Demetrius, king of Syria, sent him to Rome in 154 B. C. From this city he effected his escape, changed his name to Philippus, and obtained possession of all Macedonia. He pretended to have been the son of that monarch by a harlot, brought up by a woman of Cræta, Candia, and, after the death of his father, educated at Adramyttium until he was twelve years of age. During this period he believed himself to be the son of the person in whose house he lived. When at the point of death his foster-father declared to him his true birth, and discovered to him a considerable treasure by means of a certain writing to which the seal of Perseus had been affixed. At the request of the man's wife he kept it secret until he had escaped to a considerable distance, because she had assured him that Eumenes, his father's inveterate enemy, would cause him to be put to death. To save his life he had fled to Demetrius, king of Syria, to whom he made known his parentage, and who, on that account, had sent him to Rome. When about to take forcible possession of Thessaly, the Roman ambassador, with the assistance of the Achaean, thwarted his design. By him P. Juvencius, the Roman praetor in Macedonia, was killed, and his army defeated. Q. Cecilius Metellus not only conquered this pretender, but made him prisoner, and having recovered Macedonia, triumphed over Andronicus, frequently called in history Pseudophilippus, in 148 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 49—52. Eutrop. iv. 14).

Androcles, is, m. a native of Magnesia, hence called Androcles Magnes. Datis appointed him commander of the army, when he revolted from the king (Cor. Nep. Dat. 5).—2. A nobleman of the Acarnanes in the interest of Philippus, king of Macedonia, who, with Echedemus, prevailed on his countrymen to repeal the treaty into which they had entered with the Romans in 199 B. C. and to form an alliance with Philippus, which lasted only for a few days. The taking of Leucas and the battle at Cynocéphale obliged them to submit to the Romans (Liv. xxxiii. 16, 17).—3. A prefect of Perseus, king of Macedonia, to whom he gave the command of Thessalonica in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 32).

Androclus, i. m. a slave, who fled from the cruelty of his master in Africa, and having taken refuge in a cave was alarmed at the entrance of a monstrous lion, expecting to be instantly torn in pieces. The animal approached him gently, and lifted up one of his feet from which Androclus extracted a thorn and pressed a quantity of putrid matter, on which the lion retired and brought him, for sustenance, the beasts which he had taken. In this manner Androclus lived with the lion for three years, afterwards fled, was taken by the soldiers, conveyed to his master, and sent to Rome, where he was doomed to fight with wild beasts. Amongst others, his old Numidian acquaintance entered the arena, recognised his benefactor, and advanced towards him with every sign of blandishment, on which Androclus related these circumstances, which procured him his life, and he afterwards led the lion up and down the city, when the people exclaimed "This lion was the man's entertainer; this man was the lion's physician" (Gel. v. 14).

Androcötus, i. m. a king of the Indians, who lived on a river of that name, attacked by Seleucus. Their hostilities terminated on their becoming united by affinity (Ap. Bel. Syr. 123).

Androgeus, ō, v. i (Androgeon, ōnis, Prop. ii. 1. 62), m. a Grecian commander slain at Troy (Virg. Æn. ii. 392).—2. Son of Minos, king of Cræta, Candia, and Pasiphæ, killed by the inhabitants of Athens and Megara, because he had surpassed them in all their exercises of activity and arms. In revenge Minos made war on these states, which he conquered, and compelled them to send seven of their noble youth, of each sex, to him yearly to be devoured by the Minotaur. Adj. Androgeōncus, a, um (Catul. lxiv. 77).

Androgynus, i. m. a human being uniting both sexes; one born at Sinuessa in 211 B. C. Another of this kind, two years after, entered life at Frusino, equal in size to a child four years old. Aruspices from Etruria announced that it should not be allowed to touch the earth, but drowned in the sea. After being enclosed in a chest the infant was deprived of life in the manner prescribed by the aruspices (Liv. xxvii. 37).

Andromachē, es, f. daughter of Eëtion, king of Thēbe in Cilicia, was the wife of Hector, to whom she bore one son, Astyanax. Hōmērus has celebrated her uncommon affection for her husband, who was killed by Achilles. Her son also lost his life, but ancient authors differ with respect to the person who put him to death. She fell to the lot of Pyrrhus who carried her to Epīrus, where she bore him three sons, Mōlōssus, Pīlus, and Pērgāmus. Having afterwards repudiated her, she married Hēlēnus, a brother of Hector, and by him had Cestrinus (Virg. Æn. ii. 456, iii. 297). According to Ovidius she was of uncommon size (Art. Am. ii. 645), to which Jūvenālis alludes (Sat. vi. 502).

Andrōmāchus, i. m. was appointed governor of Cele-Syria by Pārmēnio in 332 B. C. and burned alive by the Sāmāritæ in the following year (Curt. iv. 5 seq.).—2. A man of perfidy, who betrayed the confidence and measures of Crassus (Ap. Bel. Par. 151).

Andrōmēda, m. cf. e. es. f. a daughter of Cēphēus, king of Ethīōpia and Cāsiōpē, who was chained by order of Jūpiter Ammon to a rock, and exposed to the fury of a sea-monster which Neptūnus, in consequence of Cāsiōpē having the audacity to prefer herself and her daughters in beauty to Juno and the Nereids, sent to desolate the country. Pērsēus returning from the conquest of the Gorgon, beheld her in this dreadful situation, and promised to Cēphēus to destroy the monster, on condition that Andrōmēda became his wife. To this both parents readily assented. He immediately attacked and put to death the monster, which released Andrōmēda from her chains. Phīneūs, her uncle, to whom she had been previously betrothed, rushed into the assembly during the nuptial feast, with a body of armed men, and endeavoured to carry her off by force. A bloody battle ensued, in which all the assailants were either killed, or converted into stone at the sight of Medūsa's head. After death, Andrōmēda was changed into the Constellation which bears her name (Ov. Met. iv. 670 seq.).

Andrōnīcus, i. m. a Grecian commander in the Asiatic war under Alexander the Great (Curt. vii. 3).—2. A Macedonian, who was in garrison at Ephēsus in 192 B. C. and made a successful sally against a plundering party of the Romans as they drew near the walls of that city (Liv. xxxvii. 13).—3. A man whom Pērsēus, king of Mācedōnia, sent to burn the naval arsenals at Thēsālōnīca that they might not fall into the hands of the Romans in 171 B. C. On purpose to give the king time to consider of that rash and cowardly order, Andrōnīcus delayed its execution, yet when the monarch repented of his dastardly conduct, he ordered Andrōnīcus to be put to death, that there might be no living witness of such shameful instructions (Liv. xlv. 10). See Nicias.—4. Son of Andrōnīcus, a native of Ætōlia, was beheaded in 169 B. C. because, following his father, he had carried arms against the Romans in the Macedonian war (Liv. xlv. 31).—5. A poet in the age of Ammīanus Mārcellinus, who wrote fables and poems of different kinds. He appears to have been a native of Hērāclopōlis (Amm. Mar. xix. 2).

Androphagi. See Anthropophagi.

Andros, i. f. Andri, an island in Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, of great fertility, near the southern extremity of Eubœa, Ne-gropont, taken by the Romans in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 45). It was one of the Cyclādes. Mūciānus, as recorded by Plinius, mentions that on seven particular days, yearly, a fountain in this island flowed with wine, which being carried out of sight of the temple of Bacchus returned in taste to water again (iv. 782). In modern times it contains from thirty to forty villages, and its population exceeds four thousand (Juv. Sat. iii. 70). Inh. Andrii, orum, m. (Herod. ix. 33).—2. An island off the coast of Britain, near Vectis, the Isle of Wight. It is now unknown. Ptolēmeus calls it Eēdros, and says it is deserted.

Andrōsthēnes, is. m. commanded the Lacedæmonian garrison at Corinth in 200 B. C. and defended that city against the Romans and Achæi. Next year the latter defeated him in a general engagement near Corinth, the result of his imprudent conduct, which his future movements aggravated (Liv. xxxiii. 33 seq.).—2. A prætor of Thessaly, who embraced the interest of Pompey, but was defeated by Jūlius Cæsar (Cæs. B. C. iii. 80).

Anēctius, i. m. a tribune of the Nērvii, who, with Senectius, of the same rank and people, made a brave resistance at the head of the German nations on the east of the Rhine, against D. Claudius Drusus in 12 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 139).

Anēmōrca (Anēmōrēia, Greek), m. f. a town of Phōcis, which had its name from the violent storms of wind to which it was exposed (Strab. 614). It stood near Cyrrha and Hyāmpōlis (Stat. Th. vii. 347). In later times it was called Anēmōlia (Hom. II. ii. 521).

Anēmūrium, i. n. Cape Anamours, a promontory of Cilicia, on which was a town of the same name, now Stalenura or Scalenura (Plin. i. 586. Liv. xxxiii. 20). Adj. Anēmūriēnsis, is. e. Anēmūriēnsis civitas (Tac. Ann. xii. 55).

Anētor, ōris, m. a native of Phōcis, hence Ovidius calls him Phōcius. He kept the cattle of Pēlēus (Ov. Met. xi. 348).

Angēa, m. f. Vengia, a town of Thessaly, which the Ætōli took by assault in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Angītes, m. m. one of the branches of Sīrīmon, the Strumona (Herod. vii. 113).

Angli, orum, m. a people of Germany, to the north of Albi, the Elbe, first mentioned by Tacitus in his treatise on the manners of the Germans (40). The district which they inhabited still bears the name of Angelen, between Flensburg and Sleswick. In the fifth century they migrated to Britain, the south part of which was from them called Anglia, now England.

Angrivārii, orum, m. the Angrivarians, a people of Germany, who possessed part of the country which belonged to the Brictēri, lying between Rhēnus, the Rhine, and Amīsius the Emis (Tac. Ann. ii. 8 &c.).

Angrus, i. m. the Morava, a river of Illīricum, which, running northward, passes through the Triballian plain, joins Brongus, and their united stream falls into the Danube (Herod. iv. 49).

Anguis, is, m. the name of a constellation in the northern hemisphere, consisting of sixty-four stars (Ov. Met. ii. 138).

Angitia, s. f., a nymph, according to some, and a grove according to others, on the west side of Læus Fucinus, Lago Fucino, or, Lago di Celano, in the ridges of the Apennines. It is probable that the grove received its name from the nymph who was supposed to preside over it; and this conjecture is supported by the construction in Virgilus (Æn. vii. 759), and the words of Solinus, who states that Angitia (i. e. Angitia, Virg. Æn. vii. 759, and Sil. Ital. vii. 498), a daughter of Æetes, occupied the vicinity of Fucinus, and was there esteemed a goddess, from her knowledge of the healing art, by which she repelled or cured diseases.

Anicetus, i. m., a freedman of the Emperor Nero. Agrippina, the mother of Nero, had incurred his displeasure, and nothing but her death could satiate his resentment. Hesitating between death by open violence and secret means, Anicetus proposed inviting her to Caprice, Capri, and constructing a ship so as to fall into pieces at a signal given to the men, who knew the principles on which the vessel was formed. This device gratified the unnatural cruelty of the Emperor, because it evaded the hatred of the public consequent on an act of parricide, and it ensured, as he thought, the death of his mother more effectually than administering poison secretly. The savage pretended reconciliation with his mother, easily induced her to go on board, and, after the vessel was at some distance from the shore, the deck was allowed to fall in, and he expected that Agrippina would thus be crushed to death. The bed on which she lay supported that part of the deck from coming down upon her, on which she was only plunged into the sea, and, with little injury, reached the shore by swimming. When the same Emperor wished to get rid of his wife, he again pitched on Anicetus, who was villainous by nature, and hardened by crime, commanded him to make a public confession of his adulterous intercourse with the Empress, which the wretch, without the least foundation in truth, openly avowed, in presence of the Emperor's friends, and was ordered to retire to Sardinia, where he enjoyed every convenience of life, and at last died a natural death (Tac. Ann. xiv. 3—62).

—2. A freedman of Pölēmo, king of Pōntus, who, offended at the reduction of that kingdom to a province, excited a commotion in the country, and collected a number of the inhabitants, took Trāpēzus, and, after other hostilities, he prevailed on the king of the Sēdēhēzi to join him and declare for Vitellius. Virgilius Gēmīnus, an officer under Vēspāsianus, compelled by fear that monarch to deliver up Anicetus, and his death put an end to that war in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. iii. 47, 48).

Anicla, s. f., a cousin of T. Pōmpōnius Atticus, and wife of M. Sērvilius Sulpicius (Cor. Nep. Att. 2).

Anicius, sometimes Annicius, a. um. Anicia gens, a distinguished family at Rome, from which sprung many eminent citizens. Heinsius has proved that gens Anicia and gens Aschēsia is the same.

Cn. Anicius, Cn. Anicii, m., a lieutenant-general under L. Emilius Paullus, who commanded the troops which attacked and carried Ægīnum, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 48).

L. Anicius Gāllus, L. Anicii Gālli, m., was elected prætor, and obtained, in 171 B. C., the foreign jurisdiction, on condition that he should go wherever the senate should send him. Gēntius, king of Illyricum, had joined Pērcēus, king of Mācēdōnia, and had thrown into prison M. Pērpēna and L. Pēllius, Roman ambassadors, on which account war was declared against him, and L. Anicius Gāllus appointed to command the army. He arrived in his province in the beginning of spring, 170 B. C., and, having added to the auxiliary troops which he had, two thousand foot and two hundred horse, of the Parthini, of which Epiciāus commanded the infantry, and Algālus the cavalry, he marched to raise the siege of Bāsāna. During the whole campaign, he discovered the judgment and activity of an able commander, taking a number of towns by force, whilst others voluntarily surrendered. After recovering the ambassadors, to seize the king's friends and relations, he sent L. Pēllius, who brought from Mēdēo, a city of the Labēates, Etlēva his wife, his two sons Scerdilēdus and Pleurātus, and his brother Caravantius. Anicius then despatched M. Pērpēna to announce the victory at Rome, and to inform the senate that he had finished a war which they did not know had been begun. For this victory the senate decreed a thanksgiving of three days, and continued him in the government of Illyricum with power to form a new constitution, and to adjust whatever had been deranged by the war. After placing a garrison at Scorda, the capital of the kingdom, and likewise in the cities Rhizo, Risino, and Oleñum, Dulcigno, he marched with the rest of the army into Epīrus, when Phanōta surrendered. Advancing into the country of the Mōlōssi, he received the submission of all the cities, except Pāsāro, Tēmon, Phylacē, and Hōrrēum q. v., and these he afterwards compelled to lay down their arms. In the equity of his decisions and judicious arrangements for the government of the country, he showed both a strict regard to justice, and an accurate knowledge of political matters. The whole royal family adorned his triumph (Liv. xlv. 17—43).

Anidus, i. m., a mountain of the Ligures, supposed by some to be Monte Borgada, or Borgalla (Liv. xl. 38).

Anigros, v. Anigrus, i. m., the Mauro-potamo, a river of Arcādia, which has its source in mount Lāpithas. Its waters have an unpleasant smell, which Strābo and Pausānias fabulously ascribe to the centaurs bathing in this stream, and Mēlāmpus using it for recovering the daughters of Prætus from madness. Pausānias mentions that fishes could not live in it, and that those which the Acidas brings into it become unfit for food (v. 5).

Anio, v. Anien, ēnis, m. (Stat. Syl. i. 9, 20), the Teverone, a river of Italy, which, meandering from its sources in a mountain of the Trēbāni, through the vales of Sābina, glides gently through Tibur, Tivoli, hence Anio Tiburnus; till, coming to a rock, it precipitates itself in one mass down the steep, then boiling for an instant in its narrow channel, rushes headlong through a chas-into the caverns below, and falls into the Tevere three quarters of a mile above Pons Milvius, Ponte Molle. By working its way through a rock, it forms a natural bridge, which presents another striking view of this river. The length of its course is forty-five British miles, it is twice crossed in going from Rome to Tivoli, and has four bridges near Rome. This description accounts for the epithets præceps, spūmifer, &c. applied to the Teverone. Anſēnus, i. m. the god of that river (Stat. Syl. i. 3. 70). Anſēnicōla, æ. m. an inhabitant on the banks of Anſo (Sil. Ital. iv. 225). Adj. Anſēnus, a, um, et, Anſēnsis, is, e. Anſēna fluētia (Virg. G. iv. 369). Anſēnsis centuria (Liv. xxiv. 7).

Anſōrgis, is, f. a town of Spain, the situation of which is uncertain. Near it Hasdrūbal, son of Hāmilcar, was encamped when Cn. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō marched to attack him with one-third of the veteran troops in Spain, and thirty thousand Celtiberian auxiliaries. The latter, bribed by the Carthaginians, deserted him, which caused the destruction of himself and his army (Liv. xxv. 32, 34).

Anſus, i. m. the son of Apōllo and Rhēa, was king of Dēlos, and priest to his father. He had four daughters, to whom Bāchus gave the power of changing whatever they pleased into wine, corn, and oil, and a son called Andrus, who gave his name to that island near the southern extremity of Eubœa, Negropont. Agāmēmnon wished to carry these women with him to the Trojan war, on purpose to supply his army with provisions, which being contrary to their inclinations, they implored the protection of Bāchus, who changed them into pigeons. He gave a kind reception to Æneas on his way for Lātium (Virg. Æn. iii. 80), who, according to Aurēlius Victor, married his daughter Lāvīnīa (Or. 9).

Anna, æ, f. a daughter of Bēlus, king of Tŷrus, who deserted her native country and accompanied her sister Dido q. v. To her character Virgilius has given great interest and tenderness, from the feeling part which she took in the fate of her unhappy sister (Æn. iv. 9 seq.). Ovidius makes her Anna Pērēna, who was one of the Dii Indigētes of the Romans, and describes her worship (Fast. iii. 146 seq.). Silius Itālicus states that, compelled to quit Carthage on the death of Dido, she fled to Bātus, king of Cŷrēnē, who received her into his house, and afforded her every comfort and security. The arrival of Pŷgmāllion obliged her, after residing some time at the court of Bātus, to leave that country, and to attempt her escape by sea. A storm drove her on the coast of Lātium, where she was recognised by Æneas, who endeavoured to compensate for the injustice he had done Dido, by his kindness to this unhappy fugitive. Warned by Dido in sleep, that Lāvīnīa plotted her destruction, Anna, following the advice of her sister, threw herself into the fountain Nūmicius, became a Naiad, and received divine honours from the Romans (viii. 28—201. Mart. iv. 64).

Annaeus Cōrnūtus, Annaei Cōrnūti, m. a Stoic philosopher, banished from Rome by the Emperor Nēro, because he had given his opinion too freely respecting his verses. From Persius we learn that he taught the philosophy of the Stoics at Rome, and that this poet had the benefit both of his instructions and friendship. His description of their intimacy founded on similarity of inclination and manners, and the tender affection which subsisted betwixt them, is perhaps the most splendid passage in all his writings. Dioch records a number of particulars respecting his being consulted by the Emperor with regard to his poetry, and also of the writings of Cōrnūtus, none of which have been transmitted. Eusēbius, too, mentions the banishment of this philosopher by the Emperor. His scholar, Pērsius, has immortalized his elegant verse, his excellence of disposition, sweetness of temper, kindness of heart, love of literature, and extensive knowledge. To him he addresses his 5th Satire.

Annaeus Sēneca, Annaei Sēcēti, m. an intimate friend of L. Annaus Sēneca, to whom he inscribes his book De tranquillitate animi, and mentions his death in terms of deep regret (Epist. 63).—2. A noted thief, in the opinion of Commentators. His character seems suited to the epigram in which his name occurs (Mart. viii. 81).

L. Annaeus Sēneca, L. Annaei Sēcēti, m. son of M. Annaus Sēneca, was a native of Cōrdūba, Cordova, a town of Hispānia, Spain. His father removed, during his infancy, to Rome, where he received an excellent education under the most celebrated Stoics of that period. He embraced the Pythagorean position of the Metempsychōsis, and consequently held it unlawful either to kill animals or to eat their flesh, a tenet which his father prevailed on him to renounce, in order to escape the punishment which Tiberius threatened, because they abstained from certain meats. Sēneca gave early indication of uncommon talents, which a proper course of study improved and matured, but he found it necessary to abandon a favourite pursuit in which he was fitted to excel, the practice of eloquence, because Cāligūla entertained a mean jealousy of all who displayed great oratorical abilities, and wished to be reckoned the first orator himself. He then became a candidate for offices in the state, and obtained a quietness, after which Claudius banished him to Corsica, on suspicion of an amour with Jūlia, daughter of Germānicus.

The Emperor, soon after his marriage with Agrippina, recalled Sēneca from exile, and appointed him preceptor to her son Nēro, who succeeded him in the throne. The enemies of his philosophy blamed him for initiating his pupil in those detestable vices, which were the scandal of Rome during the succeeding reign. Silius, who hated Sēneca, is the authority on which this scandalous charge, and that of criminality with Agrippina rest, and the high estimation in which the Romans held his character may be considered as sufficient confutation. He amassed prodigious wealth under Nēro, on which account Juvēnalis calls him prædites (Sat. x. 16), and these very riches, added to the magnificent houses which he built, and the beautiful gardens which he planned, formed a charge against him, which he justly considered as a prelude to his destruction. He, therefore, requested the Emperor to accept of his whole wealth, and allow him to withdraw into a life of studious retirement; but the Emperor refused his request, and Sēneca, to obviate all cause of suspicion kept himself at home under pretence of indisposition. On the discovery of Piso's conspiracy, Nátalis named Sēneca as an accessory. Of this declaration there was no proof, but it afforded a plausible pretence to the tyrant for putting Sēneca to death. Tacitus informs us that a report prevailed at Rome, that the conspirators, after employing Piso to deprive Néro of life, intended to destroy Piso himself, and appoint Sēneca Emperor, to which Juvénalis has been supposed to allude (Sat. viii. 212). This rumour, even although groundless, shows the high respect and estimation in which the citizens of Rome regarded this accomplished scholar. At the approach of death he looked with composure, displayed a magnanimity similar to that of Socrátes, consoled his wife with the utmost tenderness, and discoursed on subjects suited to his state and his character as a great man and distinguished philosopher. Having the choice of his own death, he opened his veins, which bled so slowly that, to accelerate his end, he drank a dose of poison which produced no effect. To hasten his dissolution he was put into a warm bath, which likewise proved ineffectual. The executioners, sent by the tyrant to witness this event, became clamorous for its accomplishment; not to occasion longer delay, Sēneca was removed into a stove and suffocated by the steam, in the fifty-third year of his age, and sixty-third of the Christian era.

The writings of Sēneca have been transmitted, without much loss, to modern times, and contain excellent moral reflections, just opinions on a variety of subjects, and much valuable knowledge, which the young may study with advantage and the aged recollect with pleasure. It must be confessed, that the sentiment surpasses the diction, since the latter cannot be commended either for conciseness or purity. He has left behind him compositions both in prose and verse, and although he has superiors in both, yet it is no small degree of praise to have been called by Plinius, the prince of literature. Of the tragedies which go under his name, Quintilianus ascribes only the Médæa to him; others say that he wrote also the Trôas and Hippolytus, making his father the author of Hercules furens, Thyestes, Agamemnon, and Hercules etæus. To him Statius alludes (Syl. ii. 7. 31).

M. Annaeus Lūcānus, M. Annaei Lūcāni, m. son of M. Annaeus Mella and Atilla, was a native of Corduba, Cordova, a town of Spain. Gāllio, and Sēneca the philosopher, were his paternal uncles. At what age he was removed to Rome is unknown, although there is little doubt, that he was then very young. Here he received his education, and his father being of equestrian rank, he possessed the advantage of enjoying elegant and refined society. Very early in life Lūcānus discovered uncommon talents, which he chiefly employed in poetical composition. His eager desire to excel in poetry, induced him to engage in a contest of superiority with the Emperor Néro, over whom he gained a complete victory, but his success excited the resentment of Néro, who meditated revenge. Disgusted at the Emperor opposing his reputation, and preventing him from publishing his verses, he entered into a conspiracy against the life of the monarch, which, being discovered, he, having been allowed to choose his own death, opened his veins and expired, in the twenty-seventh year of his age. Tacitus charges him with having accused his own mother of being among the conspirators, in expectation of obtaining the pardon promised for discovering the other conspirators, which he had long refused. This declaration, most probably false, detracts greatly from his character as a man, although he met his death with great resolution, and breathed his last, repeating with animation and firmness the beautiful passage in the third book of his Pharsalia, line 639—643; others say those of book ninth, beginning with Sanguis erant lacrimæ, &c. (811). Statius, after his death, addressed to his widow an ode, in which that poet has recorded no inconsiderable part of the history of Lūcānus (Syl. ii. 7). Of all his poetical compositions the Pharsalia, an unfinished work, only remains. Of the merits of that poem very different opinions have been advanced. That it falls greatly short of the Æneid, none will deny, and that many proofs of bad taste occur is likewise beyond dispute. Still the work possesses great merit, and contains numerous sublime sentiments, brilliant descriptions, intermixed with just reflections, both political and moral. The author has injured the interest of the whole, not only by adhering closely to historical facts, but recording them in their exact order of time. The facts had occurred too recently to admit either of high embellishment or great exaggeration. On this account critics deny the Pharsalia the honour of being an Epic poem, and call it a historical narrative in verse. Strictures of this kind, which are not wholly without truth, have sunk below its just level, in the public opinion, the poetry of Lūcānus, and have caused the Pharsalia to be seldom mentioned, and seldom perused. It is a work, however, which the young scholar may read with pleasure and advantage, although he must be on his guard against the instances of vicious taste, and unnecessary declamation with which he will occasionally meet. A list of the works of Lūcānus, which have perished, is frequently subjoined to his life, but the authority on which it has been penned is very doubtful. Martialis writes several Epigrams in praise of Lūcānus (vii. 20 &c.).

M. Annaeus Mella, M. Annaei Mella, was a Roman knight of senatorian rank, who declined soliciting places of dignity from a foolish desire that the power of a Roman knight might equal that of the consuls. He was the brother of Gāllio and Sēneca, and what added greatly to his reputation, he was the father of the poet M. Annaeus Lūcānus. After the death of his son, Annaeus induced Fābius Rōmānus, one of the most intimate friends of the poet, to accuse himself of being concerned in the conspiracy for which his son had died. Néro, anxious to obtain possession of his great wealth, readily believed the fictitious correspondence produced as evidence of his guilt, and ordered him to be brought into his presence. Instead of obeying this order, he opened his veins, not however before he had written a will, and in a codicil had bequeathed a great sum of money to Tigellinus, and to his son-in-law Cossutianus Capito.

which rendered the deed valid. He added another codicil complaining of the injustice of his death, and stating that Rūfus Crispinus and Anicius Cerialis, enemies of the Emperor, were allowed to live. The intention of Annaeus was probably to effect the death of these two men, who had perhaps taken some part in the accusation against his son Lucanus (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17).

M. Annaeus Nōvātus, M. Annaei Nōvātī, m. afterwards adopted by Gāllio, whose name he assumed with the praenomen of Jūnīus, was son of M. Annaeus Sēneca and Hēlvīa. He was a pleasant speaker, for which Quintilianus has commended him, and Stāthius calls him Dulcis Gāllio (Syl. ii. 7. 32). He was the brother of Sēneca, the philosopher, to whom two of that author's treatises are inscribed. The government of Achaea, as proconsul, had fallen to his lot, and he is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (chap. xviii). In attempting to obtain the favour, he incurred the displeasure, of the Emperor Tiberius, and the consequence was his expulsion from the senate, and banishment from Italy. He retired to Lesbos, which malice suggested would, in place of punishment, be a source of enjoyment, on which account he was recalled to Rome, and committed to close confinement. When his brother suffered death, fear impelled him to humble supplication, and his enemies attempted his destruction, but without success (Tac. Ann. vi. 3 seq.). To the three Sēnecas, Mārtialis refers (iv. 40).

M. Annaeus Sēneca, M. Annaei Sēnecae, m. a native of Corduba, Cordova, a town of Hispania, Spain, was of equestrian rank, and lived in the latter years of Cicero. He married Hēlvīa, a woman of excellent qualities, who bore him three sons, M. Annaeus Nōvātus, afterwards called Gāllio, L. Annaeus Sēneca, and M. Annaeus Mella. In most authors we find M. Annaeus Sēneca called Sēneca the Rhetorician, probably to distinguish him from his son L. Annaeus Sēneca, or from a collection which he made of the harangues or declamations of different Rhetoricians, a work mentioned by Quintilianus, and still extant. He removed to Rome when his children were very young, perhaps on account of their education, or with a view to their advancement in after life. His own compilation is chiefly valuable to the student of law. The merits of his son have contributed more to his celebrity than either his own writings, or the collection already mentioned.

M. Annaeus, M. Annaei, m. a son of M. Cārsēdianus, a Roman knight, was adopted by his maternal uncle Sūffēnas, but had been disinherited by his father (Val. Max. vii. 7).

Annia, æ, f. wife of M. Calpurnius Piso, who, in compliance with the will of Sulla, divorced her. She had formerly been the wife of Cina (Vel. Pat. ii. 41).

Annia Rufilla, Anniae Rufillae, f. a woman condemned for fraud (Tac. Ann. iii. 36). Perhaps she is the person mentioned by Suetonius (Octav. 69).

Annidae, arum, m. the descendants of Annus. The family of the Annii produced several illustrious characters, to which Claudianus alludes (l. 9).

Annib, orum, m. a people in the territory of the Sēres (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Anniva, æ, f. Anniba, m, f. a mountain in Scythia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Annus, i, m. a man to whom Mārtialis addresses the 48th Epigram of book vii, and condemns his mode of supping.

Annus Bassus, Annii Bassi, m. a lieutenant-general of the legion of Dalmatians under Poppeus Silvianus, who had the whole direction, and managed matters with great temper and propriety (Tac. Hist. iii. 50).

Annus Faustus, Annii Fausti, m. a Roman knight, who had been an informer under Nēro, for which he was brought before the senate, in the year 70, by Vibius Crispus, whose brother had been put to death through his agency. The violence of the accuser benefited Annus Faustus, who, although at last condemned, did not suffer that disgrace which his criminality merited (Tac. Hist. ii. 10).

Annus Gāllus, Annii Gālli, m. a commander of some distinction under Otho, and afterwards under Vespasianus (Tac. Hist. i. 87 &c.).

Annus Pōllio, Annii Pōllionis, m. a Roman accused of treason under the Emperor Tiberius, and acquitted. He afterwards entered into a conspiracy against Nēro, if confidence can be placed in the declaration of his intimate friend Sēneca, and was banished from suspicion, says Tacitus, rather than conviction. He was the husband of Sērvilla q. v. (Ann. vi. 9—xvi. 30).

L. Annus, L. Annii, m. a Latin praetor, who urged his countrymen to revolt against the Romans unless one of the consuls in future, and half the senate were Latins. The justice of this measure he vindicated before the senate with great boldness in 339 B. C., and, being treated with disdain, he rushed in great wrath out of the house, and falling on the stairs received a severe stroke on the head, which, according to some, deprived him of life, and, according to others, only of sense for a time (Liv. viii. 3—6).—2. A tribune of the people, who made a vigorous effort to retain his office after the expiry of the legal term. P. Licinius Lucillus, one of his colleagues, joined him in this attempt to break through established usages, and that in opposition to all the other tribunes of the people. Of the feeble administration of the laws at Rome, it is scarcely necessary to produce any other proof than merely to state, that the struggle of these two, not only unsupported either by law or precedent, but in open violation of both, prevented the election of the other magistrates during a whole year (Sul. Jug. 37).

L. Annus Antoninus Vērus, L. Annii Antonini Vēri, m. whose original name was Commōdus, son of T. Antoninus Pius, brother by adoption of M. Aurēlius Antoninus Pius, and afterwards his son-in-law, whom that Emperor associated with him in the government, and then, for the first time, says Eutropius, did the Roman empire obey two conducting the administration with equal right. They carried on war against the Parthians, who had been conquered by Trājanus, and then rebelled. L. Annus Antoninus Vērus went to that war, where, by his generals, he performed great things, took Seleucia, and, returning to Rome, triumphed with the other Emperor. He died of apoplexy in Vēnētia, Venice, in the eleventh year of his reign, and was ranked among the gods (Enrop. viii. 9, 10).

Q. Annlus, Q. Annli, m. a man of senatorial rank, who entered into the conspiracy against the state formed by L. Sargius Cutilia. He effected his escape, when some of the other traitors were apprehended; and it does not appear that he suffered the punishment decreed against him, from which it may be inferred, that he eluded the search of the agents of government (Sal. Cat. 17).

T. Annlus, T. Annli, m. with C. Lutatius, and C. Serrilius, was appointed to settle a colony at Placentia, Placenza, in 220 B. C. The Belli treacherously made them prisoners, and it is probable Annlus died in slavery. There is some doubt about his name (Liv. xli. 25).—2. Of consular dignity, keenly opposed the laws of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, tribune of the people, for which he was dragged before the commons, where he continued to inveigh against that turbulent tribune, 135 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 58).

T. Annlus Luscius, T. Annli Lusci, m. sent an ambassador with other two, to Perses, king of Macedonia, in 174 B. C., to demand restitution and renounce the king's friendship, unless he obeyed the order of the senate. Their answer from that monarch, as well as the preparations they had seen making in his territories for war, inflamed the resentment of their countrymen, and the result was the destruction of the Macedonian kingdom. The senate afterwards appointed him a triumvir for planting a colony at Avellana (Liv. xlii. 25 seq.).

T. Annlus Milo, T. Annli Milonis, m. was born at Laniavium. He attempted to obtain the office of consul; but was strongly opposed by his inveterate enemy P. Clodius Pulcher. Happening to meet in the Appian road, at no great distance from Rome, a scuffle took place between their servants, who well knew the mutual hatred subsisting between their masters. In this fray Clodius was wounded, conducted to a neighbouring inn, and despatched by order of Milo. In revenge to his killing Clodius, Juvénalis calls him a homicide (Sat. ii. 26). For this crime he was brought to trial, and, though defended by the eloquence of Cicero, his old and intimate friend, was condemned to banishment, and went to Massilia, Marseilles. He returned at the commencement of the Civil war, in which he joined M. Caelius Rufus, and attempted to raise an army of fugitives, pretending that he acted under the authority of Pompeius, and was killed by a stroke of a stone at Compsa, Conza, a town of the Hirpini, near the source of Aufidus, the Ofanto (Cass. B. C. iii. 21 seq.).

Annus, i. m. a year. Römulus divided the year into ten months, the first of which he called Martius, in honour of his supposed father Mars, the god of war; the 2d, Aprilis, either from the Greek name of Venus, or from the verb aperire, because plants and flowers then begin to open; the 3d, Maia, after one of the daughters of Atlas, who was the mother of Mercury; or from respect to the goddess Mayores; the 4th, Junius, from Jāna, the queen of the gods, or from Juniōres, the young; the 5th, Quintilis; the 6th, Sexilis; the 7th, September; the 8th, October; the 9th, November; and the 10th, December; from the place which these six held in the year. Quintilis was afterwards called Julius, to flatter the vanity of the first Roman Emperor, and Sextilis, Augustus, in honour of his successor. The Roman names have been adopted in this country with little variation. It is difficult to discover the principle on which Römulus proceeded with regard to the length of his months, as each exceeded a lunation, and varied in the number of days which they contained. March had 31, April 30, May 31, June 30, July 31, August 30, September 30, October 31, November 30, and December 30; which amount to 304. The solar year exceeds that of Römulus by 61 days. To reconcile it, in some measure, to the course of the sun, he added to the end of the year, intercalary days, probably about 50; but their exact number is not known.

Nūma Pōmpilius, the successor of Römulus, amongst other improvements, undertook the reformation of the Calendar. From each of the months, which had 30 days, he took one, and of these and the intercalary days he composed two new months, one of 27 days, and the other of 29 days, to which he gave the names of Jānuārius and Febrūārius, the former from Jānus, the god of the year; and the latter from the obsolete verb Febrūāre, to perform purifications, and sacrifices in honour of the dead. He made January the first month of the year, March the second, April the third, &c. and February the last. At a later period, that king added one day to January, of course his year then contained 355 days, which exceeds the Lunar year fifteen hours. To correct this error, he ordered that 24 days should be struck out of every 24th year. This injunction proceeded on the idea that his year was one day too long, which was not the truth. Had that really been the fact, it would have been more accurate to have shortened the year one day; but great as his mind was, it is no improbable conjecture, that he adopted the number 355, from some superstitious notion, which he did not choose to communicate. That he knew nearly the exact difference between the Solar and Lunar year, cannot be doubted, since he ordered 90 days to be intercalated in eight years. Now the Solar surpasses the Lunar year $11\frac{1}{2}$, which in eight years amounts to ninety days. These he ordered to be thrown into the even years, i. e. 2d, 4th, 6th, and 8th, in months of 22 and 23 days alternately. These days exceeding the truth upwards of one day every year, he ordered that in each third period of eight years only 66 days should be inserted. This correction brought him within five hours of the truth in 24 years, which is a wonderful degree of accuracy, considering the remote and barbarous age in which he lived. The insertion of the intercalary days depended on the priests, who, through ignorance or unjustifiable partiality, either to favour their friends or injure their enemies, omitted them or not, as best suited their private purposes.

The year of Nūma continued without alteration until 452 B. C., when the arrangement of the months underwent a slight change, by order of the Decemviri. These haughty tyrants continued January the first month of the year, according to Nūma's appointment, but made February the second month, March the third, &c. an arrangement which has been adopted by all the nations of modern Europe.

The confusion introduced into the Kalendar, by the downright stupidity or wilful perversity of the Priests, continued until reformed by Julius Caesar, 46 B. C. To bring the months to their proper places in the year, as had been fixed by Numa, he caused the year above mentioned to consist of 445 days, which was called the year of confusion. His object was to regulate the year, not by the changes of the moon, but by the course of the sun. To exhaust the 10 days which Numa's year was too short, he added two days to January, two to August, two to September, one to April, one to June, one to December, and one to November. Had the solar year consisted of 365 days exactly, nothing further was necessary. But as it contains 365d. 5h. 48m. 45s. seconds, he decreed that the 24th February, or 6th of the Kalends of March, should be reckoned twice every 4th year. Hence it was called bis sextilis; with us leap year, because in that year the Dominical letter with which the year begins, is changed after the 29th of February.

The Kalendar, as established by Julius Caesar, does not deviate from the truth above one day in 100 years. Against this error he had not made any provision, conceiving, most probably, that the year consisted of 365 days and six hours. This mistake rendered a further reformation necessary, for which we stand indebted to Pope Gregory XIII. He published his Kalendar in the year 1582, and all the Catholic Countries instantly adopted it. Ten days were sunk, after the 4th October. The 5th was called the 15th. But 1600th being leap year by this new reformation, after the commencement of the 17th Century, the difference became 11 days. An Act of Parliament passed in Britain, 1752, that the year should, instead of 25th March, begin with the first day of January, that the Gregorian Kalendar should be adopted, and that the 3d of September should be called 14th. Hence a new and old style. No European nation now calculates by the old style, except Russia. Every 400th year is to be leap year, and the intervening three not. Hence 1600th was bissextile, 1700th, and 1800th were not, which renders the difference now 12 days. The 1900th will not be leap year; but 2000th, 2400th, 2800th, &c. will. In this respect only does the Gregorian differ from the Julian Kalendar.

The Hebrew and Grecian year, like that of Numa, was lunar. Other nations of antiquity formed theirs in the same manner. This naturally resulted from the great facility with which 12 lunations could be calculated, in comparison of determining precisely the time that elapses from the sun's departure from any fixed star in the Ecliptic, until he return to it again. According to Tacitus, the only divisions of the year known among the Germans, were spring, summer, and winter. The name and benefit of autumn they were entirely ignorant of (Tac. Mor. Ger. 26). Magnus et vterus annus, the period during which all the heavenly bodies are found exactly in the same position in the same day of the year (Tac. Orat. 16).

Ανῶπα, æ, f. a mountain, through which the river Asopus flows. Of the same name is the path which is continued the whole length of the mountain, and terminates at the town Alpēni (Herod. vii. 216).

Ansibarii, orum, m. the Ansibarians, a German nation, whom the Chaucians forced from their native land, which appears to have lain between Amisus, the Emis, and Rhēnus, the Rhine. Boioculus was their chief, who, having refused the offer of Avitus, prepared for war. Deserted by the states, whose assistance they solicited, and rejected by those whose protection they sought, the Ansibarians, as a nation, perished. After the Romans had put to the sword all able to carry arms, they sold the rest for slaves (Tac. Ann. xiii. 55, 56).

Antabagius, i, m. the guide under whom Tiberius hastened to Germany, to see his brother, about 10 B. C. (Val. Max. v. 5).

Antæus, i, m. a commander who fought in the first line of the army of Turnus, and who seems to have fled from Æneas (Virg. Æn. x. 561).—2. A giant of prodigious size, king of Africa Tingitana, whom Hércules killed. As Antæus was a son of Terra, Hércules no sooner brought him to the ground than he acquired from his mother additional strength, and, therefore, he lifted him up in his arm and killed him by squeezing his throat, which prevented respiration. To this Ovidius elegantly alludes (Met. ix. 184). He is also described by Propertius (iii. 22. 10) and Juvénalis (Sat. iii. 89). Gábinus, a Roman historian, quoted by Strabo, relates that in his tomb at Lixs, a town in Mauritania, Morocco and Fez, Sertorius found a skeleton sixty cubits long, which he buried again. The geographer mentions it as a fiction, and truth requires that it be considered in no other light (1171).

Antänder, dri, m. a brother of Agathocles, who gained a complete victory over the Catthaginians in Sicily, whilst that tyrant destroyed their armies on their own territories (Just. xxii. 7).

Antándrus, i, f. Antandro, a city of the Troad belonging to the Lélæges, according to Alcaeus, on Sinus Adramyttēnus, the Bay of Adramitti, and over it was the mountain Aléxandria, on which Páris decided the controversy respecting the golden apple (Strab. 872). As in later times a city of very considerable note stood here, Virgilius, with propriety, makes Æneas build his ships in this convenient and celebrated place (Æn. iii. 6).

Antæa, æ, f. wife of Prætus, called by some Stêñôbœa q. e. (Hom. Il. vi. 160).

Antebrogus, i, m. a man of great influence amongst the Rēmi, who was sent ambassador to Caesar in the second year of the Gallia war (Cæs. B. G. ii. 8).

Anteus, i, m. one of the three appointed by Germānicus to build a fleet, with the view of carrying the war into the very heart of Germany, in the year 16 (Tac. Ann. ii. 6).

P. Anteius, P. Antei, m. was appointed governor of Syria, but by various artifices, deprived of that province and detained at Rome. Antistius Sōlānus, who knew that P. Anteius had contracted a friendship with Pammēnes, an exile distinguished for his knowledge of the Chaldean art, and that the Emperor Néro hated Anteius on account of his love for Agrippina, accused him of treason, on which Anteius took poison that operated and to accelerate his end he opened it in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 14).

Antēma, arum, f. a town Sabines, which had this name from the same side with Rome of Anio, ante anionem, near the junction stream with Tiber, the Tevere. A vestige now remains to mark the which it stood. Silius Italicus says, more ancient than Crustumērium (5). Antēmnates, ium, m. war on the Romans for carrying off daughters, but were defeated by Rō who took their town. Hērclia, the Rōmulus, at the request of the re-entreated her husband to pardon hers and admit them into the state. Reasonable demand the conqueror granted (Liv. i. 9, 11).

Antenor, oris, acc. ōra, m. a Trojan prince, called Thēano, the sister of Hēcūba, Priāmus, the last of the Trojan kings. Ovidius alludes (Met. xiii. After the destruction of his country to Italy, and built a city, called Antea, f. in honour of its founder, on is of Pādus, the Po, whence it was called Pātāvium, now Padua. says that Antenor and Ēnēas, from connexion of hospitality, and from being always been the advisers of the restoration of Hēlēna, were freed from all the cruelties which the exercised towards the surviving Trojans. Some ancient authors accuse both of kept a secret correspondence with the and of having betrayed Troy into hands. But this accusation other of equal respectability maintain is and groundless. It is probable that has considered the charge just, since is that a leopard's skin hung over the was the signal that the Greeks in the of the city should not injure the Antenor (x. 27). Tacitus calls him Antenor, and adds that he instilled cōstici (Ann. xvi. 21). Antenor, is, m. a son of Antenor, or an inhabitant Antenorēa. Adj. Antenorēus, a, Antenorēus Timaeus, from his settling neighbourhood of that river (Luc. ii. 194).—2. A prefect of the fleet of a king of Macēdōnia, in 170 B. C. lying at Phasus when the news of at of Pērsēs reached him, and he crossed to Cāsīndria (Liv. xlv. 28).

Antea, is, f. afterwards called Thyrēa Helenopolis, a city on the sea coast to Agamēmoon, which, with this, he promised to Achilles, if he to the war (Hom. Il. ix. 151).

Antea, is, f. Anthedona, a city of which had its name from Anthēdon, Jupiter and Anthē. Others derive from the Greek word signifying a. Hōmērus mentions that Glaucus, afterwards became a sea god, was a native town (Il. ii. 508). Adj. Antea, a, um. Anthedōnius hospes, (Stat. Th. ix. 328).—2. A city of is, not far from Gaza, Gazzara, but laid (Plin. i. 366).

Antea, is, f. a town at the Straits of Thermōpyle. Here were the seats of the Amphictyōnes (Herod. vii. 176 seq.).

Anthēmion, ōnis, m. a Trojan. Anthēmides, contracted for Anthēmionides, is, m. Simōisius q. v. (Hom. Il. iv. 488).

Anthēmūsia, is, f. an extensive district or country of Persia (Eutrop. viii. 3). It formed part of Mēsōpōtāmia, Al-jezirah. Plinius and Tacitus make it a town, hence, perhaps, it may at one period have been the capital, and gave name to the district in which it stood; but the chief city seems to have been Batnē. Tacitus writes Anthēmūsias, ūdis, adopting the Greek form (Ann. vi. 41).

Anthēus, ēs, m. a Trojan, who accompanied Ēnēas to Lātium, and was with him in the last engagement with Tūrnus (Virg. Ēn. xii. 443).—2. A man in the army of Pōlōnices, severely wounded when surveying the walls of Thēbe, Theba (Stat. Th. x. 538).

Anthrōpophagi, orum, m. a people of Scythia, who lived towards the eastern part of Siberia (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 2). They had their name from eating human flesh, and were found in different parts of the ancient world, both in India and Africa. To the east of the Ganges these cannibals inhabited a considerable tract of country, and people of the same kind possessed the more southern parts of Ethiopia. Hērōdōtus says they are not Scythian (iv. 18).

Anthylla, is, f. a town of Egypt, always assigned as part of the revenues of the queen, chiefly for the purpose of providing her with sandals (Herod. ii. 98).

Antias, is, m. a Grecian nobleman (Pin. Nem. x. 74).

Antias Restio, Antias Restionis, m. a Roman, whose life was preserved during the proscription by the affection of one of his slaves (Val. Max. vi. 8).

Anticāto, ōnis, m. used by Juvēnalis in an indelicate sense in reference to Caesar, because he had vitiated Servilla, a sister of Cāto, and also because he had written a book against Cicero's treatise, Cāto, under the title of Anticāto, which, from being divided into two parts, rendered it proper to use the word in the plural. It is probable the poet intended Anticātōnes, to include the two books, and also the impure conception to which the ancient form of books bore some resemblance (Sat. vi. 337).

Anticlēa, is, f. daughter of Autōlēus, and mother of Ulysses. Grief on account of his long absence at Troy occasioned her death; but it does not appear certain that she strangled herself, according to the traditional account. This mistake proceeds from the expression used by Eumēus (Hom. Od. xv. 355 seq.). Ulysses converses with her shade in the infernal regions (Hom. Od. xi. 84).

Anticles, is, m. a royal youth (Curt. viii. 6).

Anticles, i, m. a Grecian, one of them included in the wooden horse, and the only one who answered to the voice of Hēlēna, who imitated the speech of each of the wives of the Grecian leaders (Hom. Od. iv. 286).

Antleragum, i, n. a very strong fort in Cilicia, which the pirates surrendered to Pompey without resistance (Ap. Bel. Mith. 238).

Anticyra, æ, f. Aspro-Spitia, a town of Locris on Sinus Corinthiacus, the Gulf of Lepanto, anciently called Anticirra, from its situation opposite to Cirrha, of which Anticyra is a contraction, but Pausanias derives the name from Anticyreus, who was of the same age with Hércules, and adds, that its ancient name was Cyparissus (x. 36). M. Valérius Lævinus, propretor, took it in a few days, and gave it up to the Ætolians in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 26). Pausanias says that two kinds of hellebore grow in its neighbourhood, black which acted as a laxative, and white as an emetic. Inh. Anticyrenses, ium, m. (Herod. vii. 214).—2. Another on Sinus Miliacus, the Gulf of Zeiton (Strab. 606). Tribus Anticyris, by three Anticyre (Hor. Art. Poet. 300). Only two cities of this name are mentioned in ancient authors. Perhaps the poet had only one in his eye, and meant that three times the quantity of hellebore which Anticyra in Locris (that being best known to the Romans,) produced, would not effect a cure. This conjecture receives some support from his mentioning only one in other places, and there can be little doubt of his alluding to that of Locris (Sat. ii. 3. 83—166). The editor of Hörätius in usum Delphini mistakes these towns for islands, and commentators in general, from the language of Horace, state there were three islands of this name, than which nothing can be more remote from the truth.

Antigones, is, m. a shepherd (Virg. B. v. 89).—2. A general of Alexander the Great, whom he dismissed in his old age (Just. xii. 12). If the same man mentioned by Curtius, his merits as a soldier must have been remarkable (v. 2 seq.).

Antigénidas, æ, m. a Theban musician, with whose playing the people were one day offended, and he in the hearing of all, said "I sing to myself and the muses" (Val. Max. iii. 7).

Antigöna, æ (Prop. ii. 8. 21) v. Antigöne, es, f. daughter of Cédipus, king of Thēbae, Theba, by his mother Iocasta. She showed her filial affection for her father by attending him when blind, after Crēon her maternal uncle had driven him from his native country. Stätius introduces her standing on a Theban tower, attended by Phorbas, formerly armour-bearer to Lailus, and who gives her an account of the allies who came to the assistance of the Thebans. In this natural manner, the poet makes his readers acquainted with the characters of the Theban, as he had formerly done of the Argive chiefs (Th. vii. 247—253). Crēon ordered Antigöne to be buried alive, because she had interred her brother Pölyüices contrary to his orders, but she prevented the execution of that sentence by killing herself. Apöllödörus states, that she was thrown alive into the same grave with her brother (iii. 5 seq.). Her lover, Hæmon, put himself to death at her tomb (Prop. ii. 8. 21). Respecting the history of Antigöne, ancient writers are not agreed, and consequently different authors give different accounts. Stätius makes her accompany her father into banishment after the Theban war (Th. xi. 708 seq.).—2. The name of a tragedy written by Söphöcles (Juv. Sat. viii. 229). Euripides composed another on the same subject, which is lost.—3. Daughter of Låömédon, king of Tröja, whom Jüno transformed into a stork, because she dared to vie with her in beauty (Ov. Met. vi. 93). Sërvius on Virgilius says, that, presuming on her long hair, she dared to compare herself with Jüno.

Antigöna, æ, f. Iznik, a town of Måcëdönia, on the east coast of Sinus Thermaicus (Liv. xlv. 10). Inh. Antigönenses, ium (Sing. Antigönensis, is), m. Adj. Antigönensis, is, e. Antigönensis ager (Liv. xliii. 23). There were other four cities of this name, one in Epirus, another in Arcädia, in Bithynia, and in Syria.

Antigönia, æ, f. Argyro Castro, a town of Chåönia in Epirus, written also Antigöna, ut supra (Liv. xxxii. 5).

Antigöus, i, m. one of the generals of Alexänder the Great. He survived the death of that monarch, and, like the other officers of the same rank, he received a part of his conquests. Pämphylia, Phrygia, and Lycia fell to his lot, and his valour soon added the whole of Asia Minor to his dominion. Justinus calls him a son of Philippus, and says that he obtained Phrygia Major (xiii. 4). His military talents surpassed those of the adjoining princes, and he formed alliances which enabled him to execute measures beyond his own strength. Antipäter and Ptolémæus joined him in the overthrow of Përdiccas, and afterwards he conquered Eumēnes, whom he ordered to be starved to death. Cassander next yielded to the superiority of his arms, and the victory which his son Dëmëtrius gained over the fleet of Ptolémæus, near the island Cypus, induced that monarch to unite with Cassander, Lysimachus, and Sëleucus for his destruction, which, after various engagements, they had the satisfaction of seeing accomplished, by the wounds which he received in battle, in 301 B. C. His son already mentioned, lost his Asiatic territory, and afterwards obtained the kingdom of Måcëdönia, which his descendants retained until finally conquered by the Romans. He assumed the title of king on his victory obtained at Cypus, and the other generals of Alexander followed his example (Cor. Nep. Reg. 3).—2. Son of Dëmëtrius and grandson of Antigöus, surnamed Gönåtas. Përrhus overpowered him, seized on his kingdom, and compelled him to quit the country. After the death of his conqueror, Antigöus Gönåtas again obtained possession of Måcëdönia, which he retained during his lifetime, and, at his death, left to his son Dëmëtrius. This prince reigned thirty-four years, and died in 243 B. C. (Just. xxiv. 1.—xxvi. 2).—3. Antigöus the third, brother of Dëmëtrius the second, was left guardian to his nephew Philippus. Disregarding the principles of justice, he usurped the kingdom of his nephew, and married the widow of his brother the late king. From promising readily, but seldom fulfilling, he received the surname of Döson, or, Dütürus. The bravery of this usurper, and his success in war, entitle him to commendation, and his name appears to advantage in the pages of the historian. After a reign of twelve years, he died in 221 B. C., when the crown reverted to its lawful possessor. To him Tåctus alludes (Ann. iv. 43).—4. Son of Echecrætes, and nephew of Antigöus surnamed Döson. In the battle which he fought against resistance against the Roman land forces, he was anxious to effect something by sea; but here his inferiority was so marked that it sunk his spirits, and he ordered the garrison to withdraw from Lysimachia, the only town in his possession, which might have held out against the Romans during the whole winter, as well as distressed the troops for want of provisions. Peace alone could save his forces and kingdom. L. Cornélius Scipio, the consul, and his brother Africānus, rejected his proposals, which no doubt appeared to him sufficiently humiliating, and rather than make greater concessions he resolved to try the fate of a battle. The contending armies came to a decisive engagement at Thyātra, when Roman bravery secured a most honorable victory, and placed Antiochus at the mercy of the conquerors (Liv. xxxi. 14—xxxvii. 55). According to Justinus, he was killed, after a reign of thirty-six years, in an attack upon the temple of Jūpter in Elymais, in 187 B. C., to which he had been prompted either by covetousness, or to obtain money, on purpose to pay the heavy tax imposed on him by the Romans (xxix. 1—xxxii. 102). Aurélius Victor writes that he was killed by his companions (Vir. Il. 54), and the writer of Maccabees, that he died a natural death.—6. Son of the former, a youth of great promise, whose early death was more regretted, that suspicion was entertained of his being taken off by poison, 195 B. C. Lāvius seems to insinuate that it was not without the knowledge of his father, for which he gives several reasons (xxxv. 15).—7. Son of Antiochus Magnū, surnamed Epiphānes (i. e. rising star), because when aliens to the royal blood were about to seize on the throne of Sýria, he appeared like an auspicious star to maintain his right; but he afterwards behaved in such a foolish manner that they called him Epimānes, i. e. madman. Lāvius has recorded several of his follies. Knowing the covetousness of the Romans, and anxious to renew the treaty, he presented them with golden vessels of five hundred pounds weight, requested that they might make any demand on his services which they pleased, and paid the whole of the tribute, that the sum paid annually which had been for some time due, might not render it necessary for him again to trespass on their indulgence. Of the conditions of the new treaty we have no account. In Egypt he carried on war against the younger Ptolēmaeus and his sister Clēopātra, on pretence of restoring the elder Ptolēmaeus to the crown. These brothers were sons of the elder sister of Antiochus. To the Roman ambassadors sent to command the termination of hostilities, he refused compliance unless he received the island Cýprus and the town Pélusium, which was considered the key of Egypt. C. Pōpillius Lēnas, one of the second embassy, refused him time for consideration, insisted on an immediate answer, and, drawing a circle round him with the rod which he had in his hand, said, "Before you go out of this ring, give me such an answer as I can report to the Roman senate." Antiochus immediately replied, "I shall comply with the requisitions of the senate." He died in 164 B. C., and was succeeded by his son Antiochus V., surnamed Eupātor, whom Dēmētrius, son of

Sēlēucus, who had been a hostage at Rome, put to death with his tutor Lýsias, and then ascended the throne, in 162 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 46).—8. (VI.) Son of Alexander Bala, was killed by Trypho in 142 B. C., after a reign of two years (Just. xxxvi. 1).—9. (VII.) Surnamed Evērgētes, or, Sidētes, or, brother of Dēmētrius II., overcame Trypho, whom he drove from the kingdom, and then ascended the throne. Having married Clēopātra, his brother's widow, he took up arms, conquered the states which had revolted under his brother, and reduced to subjection the Jews, who had acquired so great power, says Justinus, that they submitted to no king after him, infested Sýria with great wars, and appointed their own governors.—This prince made preparations for war on the Parthians, took possession of Bābýlon, and advanced against that nation with a profusion of gold and silver which almost exceeds belief. Three hundred thousand scullions, chiefly cooks, bakers, and comedians, attended an army of eighty thousand men. Even the kitchen utensils were silver. A number of eastern monarchs delivered themselves and their kingdoms to Antiochus, from hatred of Parthian pride. Victorious in three engagements, he occupied Bābýlon, began to be accounted great, and all the nations revolted to him; but, quartering the soldiers in different towns in consequence of their great number, the inhabitants became discontented, rejoined the Parthians, and Antiochus fell in the first engagement with Phrātēs, who honoured his remains with the funeral ceremonies of royalty, in 130 B. C. (Just. xxxvi. 1—xxxviii. 10).—10. (VIII.) Surnamed Grýpus, on account of the largeness of his nose, son of Dēmētrius II., ascended the throne of Sýria in 125 B. C., by the efforts of his mother, who had put to death his brother Sēlēucus, because he had assumed the crown without her authority. This ambitious woman gave the nominal sovereignty to her son, while she retained the supreme power to herself. Grýpus having received auxiliaries from the king of Egypt, who gave him his daughter Tryphæna in marriage, soon overcame his rival, Alexander Zēbēma, and secured himself in his father's kingdom. His mother afterwards attempted to cut him off by poison, of which he received previous notice, refused to take the cup from her hands, and compelled her to drink it. In his brother Philōpātor, who had been brought up at Cýzicus, he had a rival for the crown. To decide the contest they had recourse to arms; but Justinus has not stated the result (xxxix. 1, 2).—11. (IX.) Son of Antiochus Evērgētes, by the widow of his brother Dēmētrius II., and maternal brother of Antiochus Grýpus, was brought up at Cýzicus, hence called Cýzicēnus, and engaged in war with his brother, who consented to his possessing a part of the kingdom. In private life his conduct commanded high respectability, yet on the throne he possessed neither dignity nor esteem. To prevent his continuing in the power of Sēlēucus, by whom he had been conquered, he put an end to his own life, in 95 B. C. (Just. xxxix. 2, 3).—After the death of this monarch, different usurpers obtained a temporary possession of the Sýrian throne, all taking the name of Antiochus. In 68 B. C. Antiochus XIII., surnamed Aslāticus, son of Antiochus Cyzicenus, according to Justinus (xi. 2), and according to others, the grandson, obtained the kingdom through L. Licinius Lucullus. Four years after, Cn. Pompeius Magnus reduced the whole country to a Roman province, deposing this monarch, and with him the family of Antiochus became extinct.—12. Surnamed Cōmāgēnus, from his being king of Cōmāgēna, a district of Syria, on the Euphrātes, who was under great obligations to Pompey, and sent him, during the civil war, 200 men, most of whom were archers who fought on horseback.—13. Another king of the same name and country, who died in the year 17, when the nation divided, some preferring the government of the Romans, and others a monarchy (Tac. Ann. ii. 42).—14. An inept barber, whom Mārtiālis holds up to ridicule (xi. 85).—15. A king of Cilicia, who obtained part of Armenia, and sent reinforcements to Vespasianus in the year 71. His name occurs in the writings of Tacitus, but that historian mentions few particulars respecting this monarch (Tac. Ann. xii. 25 &c.). Adj. Antiochenus, et, Antiochēnus, a, um. Antiochēna pēcūnia (Gel. iv. 18). Antiochinum bellum (Vel. Pat. ii. 39).

—Antiope, es, f. daughter of Nycteus and Polycus, was the wife of Lycus, king of Thebes, Theba, by whom she was divorced, because Epaphus, by stratagem, had violated her. To Jupiter she had afterwards twin sons, Zethus and Amphion, before whose birth she escaped from the chains and imprisonment in which Dirce, then wife of Lycus, from jealousy had confined her. She fled to Citheron, Elatis, but her pains came upon her, and she bore them where two roads meet, hence their names. On their reaching manhood, they avenged the cruelty of Dirce to their mother, by tying her by the hair of the head to the tail of a wild bull, which dragged her over the country and occasioned her death. Apollodorus gives a different account. According to him, Antiope, when pregnant by Jupiter, to escape the threats of her father, fled to Sicyon to Epopeus, who married her. Lycus, at the order of Nycteus, made war on Epopeus, took his capital, killed himself, and carried off Antiope, who, on the way, bore her sons at Eleutherae in Boeotia, and then exposed them. A shepherd found the twins and brought them up. Lycus, and his wife Dirce, tormented Antiope, whom they kept in chains, from which she at last effected her escape, and fled to her sons, who espoused her cause, killed Lycus, and put Dirce to death, as already narrated. They threw Dirce into a spring after she was dead, which afterwards was known by her name (iii. 5 seq.). Antiope Nyctēos, Antiope, daughter of Nycteus (Prop. iii. 15. 12).—2. A queen of the Amazons, and sister of Orthylia (Just. ii. 4).

—Antiochemus, i, m. the father of Musaeus (Orph. 308).

—Antipater, tri, m. a friend and general, first of Philip, king of Macedonia, and afterwards of his son, Alexander the Great, whom that monarch appointed governor of Macedonia, when he went to the conquest of India. The fidelity and judgment with which he discharged his duty showed, that Alexander had a just opinion of his character, notwithstanding certain surmises which had been raised against him. The other states of Greece considered the absence of Alexander a proper time for accomplishing their deliverance from subjection to his domination, and, therefore, advanced against the governor, who gained a complete victory over them, and Agis, king of Sparta, lost his life. According to some, jealousy induced Alexander to deprive him of his government and order him to come to Persia, with the view of being brought to trial. Knowing that Alexander had cut off some of his best friends, either from unreasonable suspicion or uncontrolled passion, Antipater preserved his own life by instigating his sons, then at court, to poison their own sovereign. Others with more probability ascribe the death of that conqueror to excess in drinking, and assert that Antipater had received orders to bring reinforcements to his prince. On the death of that monarch he obtained the government of Macedonia and Greece. The Greeks, anxious to be delivered from the Macedonian yoke, raised powerful reinforcements, defeated Antipater in Thessaly, and even besieged him in Lamia. The death of Leosthenes proved fatal to the cause of liberty, and Antipater not only retained his whole possessions, but transmitted them to his successor, Polyperchon, to the prejudice of his son Cassander q. v. (Cor. Nep. Eum. 2. Just. ix. 4 seq.).—2. An officer under Alexander the Great, who entered into a conspiracy with Anticles, Asclepiodorus, Elaptonius, Epimenes, Nicostatus, and Philotas against the life of that monarch in 328 B. C. (Curt. viii. 6).—3. The second son of Cassander and Thessalonica, and grandson of Antipater, who, after the death of his father and elder brother, succeeded to the crown of Macedonia, and was detested by the people in consequence of having murdered his own mother. He married Eurydice, daughter of Lysimachus, who put him to death, thus revenging one act of parricide by another (Just. xvi. 1, 2).—4. Son of a brother of Antiochus, king of Syria, who, with Seleucus, the son of that monarch, commanded the left wing in the battle of Thyatira, in which Antiochus was conquered in 192 B. C. He was at the head of the embassy sent by the Syrian monarch to form a treaty with the Romans, which was concluded in the capitol (Liv. xxxvii. 41–55).

—5. Governor of the coast of Hellaspontus, at the time Leonorius and Lutarius, chieftains of the Gauls, crossed into Asia. Under pretence of an embassy, he sent some Macedonians, with two-decked ships, and three skiffs, to act as spies. Lutarius seized the vessels, and in them carried over his army (Liv. xxxviii. 16).

—6. A general of Perses, king of Macedonia, killed in battle in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 66).

—7. A philosopher and poet of Sidon, who had a wonderful facility at writing verse. Of his poetic compositions, a few epigrams only remain. Under him Cato Uticensis studied. From his birth he was seized with fever annually on the same day, by the last he was cut off (Cic. de Orat. iii. 50 &c. Val. Max. i. 8). Antiochia, ad, et Antiochia ad.

—Antipatria, es, f. Kardiki, a town of Myrleum, situated in a narrow vale, which the Roman consul, P. Sulpicius Galba, took by assault and burned in 202 B. C., after putting the young men to the sword and giving the plunder to his soldiers (Liv. xxxi. 27).

Antiphānes, is, m. a man in the army of Alexander the Great (Curt. vii. 1).

Antiphātes, a, m. a reputed son of Sarpēdon, killed by Turnus. His mother was a native of Thēbē, a city of Mýsia, at the foot of the mountain Pliēus; hence Thēbanā de matre (Virg. Æn. ix. 697).—2. A warrior on the side of Troy, killed by Lēontēus (Hom. Il. xii. 191).—3. A king of the Laestrygōnes, who was a descendant of Lāmus, and the founder of Formiæ, Mola. Ulysses, when he arrived on that coast after the Trojan war, sent Achēmēnides, and other two of his men, to that monarch, who devoured one, Achēmēnides and the other escaped. He then attacked the ships, and sunk them all in the sea, except that in which Ulysses sailed (Ov. Met. xiv. 234–249. Hom. Od. x. 103 seq.). Dōmus Antiphātæ (Ov. Met. xv. 717). Crēntus Antiphātes (Stat. Syl. i. 3. 85).

Antiphīlus, i, m. a prætor of the Boeotians, who met T. Quinctius Flāminius at some distance from Thēbæ, probably with the view of procuring favourable terms from the Romans. By an artful manœuvre Quinctius obtained possession of the city, formed a treaty with the inhabitants, and advanced against Philippos, whom he defeated at Cynōcephālæ, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 1).—2. A general under Pērsēs, king of Mæcēdōnia, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51). He was a native of Edessa.

Antiphon, ōtis, m. a native of Rhamnūsia, equally distinguished for his eloquence and caution. Annianus Marcellinus says that he was the first who received pay for his oratory. Several orations, under his name, are still extant, but their authenticity has been much doubted (xxx. 4).

Antiphōnus, i, m. one of the nine sons of Priāmus, who survived the war. (Hom. Il. xxiv. 250).

Antiphus, i, m. a son of Priāmus, whom Agamemnon killed. Achilles had on Ida made him prisoner, and returned him to his father for a ransom. He was a man of some name (Hom. Il. xi. 101).—2. A grandson of Hērēules, the brother of Phidippus (Hom. Il. ii. 678).—3. A son of Pylāmēnes, who commanded the Mæonians in the Trojan army (Hom. Il. ii. 864).—4. An Ithacan, son of Ægēptus, and companion of Ulysses, killed by the Cyclopēs (Hom. Od. ii. 19 seq.). Hōmērus mentions another Ithacan of this name (Od. xvii. 68).—5. A man in the army of Pōlyuces, overthrown by Hēpseus (Stat. Th. ix. 252).—6. A man in the army of Etēocles, who fought on horseback, and was killed in the Theban war by Amphīarēus (Stat. Th. vii. 755).

Antipōlis, is, f. Antibe, pronounced by the natives Antiboul, a town of Gallia, France, near the mouth of Argentēus, the Argen, built by the Massilians (Tac. Hist. ii. 15). The Transilpini Ligures plundered this town, in consequence of which the consul, Q. Opimius, marched against them, and easily obtained a complete victory, in 156 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 47). Inh. Antipōlitāni, orum, m. Adj. Antipōlitānus, a, um. Antipōlitānus civitas. Antipōlitānus thynnus (Mart. xii. 163).

Antirrhām, i, n. Cape Rumi, the promontory opposite Rhūm, at the entrance into the Gulf of Lepanto.

Antissa, a, f. an island near Lēsbo, Mityleni, afterwards joined to the latter, of which, according to Plinius, it continues to form a part (i. 237).—2. A city in the island Lēsbo. Inh. Antissai, orum, m. were removed to Mēthymna, and their town demolished, because they had received into their harbour Antēnor, commander of the fleet of Pērsēs, when cruising off that island in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 31).—3. An island near Pālus Mæōtis, the Sea of Azoph, in after ages covered by Pontus Euxinus, the Black Sea (Plin. i. 239).

Antistia, a, f. wife of C. Rūbēllius Blandus, who retired with her husband at the suggestion of the Emperor Nēro, to Asia, where he was murdered. She attended her father when he withdrew to the vicinity of Fōrmīæ, Mola, on understanding that Fōrtūnātus, a freedman of his own, assisted by Claudius Dēmīānus q. r., had accused him to the Emperor Nēro. At her father's request, she went to Nēapōlis, Naples, and solicited the Emperor for his life with an importunity and boldness surpassing her sex. From the time her husband was murdered in her presence, she took food only to preserve life, mourned incessantly, at last opened her veins, with her father and grandmother, on which they all expired, the oldest first, the next in age followed, and she last of all (Tac. Ann. xvi. 10, 11). There she is called Pollutia, probably an error of the transcriber. See Rūbēllius.

Antistius, i, m. a tribune of the people, who, with Pōmpilius and M. Cānūleius, brought C. Sēmprōnius Atrātinus to trial a second time, in 419 B. C., for having been defeated in battle by the Volsi, as they pretended; but in reality from spite at his cousin, A. Sēmprōnius Atrātinus (Liv. iv. 44).

Antistius Rūsticus, Antistii Rūstici, m. a Roman, who died, says Mārtiālis, on the cruel coast of the Cāppādōces. The poet describes his death, and the sorrow of his wife Nigrina (ix. 31). This author imputes his death to the unhealthiness of Cāppādōcia, as he does also that of Rūfus (vi. 85), which may account for the epithets applied by him to the country, impia tellus (vi. 85), sæva ora (ix. 31).

Antistius Sōsīānus, Antistii Sōsīāni, m. a tribune of the people banished from Rome in the year 61, for some satirical verses against the Emperor, after he had obtained the prætorship, which entitled him to a seat in the senate. A want of prudence appears in his publishing these verses at a great entertainment in the house of Ostorius Scāpūla q. c. By accusing P. Antēius, he procured his release, which does not appear to have been of long continuance, for the Emperor ordered him and Octāvius Sāgitta to return to the islands, which they had quitted without leave. The manners of Antistius were of the worst kind, and the acquisition of wealth by the detestable employment of an informer, rendered him an object both of fear and contempt at Rome (Tac. Ann. xiii. 28 seq.).

Antistius Tūrpio, Antistii Tūrpiōnis, m. a man of uncommon strength in Pompey's army, who challenged to single combat any one of all Cæsar's forces. Q. Pōmpēius Nigērus, a Roman knight, accepted the challenge:

named Aslāticus, son of Antiochus Cēzīcēus, according to Jūstinus (xl. 2), and according to others, the grandson, obtained the kingdom through L. Licinius Lūcillus. Four years after, Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus reduced the whole country to a Roman province, deposing this monarch, and with him the family of Antiochus became extinct.—12. Surnamed Cōmāgēnus, from his being king of Cōmāgēna, a district of Sýria, on the Euphrātes, who was under great obligations to Pompey, and sent him, during the civil war, 200 men, most of whom were archers who fought on horseback.—13. Another king of the same name and country, who died in the year 17, when the nation divided, some preferring the government of the Romans, and others a monarchy (Tac. Ann. ii. 42).—14. An inept barber, whom Mārtialis holds up to ridicule (xi. 85).—15. A king of Cilicia, who obtained part of Armēnia, and sent reinforcements to Vēspāsianus in the year 71. His name occurs in the writings of Tacitus, but that historian mentions few particulars respecting this monarch (Tac. Ann. xii. 35 &c.). Adj. Antiochēus, et, Antiochēnus, a, um. Antiochēna pēcūnia (Gel. iv. 18). Antiochinum bellum (Vel. Pat. ii. 39).

Antioḗpē, es, f. daughter of Nýctēus and Pōlyxo, was the wife of Lýcus, king of Thēbae, Thēba, by whom she was divorced, because Epāphus, by stratagem, had violated her. To Jūpter she had afterwards twin sons, Zēthus and Amphiōn, before whose birth she escaped from the chains and imprisonment in which Dircē, then wife of Lýcus, from jealousy had confined her. She fled to Citheron, Elatias, but her pains came upon her, and she bore them where two roads meet, hence their names. On their reaching manhood, they avenged the cruelty of Dircē to their mother, by tying her by the hair of the head to the tail of a wild bull, which dragged her over the country and occasioned her death. Apollōdōrus gives a different account. According to him, Antioḗpē, when pregnant by Jūpter, to escape the threats of her father, fled to Sicýon to Epōpēus, who married her. Lýcus, at the order of Nýctēus, made war on Epōpēus, took his capital, killed himself, and carried off Antioḗpē, who, on the way, bore her sons at Eleuthēre in Bœōtiā, and then exposed them. A shepherd found the twins and brought them up. Lýcus, and his wife Dircē, tormented Antioḗpē, whom they kept in chains, from which she at last effected her escape, and fled to her sons, who espoused her cause, killed Lýcus, and put Dircē to death, as already narrated. They threw Dircē into a spring after she was dead, which afterwards was known by her name (iii. 5 &c.). Antioḗpē Nýctēos, Antioḗpē, daughter of Nýctēus (Prop. iii. 15. 12).—2. A queen of the Amazons, and sister of Orithýia (Just. ii. 4).

Antioḗphēnus, i, m. the father of Mūsaeus (Orph. 308).

Antipāter, tri, m. a friend and general, first of Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, and afterwards of his son, Alexander the Great, whom that monarch appointed governor of Mācēdōniā, when he went to the conquest of India. The fidelity and judgment with which he discharged his duty showed, that Alexander had a just opinion of his character, notwithstanding certain surmises which had been raised against him. The other states of Greece considered the absence of Alexander a proper time for accomplishing their deliverance from subjection to his domination, and, therefore, advanced against the governor, who gained a complete victory over them, and Agis, king of Spārtā, lost his life. According to some, jealousy induced Alexander to deprive him of his government and order him to come to Persia, with the view of being brought to trial. Knowing that Alexander had cut off some of his best friends, either from unreasonable suspicion or uncontrolled passion, Antipāter preserved his own life by instigating his sons, then at court, to poison their own sovereign. Others with more probability ascribe the death of that conqueror to excess in drinking, and assert that Antipāter had received orders to bring reinforcements to his prince. On the death of that monarch he obtained the government of Mācēdōniā and Greece. The Greeks, anxious to be delivered from the Macedonian yoke, raised powerful reinforcements, defeated Antipāter in Thessaly, and even besieged him in Lāmia. The death of Lēōsthēnes proved fatal to the cause of liberty, and Antipāter not only retained his whole possessions, but transmitted them to his successor, Pōlypērchon, to the prejudice of his son Cassander q. v. (Cor. Nep. Eum. 2. Just. ix. 4 &c.).—2. An officer under Alexander the Great, who entered into a conspiracy with Anticles, Asclepiōdōrus, Eliaptonius, Epimēnes, Nicōstrātus, and Philōtas against the life of that monarch in 328 B. C. (Curt. viii. 6).—3. The second son of Cassander and Thessilōnica, and grandson of Antipāter, who, after the death of his father and elder brother, succeeded to the crown of Mācēdōniā, and was detested by the people in consequence of having murdered his own mother. He married Eurýdice, daughter of Lysimachus, who put him to death, thus revenging one act of parricide by another (Just. xvi. 1, 2).—4. Son of a brother of Antiochus, king of Sýria, who, with Sēlēucus, the son of that monarch, commanded the left wing in the battle of Thýātira, in which Antiochus was conquered in 192 B. C. He was at the head of the embassy sent by the Syrian monarch to form a treaty with the Romans, which was concluded in the capitol (Liv. xxxvii. 41—55).—5. Governor of the coast of Hēllēspōntus, at the time Lēōnōrius and Lūtārius, chieftains of the Gauls, crossed into Asia. Under pretence of an embassy, he sent some Macedonians, with two-decked ships, and three skills, to act as spies. Lūtārius seized the vessels, and in them carried over his army (Liv. xxxviii. 16).—6. A general of Persēus, king of Mācēdōniā, killed in battle in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 66).—7. A philosopher and poet of Sýlon, who had a wonderful facility at writing verse. Of his poetic compositions, a few epigrams only remain. Under him Cato Lūcensis studied. From his birth he was seized with fever annually on the same day, by the last he was cut off (Cic. de Orat. iii. 50 &c. Val. Max. i. 8).

Antipātría, ae, f. Kardiki, a town of Illýricum, situated in a narrow vale, which the Roman consul, P. Sulpicius Galba, took by assault and burned in 202 B. C., after putting the young men to the sword and giving the plunder to his soldiers (Liv. xxxi. 27).

Antiphānes, is, m. a man in the army of Alexander the Great (Curt. vii. 1).

Antiphātes, as, m. a reputed son of Sarpēdon, killed by Turnus. His mother was a native of Thēbē, a city of Mýsia, at the foot of the mountain Pliēus; hence Thēbā de matre (Virg. Aen. ix. 697).—2. A warrior on the side of Troy, killed by Lēontēus (Hom. Il. xii. 191).—3. A king of the Læstrigōnes, who was a descendant of Lāmus, and the founder of Formiæ, Mola. Ulysses, when he arrived on that coast after the Trojan war, sent Achæmēnides, and other two of his men, to that monarch, who devoured one, Achæmēnides and the other escaped. He then attacked the ships, and sunk them all in the sea, except that in which Ulysses sailed (Ov. Met. xiv. 234–249. Hom. Od. x. 193 seq.). Dionus Antiphātes (Ov. Met. xv. 117). Cræntus Antiphātes (Stat. Syl. i. 2. 85).

Antiphilus, i, m. a pretor of the Bœotians, who met T. Quinctius Flāminius at some distance from Thēba, probably with the view of procuring favourable terms from the Romans. By an artful manœuvre Quinctius obtained possession of the city, formed a treaty with the inhabitants, and advanced against Philippus, whom he defeated at Cynēphāla, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 1).—2. A general under Persēus, king of Mæcēdonia, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51). He was a native of Edessa.

Antiphon, ōntis, m. a native of Rhamnūdia, equally distinguished for his eloquence and caution. Ammianus Marcellinus says that he was the first who received pay for his oratory. Several orations, under his name, are still extant, but their authenticity has been much doubted (xxx. 4).

Antiphonus, i, m. one of the nine sons of Priāmus, who survived the war. (Hom. Il. xxv. 250).

Antiphus, i, m. a son of Priāmus, whom Agamemnon killed. Achilles had on Ida made him prisoner, and returned him to his father for a ransom. He was a man of some name (Hom. Il. xi. 101).—2. A grandson of Hēracles, the brother of Phidippus (Hom. Il. ii. 678).—3. A son of Pylæmēnes, who commanded the Mæonians in the Trojan army (Hom. Il. ii. 864).—4. An Ithacan, son of Egyp̄tus, and companion of Ulysses, killed by the Cyclopes (Hom. Od. ii. 19 seq.). Hōmērus mentions another Ithacan of this name (Od. xvii. 68).—5. A man in the army of Pōlōncees, overthrown by Hēracles (Stat. Th. ix. 252).—6. A man in the army of Etēocles, who fought on horseback, and was killed in the Theban war by Amphiclēus (Stat. Th. vii. 755).

Antipolis, is, f. Antibe, pronounced by the natives Antipoul, a town of Gallia, France, near the mouth of Argentēus, the Argen, built by the Massilians (Tac. Hist. ii. 15). The Transalpini Ligures plundered this town, in consequence of which the consul, Q. Opulius, marched against them, and easily obtained a complete victory, in 156 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 47). Inh. Antipolitani, orum, as. Adj. Antipolitānus, a, um. Antipolitānus civitas. Antipolitānus thynus (Mart. viii. 163).

Antirrhūm, i, n. Cape Ronili, the promontory opposite Rhūm, at the entrance into the Gulf of Lepanto.

Antissa, is, f. an island near Lēsbo, Mityleni, afterwards joined to the latter, of which, according to Plinius, it continues to form a part (i. 237).—2. A city in the island Lēsbo. Inh. Antissai, orum, m. were removed to Mēthymna, and their town demolished, because they had received into their harbour Antenor, commander of the fleet of Persēus, when cruising off that island in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 31).—3. An island near Pālus Mæotis, the Sea of Azoph, in after ages covered by Pontus Euxinus, the Black Sea (Plin. i. 239).

Antistia, as, f. wife of C. Rübēllius Blandus, who retired with her husband at the suggestion of the Emperor Nēro, to Asia, where he was murdered. She attended her father when he withdrew to the vicinity of Formiæ, Mola, on understanding that Fortūnātus, a freedman of his own, assisted by Claudius Dēmīanus q. v., had accused him to the Emperor Nēro. At her father's request, she went to Nēapōlis, Naples, and solicited the Emperor for his life with an importunity and boldness surpassing her sex. From the time her husband was murdered in her presence, she took food only to preserve life, mourned incessantly, at last opened her veins, with her father and grandmother, on which they all expired, the oldest first, the next in age followed, and she last of all (Tac. Ann. xvi. 10, 11). There she is called Pollutia, probably an error of the transcriber. See Rübēllius.

Antistius, i, m. a tribune of the people, who, with Pōmpilius and M. Cānuleius, brought C. Sēmprōnius Atrātinus to trial a second time, in 419 B. C., for having been defeated in battle by the Volsi, as they pretended; but in reality from spite at his cousin, A. Sēmprōnius Atrātinus (Liv. iv. 44).

Antistius Rūsticus, Antistii Rūstici, m. a Roman, who died, says Martialis, on the cruel coast of the Cāppadōces. The poet describes his death, and the sorrow of his wife Nigrina (ix. 31). This author imputes his death to the unhealthiness of Cāppadōcia, as he does also that of Rūfus (vi. 85), which may account for the epithets applied by him to the country, impia tellus (vi. 85), neve ora (ix. 31).

Antistius Sōlānus, Antistii Sōlāni, m. a tribune of the people banished from Rome in the year 61, for some satirical verses against the Emperor, after he had obtained the priesthood, which entitled him to a seat in the senate. A want of prudence appears in his publishing these verses at a great entertainment in the house of Ostorius Scapula q. v. By accusing P. Antēus, he procured his release, which does not appear to have been of long continuance, for the Emperor ordered him and Octavius Sagitta to return to the islands, which they had quitted without leave. The manners of Antistius were of the worst kind, and the acquisition of wealth by the detestable employment of an informer, rendered him an object both of fear and contempt at Rome (Tac. Ann. xii. 28 seq.).

Antistius Tūrpio, Antistii Tūrpionis, m. a man of uncommon strength in Pompey's army, who challenged to single combat any one of all Caesar's forces. Q. Pōmpēius Nigē, a Roman knight, accepted the challenge; but the result of the contest is not recorded (Cæs. B. Hisp. 25).

Antistius Vetus, Antistii Vêteris, m. a nobleman of Mæcêdônia, who had been tried for adultery and acquitted. The Emperor, Tiberius, offended at that decision, brought him to Rome, and accused him of treason, because he had been an accomplice in the designs of Rhescupôris q. r. Antistius was banished to an island which had no commerce either with Mæcêdônia or Thræcia (Tac. Ann. iii. 38).

C. Antistius, C. Antistii, m. a lieutenant-general of Augustus in Spain (Flor. iv. 12).

C. Antistius Lâbéo, C. Antistii Lâbêonis, m. a Roman, one of the ten commissioners sent to Mæcêdônia in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 17).

C. Antistius Rêginus, C. Antistii Rêgini, m. one of Cæsar's lieutenant-generals in Gallia, France. Cæsar, in consequence of his expecting greater commotions in that country, gave orders, in the sixth year of the war, to Marcus Silânus, C. Antistius Rêginus, and T. Sêxtius, to levy troops. We find him, at other times, appointing this officer to honourable commissions (Cæs. B. G. vi. 1).

C. Antistius Vetus, C. Antistii Vêteris, m. was consul at Rome in the year 50, and had for his colleague M. Suilius Rufus (Tac. Ann. xii. 25).—2. Held the office of consul with C. Fulvius Valens, in the last year of the reign of the Emperor Dômitianus, which Eutrôpius makes the year of Rome 850, instead of 848 (viii. 1).

L. Antistius, L. Antistii, m. elected in his absence a tribune of the people, in 421 B. C. (Liv. iv. 42).—2. A tribune of the soldiers with consular power in 378 B. C. (Liv. vi. 30).—3. A tribune of the people, who preferred an accusation against C. Jullius Cæsar, after he had gone to his province. On appeal to the other tribunes, his absence was considered a sufficient cause for stopping the prosecution, nor does it appear to have been afterwards resumed (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 23).

L. Antistius Vetus, L. Antistii Vêteris, m. was elected consul with Claudius Nêro in the year 55. Antistius and Pômpêius Paulinus had the command of the army in Germany, and from triumphs in war having become common, they cultivated the arts of peace. To keep the soldiers in employment, Antistius attempted, by means of a canal, to join Arar, the Saône, and Mösella, the Moselle, and thus form a communication between Sinus Gâllicus, the Gulf of Lyons, and Oceânus Gêrmanicus, the German Ocean. Ælius Gracilis, the governor of Gallia Bêlgica, frightened him from the undertaking, by alleging that he would excite the displeasure of the Emperor, by bringing the legions into that province, because it might be inferred, that he wished to ingratiate himself with the Gauls. In his proconsulship of Asia, he punished one Claudius Demianus for his crimes, who afterwards joined Fortinatus, a freedman of Antistius, in accusing him to the Emperor, Nêro. Resolved on his destruction, that monster became exasperated at the solicitations of his daughter Antistia, the widow of Rubellius Rufus, not to receive the evidence of a freedman against his master, who, unwilling to linger at the mercy of such a savage, opened his veins at the same time with his daughter and mother-in-law, on which they all bled to death (Tac. Ann. xvi. 11).

M. Antistius, M. Antistii, m. was sent along with Q. Têrentius by the senate to C. Flâminius, ordering him to return to Rome, to perform the usual rites, and to enter on the consulship in the common manner. The consul disregarded the embassy (Liv. xxi. 63).—2. A plebeian tribune who made a proposal to the people, that an order should pass, empowering the senate to decide finally in the case of the Satriciani (Liv. xxvi. 33).

M. Antistius Lâbéo, M. Antistii Lâbêonis, m. a man distinguished by his knowledge of the law, inflexible integrity, and his determined opposition to the measures of Augustus. The last probably originated in his admiration of the ancient forms and customs of the republic. He resisted the Emperor to his face, and this unyielding temper which he showed, probably induced the favourite of Augustus to give him the name of madman. Hôrâtius joins in this prejudice, to which his obligations to Augustus, and Mæcenas, most probably impelled him (Sat. i. 3. 82). The father of Antistius fell fighting in the ranks of the republican army at Philippi. To him Tacitus refers (Ann. iii. 75).

P. Antistius, P. Antistii, m. a Roman mentioned by Cicêro, in his treatise entitled Brûtus. By order of L. Jânus Brûtus Dâmâsippus, he was killed in Cûria Hostilia, in which that monster of cruelty had convened the senate (Vel. Pat. ii. 26). See Calpurnia.

Q. Antistius Vetus, Q. Antistii Vêteris, m. divorced his wife because he had seen her in public, speaking to a freedman of the lowest rank of society (Val. Max. vi. 3).

Antium, i. m. Anzo, a town of the Volsci, in Lâtium, on the coast, of which a few straggling houses only remain. It stood on a promontory of the same name, now Cape Anzo, and was a place of great strength. It had anciently no harbour, but afterwards one must have been formed, since we know from history that it received great improvements from the Emperor Nêro, and some of the late Popes repaired it. Here was a famous temple of Fortuna, of which a few arches undestroyed point out the spot on which it stood. The situation of Anzo was uncommonly delightful, hence Hôrâtius has Gratum Antium (Od. i. 35. 1). Here the Apollo of Belvedere was found in the fifteenth century. Inh. Antiatês, ium (Sing. Antias, âtis), m. the Antians, long and successfully resisted the dominion of the Romans who, at last, compelled them to submission. The conquerors afterwards granted them the rights of citizenship, but interdicted them from meddling in maritime affairs, in which they were very powerful. Part of their fleet was laid up in the dock, and part burned in 337 B. C. The prows of the latter decorated that part of the Forum, from which speeches were delivered, and, from this circumstance, was called the Rostra. Adj. Antias, as, as; âtis, et, Antianus, a, um. Antias vilis (Gel. xvii. 10). Antias ager (Tac. Ann. xiv. 3). Antianus ager (Plin. i. 340). In this district, the Roman Emperor Nêro was born, and also his daughter Augusta Pôppæa (Tac. Ann. xv. 23).

and afterwards betraying his associates (Sal. Cat. 21—59). After the expiry of his consulship, through the interest of Cicero, he obtained the province of Macedonia, where he continued for two years, and, on his return to Rome, he was brought to trial, and sentenced to perpetual banishment, for extortion and for making war beyond the bounds of his province. Before he obtained that appointment, the censors had expelled him from the senate, and, considering the state of morals at that time in Rome, he must have been a man of very wicked and nefarious habits, qualities which rendered him a very proper accomplice in the plot of Catilina, for the destruction of the government, and massacre of the virtuous and wealthy. In Thracia, the natives gained a victory over him, to the dishonour of the Roman name (Liv. Ep. 103). —2. Brother of M. Antonius the triumvir. Under C. Julius Caesar, he served as a lieutenant-general, was taken prisoner by the troops of Cn. Pompeius. At a future period, he and his army fell into the hands of M. Junius Brutus, by whose orders he was put to death (Liv. Ep. 110—121).

Julius Antonius, Julia Antonii, m. (Some write Iulius), was the son of M. Antonius the triumvir, and Fulvia, mentioned by Velleius Paterculus, as a remarkable instance of the clemency of Augustus, who, having conquered his father, not only granted him a full pardon, but, after he had violated his house, bestowed upon him the priesthood, praetorship, consulship, command of provinces, and even gave him in marriage the sister of his niece (ii. 100). Horatius inscribes to him the second ode of the fourth book. Like his father he indulged in licentiousness, and gratitude for such kindness did not restrain him from unlawful intimacy with Julia, the Emperor's daughter, for which he was condemned, and, to avoid an ignominious death, killed himself. Hence Velleius Paterculus says he was the avenger of his own crime. To him Tacitus alludes (Ann. iii. 18. iv. 44).

L. Antonius, L. Antonii, m. consul in 43 B. C., incited by Fulvia, the wife of his brother, M. Antonius the triumvir, made war on Augustus, drove from the city M. Aemilius Lepidus the triumvir, who, with an army, was charged with the protection of Rome. Augustus besieged him in the town Perusia, compelled him to surrender, granting pardon both to him and to all his soldiers (Liv. Ep. 125, 126). —2. A noble Roman, son of Julius Antonius and Marcella, daughter of Octavia the sister of the Emperor Augustus. Under pretence of prosecuting his studies, the Emperor sent him to Massilla, Marseilles, but in reality, that he might have him removed to a distance from his person. At his death, in the year 25, the senate decreed a magnificent funeral, and ordered him to be buried in the tomb of the Octavian family (Tac. Ann. iv. 44).

L. Antonius Satrianus, L. Antonii Satriani, m. a Roman, who raised a civil war in Germany, of which he was governor during the reign of the Emperor Domitianus, by whom it was quelled, without being obliged to take the field in person (Suet. Dom. 6). Martialis informs us that he disliked the surname of Satrianus, and the poet compares him with M. Antonius the triumvir, whom he resembled in vanity, perhaps also in some more reprehensible features of his character (Mart. iv. 11).

Manius Antonius, Manli Antonii, m. one of the conspirators who killed Q. Sertorius, in Spain, in 74 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 96).

M. Antonius, M. Antonii, m. appointed master of the horse, by P. Cornelius Rufinus, in 333 B. C., but an informality having been discovered in their creation, their abdication was unavoidable (Liv. viii. 17). —2. A tribune of the people, who opposed the bill of M. Juventius Thalna, praetor, in expectation that he would be chosen to conduct the war against the Rhodians, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 21). —3. A Roman praetor, attacked the pirates who infested the Mediterranean, and chased them to Cilicia, in 105 B. C. Few particulars of this naval war have been transmitted. To his other accomplishments he added that of an orator. See M. Aquilius. Of his character, literature, and general history, Cicero has recorded many particulars in different parts of his writings. The faction of Marius put him to death, and fixed up his head on the rostrum. He was the father of M. Antonius, surnamed Cræticus, and grandfather of the triumvir (Liv. Ep. 68—80. Cic. Brut. 43). —4. Son of the former, was a man of very great avarice, little scrupulous about the means by which he might gratify his favourite inclination. In 76 B. C. he obtained the praetorship, and the command of the whole coast of the Mediterranean. This unlimited authority enabled him to indulge his rapacity without restriction, and to accumulate money by pillaging not only Sicily, but the provinces. To give additional range to his inordinate love of money, he made war unjustly on the Cretans. Thinking himself sure of conquest, he assumed, at the commencement of hostilities, the surname of Cræticus; but, instead of overrunning the island, the natives defeated him with great loss, and he died of grief (Liv. Ep. 97). —5. Son of M. Antonius, surnamed Cræticus, was a man of great talents, inordinate ambition, and consummate profligacy. To the advantages of a handsome person, and pleasant countenance, he added elegance of manners and a captivating address. His intrepidity and strength were beyond those of ordinary men, and his knowledge of military tactics was highly extolled. Soon after the death of his father, Julia, his mother, who was of the family of the Caesars, married Cornelius Lentulus, who was condemned to suffer death, in consequence of his being engaged in the conspiracy of Catilina. To the execution of this sentence, which fell to the lot of Cicero as consul, has been attributed the implacable hatred which Antony conceived against the orator. His early dissipation and extravagance were, most probably, a consequence of his being educated under the roof of that traitor. From Sallustius it appears that, if not an accomplice, he was at least privy to the conspiracy of Catilina; and M. Tullius Cicero, his colleague in the consulship, detached him from that unlawful combination, by allowing him Macedonia to his province, without referring to the lots. That country was then enriched with the trade of the east, and held out a prospect of great wealth to Antonius, whose only to support his previous character, but to rise in the esteem of his subjects. To extend the bounds of the empire formed no part of his plan, and to the loss of posterity no historian flourished during the time he enjoyed the purple, so that the details of his government have not been transmitted. A conspiracy formed against his life gave him an opportunity of showing his clemency, and his prudence may be estimated by his rejection of the vain titles bestowed on him by the senate. Rome was indebted to this prince for several elegant buildings, and the citizens for many splendid games, which he considered necessary, and therefore did not deem them a superfluous expense. The jurisprudence of the Romans received great improvements from the just enactments of this great man, who died in the year 161, at the age of seventy-five, in the twenty-third year of his reign. To him Claudianus alludes (xxviii. 421).

Antónius, i. m. surnamed Félix, was the brother of Pallas q. v. and the freedman of Antónia, the mother of the Emperor Claudius, from whom he had assumed the name Antónius. In Scripture he is called Félix. He was governor of Judæa, strictly speaking, that part possessed by the Samaritans, and he married Drüsilla, grand-daughter of M. Antónius and Clēōpātra. From what is known of his history, he must have been a man of enormous lewdness and cruelty. Even when he exercised in that country the authority of a king, he did not in his conduct rise above his birth, but in every action discovered the mind and disposition of a slave. He was the husband of three queens, two of whom had the name of Drüsilla, the other is unknown (Suet. Claud. 28. Tac. Ann. xii. 54. Hist. v. 9).

Antónius Flāmma, Antónii Flāmmæ, m. accused of extortion and cruelty by the inhabitants of Cýrēnē, for which crimes he was banished in the year 71 (Tac. Hist. iv. 45).

Antónius Mūsa, Antónii Mūsæ, m. was physician to Augustus, as his brother Euphōrbus had been to Júba, king of Mauritānia. He cured the Emperor of a lingering illness, by means of the cold bath, which brought that prescription into great celebrity. Augustus recompensed his medical skill with remarkable liberality, and the people erected a statue to him next to that of Æsculāpius (Suet. Aug. 59). As Mūsa is a surname of the Pompōnii, some have conjectured that he was a freedman of that family. He wrote a treatise, De herba Vēttōnicā, which is still extant (Plin. iii. 603).

Antónius Nāso, Antónii Nāsōnis, m. a prætorian tribune, cashiered by Galba in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 20). Suetonius calls him M. Actōrius Nāso q. v.

Antónius Nātālis, Antónii Nātālis, m. a Roman knight, one of the conspirators against the Emperor Néro. He was the intimate friend and confidant of Cn. Piso. On the plot being discovered, Antónius made a full confession, on which account the Emperor pardoned him (Tac. Ann. xv. 50—71).

Antónius Nōvēllus, Antónii Nōvēlli, m. a first centurion in the army of Otho, who entrusted him and Suedius Clēmens with the command of the army against Gāllia Nārbōnensis. The expedition came to nothing, for Antónius had no authority, and his colleague affected popularity, consequently both were useless (Tac. Hist. i. 87. ii. 12).

Antónius Prīmus, Antónii Prīmi, m. was a native of Tōlōsa, Toulouse, a man of great eloquence, and also of great influence among the common people. Having been witness to a forged will, the senate expelled him. Though disgraced by this sentence, he afterwards obtained the office of consul, besides Galba gave him the command of a legion in Pānnōnia. In him Vēspāsianus had a brave officer and an active friend, whose eloquence gave him a command over the minds of others, and whose military skill rendered his services of singular importance. The rebellion in favour of Vēspāsianus placed at once in his view the means both of gratifying his ambition, and of acquiring prodigious wealth. He advised to enter Italy immediately, and after artfully removing the two generals, T. Amplius Flāvianus, and M. Apōnius Sātūrinus, remained sole commander-in-chief. Having defeated the army of Vitēllius, he took the camp near Crēmōna, and, on threatening to attack the town, the inhabitants opened the gates. The sack of Crēmōna brands with infamy his military reputation, which his victory over the German legions, and the overthrow of Vitēllius raised to remarkable distinction. Even the troops that had remained faithful to Vitēllius, Antónius compelled to desert him, and thus opened, without opposition, a passage to Rome, which he entered, and obtained consular honours. After he had secured the imperial throne to Vēspāsianus, he set out to join him, and, from that period, does not appear to have possessed either much power, or much consequence. This neglect Tacitus attributes to his former arrogance, avarice and cruelty (Tac. Hist. ii. 86 &c.). When a boy, he had the surname of Beccus, i. e. cock's bill (Suet. Vit. 18).

Antónius Taurus, Antónii Tauri, m. a præfect of the prætorians, cashiered along with Antónius Nāso q. v. (Tac. Hist. i. 20).

A. Antónius, A. Antónii, m. one of the three Roman ambassadors sent to Persēs, king of Mācēdōnia, in 170 B. C., after that monarch had been conquered by L. Æmilius Paullus (Liv. xlv. 4).

C. Antónius, C. Antónii, m. a noble Roman, son of M. Antónius, a celebrated orator, and brother of M. Antónius Crēticus, the father of the triumvir. He held the consulship with M. Tūllius Cicēro 64 B. C., and commanded the army against the rebel L. Sērgius Cātīlina. With that traitor he had formerly been in habits of intimacy, and had they been elected to the consulship at the same time, the destruction of the government would have been the inevitable result. His indigent circumstances Cātīlina trusted, would have subjected him to subserviency in his flagitious measures, and it required the ingenuity of M. Tūllius Cicēro to withdraw him from the conspiracy, and from every other design formed against the state. According to Sāllūstius, the gout prevented him from appearing at the head of the troops in the engagement against Cātīlina; but some have alleged that he feigned inability on purpose to avoid meeting with the traitor, who might, before both armies, have reproached him with being accessory to the conspiracy, Antónla, m, f. a tower in Jerusalem, so called by Heródes, in honour of M. Antónius (Tac. Hist. v. 11). Adj. Antónlānus, a, um. Antónlāna praxidia (Flor. iv. 9).

M. Antónius Gniphó, M. Antónli Gniphónis, m. a native of France, was exposed in infancy by his parents, but treated kindly by the person who brought him up, through whose means, probably, he obtained a thorough education, both in Latin and Greek. That he possessed great genius, and taught rhetoric with uncommon ability, cannot be doubted, since his school was frequented by eminent men, among whom was M. Tullius Cicéro, even when invested with the praetorship. Of a temper and disposition naturally mild, he seems to have been little solicitous about money, never pactioned with his scholars, but trusted to their liberality. His first attempts at teaching were in the family of C. Jullius Caesar, when that ambitious Roman was a boy. He died at the age of fifty, leaving behind him two large volumes on the Latin language, according to Atéius Philólógus, and it is to be regretted that that work has not been preserved (Suet. II. Gram. 7).

Q. Antónius Mērenda, Q. Antónli Mērenda, m. elected a tribune of the soldiers, with consular power, in 421 B. C. (Liv. iv. 42).

T. Antónius Mērenda, T. Antónli Mērenda, m. one of the second decemviri, appointed in 451 B. C. (Liv. iii. 35).

Antóres, is, m. a man of celebrity, and companion of Hércules, who, having departed from Argos, his native city, adhered to Evander, and was killed by Mēzentius (Virg. Æn. x. 778).

Antron, ónis, v. Antrónia, v. f. a town of Magnésia (Pom. Mel.), of Thessália (Steph. Strab.), remarkable for a large breed of asses. Adj. Antrónli, orum, m. Adj. Antrónlus, a, um. Antrónlus Asinus, a name given to a man of great size and little mind.

P. Antrónius, P. Antrónli, m. the man who murdered M. Antónius, and carried his head to C. Márius (Val. Max. viii. 9). Others call him Annlus.

Antúlla, v. f. a woman, whose premature death Mártialis has described (i. 117). She was the daughter of Fenius q. v.

Antunucum, i, n. Andernoch, a town near Bóna, Bonn, and Bingen, Bingen (Amm. Mar. xviii. 2).

Anúbis, is, v. idis, m. a god of the Egyptians, represented with the head of a dog, hence latrator Anúbis (Virg. Æn. viii. 693. Ov. Met. ix. 689); latrans Anúbis (Prop. iii. 11. 41). According to some, he was the son of Osiris, by Nephthys, the wife of Týphon, but others say he was the brother of Osiris. Plútarchus maintains that when he was exposed from fear of Týphon, a dog, called Anúbis, found him, and that he made this dog his constant attendant and guard. It has also been transmitted, that Anúbis was a boy, born with a dog's face, and that Mērcúrius was worshipped by the Egyptians in this form. The latter idea is at least countenanced, if not supported, by Juvénalis (Sat. vi. 533—7). Derisor Anúbis, the mocker of Anúbis, i. e. the high priest of that god, who, when carrying his image in a frantic manner up and down the streets, laughed at the follies of the people for joining in such an unmeaning and absurd rite (Juv. Sat. vi. 533). Per ora vērēndi Anúbidia (Ov. Amor. ii. 13. 11).

Anulínus, i, m. a man enriched by the Emperor Séptimius Sévérus (Aur. Vic. Ep. 20). —2. A Roman of senatorian rank, of whom, according to some, the Emperor Diocletianus was a freedman; but, according to the more generally received opinion, he was the son of a clerk (Eutrop. ix. 19).

Anxur, úris, m. a king or prince of the Scythians (Val. Flacc. vi. 68).

Anxur, úris, m. et n. a town of Látium, situated on an eminence overhanging a morass, so called in the language of the Volscei, to whom it belonged, but the Romans called it Terrácina, Tarracina q. v. a name which it still retains. It was near Anýela, which was destroyed by serpents, and was taken by Númerius Fábius Ambústus in 405 B. C. (Liv. iv. 59). Its future attempts to regain independence were unsuccessful, and it fell wholly under the dominion of the Romans, who sent a colony thither in 328 B. C. The via Appia passed this town, now poor and inconsiderable, and forming part of the territory of the Pope. Júpiter was worshipped here under the name of Júpiter Anxúrus. That Anxúrus denotes beardless or unshaven seems a fiction of the grammarians (Virg. Æn. vii. 799). Súperbus Anxur, lofty or elevated Anxur (Mart. vi. 42). Arces Anxúris (Luc. Phar. iii. 84). Anxúras, as, as. Anxúras populus (Liv. xxvii. 38).

Anýsis, is, m. a king of Egypt, who succeeded Asychis, was banished from his kingdom by Sabacus, king of Æthiopia, and restored to the throne after he had lived fifty years on the island Elbo (Herod. ii. 137).

Anýsis, is, f. a town of Egypt, from which the district was called Anýsia (Herod. ii. 137).

Anýtus, i, m. one of the accusers of Sócrates, hence Hórátius Anýtique rerum, i. e. Sócratem (Sat. ii. 4. 3).

Anzaba, v. m. a river of Mēsopotámia (Amm. Mar. xviii. 6).

Aon, ónis, m. a man killed in the Theban war by Týdeus (Stat. Th. viii. 475). —2. A son of Néptúnus, who went from Apúlia to Bæótia. His posterity were called Aónes, and that part of Bæótia which they inhabited, Aónia, but some authors include the whole of that district under this name (Gel. xiv. 6). Tellus Aónis, Bæótia (Stat. Th. vi. 17). Aóniæ, arum (sing. Aónides, æ), m. Bæotians. Tunc prior, Aónides, i. e. Etócles (Stat. Th. ix. 95). Aónides, um, f. the Muses, from Hêlêcon and Citheron, mountains in Bæótia, being sacred to them. Adj. Aónlus, a, um, et, Aónis, is, e, Theban or Bæotian. Aónlus vertex, Hêlêcon (Virg. G. iii. 11). Aónes montes, the Bæotian mountains, i. e. Hêlêcon and Citheron (Virg. B. vi. 65).

Aörnus, i, m. a rock on the river Indus, which Alexander the Great carried by assault, not however without considerable difficulty, in 328 B. C. (Curt. viii. 11).

Aórsi, orum, m. a people whom Plinius places next the Gêtre (i. 438). Another people, or perhaps a different tribe of the same people, are mentioned by this geographer as adjoining to the Cádusi, and appear to have lived near the Caspian Sea (i. 676). To the latter Tacitus alludes under the name of Adórsi (Ann. xii. 15).

extravagance had overwhelmed him in debt (Cat. 26). In 49 B. C., Antōnīus, master of the horse, marched troops into Rome, in consequence of a sedition excited by P. Cōrnēlius Lēntūlus Dōlābella, a plebeian tribune, and killed eight hundred of the people. Three years after, when consul, he ran among the Lupercalians, went up to his colleague, C. Jūlius Cēsār, and placed a crown upon his head, which the latter laid by him on a chair. Eloquence was his favourite study, and his accomplishments as an orator commanded general applause. He first displayed his military talents in Syria, under the consul Gābīnius, by whom he was appointed master of the horse. The undaunted courage and martial abilities of Antony procured him the esteem and friendship of Cēsār, in whose army he held the commission of a lieutenant-general in the war in Gallia, France. To the interest of that consummate general, he was indebted for the highest offices in the state, which he amply repaid by his fidelity and valuable services. In the memorable battle of Phārsālīa, the plain of Pharsa, he commanded the left wing, and his activity, courage, and knowledge of military evolutions, contributed greatly to the success of his general. To Antony, Cēsār then gave the government of Itālia, with the title of master of the horse. He himself went immediately in pursuit of Pompey, resolved to complete his victory by the destruction of that great man, being convinced that during his life he would neither enjoy peace nor security. Confiding in the gratitude of the king of Egypt, whose father he had restored to the throne, Pompey fled to that country, where he was murdered by order of the Egyptian monarch. The death of Pompey rendered the authority of Cēsār absolute. He modelled the constitution, and governed the empire as he thought fit. His usurpation and despotism soon gave birth to a conspiracy against his life, which was carried into execution on the Ides of March, 43 B. C. After the assassination of his patron, Antony, whom Cēsār had named second in his will, was exceedingly enraged that Octāvīus had been preferred before him, and contempt for his youth and haughtiness, from his own intimacy with Cēsār, impelled him to treat Octāvīus with every degree of contumely and insult (Flor. iv. 4), when a number of the veterans revolted from him to Octāvīus. Acting on these principles, he artfully endeavoured to obtain the sovereignty of Rome; but his intention being perceived, success was denied. The plans which he formed, and the measures which he pursued, to gratify his ambition, discovered uncommon vigour of mind and depravity of heart. An obvious reason forbids entering into a detailed account either of his enormous cruelty, or his excessive dissipation. The greater part of the nobles joined the republicans, and Octāvīus, the grand-nephew of Cēsār, attached himself to the consuls Hīrtius and Pānsa, who marched by order of the senate against Antony, then besieging Dēcimus Brūtus in Mūtina, Modena. Upon his defeat, he fled with the remainder of his forces to Lēpīdus, who had, at that time, the command in Gallia, France. With these two, Octāvīus entered into an agreement respecting the settling of the state, which was, in fact, a partition of the empire amongst them. The proscription was again revived with all its horrors. It contained 300 senators, and 2000 knights, among whom was Antony's maternal uncle, and Cicero. Of these, part fled to Brūtus and Cāssius (q. v.), and the rest were butchered wherever they were found. This compact received the name of the SECOND TRIUMVIRATE. Their first act was to raise forces and march against the republican party, at the head of which were the two patriots above-mentioned. Near Philippi, a town on the frontiers of Macedonia and Thracia, Romania, the hostile armies came to an engagement, in which Brūtus defeated Octāvīus, and Antony, Cāssius. Despairing of ultimate success, Cāssius ended his own life, and Brūtus, in the second battle, being completely vanquished, preferred a Roman death to submission. Antony went to Egypt, and spent his time in the most extravagant dissipation with Clēōpātra, the queen of that country. But Augustus having forced his wife Fūlvīa, and his son, to fly from Rome, he was at last roused from his inactivity, and concerted measures to resent the insult. With this view he crossed to Brūndisium, Brundisi, and hostilities would have soon commenced, had not their friends interfered. Meantime Fūlvīa died, and peace was concluded between them, by Antony marrying Octāvīa, the sister of Augustus, by whom he appears to have had two daughters, Antōnīa Māior, afterwards the wife of L. Dōmītius Ahenōbārbus, called inaccurately by Tacitus, Minor, and Antōnīa Minor, wife of Nēro Claudius Drūsus (Tac. Ann. iii. 3 seq.). Livius says he repudiated his wife Fūlvīa, at the earnest request of Octāvīus, and then married his sister Octāvīa (Ep. 127). His attachment to Clēōpātra still continued, and he appears to have lived almost wholly with her in Egypt. By her he had two sons, to one of whom he gave the kingdom of Armenia, after having imprisoned Artavasdes. By the Parthians he was defeated, and then returned to Armenia. He decimated the troops who had fled during the Parthian war, and fed the rest on barley (Ap. Bel. Par. 160—163). At this time Sex. Pompēius, with whom he had formed an alliance, rebelled against him, on which account he caused him to be put to death (Liv. Ep. 130—132). The divorce of his wife Octāvīa, put an end to the dissembled friendship, which had for some time existed between him and his brother-in-law. Both began to make preparations for war, and both exerted themselves with a zeal and activity proportioned to the greatness of the empire for which they contended. They met in Mārē Iōnīum, off Actium, a small town in Acarnania, Karili, a district of Græcia, Greece, of which no vestige now remains. Clēōpātra, contrary to the earnest remonstrances of Antony, was present at the engagement, and her timidity contributed to his defeat, for she was the first who retired from the battle, and he fled with her to Egypt, whither Augustus followed him. Finding himself deserted by all his friends, and at the mercy of a cruel rival, he stabbed himself. Tacitus, in allusion to the necessity of having recourse to this act of violence, says "interfecto Antōnio" (Ann. i. 2). Rōmānus dux, Antōnīus (Ov. Met. xv. 826).

of a fictitious king (Hom. Od. xxiv. 304).—2. A man killed by Phœbas, while buried in sleep from drunkenness, in the battle of the centaurs (Ov. Met. xii. 317).

Aphidna, a, f. a town of Lacedæmonia, celebrated for the battle of Cæstor and Pöllux with Lyncæus and Idas, sons of Aphæreus (Ov. Fast. v. 708).

Aphidne, arum, f. Kassia, a town of Attica (Herod. ix. 73). Here Thæseus concealed Hælen, after he had carried her off to Lacedæmon. Adj. Aphidneus, a, um (Herod. vi. 109).

Aphidnus, i, m. a Trojan killed by Tùrnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 702).

Aphir, Iris, m. a fugitive from the kingdom of Mäsinissa, who lurked about Cýrenë, and in pursuit of whom that monarch had requested permission of the Carthaginians to pass through that territory, a proof that it belonged to them. They produced this as evidence to the Roman senate when Mäsinissa claimed it as his in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 62).

Aphrōdisias, adis, f. Geyra, a town of Caria, or Æolis, which Antiochus, king of Syria, took at the first assault in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 21). Inh. Aphrōdisiensis, um, m. (Tac. Ann. iii. 62). Adj. Aphrōdisiensis, is, e.—2. A town of Cilicia, which had been under the government of the Egyptians, from whom Antiochus, king of Syria, took it in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 20).—3. A small island on the African coast, near Cýrenë (Herod. iv. 169).

Aphrōditë, es, f. the Greek name of Vénus.

Apia, m, f. a Sythian goddess, the same with Tellus (Herod. iv. 59).

Apia, m, f. the ancient name of Pélōpōneus q. v.

Apianus, i, m. a legacy hunter, on whom Märtialis has written an epigram (vi. 62). Some copies read Opptianus.

Apicata, m, f. the wife of Scjānus, whom he drove from his house, after she had born him three children, to remove suspicion from the mind of Livia. She discovered the conduct of her husband to Drusus (Tac. Ann. iv. 3—11).

Apicius, i, m. a noted glutton, who wrote a treatise on cookery, and the best means of provoking appetite. From his great riches he made all his experiments at his own expense. After he had spent eight hundred thousand pounds, he put himself to death by poison, for fear he should die of want, although he had eighty thousand pounds remaining. Others say, that, having been despised in consequence of his poverty induced by his extravagance, he hanged himself (Juv. Sat. iv. 23). The latter idea, perhaps, originated from pauper Apicius (Juv. Sat. xi. 3), where Apicius seems to denote any luxurious, gluttonous person reduced to poverty by gratification of the palate, and therefore should be translated, a poor Apicius. It is probable he is the person mentioned also by Märtialis, from similarity of character (iii. 22). Dio calls him M. Gavius Apicius, and Plinius styles him, the deepest gulf of all gourmandisers. From Tacitus he appears to have been addicted to the worst of vices (Ann. iv. 1).

Apidānus, i, m. the Satalge, a river of Thessaly, which runs in a northern direction, and is joined by Enipeus and other streams before it falls into Pénæus, the Salampria, near Larissa (Luc. Phar. vi. 373).

Apidius Mērula, Apidli Mērula, m. a man whose name the Emperor Tiberius erased from the roll of the senate, because he refused to swear by the acts of Augustus (Tac. Ann. iv. 42).

Apinius Tiro, Apinli Tirōnis, m. a man who had held the office of prætor, and who put himself at the head of the revolt against the Emperor Vitellius, in favour of Vespasianus. The plot did not originate with him, but he took an active part, and the means which he employed for raising money from the free towns, injured the cause by the hatred which it excited, more than all the advantage resulting from the money which he raised (Tac. Hist. iii. 57, 76).

Apio, ōnis, m. a king of Libya, surnamed Ptolémæus, who, at his death, left the Roman people his whole possessions (Eutrop. vi. 11). Livius makes Ptolémæus his name, and Apio his surname (Ep. 70). To him Tacitus refers (Ann. xiv. 18).

Apōlæ, arum, f. a town of the Latins, taken by L. Tarquinius, with the spoils of which he began the capitol (Plin. i. 334). Inh. Apōlani, orum, m.

Apis, is, e. Idis, m. called by the Greeks Epaphus, a son of Phôrōneus and Læōdicë, who, after death, received divine honours under the name of Scërapis. He ordered Pélōpōneus, the Moreo, of which he was king, to be called Apia, from his own name (Apol. ii. 1). Apis is another name of Osiris q. v. He was worshipped under the form of a white ox, with black spots, hence variousque coloribus Apis (Ov. Met. ix. 690). The same poet writes corniger Apis (Ov. Amor. ii. 13, 14).

Apis, Idis, f. Lebwyat, a city of Egypt, on the confines of Libya (Herod. ii. 118).

Apisæon, ōnis, m. a native of Pæonia, son of Hippasus. He joined the Trojan army, was remarkably brave, but fell by the hand of Lycômêdes. Hippasides, m, m. Apisæon (Hom. Il. xvii. 348 seq.).

Apōdōti, orum, m. a people of Ætolia (Liv. xxxii. 34).

Apōllināris, is, m. a friend of Märtialis, to whom he addresses an epigram (vii. 25). His name occurs frequently in the writings of that poet.—2. A tragedian, on whom the Emperor Vespasianus conferred a present of 400,000 sesterces (Suet. Vesp. 19). Some suppose that he is the person named Apelles (Suet. Calig. 33).

Apōllinis prōmōntōrium, Cape Zibeeb, or Zebibi, the western promontory of Sinus Tūnitānus, the Gulf of Tunis, as was Mærcūri Prōmōntōrium, Cape Bon, or Ras-adder, the eastern (Liv. xxx. 24).

Apōllo, ōnis, m. the son of Jūpiter and Lātōna, the god of music, medicine, augury, painting, poetry, and all the fine arts. He was born at the same birth with his sister Diāna, near the foot of Cýnthus, a mountain in Dēlos, an island in Mærë Agēum, the Archipelago. Hence he was called Cýnthius, and Dēlius; and Diāna, Cýnthia and Dēlia. Among beasts, the wolf; among insects, the grasshopper; among birds, the cock, the crow, the swan, and the hawk; and, among trees, the palm, the olive, and the laurel, were sacred to Apollo. He was represented as a tall beardless young man (Acerscōmes q. v), of handsome shape, holding in his hands a bow (hence called Dēus Arcilēns, Ov. Met. i. 441) or a lyre, and his head sur-

Aōus, i. m. the Pollonia, or, Viossa (Voissa, Hughes), a river of Macedonian Illyricum, runs in a narrow valley between two mountains, called by the natives Aērōpus and Asnāus, affording a very narrow passage only along the bank (Liv. xxxii. 5). Flōrus makes it the boundary of Macedōnia (ii. 7). See Eas.

Apesus, c. Pesus, i. m. the name of a river on which stood a cognominal town, Apesus, i. f. They were both in the vicinity of Lāmpsācus (Hom. Il. ii. 828).

Apāmēa, æ. f. Afiām-kara-hisār, a town of Phrygia, not far from the source of Meander, the Meinder, and the site of Vētēres Cēlena, by the inhabitants of which it was built, and they gave it that name from Apāmēa, sister of king Sēlēucus (Liv. xxxviii. 13). Inh. Apāmēenses, iur. m. were relieved from tribute for five years, because they had suffered by earthquakes in the year 54 (Tac. Ann. xii. 58).—2. A town of Syria, so called from Apāmēa the mother of Sēlēucus. Inh. Apāmēni, orum, m. (Just. xxxix. 1).—3. A town on Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, now Mutania (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).—4. A town of Parthia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). Adj. Apāmēus, et, Apāmēnus, a. um.

Apāmīa, æ. f. daughter of one Alexander of Megālōpōlis, and wife of Amynder, king of the Athāmānes (Liv. xxxv. 47).

Apelaurum, i. n. Mermingo-longo (i. e. Ant-forest), a mountain in Arcadia.

Apelaurus, i. m. a place in Stymphalia terra. Here Nicōstrātus, praetor of the Achei, commanded the neighbouring states to assemble on a particular day, on purpose to attack Andrōsthēnes, who commanded an army of six thousand men at Cōrinthus for Philippus, king of Macedōnia. Andrōsthēnes was routed and Achāla delivered from fear (Liv. xxxiii. 14, 15).

Apēliōtas, æ. m. the Greek name of the east wind, which the Latins called Subsōlānus, and is the same with Eurus (Cat. xxvi. 3).

Apēlles, is, m. a native of Cos, Lango, was the most eminent painter of antiquity. The excellence of his pictures, which so greatly surpassed that of all others, we find extolled to the highest degree both by poets and prose authors. In what their particular merit consisted, whether in design, attitude, or colouring, we have no certain information; only Plinius makes elegance his chief characteristic, and adds that he was no less distinguished for simplicity than for art (v. 207). Since Alexānder prohibited by edict any painter except Apēlles from taking his likeness, it is probable that the delicacy of his touches, colouring, and exquisite finishing formed part of his unrivalled supereminence. Plinius informs us that he never used more than four colours, and that the number of his paintings alone nearly exceeded those of all others. The same author has mentioned several of his pieces, Venus, rising out of the sea, which was considered his master-piece, &c., which our limits will not allow us to particularize (v. 212). Adj. Apēllēus, a. um. Spirat Apēllēā redditus arte Mēmōr, Mēmōr, restored by the art of Apēlles, breathes, i. e. has so much the appearance of life as to seem breathing (Mart. xi. 10). Si quid Apēllēi gaudens animasse colōres, if Apēlles' colours take pleasure in giving life to any thing (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 64).—2. A man whom Philippus, king of Macedōnia, sent with Philōcles to Rome in 183 B. C., in consequence of suspecting that his son Dēmētrius had entered into a traitorous correspondence with the senate. These commissioners acted with the utmost perfidy, forged a letter in name of T. Quinctius Flāmius to Dēmētrius, and gave other statements which convinced Philippus of his son's guilt, and he immediately ordered him to be put to death. To escape the punishment which his crime merited, Apēlles fled to Rome as soon as Philippus came to the true knowledge of the case, and, after the death of that monarch, Pērseus, at whose instigation Apēlles had acted, invited him to return to Macedōnia, promising him large rewards for his services, and, in open violation of this assurance, deprived him of life (Liv. xl. 20 seq.).

Apēnninus, a. um. Apēnninus (mons), the Apennines, a chain of mountains nearly in the middle of Italy, extending from Alpes, the Alps, to Rhēgium, Reggio, about seven hundred miles in length, in which all the rivers of that country take their rise. Apēnnincola, æ. c. g. an inhabitant of the Apennines (Virg. Æn. xi. 700). Apēnninīgēna, æ. c. g. a native of the Apennines; applied to Tiber, the Tevere, from having its source in these mountains (Ov. Met. xv. 432).

Aper Arrius, Apri Arrii, m. praefect of the praetorian band under the Roman Emperor Cārus, who, with the view of obtaining the crown, murdered both the emperor, and his son Nūmēriānus, although by the advice of his father he had married the daughter of Aper. His guilt having been discovered and Diocletianus elected Emperor, Aper was brought forth, and the newly elected Emperor, seated on the tribunal, having sworn that he had no hand in the death of Nūmēriānus, and having charged the crime upon Aper, he immediately descended from his seat, and thrust his sword into his breast, repeating "Gloriāre Aper. Enēa magni dextrā cadis," and Aper fell lifeless at his feet (Eutrop. ix. 18).

M. Aper, M. Apri, m. a distinguished orator, mentioned by Tācitus (Orat. 2 §c.).

Apērāntia, æ. f. a town of Thessaly, which Philippus, king of Macedōnia, took by force of arms in 193 B. C. Inh. Apērāntii, orum, m. the Aperantians, opened their gates to Pērseus in 171 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 22).

Aphāreūs, ēos, m. a warrior in the Grecian army, son of Cālētor. He was one of those who supported Idōmēneus attacked by Enēas and Deiphobus. He fell by the hand of Enēas (Hom. Il. xiii. 541).—2. A centaur, whose arm Thēscus fractured, but allowed him to live (Ov. Met. xii. 341). Adj. Aphāreūs, a. um. Aphāreūa proles, the sons of Aphāreūs, who were among the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 304).

Aphārias, æ. m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, who charged Alexander Lyncestes q. v. with conspiring against the life of the king (Curt. vii. 1).

Aphēllas, æ. m. See Ophēllas.

Aphēsas, v. Apēsas, antis, et, Apēsantus, i. m. (Plin. i. 417), Fuka, a mountain of Argolis, on which Pērseus sacrificed to Jūpiter, hence Stātius calls it Pērseus mons (Th. v. 640).

Aphidas, antis, m. the fictitious name of of a felonious king (Hom. Od. xxiv. 304).—

2. A man killed by Phōrbas, while buried in sleep from drunkenness, in the battle of the mausers (Ov. Met. xii. 317).

Aphidna, m., f. a town of Lācōnia, celebrated for the battle of Cāstor and Pollux with Lysceus and Idas, sons of Aphāreus (Ov. Fast. v. 708).

Aphidneus, arum, f. Kassia, a town of Attica
(Herod. ix. 73). Here Thēseus concealed Hēlōna, after he had carried her off to Lācō-nemon. Adj. Aphidneus, a, um (Herod.
ix. 129).

Aphidneus, i., m. a Trojan killed by Turnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 702).

Aphir, iris, m. a fugitive from the kingdom of Māsīnissa, who lurked about Cŷrēnē, and in pursuit of whom that monarch had requested permission of the Carthaginians to pass through that territory, a proof that it belonged to them. They produced this as evidence to the Roman senate when Māsīnissa claimed it as his in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 62).

Aphrōdisias, adis, f. Geyra, a town of Cāria, or Æolis, which Antiochus, king of Sŷria, took at the first assault in 192 B. C.
(Liv. xxxvii. 21). Inh. Aphrōdisiensis, ium, m.
(Tac. Ann. iii. 62). Adj. Aphrōdisiensis, is, e.
—2. A town of Cilicia, which had been under the government of the Egyptians, from whom Antiochus, king of Sŷria, took it in 199 B. C.
(Liv. xxxiii. 20).—3. A small island on the African coast, near Cŷrēnē (Herod. iv. 169).

Aphrōdisiā, as, f. the Greek name of Vēnus.

Apia, as, f. a Scythian goddess, the same with Tēllus (Herod. iv. 59).

Apia, as, f. the ancient name of Pēlōpōnnēus q. v.

Apianus, i., m. a legacy hunter, on whom Mārtiālis has written an epigram (vi. 62).
Some copies read Opptianus.

Apicita, as, f. the wife of Sējanus, whom he drives from his house, after she had born him three children, to remove suspicion from the mind of Livia. She discovered the conduct of her husband to Drusus (Tac. Ann.
iv. 3—11).

Apicius, i., m. a noted glutton, who wrote a treatise on cookery, and the best means of provokeing appetite. From his great riches he made all his experiments at his own expense. After he had spent eight hundred thousand pounds, he put himself to death by poison, for fear he should die of want, although he had eighty thousand pounds remaining. Others say, that, having been despised in consequence of his poverty induced by his extravagance, he hanged himself (Juv.
sat. iv. 23). The latter idea, perhaps, originated from pauper Apicius (Juv. Sat. xi. 3), where Apicius seems to denote any luxurious, gluttonous person reduced to poverty by gratification of the palate, and therefore should be translated, a poor Apicius. It is probable he is the person mentioned also by Mārtiālis, from similarity of character (iii. 22). Dio calls him M. Gāvius Apicius, and Pīnius styles him, the deepest gulf of all gormandisers. From Tacitus he appears to have been addicted to the worst of vices (Ann. iv. 1).

Apidneus, i., m. the Satalige, a river of Thessaly, which runs in a northern direction, and is joined by Enpēus and other streams before it falls into Pēnēus, the Salampria, near Lāriaea (Luc. Phar. vi. 373).

Apidius Mērūla, Apidī Mērūle, m. a man whose name the Emperor Tibērius erased from the roll of the senate, because he refused to swear by the acts of Augustus (Tac. Ann. iv. 42).

Apinius Tiro, Apinī Tīrōnis, m. a man who had held the office of praetor, and who put himself at the head of the revolvers against the Emperor Vitēllius, in favour of Vēspā-sianus. The plot did not originate with him, but he took an active part, and the means which he employed for raising money from the free towns, injured the cause by the hatred which it excited, more than all the advantage resulting from the money which he raised (Tac. Hist. iii. 57, 76).

Apio, ōnis, m. a king of Libŷa, surnamed
Ptōlēmæus, who, at his death, left the Roman people his whole possessions (Eutrop.
vi. 11). Livius makes Ptōlēmæus his name, and Apio his surname (Ep. 70). To him
Tacitus refers (Ann. xiv. 18).

Apīole, arum, f. a town of the Latins, taken by L. Tarquinius, with the spoils of which he began the capitol (Plin. i. 334).
Inh. Apīolani, orum, m.

Apis, is, e. Idīs, m. called by the Greeks Epāphus, a son of Phōrōnēus and Lāōdicē, who, after death, received divine honours under the name of Sērāpis. He ordered Pēlōpōnnēus, the Morea, of which he was king, to be called Apia, from his own name (Apol. ii.
1). Apis is another name of Osiris q. v. He was worshipped under the form of a white ox, with black spots, hence vārisque cōloribus Apis (Ov. Met. ix. 690). The same poet writes corniger Apis (Ov. Amor. ii. 13, 14).

Apis, Idīs, f. Lebwyat, a city of Egypt, on the confines of Libŷa (Herod. ii. 118).

Apisāon, ōnis, m. a native of Paeōnia, son of Hippāsus. He joined the Trojan army, was remarkably brave, but fell by the hand of Lŷcōmēdes. Hippāsides, as, m. Apisāon
(Hom. Il. xvii. 348 seq.).

Apōdōti, orum, m. a people of Ætōlia (Liv. xxxii. 34).

Apōllināris, is, m. a friend of Mārtiālis, to whom he addresses an epigram (vii. 25).
His name occurs frequently in the writings of that poet.—2. A tragedian, on whom the Emperor Vēspāsianus conferred a present of 400,000 sesterces (Suet. Vesp. 19). Some suppose that he is the person named Apēlles (Suet. Calig. 33).

Apōllinis prōmōntōrium, Cape Zibeeb, or Zebibi, the western promontory of Sinus Tūnitānus, the Gulf of Tunis, as was Mē-cūrii prōmōntōrium, Cape Bon, or Ras- adder, the eastern (Liv. xxx. 24).

Apōllo, ōnis, m. the son of Jūpiter and Lātōna, the god of music, medicine, augury, painting, poetry, and all the fine arts. He was born at the same birth with his sister Dīāna, near the foot of Cŷnthus, a mountain in Dēlos, an island in Mārē Egeūm, the Archipelago. Hence he was called Cŷnthus, and Dēlius; and Dīāna, Cŷnthia and Dēlia.
Among beasts, the wolf; among insects, the grasshopper; among birds, the cock, the crow, the swan, and the hawk; and, among trees, the palm, the olive, and the laurel, were sacred to Apollo. He was represented as a tall beardless young man (Acērsēōmes
q. v.), of handsome shape, holding in his hands a bow (hence called Dēus Arcēnens, Ov. Met. i. 441) or a lyre, and his head surrounded with rays of light. Augur Apōllo (Virg. Æn. iv. 376). Apōllo auctor carminis, Apōllo, father of poetry (Tib. ii. 4. 13). Crinētus Apōllo, long-haired Apōllo (Virg. Æn. ix. 638). Altus Apōllo, from his temple standing on an eminence (Virg. Æn. vi. 9). Adj. Apōllināris, is, e, et, Apōllinēus, a, um. Apōllināres ludi, games celebrated to procure victory, not health (Liv. xxv. 12). Apōllināris laurea, the laurel of Apōllo (Hor. Od. iv. 2. 9). Apōllinēa urbs, the capital of Delos (Ov. Met. xiii. 631). Apōllinēa prōles, the offspring of Apōllo i. e. Æsculāpius (Ov. Met. xv. 538).

Apōllōcrates, is, m. elder son of Dīōnysius, tyrant of Sicily. The success of his opponent, Dion, rendered him willing to make peace on the following terms, that Dion should have Sicily, Dīōnysius Italy, and Apōllōcrates Syracūse, Saragossa (Cor. Nep. Dion 5). This author does not appear to have considered him the son of Dīōnysius, but it is expressly mentioned by Plutarchus.

Apōllōdorus, i, m. an officer under Alexander the Great, whom he appointed governor of Bābylōnia in 331 B. C. (Curt. v. 1).

—2. An Egyptian mentioned by Mārtialis (i. 62). Of his history nothing is known, although it is probable he was an author of considerable eminence.—3. A Greek comic poet, the rival of Menander (Gel. ii. 23).

4. A preceptor of Augustus, was a native of Pergāmus, and an author whose style is censured by Tācitus (Orat. 19).—5. An Athenian, who advised a revolt of his countrymen from the Romans, for which he was tried, convicted, and driven into exile in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 50).

Apōllōnia, æ, f. Polina, a maritime town in the west of Græcia, Greece, on Æas, v. Aōus, the Viosu (Holland), where it falls into the Gulf of Venice, built by the Corcyræans and Corinthiāns. Plinius says it was about 7 miles from the sea, but we have the authority of Cæsar for calling it a sea-port (B. C. iii. 5). From this town Lūcillus carried to Rome, and placed in the capitol, a famous statue of Apōllo, 45 feet high, which, according to Plinius, cost 500 talents. Inh. Apōllōniātes, ium, v. Apōllōniāte, arum, m. Adj. Apōllōniēnsis, is, e, v. Apōllōniēticus, a, um.

—2. Sizeboli, a town of Thrācia, on the coast of the Archipelago (Just. xv. 2). Inh. Apōllōniēnses, ium, m. (Just. ix. 2).—3. A town of Mācedōnia, at which Pērseus met L. Æmilius Paulus, by whom he had been conquered (Liv. xlv. 28).—4. A city of Assyria (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).—5. Another, on the Black Sea, two days' journey distant from the sources of Tēarus (Herod. iv. 90).

Apōllōnides, is, m. a governor under Darius, who was given up bound to the officers under Alexander the Great, by the inhabitants of Chios, in 332 B. C. (Curt. iv. 5).—2. A Syracusan nobleman, whose judicious speech to his countrymen divided in opinion respecting the Romans and Carthaginians, in 216 B. C., Livius has recorded (xxiv. 28).

Apōllōnis, idis, et, Apōllōnidēa, v. Apōllōnidia, æ, f. a town of Lycia. Inh. Apōllōnidēnses, ium, m. (Tac. Ann. ii. 47).

Apōllōnius, i, m. an officer of Alexander the Great, whom he appointed governor of that part of Africa adjoining to Egypt, in 331 B. C. (Curt. iv. 8).—2. Commanded part of the fleet of Antiochus Magnus in the engagement with the Rhodians off Sida in 192 B. C. The royal fleet was defeated, and Hannibal, who commanded the squadron on the left, was greatly dispirited by the loss of this one battle (Liv. xxxvii. 23).—3. Ambassador of Antiochus Epiphanēs at the senate of Rome, who, from the nature of the embassy, as well as from the valuable presents which he brought, was graciously received, presented with a hundred thousand asses, had a whole house for his accommodation, and his expenses defrayed as long as he was in Italy, in 175 B. C. The ambassadors who had been in Syria reported that he stood very high in the king's favour, and that he was a very great friend to the Roman people (Liv. xlii. 6).—4. A native of Chalcis, Egripa, who instructed the Roman Emperor, M. Antoninus, in philosophy. For that purpose Antoninus Pius had invited him from his native city to come to Rome, and on his arrival the Emperor sent for him to the palace; but the philosopher refused to go, alleging as a reason, that the scholar ought to wait on the master, and not the master on the scholar. When the Emperor received his answer, he said, laughing, "it is easier for Apollonius to come from Chalcis to Rome, than from Rome to the palace" (Eutrop. viii. 12).—5. A native of Tysana in Cappadocia, was born about the beginning of the first century. Adopting the opinions of Pythagoras, he observed his rules with uncommon strictness, abstained from the use of animal food, wine, and women. From his knowledge of medicine, or more probably of the virtues of herbs, he effected many wonderful cures, of which infidels have made a very unjustifiable use. Philostratus gave to the world a detailed account of this philosopher's life, in which he mentions so many improbabilities that the whole may be considered merely as fiction (Amm. Mar. xxi. 14).

Apōllōnius Mōlo, Apōllōni Mōlonis, m. a native of Alabānda, who obtained distinction as a rhetorician. He appears to have supported himself by teaching rhetoric, and had some eminent characters for his scholars. It is enough to mention M. Tullius Cicero, who studied under him both at Rome and in the island Rhōdos. This celebrated orator has recorded some of his sayings, and described some of his peculiarities. An epigram on Apollonius occurs in Mārtialis. The poet laughs at him for forgetting the names of the persons whom he was to salute, on which account he wrote out their names and committed them to memory (v. 22).

Apōllōphānes, is, m. an officer in the fleet of Sextus Pompeius. By the united attack of Apollōphānes and Demochares, Augustus was completely defeated, and, with difficulty, escaped with only one ship (Suet. Octav. 16).

Apōnius, i, m. a man put to death by the second triumvirate (Ap. Bel. Civ. 604).

Apōnius Sātūrninus, Apōnii Sātūrnini, m. a Roman who fell asleep at a sale at which the Emperor Cālgula was present. Observing Apōnius asleep, Cālgula desired the auctioneer to observe his nods, and to consider them as higher offers, a hint which he necessarily followed out, and adjudged thirty-seven slaves to the sleeper at a most enormous sum (Suet. Cal. 38).

M. Apōnius Sātūrninus, M. Apōnii Sā-

[illegible]

1. Apollonius, a Roman senator, commanded a Roman squadron in Persia, in 217 B. C. (Liv. 39). A Roman general under P. Scipio Africanus, who was at Mytilene, where he captured the island across than the sea, he commanded the fleet of that country, and lived in the memory of his activity, and his spirit. In a. d. 116, 122 B. C.

...the office of city
...have been his
...Three coun-
...a colony in ...formed one of ...the town, in
...It has
...hundred
...to the ...pre-
...of the

...of the
...from
...the
...
...of fair
...Flas-
...at-
...and
...in
...They
...laid
...N.Y.

[illegible]

after the
the European countries, the standard is dark blue, with three being amongst the most common, at a third of others. The Russian standard, at first, was a triangle of blue and a pale blue triangle, a year after, which was to denote the third part of a coat, then of red, sometimes of silver, and was made of gold, in different forms. Marked, during his second expedition, transferred into the Russian army the Eagle, which continued to be the Eagle till the liberation of the empire. The mark of originality does not belong to the Russian, for we have the authority of Koutchouk to maintain, that it was first used as a military standard by the Persians. Sometimes, it is a standard-bearer, whose office seems, in some degree, to correspond to that of Herald with us. His place was in the first rank. To allow the standard to fall into the hands of the enemy, was reckoned highly disgraceful to the whole legion, which is still the case in modern times, but particularly in the persons who carried it. In one instance mentioned by Livy, the standard-bearer was the first to die. But the Convention effected the same punishment at that time, and the army was dedicated for cowardice and treachery. It does not appear from Roman history, that measure was not to such service, unless in instances of wild destruction of duty, proceeding either from cowardice, or treachery manifest.

Apollonia, n. f. a considerable place in NE. A. about 22 miles from Clupea, mentioned in Caesar (B. C. II. 25). It had a harbor, reached by two promontories, which was convenient for shipping in the summer months. Here C. Caesarius from Sicily landed two legions, and 200 boats, on 10th the Vindis on Mts. Hadrianum, the city of Vesio. Strabo says it was built by Romans, to resist the incursions of the Germans, when their territory on that coast did not extend further north. The same has been thought to be derived from its name (Vesio) lying over the site at the time the solution was laid; but more probably it is the Roman standard, in consequence of legions having been long stationed in place. From its splendour and magnificence, it was sometimes called Atrium Solis. A Roman colony was settled there 5 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 51). Antioch, king of Huns, after a long and obstinate siege, ordered it, in the year 626, and completely the city destroyed, that the next generation should scarcely discover its ruins. Since time, a few soldiers' huts point out the place near which it stood. Agrippa, according to Pliny, was at the distance of 100 paces from the coast. Agrippa.

pulla, n. f. a woman convicted of adultery with Varus Niger, and executed at the instigation of the Emperor Tiberius (Tac. iv. 42).

in an island at the mouth of the River, Brissot had taken and plundered the Indian camps next the sea (T. 31).

Niger, Aquila Niger, m. a. Fl.

Q. Appuleius, Q. Appulei, m. one of the ten commissioners appointed to distribute the unoccupied lands in Liguria and the north of Italy, in 175 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 4).

Q. Appuleius Pansa, Q. Appulei Pansae, m. a Roman who was consul with M. Valerius Maximus in 302 B. C. They invested Nequinum, Narni, in Umbria, without carrying it, and it fell into the hands of the succeeding consuls (Liv. x. 5-9).

Apres, is, m. a nobleman of the Cölchi, who held a command at the time the Argonauts arrived, and appears to have been killed by Cólaxes (Val. Flacc. vi. 638).

Apri, orum, f. Apro, a town of Thracia, on the river Mēlos (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).

Apries, is, m. son of Psāmmis, a king of Egypt; in the beginning of his reign most fortunate, in the end driven from his throne in consequence of his being defeated by the Cyrenians (Herod. ii. 161 seq.).

Aprōnia, ae, f. daughter of L. Aprōnīus, and wife of Plautius Silvānus, by whom she was murdered (Tac. Ann. iv. 22).

C. Aprōnīus, C. Aprōnīi, m. elected a tribune of the people in 449 B. C. Besides this tribune, four of his colleagues were chosen, not from their previous merits but from expectation of their future conduct (Liv. iii. 54).

L. Aprōnīus, L. Aprōnīi, m. a Roman knight, who held a commission under Gērmanicus, and his conduct procured him triumphal ornaments. He was sent against Tacfarinas into Africa, of which country he had been proconsul, having been consul in the year 8, and had decorated a cohort, of which the behaviour had been disgraceful in an engagement with Tacfarinas q. v. Each man upon whom the lot had fallen died under repeated blows of a stick. His daughter Aprōnia was married to Plautius Silvānus, who murdered her. L. Aprōnīus having seized him, immediately carried him before the Emperor, and his guilt appearing indubitable, he had his veins cut to escape an ignominious death. He was likewise the father-in-law of Cn. Cōrnēlius Lēntulus Gætūlicus q. v. (Tac. Ann. i. 29 seq.).

L. Aprōnīus Cēsianus, L. Aprōnīi Cēsianī, m. son of L. Aprōnīus, distinguished himself when serving under his father in Africa at the head of a detachment against Tacfarinas in the year 20; eight years after, he displayed great bravery and activity when proprætor in Lower Germany, although the Frisians gained an advantage over him (Tac. Ann. iv. 73; xi. 19).

Apsēdes, is, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. Il. xviii. 46).

Apsorus, i, v. Bathys, is, m. the Sorak, a river of Moschica, which falls into the Black Sea.

Apsus, i, m. the Crevasta (D'Anv.), the Berat (Hughes), a small river of Græcia, Greece, which, running westward, falls into Mārē Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, to the N. of Apollōnia. Cæsar and Pompey encamped on the opposite banks of this river, where, according to Lūcānus, they first came in sight of each other. To the Apsus, Lūcānus joins the adjective mollior, which indicates that it was a gently flowing stream (Phar. v. 462).

Apūa, ae, f. Pontremoli, a town of Liguria. Inh. Apūāni, orum, m. to which Ligures is frequently added, the Apuan Liguri-ans, often made war on their neighbours, which rendered it necessary for the Roman armies to march against them. Though frequently subdued, they still had recourse to arms, and at last were removed from their own country to Samnium (Liv. xxxix. 2 seq.).

Apūleia Vārilla, Apūlēne Vārillæ, f. daughter of Apūlēus and Marcella Māior, and granddaughter of a sister of Augustus, who was accused of uttering words to the dishonour of Augustus, and also against the Emperor Tiberius and his mother. To these charges adultery was added, and for this crime she was banished to a distance of two hundred miles from Rome. The Emperor and his mother desired that the language affecting them should not be brought against her, and with respect to Augustus she had a sentence of acquittal (Tac. Ann. ii. 50).

L. Apūlēus, L. Apūlēi, m. a tribune of the people, who brought M. Fōrlus Cīmīlus to trial, respecting the plunder of Vei, for which that general had to go into banishment, being unable to pay the fine of fifteen thousand asses, in 390 B. C. (Liv. v. 32).

2. A Roman who, after being one of the ten commissioners for dividing the unoccupied lands of Liguria and the neighbourhood, was elected prætor in 168 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 4 seq.).—3. An eminent grammarian, who appears to have been born a slave, and manumitted by Efficus Cālvinus q. v.

L. Apūlēus Sātūrninus, L. Apūlēi Sātūrnīni, m. was violently appointed a tribune of the people by the assistance of C. Mārius, after the soldiers had killed his competitor, A. Nōnīus, and he exercised the office with no less violence than he had obtained it. He passed an agrarian law by force, and brought to trial Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Nūmidicus, because he had not sworn to the observance of this enactment. Anticipating the result of this prosecution, Cæcilius did not wait till sentence was pronounced, but retired into voluntary banishment at Rhodus. Apūlēus afterwards murdered C. Mēmōnius, a candidate for the consulship, for no other reason than that he feared opposition from him to his measures, on which the senate had recourse to force, when he and the associates of his criminal conduct atoned for the violation of the laws by an ignominious death, in 102 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 69). M. Tūllius Cicerō has recorded most of the facts above stated, and subjoined a few additional circumstances, as have likewise Applianus and Plūtarchus. These particulars, however, bearing chiefly upon the same point, render further detail unnecessary. To him Sallustius alludes (Frag. 1); and Tacitus (Ann. iii. 27). Adj. Apūlēianus, et, Apūlēus, a, um. Apūlēiana seditio (Flor. iii. 12). Apūlēia lex (Aur. Vic. Vir. Il. 61).

Sextus Apūlēus, Sexti Apūlēi, m. held the office of consul with Sextus Pōmpēius, when Tiberius succeeded to the imperial throne in the year 14, and these two took the first oath of fidelity to that Emperor (Tac. Ann. i. 7).

Apūlia, ae, f. Puglia, a district of Italia, Italy, bounded on the N. by the river Fortere, on the W. by Cāmpānia and Lūcānia, on the S. by Cālābria, and on the E. by Mārē Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice. From Jūvénalis, land in Apūlia appears to have been low priced, either from its being unfruitful and mountainous, or the atmosphere unwholesome (Sat. iv. 27). It was divided into two districts, Daunia, Capitanata, and Peucetia, Terra di Bari. The climate, from its southern latitude, was hot, hence Hôrâtius, uxor perniciis Apuli perusta solibus, the wife of the swift Apulian, scorched by the sun, i. e. from her working in the fields (Epid. ii. 42). The women of Apulia, like the Sabines, were distinguished for frugality and moral purity. Inf. Apuli, orum (sing. Apulus, i), m. divided by Plinius into three tribes, Daunii, Teani, and Lucani (l. 355). Adj. Apulicus, et, Apulus, a, um. Apulicum mare, the Gulf of Venice (Hor. Od. iii. 24. 4). Apuli lupi, Apulian wolves (Hor. Od. l. 33. 7).

L. Apustius, L. Apustii, m. a lieutenant-general, who commanded a Roman squadron at Tarentum, Taranto, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 38).—2. A lieutenant-general under the Roman consul P. Sulpicius Galba, who sent him against Macedonia, where he carried on war with greater success than clemency. He afterwards commanded the fleet which acted against that country, and Livius has recorded many instances of his activity, bravery, and enterprising spirit. In a disorderly combat he lost his life, 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 27 seq.).

L. Apustius Fullo, L. Apustii Füllonis, m. was elected plebeian edile in 202 B. C. He afterwards was raised to the office of city praetor, and this appears to have been his highest civil preferment. Three commissioners were appointed to settle a colony in Thaurinus ager, and Apustius formed one of that number (Liv. xxxi. 4 seq.).

Aque Sextius, Aquarum Sextiarum, f. Aix, a town of Provence, founded in 124 B. C., by C. Sextus Calvinus q. v. It has cold and hot springs. Near this town, in 105 B. C., C. Marius killed two hundred thousand of the Teutones and Ambrones, besides making ninety thousand prisoners (Liv. Ep. 68. Flor. iii. 3).

Aquarius, i, m. the eleventh sign of the Zodiac. Lēis Aquarius, lightened, viz., from the toil of bearing the Sun, i. e. when the sun passes to Piscis (Ov. Fast. ii. 457).

Aquiculus, i, m. one of the Rutili, of fair renown in arms, who, with Tmarus, Haemon, Quercens, and their whole troops, attempted to burst in, when Pandarus and Bittas opened the gates of the city, and in defiance invited the enemy to enter. They either turned their backs in flight, or laid down their lives in the very gate (Virg. Æn. ix. 684).

Aquila, æ, m. an Eagle; also the standard of a Roman legion. From the second consulship of Marius, and under the Emperors, the standards were most commonly of silver, seldom of gold, in the form of an Eagle, from which the name is derived. The preference was given to the former metal, according to Pliny, because it is seen at a greater distance than the latter. But though the figure of the Roman Ensigns was always that of an Eagle, they were not always precisely alike. Sometimes they resembled an Eagle in a standing posture; at others, with outstretched wings, which was the most common form; and not unfrequently with a turret on their backs. In British and most European countries, the standards are cloth, silk, &c., which from being variegated are called colours, or a stand of colours. The Roman standard, at first, was a bundle of hay fixed to a pole, Mimiphus, a term afterwards used to denote the third part of a cohort, then of wood, sometimes of silver, and more rarely of gold, in different forms. Marius, during his second consulship, introduced into the Roman army the Eagle, which continued to be the Ensign till the destruction of the empire. The merit of originality does not belong to the Romans, for we have the authority of Xenophon to maintain, that it was first used as a military standard by the Persians. Aquilifer, eri, m. a standard-bearer, whose office seems, in some degree, to correspond to that of Ensign with us. His place was in the first line. To allow the standard to fall into the hands of the enemy, was reckoned highly disgraceful to the whole legion, which is still the case in modern times, but particularly to the person who carried it. In one instance recorded by Livy, the standard-bearer was, for this crime, put to death. But the Centurions suffered the same punishment at that time, and the army was decimated for cowardice and treachery. It does not appear from Roman history, that recourse was had to such severity, unless in instances of wilful dereliction of duty, proceeding either from unmanly timidity, or treacherous intention.

Aquila, æ, f. corrupted from Aquilina q. v. (Aur. Vic. Cæs. 27).

Aquilaria, æ, f. a considerable place in Africa, about 22 miles from Clippa, mentioned by Caesar (B. C. ii. 23). It had a harbour, protected by two promontories, which was convenient for shipping in the summer months. Here C. Curio from Sicily, Sicily, landed two legions, and 500 horses, 49 B. C.

Aquileia, æ, f. a seaport of the Veneti on Mare Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice. Strabo says it was built by the Romans, to repel the inroads of the barbarians, when their territory on that coast did not extend farther north. The name has been thought to be derived from an eagle (Aquila) flying over the site at the time the foundation was laid; but more probably from the Roman standard, in consequence of two legions having been long stationed in that place. From its splendour and magnificence, it was sometimes called Roma Secunda. A Roman colony was settled there in 185 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 55). Attila, king of the Huns, after a long and obstinate siege, plundered it, in the year 452, and so completely was the city destroyed, that the next generation could scarcely discover its ruins. Since that time, a few fishermen's huts point out the place near which it stood. Aquileia, according to Pliny, was at the distance of 1500 paces from the coast. Adj. Aquileus, a, um.

Aquilla, æ, f. a woman convicted of adultery with Varius Egiur, and banished at the suggestion of the Emperor Tiberius (Tac. Ann. iv. 42).

Aquilus, i, m. a first centurion, left with troops in an island at the mouth of the Rhine, after Brinno had taken and plundered the two Roman camps next the sea (Tac. Hist. iv. 15).

Aquilius Niger, Aquilli Nigri, m. a R man who declared that he had killed the consul, A. Hirtius, in the confusion of the battle (Suet. Aug. 11).

Aquilius Rēgulus, Aquilii Rēguli, m. extremely hated on account of the overthrow of the houses of the Crassi, and Orphitus, on the ruins of which he expected to raise himself. His brother, Vipstanius Messala, undertook his defence, and got great reputation by his eloquence and good temper. The false information of Aquilius Rēgulus, had branded him with the odious name of accuser of the innocent (Tac. Hist. iv. 42).

Aquilii, orum, m. brothers, but Livius does not mention their number, who entered into a conspiracy for the restoration of the Tarquins, in 509 B. C. In this plot were involved Vitellii, and two sons of the consul, L. Junius Brutus (Liv. ii. 4).

C. Aquilius Flōrus, C. Aquilii Flōri, m. consul with L. Cornēlius Scipio, in 261 B. C. From that part of Livius' history being lost, nothing further respecting Aquilius is known (Eutrop. ii. 20).

C. Aquilius Tuscus, C. Aquilii Tūsci, m. a noble Roman, who held the consulship with T. Sicius Sabinus, in 487 B. C. During the time he continued in that office he conquered the Hernici (Liv. ii. 40).

L. Aquilius Corvus, L. Aquilii Corvi, m. a military tribune, with consular power, in 387 B. C. (Liv. vi. 4).

Mānius Aquilius Crāssus, Mānii Aquilii Crāssi, m. a Roman consul, in 132 B. C., went against Aristonici, whom he wished to make an ornament of his triumph, rather than adorn the procession of M. Perpenna, by whom he had been conquered (Just. xxxvi. 4).

—2. A Roman proconsul, who put an end to the war of the slaves in Sicily, in 101 B. C. He was accused of extortion, and refused to solicit the favour of the judges, on which M. Antonius, his advocate, cut up his vest and showed the marks of his wounds in front, the sight of which produced his immediate acquittal. Cicero is the only author who mentions this fact. He was defeated by Mithridates, in 90 B. C., who is said to have put him to death by pouring melted gold into his mouth (Liv. Ep. 69—77).

P. Aquilius, P. Aquilii, m. a Roman, appointed with M. Ogulnius, to purchase grain in Etruria for the citadel of Tarentum, Taranto, in 212 B. C. The Romans sent one thousand soldiers with that grain to reinforce the garrison (Liv. xxvii. 3).

Aquilo, ōnis, m. the north wind, called by the Greeks, Bōrēas (Gel. ii. 22). Adj. Aquilonius, a. um. Aquilonia prōles, Zēthes and Cālās (Prop. i. 20. 25).

Aquilōnia, a. f. Carbonara (Cluv.), Lacedæna (others), a town of the Hirpini, taken and plundered by L. Pāpilius Cursor, the consul, who burned it to the ground, in 295 B. C. Thirty thousand and three hundred of the Samnites were killed there, three thousand eight hundred and seventy taken, with ninety-seven military standards (Liv. x. 33—44). —2. Agnois, stands to the east of the Apennines, between Sāgrus, the Sangro, and Trinius, the Trigno.

Aquilus, i, m. a bad poet, who appears to have written with great malignity (Cat. xiv. 18). A friendship existed between him and Cicero (Cic. Tusc. v. 22).

Aquūm, i, n. Aquino, a town of Lātium, on Melpis, the Melfa, a branch of Liris, the Garigliano. Juvēnalis, the celebrated Roman satirist, was a native of this town. Inh. Aquinates, ium (sing. Aquinas, ātis), m. excelled in dyeing a kind of purple. It required nice discernment to observe the difference between it and that of Tyros. Adj. Aquinas, as, as; ātis. Aquinas fucus, a purple dye (Hor. Epist. i. 10. 27). Aquinas colōnia (Tac. Hist. i. 88).

Aquīnus, i, m. a man devoured by the huge serpent, which M. Atilius Rēgulus afterwards killed on the banks of Bāgrāda, the Mejerda (Sil. Ital. vi. 166).

Aquitānia, a. f. one of the three principal divisions of Gallia, France, bounded on the E. by Prōvincia, Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné, on the N. by the river Gārūma, the Garonne, which separates it from Gallia Cēltica, on the W. by Océānus Cāntabrieus, the Bay of Biscay, and on the S. by Pyrēnei Montes, the Pyrenees, or Pyrenean Mountains, which divide France from Hispania, Spain. As Aquitānia was much less than either of the other two divisions, Augustus extended its northern boundary to Ligēris, the Loire. M. Valērius Mēssala had the honour of a triumph for reducing this district into the form of a province, in 29 B. C. (Con. Cal.). It contained more than twenty different nations, not numerous, nor much known, all bearing a greater resemblance in language and form to the Spaniards than to the Gauls. Inh. Aquitāni, orum (sing. Aquitānus, i), m. the Aquitanians. They excelled as miners, from having mines of brass (Ces. B. G. iii. 21). Flōrus relates, they were a cunning people, and concealed themselves in caves, which Caesar ordered to be shut up. This manner of putting the people to death discovered great cruelty of disposition (iii. 10). Adj. Aquitānicus, ā, Aquitānus, a. um. Mārē Aquitānicum, the Bay of Biscay. Aquitāna gens (Iib. ii. 1. 33).

Aquites, is, m. priest of Phāsīs, the Phaz, a river of Cōlchis, who was killed in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. vi. 295).

Ara, a. f. the name of a constellation consisting of eight stars in the southern hemisphere, hence pressa ara (Ov. Met. ii. 139).

Arābarches, a. m. a præfect of Arābia (Juv. Sat. i. 130). The reading is doubtful, and the meaning of the passage disputed.

Arābia, a. f. a country of Asia, generally considered, in ancient times, as bounded on the north by Pālēstina, on the east by Euphrātes, the El Frat, on the south by the Indian Ocean, and on the west by Sinus Arābicus, the Red Sea, or the Arabian Gulf, and Isthmus of Suez. That the territories of the Arabians frequently exceeded these bounds, particularly on the east and west, is manifest, from their possessing a considerable part of Mēsōpōtāmia, Jezirah, and the whole of the western shore of the Red Sea. Ptolēmaeus is the first geographer who mentions the divisions of Arābia, viz., Petrea, stony, Deserta, desert, and Felix, happy; but Plinius employed the same terms (only he has Bēta, in place of Felix) in his description of that country. Arābia Felix is called by the natives, Aden, and is by far the most valuable part of Arābia. Arābia Petrea, supposed to have its name from Petrā, its capital, or from the number of granitic rocks and mountains, lies to the north of Arābia Félix, and to the west of Arābia Deserta, the greater part of which is sandy desert, over which the traveller has to direct his course, either by the heavenly bodies, or by the mariner's compass. Inh. Arābes, um (sing. Arābis, ābis), m. Arābes Ascīte, Arabians who had this name from the Greek word, signifying a bladder, because they laid hurdles upon bladders, and crossed the sea on them, as in ships, and thus infested the Red Sea by their piracies. Arābes Aulēi, had their settlement on the west side of the Red Sea, and afterwards had the Arabic district of Egypt. Conjoined with them were the Arābes Gebādēi. Arābes Cānchlēi bordered on Syria on the east, whom some have supposed to be the Amalecīte of Sacred Scripture. Arābes Cōdrēi lived on the south, and probably had their name from inhabiting Cedar, or rather Kedar, a district of the Saracēni, according to Hērōnīmus, and so called from a son of Ishmael. Arābes Orēi (i. e. mountaineers, from ōre), inhabited part of Mēsōpōtāmia. Arābes Retāvi appear to have been contiguous to those last mentioned, and their chief town was Singāra. Arābes Scēnīte, in Arābia Petrea, had their name probably from living in tents. They are also called Saracēni, and in Holy Writ, Imācēlīte. Arābes Trōlōdīte, a tribe, who lived on the western coast of the Red Sea (Curt. iv. 7). Livius says, that the archers of the Arabians rode on dromedaries, and had swords four cubits long (xxxvii. 40). Dices Arabs cultor sōdōrāte sēgētis, the rich Arabian, the cultivator of an odoriferous crop (Tib. iv. 2. 18). Adj. Arābicus, et, Arābius, a, um. Arābius Sinus, the Red Sea (Cor. Nep. Frag. vii. 3). See Mārē Rubrum. Adv. Arābicē, after the manner of the Arabs.

Arābīte, arum, m. a people of Gedrōsīa, whose country is now called Arābia. Curtius makes the Gedrōsīi and Arābīte inhabit different countries (ix. 10).

Arābus, i, m. a man killed by Hādrūbal whilst he attempted to strip Nābis of his armour (Sil. Ital. xv. 693).

Arābus, e, Arābius, i, e, Arābis, is, m. the Meas, or, the Pooralee, a river of Gedrōsīa, in which lived the Arābīte, and from which they received that name (Curt. ix. 10).

Arāchia, e, f. a town of Sūsīāna (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Arāchnē, es, f. a woman of Lydīa, whose father's name was Idmon. She excelled in weaving, in which art she challenged Minerva to a contest, and, having been surpassed, hanged herself. The goddess, in commiseration of her unhappy fate, turned her into a spider, called by the Greeks Arachnē, and by the Latins Arāchnē. Perhaps in ancient times Arāchnē was a common appellation of women who excelled in spinning, dyeing and weaving, and afterwards when it became a proper name the word may have given origin to the fable which Ovidius has beautifully sung (Met. vi. 5-145). Adj. Arāchnēus, a, um.

Arāchōsīa, e, f. a country lying to the west of Indus, the Sind, which fell to the lot of Sibyrīus at the death of Alexander the Great. Inh. Arāchōsīi, orum, m. (Just. xlii. 4).

Arāchōtoserēnē, es, f. a lake or marsh in Arāchōsīa (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Arāchthus, i, m. the Arta, is the same with Arētho, v. Arēthon q. v. and is variously written.

Arācillum, i, n. a town in the north of Spain, which resisted the Roman arms with great bravery, although at last obliged to submit (Flor. iv. 12).

Arācynthus, i, m. Zigos, a celebrated mountain of Ætōlia or Acarnānia, hence Actaus Arācynthus (Virg. B. ii. 24).

Arādus, i, m. a man in the army of Hānūbal, killed by Mūrrus (Sil. Ital. i. 380).

Arādus, i, et, Ardos, i, f. (Plin.), Rund, an island of Phoenicia, supposed to be called Arvad in Scripture (Ezek. xxvii. 8), about two hundred paces from the shore, and less than a mile in circumference. On this island stood a cognominal town which, with Tyrus and Sidon, formed Tripōlis. Inh. Arādīi, orum, m. whose territory Strabo mentions (1070).

Arēthyrēa, e, f. a city of the Argīvi (Hom. Il. ii. 571).

Arāgus, i, m. the Aragua, a river of Ibēria, one of the tributaries of Cyrrus, the Kar.

Arar, āris, acc. im, e in, ab. e, v. i, m. (called also Sauconna, whence, probably, the modern name, Amm. Mar. xv. 11), the Saone, a very slow smooth-running river of Gallia, France, which takes its rise near Vogēsus, Mount Vange, runs southward, and, after receiving several streams, falls into Rhōdānus, the Rhone, at Lugdūnum, Lyon, or Lyons. Lucānus describes this river as rapid and impetuous, hastening the Rhone along with it (Phar. vi. 476). The poet Claudīanus writes Arāris in the nominative (v. 111 &c.).

Arārat, n. indec. Maas (Armenīais), Agri-Dagh (Turks), a mountain of Armenia.

Arārus, i, m. the Sereth, a river of Scythia, and northern branch of the Danube (Herod. iv. 48).

Arathis, is, f. wife of Dāmāscus, king of Syria, in whose honour he built a splendid tomb, which was regarded as a temple (Just. xxxvi. 2).

Arātus, i, m. a Greek poet, born at Sōli, afterwards Pōmpēiōpōlis, Mezethu, a town of Cilicia, in the reign of Ptolēmīus Philādēlphus. The talents which he discovered in early life induced his parents to give him a good education. He adopted the opinions of the Stoics, studied medicine, and acted as physician to Antīgōnus Gōnātas, king of Macedōnia, to whose court he had been invited by that prince, from a love of literature and a desire to encourage learned men. Here he wrote his poem entitled Phanōmēna, in which he describes the motions of the stars, their nature, influences, and relations. Cicero, in very early life, translated this poem into Latin verse, as did also Germanicus Cæsar, and Festus Avlēnus. A few fragments only of Cicero's version now remain. The numerous commentators on the Phanōmēna show the high esteem in which the learned held this poem, which must be considered an ingenious and beautiful treatise on a subject not remarkably suited for poetical embellishment. Virgilius owes obligations to him in different parts of the Georgics, and the Apostle Paul has quoted some of his words in his speech to the Athenians (1).

xvii. 28). Nōtus Arātus, celebrated Arātus (Stat. Syl. v. 3. 23). Adj. Arātēus, et. Arātius, a., um. Arātēa (carmina) (Cic. Div. ii. 5). Arātium carmen (Cic. Leg. ii. 3).—2. A Lacedæmonian, who advised the sending of the youth home from the Messenian war, that the state might not suffer from want of children. His son Phālānthus conducted to Italy the children born in consequence of that advice (Just. iii. 4). See Parthēnia.—3. A man of distinction among the Achæi, from whom Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, when he came to assist that nation against the Etōli and their allies in 210 B. C., took away his wife Pōlycrātia, pretending that she would be married to a sovereign prince (Liv. xxvii. 31).—4. A native of Sicyon, son of Clinias, whom Philippus murdered, although he used to call him his father (Liv. xxxii. 21).—5. Son of the former, whom Philippus likewise unlawfully bereaved of life, and whose spouse he carried off to Mæcēdōnia for the gratification of his own licentiousness (Liv. xxxii. 21).

Arauricus, i., m. an eminent warrior of the same age with Phoreys, pursued by Hānnibal at Trāsimēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 557).

Aravisci, orum, m. a people of Pānnōnia (Tac. Mor. Ger. 23). Ptolēmaeus places them in the north-east corner of that country.

Araxates, corruptedly written by Ammianus Marcellinus for Iaxartes q. v. (xxiii. 6).

Arāxes, is, m. the Arash, or Arrassow, has its rise in the same mountains with Euphrates, the Frat, at the distance of only six thousand paces, and, after being increased by the river Mūris, falls into Cýrus, the Kur, which runs into Mārē Cāspium, the Caspian Sea. It formed the boundary between Mēdia and Armēnia, according to Appianus (Bel. Par. 163). Pōmpōnius Mēla has given an admirable description of this river (iii. 74). Xēnōphon calls the upper part of this stream by mistake Phāsis. The rapidity of Arāxes, the Arash, in certain parts of its course, Virgilius has elegantly described, pontem indignātus Arāxes (Æn. viii. 723).—2. An ancient name of Pēnēus, the Salampria, which Strābo derives from the Greek verb to break asunder, because it broke off Ossā from Olympos, and he thinks that the former river in Armēnia had its name from a similar cause (771).—3. See Chabōras.

Arbāca, æ, f. a town in Arāchōsia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Arbāces, is (Arbācus, i., v. Arbāetus, i.), m. the governor of Mēdia, in the reign of Sārdānāpālus, who formed a conspiracy against the life of his sovereign, and received the crown as the reward of his perty. By this prince the monarchy was transferred from the Assyrians to the Medians (Just. i. 3).

Arbācus, i., f. a town of Celtibēria (Sil. Ital. iii. 362). Stēphānus writes Arbācē. Inh. Arbāci, v. Arbāci, orum, m. (Aur. Vi. Vir. II. 61).

Arbates, æ, m. king of Cāppādōcia (Curt. x. 10).

Arbēla, æ, f. a town of Sicily, the situation of which is unknown (Sil. Ital. xiv. 271). The Greeks shorten the second syllable of this word, and used it in the plural as well as in the singular number. Inh. Arbēlei, orum (Sing. Arbēlaus, i.), m. From their extreme credulity arose the proverb mentioned by Sūidas "quid non fies Arbēlaus cite conferas."

Arbēla, orum, n. Erbil, a castle, according to Tacitus, memorable for the last battle between Dārius and Alexander the Great, which decided the fate of the Persian monarchy. It was situated to the north and east of Ninus, in Assyria, on the river Zabos (Tac. Ann. xii. 13). Arbēlitis, idis, f. the district round Arbēla. Inh. Arbēlitas, arum, m.

Arbocāla, æ, f. a city of the Cārtēi, which Hānnibal took after a defence long continued by the bravery and number of its inhabitants (Liv. xxi. 5).

Arbūscūla, æ, f. a comedian that lived in the time of Cicero, who commends her acting (Ep. ad Att. iv. 15); but Hōrātius mentions her having been hissed, and her despising that mark of insult as it proceeded from the common people, not from the Equites or Pātrici (Sat. i. 10. 77).

Arcādia, æ, f. an inland country in Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea. From the number of oaks which it produced, it was anciently called Drymōdes, afterwards Pēlāsgis, and at a later period, Arcādia, from Arcas, the son of Jūpiter and Cāllisto. The inhabitants were mostly shepherds, and excelled in music and pastoral poetry. Pēcūaria Arcādia, the pasture grounds of Arcādia, i. e. the herds of asses; from the Arcadians rearing a number of the largest and best kind of these animals (Pers. Sat. iii. 9). Arcas, ādos, an Arcadian. The Arcadians were reckoned dull and stupid, hence the Greek poets call them βουπαιδῆνες, delirious, silly; and Αρκάδιον βλάστημα, an Arcadian shoot, was proverbial, denoting mental incapacity. Pius Arcas, the pious Arcadian, i. e. Mērcūrius (Mart. ix. 35). Adj. Arcas, as, et. Arcādus, v. Arcādileus, a., um. Arcus dēa, Cāllisto (Val. Flacc. v. 206). Arcas (sidus), Bōotes (Val. Flacc. v. 371). Arcādii cōlōni (Stat. Th. ii. 50). Arcādici iuvenis, the Arcadian youth, i. e. the stupid or unteachable youth (Juv. Sat. vii. 160).—2. A city of Crēta (Sen. Nat. Quest. iii. 11).

Arcādus, i., m. eldest son of Thēodōsius the Great, was born in Spain, and succeeded his father as Emperor of the East in the year 395, when he was about eighteen years of age. In Constantinople he received an excellent education suited to his high rank, and here he lingered out an indolent life in the most extravagant magnificence. The powers of his mind were inferior to his station, and courtiers, who flattered his vanity, took advantage of his weakness, to govern the empire, for their own aggrandisement, but to the injury of the state. Eutrōpius, a eunuch, in advanced life, openly assumed the administration, satiated his own avarice, insulted the nobles, and performed almost every imperial office. The reign of this favourite, however, did not continue long. The rebellion of Tribigild, and the conspiracy of Gainas, roused the careless Emperor to activity, on purpose to prevent, if possible, the loss of his Asiatic dominions; yet neither now, nor at any former or later period of his reign, can one single measure be mentioned, which properly belonged to him. The Empress, the rapacious and haughty Eudoxia, predeceased Arcādus, leaving only one son, Thēo-

Arctus, the younger, said by some to have been the son of Count John, rather than of Arctidius. This Emperor died at Constantinople, in the thirty-first year of his age, and fourteenth of his reign (Claud. v. 143 seq.).

Arctidius, i. m. a river of Asia Minor, which falls into the Black Sea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). In Ptolemy the nominative appears to be Arctidis.

Arctidius, m. m. a son of Mithridates (Ap. Bel. Mith. 181).

Arctus, utia, m. a Sicilian, who sent his son to the assistance of Æneas. The youth was killed by Mæcænius (Virg. Æn. ix. 581-589).

Arctylas, m. m. a Greek philosopher, by birth an Æolian, was a scholar of Polemôn, and, on settling at Athens, became the founder of the middle academy. He denied the evidence of the senses, maintaining that nothing could be certainly known. His learning entitled him to higher respect than the purity of his morals, or the moderation of his appetites (Pers. Sat. iii. 79).

Archelaus, i. m. a commander of the Boeotians, who was killed by Hæctor (Hom. Il. ii. 436: xv. 329).—2. A native of Cyrênê, whom Pindarus celebrates (Pyth. iv. and v). There were other two of this name born at the same place (Herod. iv. 159 seq.).—3. An officer of Alexander the Great, at whose death Mesopotamia, Al-jesrah, fell to his lot (Just. xii. 4).—4. A friend of the tyrant Agathocles, by whom Archagathus was killed in 307 B. C. (Just. xii. 8).

Archelus, i. m. a son of Jupiter, the father of Læertes, and grandfather of Ulysses (Ov. Met. xii. 144). According to Hæginus, who calls him Archus, he was the only son of Cephalus and Procris q. v. (189).

Archagathus (Diódorus and Polybius write Archagathus), i. m. a son of Agathocles, tyrant of Sicily, who accompanied his father into Africa, where, for some time, he commanded the army against the Carthaginians. After his father, after a severe defeat, deserted both him and the army, the latter made peace with the enemy, and the former was slain (Just. xii. 5-7).

Archelaus, i. m. a commander under Alexander the Great, to whose care he entrusted Susa, and a garrison of three thousand men, in 331 B. C. (Curt. v. 2).—2. A king of Macedonia, who was killed and his death not resented on the perpetrators (Curt. vi. 11).—3. A son of Amyntas II. and Gygæa, killed by his brother Philippos (Just. vii. 4: viii. 3).—4. A nobleman of Acarnania, who, with Blænor, recommended an alliance with the Romans, for which they were afterwards condemned as guilty of treason. Resolved either to be acquitted, or to suffer whatever should happen, they with the prætor Zœuxidas went into an assembly of the people, and spoke at first in the manner of suppliants, afterwards stated their case with more boldness, and at last complained of the cruelty and injustice which they had received. By this determined conduct, the people were so much affected, that they repealed the decrees respecting them, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 16).—5. One of the generals of Mithridates, king of Pontus, who took Athens and Piræus in 89 B. C., and made a vigorous resistance against L. Cornélius Sulla, who retook that city during the following year. His defence of the latter against Sulla, is one of the noblest acts of bravery and military skill recorded by antiquity (Ap. Bel. Mith. 190 seq.). Sulla afterwards defeated the army of Mithridates in Thessalia, Thessaly, killed a hundred thousand, and took their camp by storm. That noble Roman entirely destroyed the army of Mithridates, on its being recruited, and again commencing active preparations against Piræus, on which Archelaus surrendered and gave up the royal fleet to Sulla (Liv. Ep. 78-82). From Plutarchus, Archelaus appears to have had camels in his army, both at Orchoménos, Screpá, and at Charônêa (Plut. Lucul.). The account of Eutropius differs a little from that of Livius (v. 6).—6. Appointed king by the Egyptians after they had dethroned Ptolémæus. A. Gabinius, proconsul of Syria, dethroned and put him to death, with his sister Bérénice, to whom he was married, and restored the banished king Ptolémæus to the throne, in 57 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 105. Dio xxxix. 57 seq.).—7. A king of Cappadocia, who filled the throne during a space of fifty years. To Tiberius, when residing in the island of Rhodus, he paid no sort of respect, not from any dislike to the prince, but acting on the advice of the friends of Augustus, and this incurred the resentment of his unforgiving mind. On his accession to the throne, Tiberius invited him to Rome, promising forgiveness of all past offences. Treachery lay at the bottom of this apparent kindness, for no sooner had the aged monarch arrived at Rome, than he was arraigned before the senate, and, though acquitted, sunk with grief at his degraded situation of a state prisoner. He died, but whether by his own hand, or a natural cause, Tacitus considers doubtful. His kingdom was then reduced into the form of a province (Tac. Ann. ii. 42).

Archémorus, i. m. was the son of Lycurgus, king of Némæa, by Eurydice. Apollodorus says, he was surnamed Ophêltes, and that some called his mother Amphithêa (i. 9). From this passage it appears, that his name at first was Ophêltes, and not the surname, as the same writer has mentioned in a different place. He relates that his nurse Hypsipylê went to show Adrastus and his companions, a spring of Längia, and having left the child, a serpent killed him before her return. These men destroyed the serpent, buried the child, called him Archémorus, and in honour of him instituted the Nemæan games. From that period, the fountain Längia bore his name (Stat. Th. iv. 719).—2. A son of Rhoetus, king of the Marrubii in Italy. His father married, after his mother's death, Caspéria, whom her step-son violated, and when Rhoetus came to the knowledge of his criminality, and wished to punish him, he fled to Turnus (Serv. ad Virg. Æn. x. 389). Noverca Archémôri, i. e. Caspéria (Juv. Sat. vii. 235). This name is also written Archémolus.—3. A man in the Carthaginian army, killed by Rüllus in the battle at Zama (Sil. Ital. xvii. 426).

Archêptolémus, i. m. the brave charioteer of Hector, whom Tæucer killed in place of his master. He succeeded Enlôpeus, and was the son of Iphitus (Hom. Il. viii. 312).

Archestrātus, i. m. a Grecian of some distinction (Plin. Ol. x. 2).

Archētiūs, i. m. a Rutulian, who was killed by Mnēsthēs (Virg. Æn. xii. 459).

Archias, æ. m. first magistrate of Thēbe, Theba, whose neglect of business for the gratifications of the table proved fatal to himself and to many others. Pēlōpidas, at the head of the exiles, attacked them, when drunk during the night, and delivered their country from the power of the Lacedæmonians (Cor. Nep. Pelop. 3).—2. A priest of Cēres, who, in a letter to Archias above-mentioned, narrated every particular respecting the march of the exiles. Having been seated at table when he received it, he put it under his pillow without breaking the seal, with this observation, "I defer all serious business till to-morrow." Pēlōpidas and the other exiles burst in upon him and his friends during the darkness, and put the whole to the sword, when drunkenness unfitted them for resistance, forced the Lacedæmonians from the garrison, and delivered their country from foreign domination (Cor. Nep. Pelop. 3).

Archidāmus, i. m. son of Agēsīlāus, who, when commander of the Lacedæmonian forces, was wounded in battle with the Thebans, in 385 B. C., and, observing his army overcome, demanded, by a herald, the bodies of the killed for burial. This requisition the Greeks considered an acknowledgment of defeat, and accordingly the Thebans sounded retreat (Just. vi. 6).—2. An Ætolian, who compelled Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, to raise the siege of Thaumāci, in 201 B. C. Eight years after, he was sent ambassador to the council at Ægium, where his language was most intemperate, particularly against T. Quinctius Flāminius, who made a keen and sarcastic reply (Liv. xxxii. 4 seq.).—3. A prince of the Ætoli, who attached himself to Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōniā, and was one of the three persons who accompanied him in his flight after he had been conquered by the Roman commander, L. Æmilius Paulus, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 21 seq.).

Archigēnes, is. m. a physician of great eminence, born at Apāmēa, a town of Sýria, who wrote a number of books on medicine, and exercised that profession at Rome, in the reigns of Dōmītiānus, Nērvā, and Trājanus. His name occurs often in the writings of Galēnus and Ætius. Juvēnālīs uses the name to denote any eminent physician, whose appearance the gullant was to assume (Sat. vi. 235). Others think that the poet in that passage charges physicians with the crime of adultery, which they committed under pretence of exercising their profession.

Archilōchus, i. m. a native of Pāros, Paro, a poet who flourished about 750 B. C. Romulo regnante vixit (Cic. Tusc. i. 1). He is supposed to have been the first who wrote in Iambic verse, a measure suited to satire, and to the bitter severity in which he indulged. He must have excelled in this kind of poetry, since Aristōphānes considered the Iambics of Archilōchus by far the best. Lēcambes gave to another his daughter Nēōbūlē after she had been betrothed to Archilōchus, on which account he wrote a poem against them, full of the keenest sarcasm, and poignant wit, which drove both to self-destruction. They hanged themselves. Some of his writings are still extant. The Lacedæmonians, for the obscenity of his verses, banished him from their territories, and condemned his writings. He appears to have been murdered, which Apōllo condemned, no doubt on account of the excellence of his genius (Plin. ii. 50). Of his poetical merits Cicero must have formed a very high opinion, since he mentions him between Hōmērus and Pindārus (Plin. ii. 35). Adj. Archilōchus, a. um, of Archilōchus; bitter, cutting, sarcastic. Archilōchium edictum Bibuli, the sarcastic edict of Bibulus (Cic. Att. ii. 20).—2. A son of Antēnor, skilled in every kind of fight. He warred under Ænēas, and was killed by Te-lamonian Ajax (Hom. Il. ii. 823—xiv. 464).

Archimēdes, is. m. one of the most celebrated geometricians of antiquity, was a native of Sýracūse, the capital of Sicily. By birth he was related to Hērō, king of that island, which, in ordinary characters, would be deemed an honour; but the extraordinary powers of his mind rendered him an honour to all his relations. In a knowledge of mathematics, history can place few men in competition with him, and he surpassed all in mechanical invention. He is said to have formed a glass sphere of most astonishing workmanship, in which he represented the motions of the heavenly bodies. The king had employed a jeweller to make him a crown of pure gold; but suspecting the fidelity of the artist, he gave it to Archimēdes to ascertain the quantity of alloy, which the mathematician ascertained by immersing it in a vessel full of water, and measuring the quantity which the crown caused to run over. The idea was suggested to him, after some days of severe study, by observing the water rise on the side of the bath as he went into it, and, transported at the discovery, he ran out into the streets naked, crying εὕρηκα. By means of the machines which he invented, Archimēdes baffled, for a considerable time, the best efforts of the Roman consul, M. Claudius Mārcellus, to take Sýracūse. Immediately after it fell into the hands of the Romans, 214 B. C., Archimēdes lost his life, but in what manner is not certainly known. Livius states that he was killed by a soldier, who knew not who he was, whilst intent upon some mathematical figures which he had drawn on the sand. Claudius regretted his death, gave him an honourable interment, and protected all the relations of that great man. Of his writings a considerable part is lost, but part is preserved (Liv. xxiv. 34 seq.).

Archippus, i. m. a king of Archippē, a town of the Marsi, swallowed up by Lācus Fūcīnus, Lago di Celano. It was built by Mārsyas, who was at the head of a party of Lydi (Plin. i. 360. Virg. Æn. vii. 752).—2. A native of Argos, who drove the garrison of Nābis out of that city, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 40).

Archo, ūs. f. a daughter of Hērōdēus, a Thessalian nobleman, whose father and husband Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, killed. She was afterwards married to Pōris, the chief of the Ænīates, by whom she had many children, and died when they were young (Liv. xl. 4).

Archos, i. t. Archon, ōntis. m. an officer under Alexander the Great, who, on the death of that prince, succeeded to the government of the Pélēgi (Just. xlii. 4). The reading here doubtful; perhaps it ought to run thus: "Archus obtained the Babylonians, Poncestes, the Persians, and Tleptolēmus, the Carmani."

Archytas, m., a philosopher, who adopted the opinions of his preceptor Pythagoras. Though born at Tarentum, Taranto, he was a Greek by extraction. Mathematics, astronomy, geometry, and mechanics appear to have been his favourite studies, and in all he excelled. As a proof of his ingenuity in the last, he made a wooden dove which flew, and invented several curious machines. Some fragments of his writings may be seen in Stobæus. His personal bravery saved his life when Pythagoras and some of his scholars were killed, and his military achievements added to the celebrity of his fame as a philosopher. The intimate friendship of Plato and Timæus gives proof both of his high character and attainments. A letter of the former to Archytas is still extant.

Arco, c. Arcion, ōtis, m. brother of Xēnarchus, prætor of the Achai, who was friendly to an alliance with Pērcēus, king of Macedōnia, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 24).

Archēnēsus, i., f. an island in the Archipelago, near the coast opposite Hălēcārñassus, Hălēcār.

Arctōphylax, ōcis, m. a constellation near the north pole, to which the Greeks gave this name from being, as it were, the companion and guardian of Ūrsa Mājor, and the Latins sometimes called it Custos Ūrsæ (Ov. Fast. ii. 153, 159).

Arctos, i., f. the Greek name of a constellation near the North Pole, which the Latins called Ūrsa Mājor. Callisto, daughter of Lŷcāon, visited by Jūpiter, and transformed by Jūno into a bear, was changed into this constellation, hence "clarissime Lŷcōnis Arcton" (Virg. G. i. 158). Her son Arcas was transformed into Arctōphylax, i. e. the Bear's keeper. She is also called Hēlicē, i. e. a revolving. Ūrsa Minor (also denominated Cŷnōsūra, i. e. the tail of the dog, by the Greeks,) was translated into this constellation by Jūpiter, in gratitude for her having been one of the nymphs who kept him. Hence there are two still names, the Greater, and the Less, Bear. Adj. Arctōus, a., um. of Aretos; northern. Arctos Osea (Stat. Th. iii. 319).

Arcturus, i., m. a constellation which, according to Cōlūmella, rises on the fifth day of September, and, according to Plinius, seven days before the equinox (Virg. G. i. 90). The name has been derived from its position, arctos osea, tail of the bear. Icārus was changed into this constellation, and his daughter Erigōnē into the sign Virgo (Hyg. ii. 11).

Arctus, i., m. a Grecian philosopher, whom the Emperor Augustus took into his family, who did also his sons Dīōnŷsius and Nicās. It does not appear that the Emperor did, even with these advantages, make great progress in Grecian literature, as he never learned either to speak or write the Greek language (Suet. Aug. 89).

Arctes, um., m. a people living on the west of the Black Sea (Orph. 1034).

Arctilius, i., m. a son of Vŷlcānus, said to have invented the pipe, and to have built a temple to the Muses, who are hence called Arctides (Paus. ii. 31).

Ardēa, m., f. a town of Lātium, built by Ardēas, a son of Ūlŷssēs and Cīrēa, who called it by his own name. According to Virgilius and Silius Itālicus it was built by Dānāē, who, after she was injured by Jūpiter, fled to Italy, and founded this town, which was anciently called Ardēa. On its being burned, the inhabitants said it was changed into a bird, called Ardēa, which, after it was rebuilt, became the name of the city (Virg. En. vii. 412). Here, Plinius says, there were paintings in his day older than Rome (v. 178). When Eneās arrived in Lātium, this city was the capital of the Rūtuli, which it continued to be for many generations afterwards. Tarquinius Sūpēbus was besieging it at the time he and his family were banished from Rome (Liv. i. 57). A colony from this place settled at Sīgūntum, Mureidro, hence Silius Itālicus applies the adjectives Dānŷlus and Rūtŷlus to that town, and its inhabitants. Inh. Ardēates, ium (Sing. Ardēas, ōtis), m. Adj. Ardēas, as, as, et, Ardēatinus, a., um. Ardēas templum, the temple of Ardēa (Plin. v. 222). Ardēatinum pradium (Cor. Nepi. Att. 14).—2. A city of Persia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Ardæi, orum, m. a people of Blyricum, frequently mentioned by Strābo, Pōlybius, &c., and their name occurs also in Lŷvius (xxvii. 30).

Ardēnā. See Hērđōnā. Inh. Ardēnā. Inh. Ardēnā. m., f. Ardenne, a forest of Gallia, France, the largest in that country, reaching, according to Cæsar, from Rhēnus, the Rhine, and territory of the Trēviri, to that of the Nērvii, upwards of 500 miles in length (Cæs. B. G. vi. 29). D'Anville makes the length about 160 miles, and supposes that Cæsar meant to write 160; but there is no good authority for this reading. The ground is now in many places cleared, and cities built upon it. Strābo says, the trees of this forest were not of a great height, and, although of great extent, it is less than the measurement of some writers, who estimate it at 4,000 stadia.

Ardēs, is, m. a son of Antōchus, king of Sŷria, sent along with his brother Mithridātes at the head of the army, and ordered to wait for their father at Sardes, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 19).

Arēacide, arum, m. a Numidian nation (Ap. Bel. Pun. 18).

Arēas, m., m. a Spartan commander against the Etōli (Just. xxiv. 1).

Arēcca, m., f. a town of Sŷsīāna, a district of Persia. Adj. Arēccæus, a., um. Arēccæi campi, Babylonian plains (Tibul. iv. 1. 142).

Arēcōmici, orum, m. a people of Gallia, France, who lived on Gallus Sīgus, the Gulf of Lyons, to the west of Rhōdānus, the Rhone (Cæs. B. G. vii. 7 seq.). See Volcæ.

Arēi, orum, m. an African nation, whose particular situation is unknown. They sent auxiliaries to the Rhodians, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 18).

Arēlŷcus, i., m. father of Prōthōemōn, wounded by Patrōclŷs (Hom. Il. xiv. 451—xvi. 308).

Arēthōus, i., m. father of Mēnēsthus, and king of Arna (Hom. Il. vii. 8 seq.).—2. The charioteer of Klŷgmus, killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xx. 487).

Arēlātum, i. v. Arēlātē, is, n. et, Arēlas, itis, f. Arles, a town of the Salŷes, on the east side of Rhodānus, the Rhone, at no great distance from the mouth of that river. There Cæsar, in thirty days from the cutting of the wood, built twelve long ships. From an expression of Ausonius, it appears to have been a city of considerable eminence. It was called Arēlas Sextānorum, from being built by the soldiers of the sixth legion (Cæs. B. C. i. 36). Iah. Arēlātenses, ium, m. Adj. Arēlātensis, is, e. Arēlātense oppidum (Aur. Vic. Ep. 41).

Arēmōricæ. See Armōrica.

Arēmūlus Silvius, Arēmūli Silvii, m. a king of Lātium, called by Līvius, Rēmūlus Silvius; by Ovidius, Rēmūlus; and by Diōnysius, Alladius (Aur. Vic. Or. 18).

Arēnæum, i, n. Arnhem, a town of Germany, on Rhēnus, the Rhine (Tac. Hist. v. 20).

Arēnē, es, f. daughter of Cebālus, and wife of Aphāreus, to whom she bore Lyncæus and Idas, two of the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. i. 463).

Arēnē, es, f. P. Castro, a town of Mēssēnia (Plin. i. 415), called by Strābo, Pyltāca Arēnē (506). Hōmērus mentions Arēnē, a proof of its antiquity, and Pausānias says, that it was built by Aphāreus, who gave it that name in honour of his wife (iv. 2).

C. Arēnnius, C. Arēnnii, m. a tribune of the people, in 212 B. C., who opposed the election of a dictator to the consulship, alleging it was inconsistent with the principles of a republic to reappoint the same person to the highest magistracy (Liv. xxxvii. 6).

L. Arēnnius, L. Arēnnii, m. a tribune of the people, in 212 B. C. He joined C. Arēnnius in opposing the re-election of a person to the supreme magistracy (Liv. xxvii. 6).—2. A prefect of the allies, taken prisoner by Numidians, in 210 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 26, 27).

Arēōpāgus, i, m. a court at Athens, which had this name from the hill of Mars (agros areos), on which it was held. The institution of this judicature is uncertain, and likewise the number of persons who composed it, some making it nine, others thirty-one, and some fifty-one. The justice and impartiality of its sentences rendered this tribunal so famous, that even foreign states often submitted their differences to its decisions. Murder, poisoning, robbery, wilful fire-raising, and innovations, either in religion or government, fell under the cognizance of this court. Besides the custody of the laws, the Arēōpāgus managed the public fund. Pēricles diminished its authority, because unsuitable to his plans. For a considerable time after, it continued to retain its dignity, but courts rise and fall in integrity with the general state of morals. Arēōpāgite, arum, m. the judges of this court. Adj. Arēus, a, um. Arēum iudicium, a trial in the Arēōpāgus (Tac. Ann. ii. 55).

Arēos, i, m. a centaur, killed by Drŷas, one of the Lāpithæ (Ov. Met. xii. 310).

Arēs, is, m. a nobleman of Cŷzicus, Chizico, and brother of Mēlanthus; both were killed by Telāmon, in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 203).

Arēta, e, f. daughter of Rhēxenor, and wife of Alcīnōus, who was her uncle. She appears to have exercised the office of supreme judge (Hom. Od. vii. 66).

Arētāon, ōnis, m. a man of distinction in the Trojan army, killed by Tēucer (Hom. Il. vi. 31).

Arētē, es, f. daughter of the former Diōnysius, king of Sŷracūsa, Saragossa, and Aristōmāchē, and wife of Dion (Cor. Nep. Dion 1).—2. Daughter of Aristippus, whom her father educated with care (Diog. Laert. Arist.).

Arētes, is, m. an officer under Alexander, whom he sent against the Scythians, in his engagement with the Persians at Arbēla, in 331 B. C. (Curt. iv. 15).

Arētho, ōnis, v. Arēthou, ōntis, m. the River of Arta, a navigable river of Athānānia, which falls into Sinus Ambrācius, the Gulf of Arta (Liv. xxxviii. 3).

Arēthūsa, e, f. a daughter of Nērēus and Dōris, and one of Diāna's Nymphs. When she fled from Alphēus, exhausted by fatigue, and unable to make further exertion, dissolving into tears, Diāna, from compassion, opened a passage to her below ground, under the sea, until she reached Ortŷgia, a small island on the east coast of Sicīlia, Sicily, where the goddess turned her into a fountain, which retained her name. This spring was fabled to be the river Alphēus, the Ronŷia, of the Morea, which ran under ground beneath the sea from that country to Ortŷgia, a fiction which Strābo takes the trouble to disprove. It, in ancient times, emitted a large stream of very sweet water, which abounded with fishes. It proceeds from a submarine stream, which flows under the old harbours, and branches out in different directions. A late traveller (Hughes) supposes the Acradina contains its spring, and adds, that this fountain is now a public wash-tub, and has become brackish, probably in consequence of an earthquake. Arēthūsis, idis, f. of Arēthūsa, applied to females, and to nouns feminine. Arēthūsidēs Sŷracūsa, Arēthusian Saragossa, from the first part of it having been on Ortŷgia (Ov. Fast. iv. 873). Adj. Arēthūseus, a, um. Arēthūsai latices, the waters of that fountain (Claud. xxxv. 60).

Arēthūsa, e, f. a town of Thrācia, at which the poet Euripides was buried (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).

Arētūlla, e, f. a Roman lady, who expected to procure from Dēmētrianus the return of her brother, an exile in Sārdinia. Mārtialis writes her an Epigram on this subject, which he enlivens with a beautiful fiction (viii. 32).

Arētus, i, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Antōmēdon (Hom. Il. xvii. 494 seq.).—2. Son of Nestor (Hom. Od. iii. 414).—3. The father of Nisus, who is hence called Arētīades (Hom. Od. xviii. 412).

Arēus, i, m. a Lacedæmonian exile, who, together with Alcibiādes, complained to the Roman senate of the injustice and cruelty of the Achæi, who had condemned them both to die. The opposition of the Romans induced the Achæi to comply with the will of the senate, and the sentence of death was reversed (Liv. xxxix. 35).

Arēvāci, orum, m. a people of Spain, in Old Castile, to whom belonged Clūnia, Coruana, and Segobia, Segovia, on Arēva, the Eresma. Argēi, orum, m. places in Rome, set apart

(Liv. Eps. 46, 47).—6. Another Cappadocian king, who banished his brother Orophernes, assisted Alexander Bala the enemy of Demetrius, and likewise went at the head of auxiliaries to the assistance of the Romans, against Aristonicus. He lost his life in that war, about 132 B. C., and the Romans gave to his children Lycônia and Cilicia (Just. xxv. 1: xxxvii. 1). See Lædicæ.—7. A king of the same country, who married a sister of Mithridates, king of Pontus, and was killed by his brother-in-law in 89 B. C. (Just. xxxviii. 1).—8. Son of the former, who was cut off by his maternal uncle Mithridates (Just. xxxviii. 1).—9. Brother of the former, driven from Cappadocia by the same Mithridates, after which he died, in consequence of grief at his misfortune (Just. xxxviii. 2).—10. A son of Mithridates, whom his father appointed king of Cappadocia, when only eighteen years of age, in 93 B. C., and sent with him Gordius as his director (Just. xxxviii. 1).

Arias, æ, m. the Herud, a river which traverses Aria (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Ariastænus, i, m. a king of the Scythians, who engaged in war with the Argonauts, fought from chariots armed with scythes, and lost his life in battle (Val. Flacc. vi. 403—423).

Ariaspæ, es, f. a town of Drangiana (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Aricia, æ, f. Arícia, or Nemi, a town of Latium, built by Hippolytus at the foot of the Alban mount, adjoining to which was a grove sacred to Diana, whence she was called Nemoralis, and it "her woody kingdom," which contained the fountain Egéria, and a lake (Ov. Met. xiv. 331). Iuh. Aricini, erum (Sing. Aricinus, i), m. having a dispute with the Ardeates respecting some territory, agreed to refer the matter to the decision of the Roman people, and the comices, on the evidence of one P. Scaptius, a plebeian, adjudged the lands to themselves, in 444 B. C. Against this iniquitous appropriation, the consuls and the chief of the senators solemnly protested, and solicited each of the tribunes of the people to prevent the disgrace of such an act of rapacity and injustice, but in vain, for justice or clemency is seldom an attribute of the multitude. The right of citizenship was given them, and their worship restored to them by the senate, in 337 B. C. (Liv. iii. 71 seq.). Adj. Aricinus, æ, um. Aricinus lacus, the Lake of Nemi, the waters of which Stätius celebrates for their clearness (Syl. iii. l. 57); in this he is supported by Strabo (343). Lacus comæ Hippolyti, the Lake of Nemi, near which Hippolytus resided (Stat. Syl. iii. l. 57). Empor Aricini arri, the purchaser of land at Arícia (Hor. Epist. ii. 2. 167). Ad Ariciæ axes, at the Arician axles, i. e. in the chariots on the road to Aricia. It was a much frequented road, and, on that account, infested by beggars (Juv. Sat. iv. 117). Aricidia Tertulla, Aricidia Tertulla, f. daughter of Tertullus, and first wife of the Roman Emperor Titus (Suet. Tit. 4).

Arideus, i, m. a son of Amyntas II. king of Macedônia, and Gygea (Just. vii. 4).—2. (Sometimes called Philippus Arideus) son of Philippus, king of Macedônia, by Philina, a native of Larissa, a woman of low birth and lewd practices (Salutrix, Scort- tum, Just. xiii. 2). The infantry, after the death of his brother Alexander the Great, saluted him king, and ordered him to be called by the name of his father Philippus. They appointed him life-guards, and threatened destruction to the cavalry who had agreed to the proposal of Pêrdiccas, that they should wait for the delivery of Rôxana, and, if she had a son, they appointed Cratærus, Læonæus and Pêrdiccas guardians, and swore obedience to the tutors. An agreement having been effected, by the eloquence of Pêrdiccas, between the infantry and cavalry, both declared Arideus king, reserving a portion of the empire to the son of Alexander, if Rôxana's child should be a boy. Arideus appears to have laboured under a particular infirmity, which probably unfitted him for the proper administration of government, an office which his wife Eurýdicæ exercised. Cæssander having married Thêssalonîcê q. v., Eurýdicæ, in name of the king, commanded Polyperchon to deliver up the army to his son-in-law. Owing his appointment to Eurýdicæ, he acted solely by her direction, and spread terror over the greater part of Greece. The unsettled state of the country obliged Eurýdicæ to recall him from Pelôpônnesus, the Morea, and, soon after, Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, returning from Epirus, Lower Albania, the Macedonians declared for her, and she commanded both Arideus and Eurýdicæ to be slain. This event happened in the sixth year after the death of Alexander the great, in 317 B. C. (Just. ix. 8 seq.). To him Cörnêlius Nêpos alludes, under the name of Philippus (Phoc. 3).—3. A general of Alexander the Great, who was ordered after his death to carry his body to the temple of Jupiter Ammon (Just. xiii. 4).

Aries, ëtis, m. a ram, also a military engine for battering down walls. It is said to have been first used by the Carthaginians at the siege of Gades, Cadiz. This instrument was originally very simple. To the end of a beam, varying in length and thickness according to circumstances, was affixed a piece of iron in the form of a ram's head, to which it owes its name. This powerful engine of war rested on the arms of the soldiers who worked it. The first improvement made on the battering ram, was to suspend it by a chain or a rope from the top of two logs of wood, having the lower ends fixed firmly in the ground, at a considerable distance from each other, and terminating in a point at the upper, by which contrivance the men who wrought were wholly relieved of its weight. To protect them from the destructive weapons thrown by the besieged, a shade or mantlet, with a strong roof, was formed around it. The whole stood on wheels, so that the besiegers easily moved the engine at pleasure. It does not appear from ancient history, that the battering ram received any important improvement after the one just stated. The discovery of gunpowder and introduction of artillery have quite superseded the use of this military engine, which the Romans long held in great esteem. The number of men employed at once in working the ram, and the length of time they continued, would vary according to the number of troops, the magnitude of the beam, the thickness of the wall, &c. It is certain that the order of Minerva, hence she is called Palladia pinus (i. 457), and Dea (iv. 336). Some derive the name from the Greek adjective σιφίς, and others from Argivi, because built and sailed by the Greeks. This seems to have been the opinion of Cicero. Plinius appears to have supposed that Iason first sailed in a ship of war, hence it is probable he did not consider Argo the first ship (ii. 104). Adj. Argōus, a, um. Argōa signa, a representation of the ship Argo (Stat. Th. vi. 725).—2. The name of a constellation. Argollicus, i, m. the husband of Pōmpēia Macrina. The Emperor Tiberius put him to death and condemned her to banishment. He was the son of Lūco q. v., and a man of distinguished rank in Achāia (Tac. Ann. vi. 18).

Argōnautae, arum, m. a name given to the heroes who, under the command of Iason, sailed with him in the Argo to Cōlchis in quest of the golden fleece (Stat. Syl. ii. 7. 77). See Aurum vellus.

Argos, ōs, n. Plur. Argi, orum, m. used by Hōmērus and other Greek authors to signify Greece, the principal city of Argōlis, a district of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, between Arcādia, and Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago. Argos Milias, part of the plain of Mantinēa, so called from its being marshy and uncultivated (Paus.). Inh. Argivi, orum, m. often used as a general appellation of the Greeks. Argōlis, idis, f. of Argos, applied to females or nouns feminine. Argōlis Alcōnē (Ov. Met. ix. 276). Adj. Argēus, Argēvus, et, Argōllicus, a, um. Tibur Argēo pūllum cōlono, Tivoli, founded by a colony from Argos (Hor. Od. ii. 6. 5). Bellum Argivum, v. Achūcum (Gel. x. 16). See L. Mummulus. Pellis Argōlica, i. e. iūs (Ov. Met. i. 726). Argōlicī fratres, Clēōbis and Bitōn q. v. (Cland. l. 39).

Argus, v. os, i, m. the son of Aristor, who married Ismēnē, the daughter of Asōpus. He had a hundred eyes, of which two only slept in succession. On this account, Jūno sent him to watch Io, when changed into a cow; hence called custos Junōnis (Ov. Met. ii. 678). But Mērcūrius, at the command of Jūpiter, lulled him asleep, by the sound of his flute, and then killed him. Jūno put the eyes of Argos into the tail of the peacock, which was sacred to her. Argiphōntes, a, m. a name of Mērcūrius from killing Argos (Hom. ii. 103). Aristōrides, a, m. a patronymic of Argos.—2. The builder of the ship Argo, and one of the sailors in that vessel in the expedition to the Cōlchis in quest of the golden fleece (Val. Flacc. i. 93 seq.).

Argēvus, i, m. a boy beloved by Agāmēmmon, who was drowned, according to some in Cēphissus, the Macroneri, according to others, in the sea (Prop. iii. 7. 22).

Argyraspides, um, m. a name given by Alexander the Great to his army, from their having silver shields, i. e. covered or studded with plates of silver. He covered the trappings of his horses and the armour of his soldiers with silver; that the appearance of the troops might correspond with the idea of their being the conquerors of the East (Just. xii. 7). At the battle of Thēātira, Thira, or Abhisser, in 192 B. C., the royal cohort of Antiochus, king of Syria, had the same name, and from the same cause. They were heavy armed soldiers (Liv. xxxiv. 40).

Argyrippa, v. Argyrippa, v. f. at first Argos Hippium, of which Argyrippa is a contraction, afterwards shortened into Arpi, a city of Apulia, built by Diomedes, who gave it this name from Argos in Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, and its pastures being fitted for the rearing of a good breed of horses (Virg. Æn. xi. 246).

Aria, v. f. a country of Asia, southeast of the southern extremity of Mārē Cāspium, the Caspian Sea, forming the boundary of Parthia on the east. Inh. Arii, et, Ariani, orum, m. appear from Plinius to have been numerous and powerful (i. 691). Fortis Arius (Luc. Phar. iii. 281).—2. A people of Germany (Tac. Mor. Ger. 43).

Ariadnē, es, f. daughter of Minos, king of Crēta, Candia, and Pasiphāa, who conceived a strong attachment for Thēsēus, whom her father had shut up in the labyrinth to be devoured by the Minotaur. Thēsēus destroyed that monster, and Ariadnē gave him a clue by means of which he extricated himself from the intricate mazes of his prison. In pretended fulfilment of his promise, he carried her away with him, but left her asleep on the island Dia, Standia, thinking it would be dishonourable for him to take her to his native country, and afterwards married her sister Phadra. Bāchus, after Ariadnē had been deserted by her faithless lover, married her, and hence Ovidius says she became a goddess by the crime of Thēsēus, i. e. his desertion of her (Fast. iii. 460). Bāchus gave her a crown, which was changed into a constellation under the same name. Ovidius calls this Corōna Gnōis, because she was a native, and her father king, of Crēta, Candia. Adj. Ariadnēus, a, um. Ariadnēum sidus, the constellation of Ariadnē, or the Crown (Ov. Fast. v. 346). Ariadnēa Corōna (Manil. v. 21).

Ariārthes, is, m. son of Artāxērcēs Mēmon, brother of Dārius, and Ochus (Just. x. 1).—2. A king of Cāppadōcia, whom Perdicas drove from his kingdom in 323 B. C. (Just. xiii. 6).—3. Son of Artāmēnes, who obtained the crown of Cāppadōcia about 223 B. C. (Just. xxix. 1).—4. King of Cāppadōcia, from whom Antiochus, king of Syria, requested auxiliaries after his defeat in a naval engagement at Mōnōnēsus, in 191 B. C. The Cappadocians and the auxiliaries of Morzus, formed the left wing of the army of the Tēctōsāgi and Trōcmi in the battle at Magaba. To Cn. Mānlius Vulso he made an apology for assisting Antiochus with troops. The Romans, for assisting their enemy, fined him in six hundred talents of silver. Through Eumēnes, king of Asia, to whom he had married his daughter, the one half of the fine was remitted, and he was received into friendship with the Romans. He afterwards sent his son to be educated at Rome, a measure very grateful to the senate, who ordered the Prætor to hire a house for the young prince and his attendants. He died in 165 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 26 seq.).—5. The son of the former, who succeeded him in the throne, renewed the alliance with the Romans, and was afterwards driven from his kingdom by Dēmētrius, king of Syria, but the Romans restored him to his dominions. After a second expulsion by the same monarch, the senate again put him in possession of the kingdom of Cāppadōcia.

(Liv. Ep. 46, 47).—6. Another Cappadocian king, who banished his brother Orophernes, assisted Alexander Bala the enemy of Dmétrius, and likewise went at the head of auxiliaries to the assistance of the Romans, against Aristónicus. He lost his life in that war, about 132 B. C., and the Romans gave to his children Lycônia and Clícia (Just. xxxv. 1: xxxvii. 1). See Lædiciæ.—7. A king of the same country, who married a sister of Mithridates, king of Pontus, and was killed by his brother-in-law in 89 B. C. (Just. xxxviii. 1).—8. Son of the former, who was cut off by his maternal uncle Mithridates (Just. xxxviii. 1).—9. Brother of the former, driven from Cappadocia by the same Mithridates, after which he died, in consequence of grief at his misfortune (Just. xxxix. 2).—10. A son of Mithridates, whom his father appointed king of Cappadocia, when only eighteen years of age, in 93 B. C., and sent with him Gordius as his director (Just. xxxviii. 1).

Arias, m. m. the Hericul, a river which traverses Aria (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Ariaménus, i. m. a king of the Scythians, who engaged in war with the Argonauts, fought from chariots armed with scythes, and lost his life in battle (Val. Flacc. vi. 465—423).

Arîspé, es. f. a town of Drangiana (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Aricia, m. f. L'Arícia, or Nemi, a town of Latium, built by Hippolytus at the foot of the Alban mount, adjoining to which was a grove sacred to Diana, whence she was called Nemoralis, and it "her woody kingdom," which contained the fountain Egéria, and a lake (Or. Met. xiv. 331). Inh. Arîcîni, urbs (Sing. Arîcînus, i), m. having a dispute with the Ardeates respecting some territory, agreed to refer the matter to the decision of the Roman people, and the commons, on the evidence of one P. Scaptius, a plebeian, adjudged the lands to themselves, in 444 B. C. Against this iniquitous appropriation, the consuls and the chief of the senators solemnly protested, and solicited each of the tribunes of the people to prevent the disgrace of such an act of rapacity and injustice, but in vain, for justice or clemency is seldom an attribute of the multitude. The right of citizenship was given them, and their worship restored to them by the senate, in 357 B. C. (Liv. iii. 71 seq.). Adj. Arîcînus, a. um. Arîcînus lăcus, the Lake of Nemi, the waters of which Stătius celebrates for their clearness (Syl. iii. l. 57); in this he is supported by Străbo (343). Lăcus conatus Hippolyti, the Lake of Nemi, near which Hippolytus resided (Stat. Syl. iii. l. 57). Emper. Arîcîni arri, the purchaser of land at L'Arícia (Hor. Epist. ii. 2. 167). Ad Arîcînos axes, at the Arîcînian axles, i. e. at the chariots on the road to Aricia. It was a much frequented road, and, on that account, infested by heggars (Juv. Sat. iv. 117).

Aricidia Tertullia, Aricidia Tertullia, f. daughter of Tertullus, and first wife of the Roman Emperor Titus (Suet. Tit. 4).

Arideus, i. m. a son of Amintas II. king of Măcêdônia, and Gygea (Just. vii. 4).—2. (Sometimes called Philippus Arideus) son of Philippus, king of Măcêdônia, by Philinna, a native of Lărissa, a woman of low birth and lewd practices (Salatrix, Scor- tum, Just. xiii. 2). The infantry, after the death of his brother Alexander the Great, saluted him king, and ordered him to be called by the name of his father Philippus. They appointed him life-guards, and threatened destruction to the cavalry who had agreed to the proposal of Pêrdiccas, that they should wait for the delivery of Rôxăna, and, if she had a son, they appointed Crăterus, Lăônănus and Pêrdiccas guardians, and swore obedience to the tutors. An agreement having been effected, by the eloquence of Pêrdiccas, between the infantry and cavalry, both declared Arideus king, reserving a portion of the empire to the son of Alexander, if Rôxăna's child should be a boy. Arideus appears to have laboured under a particular infirmity, which probably unfitted him for the proper administration of government, an office which his wife Eurýdicê exercised. Căssănder having married Thessălônîcê q. v., Eurýdicê, in name of the king, commanded Polyperchon to deliver up the army to his son-in-law. Owing his appointment to Eurýdicê, he acted solely by her direction, and spread terror over the greater part of Grăce. The unsettled state of the country obliged Eurýdicê to recall him from Pelôpônnesus, the Morea, and, soon after, Olymphas, the mother of Alexander the Great, returning from Epirus, Lower Albania, the Macedonians declared for her, and she commanded both Arideus and Eurýdicê to be slain. This event happened in the sixth year after the death of Alexander the great, in 317 B. C. (Just. ix. 8 seq.). To him Cărnălius Năpos alludes, under the name of Philippus (Phoc. 3).—3. A general of Alexander the Great, who was ordered after his death to carry his body to the temple of Jupiter Ammon (Just. xiii. 4).

Aries, ëtis, m. a ram, also a military engine for battering down walls. It is said to have been first used by the Carthaginians at the siege of Gădes, Cadiz. This instrument was originally very simple. To the end of a beam, varying in length and thickness according to circumstances, was affixed a piece of iron in the form of a ram's head, to which it owes its name. This powerful engine of war rested on the arms of the soldiers who worked it. The first improvement made on the battering ram, was to suspend it by a chain or a rope from the top of two logs of wood, having the lower ends fixed firmly in the ground, at a considerable distance from each other, and terminating in a point at the upper, by which contrivance the men who wrought were wholly relieved of its weight. To protect them from the destructive weapons thrown by the besieged, a shade or mantlet, with a strong roof, was formed around it. The whole stood on wheels, so that the besiegers easily moved the engine at pleasure. It does not appear from ancient history, that the battering ram received any important improvement after the one just stated. The discovery of gunpowder and introduction of artillery have quite superseded the use of this military engine, which the Romans long held in great esteem. The number of men employed at once in working the ram, and the length of time they continued, would vary according to the number of troops, the magnitude of the beam, the thickness of the wall, &c. It is certain that in some instances, upwards of fifty men plied on each side, and from the severity of the labour, they must, in ordinary cases, have been frequently relieved.

Arīma, orum, n. a place in Cilicia, famous for its subterraneous fires. Some maintain that it was in Syria (Hom. II. ii. 783).

Arīmāspi, orum (Sing. Arīmāspus, i), m. a people of Scythia, supposed by Major Rennel to have lived about 45° North Lat., and 105° East Lon. This tribe had, according to ancient history, but one eye, which their name in their native tongue is said to denote; Arīma, one, and Speu, an eye. They inhabited Altai, which contained gold mines, denoted by the name; Alta, in the Mongul and Kalmuc languages, signifying gold. Herodotus considers them a European nation, but disbelieves the fiction of their having only one eye. By Lucanus they are represented binding their hair with gold (Phar. iii. 281). Adj. Arīmāspēus, a, um (Herod. iv. 14).

Arīmāsthe, arum, m. a savage nation near Palus Maotis, and adjoining the Arsōpē (Orph. 1052).

Arīmāzes, is, m. a Sogdian, who, with thirty thousand men, obtained possession of a rock thirty stadia high, and a hundred and fifty in circumference, and in vain attempted to prevent its falling into the hands of Alexander the Great, in 328 B. C. (Curt. vii. 11).

Arīmīnum, i, n. Rimini, a city of Umbria, on the south bank of Ariminus, i, m. the Marechia, near the place where it falls into Mārē Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice. Here the tribunes in the interest of Cæsar met him, when he first raised the standard of rebellion against the government of the state, and the lives of his fellow-citizens. Bomb shells were invented about the year 1468 at Rimini. These bombs were made of bronze, and Rimini contains some buildings of good architecture. There is a bridge of five arches over the Marechia. Via Flāminia, the Furlo road, extends from Rome to Rimini, a distance of two hundred and eight Roman miles. The modern road follows the course of the ancient, and is about two hundred English miles. Iah. Arīmīnēses, ium, m. (Liv. xxvii. 10). Adj. Arīmīnēsis, is, e. Arīmīnēsis Fōlla, Fōlla of Rimini (Hor. Epod. v. 42).

Arīmphēi, orum, m. a people who lived on the borders of the Black Sea, distinguished for their justice, and mildness of disposition (Ann. Mar. xxii. 8).

Arīnchi, orum, m. a savage tribe reckoned among the Tauri, as were also the Sinchi and Nāpei. Of them Ammianus Marcellinus gives a horrible account (xxii. 8).

Arīnes, is, m. a Colchian nobleman killed by Cālāxes, in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. vi. 638).

Arīnthēus, i, m. a Roman, who was consul with Mōdēstus, in the year 363 (Claud. xviii. 478).

Arībārāzēs, is, m. a military commander under Dārīus, who defended Pylæ Susides (Curt. iv. 12). See Orōbātes.—2. A prefect of Lydia, Ionia, and the whole of Phrygia, who revolted from the Persian monarch, and seized the kingdom of Pōntus, of which he retained possession till his death. His name occurs frequently in the lives of the Commanders, written by Cōrnēlius Nepos.—3. A Numidian, grandson of Sýplax, whom the Carthaginians had in their army, at the head of a vast body of Numidian troops, in 154 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 48).—4. A king of Cāppadōcia. L. Cōrnēlius Silla, in 97 B. C., restored him to his kingdom, from which he had been expelled by his more powerful neighbours, who seem to have obliged him to leave the country whenever they chose. Continuing faithful to the Romans, Cæsar restored him to the throne, after Mithridātes had expelled him from his kingdom, and took his brother Ariarāthes under his protection, at the time he passed through that country, when he marched against the king of Pōntus. The senate recommended him to the protection of M. Tūllius Cicero, who executed the trust with fidelity, delivered him from immediate danger, and not only protected him, but enabled him to reign with the authority and dignity of a monarch (Cic. Ep. Fam. xv. 4). To the preservation and re-establishment of this prince, the same author alludes in strong language, for he seldom underrates his own merits or good offices (Ep. Att. v. 20). To him Eutrōpius refers (v. 5).—5. By birth a Mede, distinguished for his graceful form and mental abilities, obtained the kingdom of Armēnia with the consent of the natives, by the appointment of C. Cæsar, grandson of Augustus. On the death of this prince, which was caused by an accident, the Armenians refused submission to his descendants (Tac. Ann. ii. 4). See Erāto.

Arion, ōnis, m. an eminent lyric poet and musician, son of Cyclos, and a native of Mēthymna, Molico, in Lēsbos, hence Mēthymneus Arion (Mart. viii. 51). He was the first who published dithyrambs at Corinth, where he spent some time with Pēriānder, tyrant of that city, and afterwards went into Italy, where he acquired a large fortune. As he was returning home, the sailors resolved to seize his property, and insisted he should either kill himself, that he might be buried on land, or leap into the sea. He preferred the latter, and having dressed himself in his best clothes he requested that he might be allowed to play a tune before his death, to which they assented; when he had finished it he leaped into the sea and was carried back safe to Tēnārus to Pēriānder, by one of the Dolphins which the sweetness of his music had attracted round the ship. For this intended murder, Pēriānder caused the sailors, on their return to that port, to be crucified. Adj. Arīōnius, a, um. Arīōnia līra (Prop. ii. 26. 18).—2. The horse of Adrāstus, during the Theban war, of which Stātilus has given a detailed account (Th. vi. 424 seq.). He was reared by the Nereids, and presented to that monarch by Nēptūnus (Claud. viii. 554); Pausānias makes Arion the son of Cēres and Nēptūnus viii. 25). He had the power of utterance, and foretold what was to happen. In this fiction, Stātilus has followed the Roman historians, who often mention oxen announcing future events, and Plīnius states the same thing.

Arīōvistus, i, m. king of the Germans, who invaded Gallia, France, 60 B. C., conquered a considerable part of that country, and subjected the inhabitants to the most cruel and oppressive treatment. Cæsar marched up to his very camp, compelled him to fight, and gained such a complete victory, that a very few only, among whom was Ariövistas himself, escaped. These continued their flight, until they reached the banks of the Rhine, which they crossed, some by swimming, others by boats. Ariövistas, in a little vessel, got safely to the other side. From this period nothing of his history is known, nor does his name afterwards occur above three times in the Commentaries of Caesar. Titurius in his speech mentions the death of this prince as subject of regret among the Germans; and, from the manner in which it is introduced, there is little doubt that he had fallen a victim to the ambition of the Romans (Cæs. B. G. v. 29).—2. A commander of the Insubres Galli, whom the consuls C. Quinctius Flamininus Népos and P. Furius Philus conquered, 225 B. C. (Flor. ii. 4).

Aris, is, m. a commander of the Carthaginians, who behaved in a cowardly manner when P. Cœnilius Scipio Africanus and his friend C. Lælius attacked Carthago Nova (Sil. Ital. xv. 232). Lælius writes the name differently (xxvi. 49).

Arisba, æ, v. Arisbæ, es, f. a city of the Troad, built by Scamandrius, and Ascænius, son of Æneus. It stood between Percotæ and Abydos, and belonged to the Mitylænei. Others say that Dardanius, coming from Scaudetræcia into the Troad, married Arisba, daughter of Tœceer of Crœta, Candia. The site of it was doubtful in the age of Strabo, but it must have been of considerable note, since Hómærus calls it divine (Il. ii. 836).—2. Another in Lêsbois, mentioned by Lûcians (Phar. iii. 204), so called from Arisba, daughter of Macar or of Mœrops, who was first married to Alexander, son of Priâmus (Steph.).

Arisbas, æ, m. the priest of Jûpiter Ammon (Sil. Ital. iii. 668).

Aristæus, i, m. prætor of the Achæi in 200 B. C., who prevailed on his countrymen to renounce the alliance of Philippus, king of Mæcédônia, and join the Romans. After accompanying T. Quinctius Flamininus to an interview with Philippus, king of Mæcédônia, he advised the Boeotians to attach themselves to the Romans, reproved the vanity of the Etôli, and joined Quinctius near Clœonæ with ten thousand Achæan infantry and one thousand cavalry (Liv. xxxii. 19 seq.).

Aristæus, i, m. son of Apôllo, by Cÿrênê, daughter of Pênêus, king of Arcâdia, according to some, of Pênêus, the Salampria. He was born at the same time with Nômios, Authônus, and Argæus. Aristæus married Autônê, daughter of Cædmus, by whom he had Actæon &c. Aristæus had an extensive kingdom in Arcâdia, and was the first who taught mankind the use of bees, honey, and milk for cards. To this Ovidius alludes (Ep. Pont. iv. 2. 9). He was also the first who found out the subtilties of the dog star (Just. xiii. 7). Cicero makes him the inventor of the olive, or of the oil of olive. Virgilius has beautifully sung the fiction respecting the manner in which he recovered his bees (G. iv. 316 seq.). Sallustius relates that after the death of his son he quitted Thêbæ, Thera, took possession of Cœa, Lango, afterwards with Dædalus went to Sardinia, and at last to Cômæ (Frag.). Justinus calls him the Son of Grynus, and treats his origin and history as a fiction (xiii. 7). Diodôrus Siculus says he had three names, Nômios, Argæus and Aristæus (iv. 81).—2. A Corinthian, son of Adamantus, put to death by the Athenians (Herod. vii. 137).

Aristagôras, æ, m. Several of this name are mentioned by Hêrôdotus, of whom the most distinguished was the son of Mœlpagôras (v. 30 seq.).

Aristander, dri, m. a native of Telmissus, a very skilful soothsayer, who accompanied Alexander the Great to Pêrsia (Curt. iv. 2).

Aristarchus, i, m. a grammarian of great celebrity, who lived at Alexândria in the reign of Ptôlêmaus Philadêlphus. The accurate judgment, and critical acuteness which he discovered in correcting the writings of Hómærus and other Grecian poets, gained him so great celebrity, that his name became a common appellation, denoting a critic of elegance, taste, and superior discernment. His commentaries on the Greek poets, it is said, extended to eighty volumes. Cicero commends him in various parts of his works, and calls his friend T. Pompônus Atticus, his Aristarchus, "meis orationibus quarum tu Aristarchus es" (Att. i. 14). Quintiliânus allows him a high rank among judges of poetry (x. 1). Ovidius considers him as greatly inferior to Hómærus. "Correction, in point of difficulty," says he, "is as much greater than composition, as great Hómærus is greater than Aristarchus" (Ep. Pont. iii. 9. 24).

Aristides, is, m. son of Lÿsimæchus, was born at Athens about 500 B. C. Thémistôcles was nearly of the same age, and surpassed him in that kind of eloquence which captivates the multitude. This talent gave him a decided superiority over his rival in all popular assemblies, secured to him the highest offices in the state, and procured the banishment of Aristides for a period of ten years. The innocence of his life, and unsullied integrity of his conduct, were of no avail with the giddy rabble, swayed by the winning eloquence, and fallacious arguments of Thémistôcles. A decree of the people restored him to his native country in the sixth year of his banishment, when Xêrxes made a descent on Greece. He fought in the battle at Sâlâmîs, Colouri, and commanded the Athenians at Plâtêa, Coela, when Mærdônîus was routed, and his army cut off. That regard for justice which distinguished his whole life, procured him the surname of Just, and the same excellence raised the Athenians as a people, and placed them at the head of the Grecian states. The unbounded confidence placed in him by his countrymen, he justified by a strict and undeviating adherence to moral rectitude, and the prosperity of the state, despising the accumulation of wealth, and the aggrandisement of his own family. At his death, he left his family in poverty, being scarcely possessed of a sum equivalent to his funeral expenses. His daughters were brought up by the state, and at their marriages received portions from the common treasury. The biography of this great man is succinctly recorded by Cœrnâlius Népos, and at great length by Plûtarchus. Appiânus states that he was accused of theft, made no defence, but submitted in silence to the insult (Bel. Syr. 114).

Aristion, ônis, m. an Athenian philosopher, who adopted the opinions of Epicurus (Ap. Bel. Mith. 189).

Aristippus, i. m. an African, born at Cyrene, who founded that sect of philosophers called, from the place of his birth, the Cyrenaic. He studied under Socrates, but his opinions differed greatly from those of his master. His philosophy led men to pursue pleasure as the supreme good, and encouraged a principle of selfishness, teaching every man to live chiefly, if not solely, for himself. This system rose to eminence under Epicurus, who, according to Lucianus, had been the scholar of Aristippus. The doctrine of Epicurus did not exactly coincide with that of Aristippus, nor did the followers of the former adopt, without alteration, the tenets of their master. Horatius has delineated the character of Aristippus, whom he contrasts with Diogenes the Cynic (Epist. i. 17). Adj. Aristippicus, a. um.

M. Aristius, M. Aristii, m. a tribune of the soldiers under Cæsar, during the Gallic war (Cæs. B. G. vii. 42).

Aristo, onis, m. a Grecian of a good family, and great property; was by birth a Sicilian, and by employment a tragedian. Among the Greeks this profession was not counted dishonourable. Of his patriotism, in discovering the plot of Andronodorus, in 216 B. C., he gave an unquestionable proof, on which the conspirators suffered the punishment which their crime merited (Liv. xxiv. 24).—2. A Tyrian, upon whom Hannibal, when at Ephesus with Antiochus, king of Syria, in 195 B. C., prevailed to undertake a voyage to Carthage, in order to rouse the state against the Romans. The enemies of Hannibal discovered that he was within their walls, and summoned him before the senate, where he discovered considerable shrewdness in eluding the charge, maintained his innocence, and effected his escape by means of a deception, in which he overreached the Carthaginians (Liv. xxxiv. 61).—3. An Athenian, who delivered up Athens to Mithridates, king of Pontus, about 89 B. C. (Eutrop. vi. 6).

Aristobulus, i. m. a king of the Jews, conquered by Cn. Pompeius Magnus, who led him in triumph through the streets of Rome in 63 B. C. (Eutrop. vi. 16).—2. A man to whom Nero intrusted Armenia Minor, and allowed him to assume the badge of monarchy when he made preparations for invading the territory of the Parthians, in the year 54 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 7: xiv. 26).

Aristoclides, æ, m. a native of Ægina, whom Pindarus celebrates for his victory in the Pænicrætum, at the Nemean games (Pin. Nem. 3).

Aristodemus, i. m. a descendant of Hercules, and one of the commanders of the Heraclidae at the time they invaded Peloponnesus, the Morea (Vel. Pat. i. 2).—2. King of Cume, to whom Tarquinius Superbus fled after the battle at the lake Regillus, and with whom he died, in 495 B. C. He detained the Roman ships which had purchased corn at Cume, as the property of the Tarquini, of whom he was the heir, in 492 B. C. (Liv. ii. 21–34).—3. A Thessalian in the army of Darius. At the battle of Issus he had the command of twenty thousand infantry (Curt. iii. 9).

Aristogiton, onis, m. the companion of Harmodius in the expulsion of the Pisistratide from Athens (Gel. ix. 2).—2. An Athenian mentioned by Curtius as having broken faith and joined the Persians (iii. 13). Here the statement differs considerably from that of Arrian, whose accuracy is more to be depended on.

Aristomachus, es, f. the sister of Dion, and wife of the former Dionysius, by whom she had two sons, Hipparinus and Nymæus, and as many daughters, Sophrosyne and Arete (Cor. Nep. Dion 1).

Aristomachus, i. m. a great-grandson of Hercules (Pin. Pyth. x. 4).—2. A traitor, who headed the populace of Cræta, Cotrone, by which he secured admission to the Brutii, and, finding himself unable to betray the citadel, he quitted the place and joined Hannibal in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 2 seq.).

Aristomædes, is, m. a Thessalian, who commanded twenty thousand infantry in the army of Darius, at the battle of Issus (Curt. iii. 9).

Aristomènes, is, m. a native of Ægina, celebrated by Pindarus for gaining the prize for wrestling at the Pythian games (Pyth. viii.).—2. An officer under Darius, king of Persia (Curt. iv. 1).

Ariston, onis, m. an officer under Alexander, who distinguished himself in an engagement at the head of the cavalry of the Pæones, in 331 B. C. (Curt. iv. 9).

Aristoniceus, i. m. tyrant of the Methymnæi, and appears to have exercised the infamous employment of a pirate. The inhabitants of Chios put him and his men in chains, and gave them over to Amphoterus and Hegelochus, in 332 B. C. (Curt. iv. 5 seq.).

Aristoniceus, i. m. Son of Attalus, king of Pergamus. Justinius makes him a son of Eumenes. In the epitome of Livius, and also in Eutropius (lv. 20), he is called a reputed son of Eumenes, king of Asia, by a concubine Ephessa; Florus says of the royal blood (ii. 20). He seized on the kingdom left by Attalus, which by the will of that king ought to have been free. Aristoniceus defeated and killed P. Licinius Crassus, consul and pontifex maximus, who marched against him, according to Florus made himself prisoner; but M. Perpenna, consul, afterwards gained a decisive victory over this usurper, whom he allowed to surrender, in 132 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 59). If confidence may be placed in the accuracy of the fragments of Sallustius, the Romans led him in triumph. From its being a letter from Mithridates to Arsaces, whom he endeavoured to persuade to take up arms against the Romans, he may naturally be expected to exaggerate the avarice, rapacity, and injustice of his inveterate enemies. Eutropius states that the death of Perpenna prevented a triumph, in consequence of the victory over him, and that he was strangled in prison by order of the senate (iv. 20).

Aristonius, i. m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, who contributed to the safety of that monarch, when severely wounded in battle with the Malli (Curt. ix. 3).

Aristophanes, is, m. a poet of Athens, then father of ancient comedy, who flourished during the Peloponnesian war. He possessed an imagination both lively and powerful, and a strong sense of the ludicrous, which he depicted in a manner irresistibly laughable, or exposed to insufferable contempt. He exhibited on the stage real characters under their real names, and exposed, with the utmost severity, their foibles or vices. Nor did he confine his ridicule or satire to persons who merited reproof or exposure to infamy, but sometimes unjustly assailed the virtuous, of which his attack on Socrates is both a proof and a censure. Impurity of thought too often debases his writings, and the coarseness of his language aggravates the grossness of the idea. This charge may be generally brought against comic writers of every age and country. How seldom do we find comedy unspiced by impure language, or indelicate allusion? Had Aristophanes written under the restraint of delicate feeling, and moral rectitude, his plays might have ameliorated the conduct and morals of his countrymen, but they frequently had an opposite tendency. He excelled in elegance of diction, and his inexhaustible fund of wit added to the finest railery, or most sarcastic severity, might have rendered his writings a source of elegant and instructive amusement. He composed seventy-four comedies, of which eleven only remain.—2. The father of Aristocides (Pin. Nera. iii. 35).

Aristor, oris, m. the father of Argos, whom Juno appointed keeper of Io. Aristorides, m, m. a patronymic of Argos (Ov. Met. i. 624).

Aristoteles, is, m. one of the greatest philosophers of antiquity, was the son of Nicomachus and Festida, and born at Stagira, Stagros, a town of Macedonia, about 384 B. C. His father, who had been physician to Amyntas, grandfather of Alexander, died when he was young, leaving him a considerable fortune, most of which he spent in extravagance, in consequence of his mother's death and the carelessness of his tutor. He then entered the army, which he soon quitted in disgust, and afterwards consulted the oracle at Delphi respecting his future conduct. The priestess advised him to study philosophy at Athens, and he immediately obeyed the oracle, placing himself at the age of eighteen under the tuition of Plato, whose scholar he continued for nearly twenty years. His extraordinary application procured a corresponding extraordinary degree of success. He slept little, lived on spare diet, and gave almost none of his time either to recreation or exercise. On the death of Plato, from whom he differed in several particulars, he retired to Assaria, a city of Mysia, where he married Pythias, sister of Hermias, king of that place, and such was his affection for his wife, that he offered sacrifice to her. His brother-in-law having been taken prisoner by a general of the king of Persia, he removed to the capital of Lesbos, Mityleni, where he remained until invited by Philippus, king of Macedonia, to undertake the education of his son, Alexander the Great. That monarch, in his letter to the philosopher, stated, that he returned thanks to the gods, not so much for making him a father, as for giving him a son, whom he could have Aristoteles for his instructor. In eight years (five, Just. xii. 16), Aristoteles finished the education of the young prince with such astonishing success, that Philippus erected statues in honour of him, and rebuilt his native town, Stagira, Stagros, which the wars had nearly reduced to ruins. Alexander showed great respect and attachment to Aristoteles, from whose instructions he received, according to Plutarchus, more advantage than he did from the splendour and power transmitted to him from his father. At the suggestion of the pupil, the philosopher wrote the history of animals, in which the liberality of the former, and the pains which he took in collecting specimens in his Asiatic expedition, enriched the labours, and afforded time for maturing the treatise of the latter. Aristoteles edited the Iliad of Homerus, and his critical knowledge of poetry must have greatly improved that poem. Alexander had always that copy with him, and slept with it under his pillow. Of the numerous writings of Aristoteles, a simple enumeration would exceed our bounds. Many of them have been transmitted entire, and the variety of subjects on which he has written, and the ability uniformly displayed, prove the vast powers of his mind. The fame of Alexander secured him tranquillity during the life of that monarch, whose liberality afforded him every facility for the prosecution of his philosophical inquiries. He resided at Athens during the last fourteen years of his life, and no sooner was Alexander dead than the priests and sophists incited the fury of the populace against him, by which he was induced, from regard to his own safety, to withdraw from that city. Lest that measure should have been imputed to unmanly fear, particularly when contrasted with the magnanimity of Socrates, he justified his conduct by saying, that he did not wish to give the Athenians another opportunity of sinning against philosophy. According to some, he only survived his departure from Athens a few months; grief and anxiety terminated his life. Others maintain that he threw himself into Euripus, the Strait of Negropont, because he could not discover the cause of its irregular tides. Another account has been transmitted, that he died at Athens. These different statements afford sufficient evidence that respecting his death nothing is certainly known. He was the founder of the Peripatetic philosophy, which many of the Romans adopted during the reign of the Cæsars. From his native city he was called Stagiritæ. Adj. Aristotellus, et, Aristotellus, a, um. Aristotella pigmenta, the embellishments of Aristoteles (Cic. Att. ii. 1).—2. The name of Battus, the founder of Cyrene q. v. (Pin. Pyth. v. 117).—3. An officer of Antiochus, king of Syria, who commanded at Chalchis, in 193 B. C. On the approach of the Roman consul, he left that place, and all the cities of Eubœa submitted (Liv. xxvi. 21).

Aristotimus, i, m. a tyrant, who seized on the city of the Epœi, and acted with the greatest cruelty, for which his life atoned at the end of five months (Just. xxvi. 1). See Hellenicus.

Arius, i, m. a native of Libya, who flourished during the fourth century, and was the founder of the sect called from him Arians. His peculiar tenets were, denying the Divinity, and the consubstantiality of the Word. The spread of his opinions at first was greatly promoted by Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, taking part with him, and from his having great influence with Constantia, sister of the Emperor Constantinus. The numerous disputes to which they gave rise, induced Constantinus to assemble a council at Nice, in the year 325, when the doctrine of Arius was condemned, his books ordered to be burned, and capital punishment denounced against all who kept them. Sentence of banishment was pronounced against himself, which, being revoked at the end of five years, Arius gave in a confession of his faith, so artfully framed as to satisfy the Emperor, who ordered Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, to receive him, but he died that evening. Athanasius, his zealous opponent, having been promoted to the See of Alexandria after his banishment, continued dissatisfied with his creed, and refused to admit him into communion (Amm. Mar. Excerpt.).

Arius, a. um. See Arēis.

Armēnes, is, m. son of Nābis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, who was given as a hostage to T. Quinctius Flamininus, and adorned the triumph of that victorious general, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 52). Eutropius mentions the same circumstance (iv. 2).

Armēnla, æ, f. a large country of Asia, divided into Mājor and Minor. Armēnla Mājor, now called Turcomania, was bounded on the S. by Sýria and Mēsōpōtāmīa, on the E. by Mēdia, on the N. by Iberia and Cōlchis, which two countries extended from Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, to Mārē Cāspium, the Caspian Sea. It was made tributary to the Medes by Astyages, and Cyrus reduced it to a province. Alexander the Great also subdued this country, which afterwards fell under the power of Antiochus the Great, who sent two deputies, Zādriādes and Artaxias, to take the command of it. But these governors, stimulated by love of power, excited the Armenians to revolt, carried on a successful war against several neighbouring states, and shared between them the sovereignty of the country. By them it was first divided into Armēnla Mājor, and Armēnla Minor; the former of which fell to the lot of Artaxias, and the latter to Zādriādes. Armēnla Mājor, Turcomania, was, according to Strābo, who was a native of Cāppādōciā, a neighbouring province, bounded on the N. by part of Mount Caucāsus, on the E. by Mēdia and Atrōpātēna, on the S. by Taurus, which separates it from Mēsōpōtāmīa, and on the W. by the river Euphrātes, or Armēnla Minor, and the mountain Parjādes, Jildiz Dag, which divide it from Cāppādōciā and Pōntus. The boundaries of Armēnla Minor, were on the S. Mount Taurus, separating it from Cilicia, on the E. the Euphrātes, and on the N. and W. that chain of mountains known by the names of Amānus, Alma-dag, Antitaurus, and Sōrdiscus. The limits assigned to these two countries by ancient geographers, are not materially different from those above-mentioned, which were generally adopted by subsequent writers. Of Armēnla Minor little is known. Tigrānes, king of Armēnla Mājor, made a brave and long resistance against the Romans, but was at last subdued by Pompey. From that time the kings of this country were tributary to the Romans, till the reign of Trajan, when it was reduced to a province. Under Justin II. it was subdued by the Saracens, who retained their possession until they were conquered by the Turks, who gave it the name of Turcomania. On regaining their freedom, the Armenian princes ascended the throne, and continued even during its subjection to the Tartars. But in the year 1522 the Turks again subjected it to their power, and it has ever since been a province of the Turkish empire, except the eastern part, which is included in the Persian dominions. Armēnla in general is mountainous. The most remarkable are Taurus and Antitaurus. It is, however, reckoned one of the most fruitful countries of Asia, and is watered by several large rivers. The Lycus and Phāsis, which fall into the Black Sea, the Araxes and Cyrus which run into the Caspian Sea, and Euphrātes which flows into the Persian Gulf, besides others of less note, have their sources in Armēnla. Annibustuendis Armēnla Sýriaque, for defending the rivers of Armēnla and Sýria; the Euphrātes and Tigris, i. e. the eastern boundaries of the Roman empire (Juv. Sat. viii. 169). Inh. Armēni, oftener, Armēnli, orum, m. Claudianus describes them as having curled hair, and wearing clothes of a greenish colour, the dress of the poorer Romans (v. 108). Odorūti Armēni, the sweet scented Armenians, i. e. the Armenians, whose country produced numerous aromatic plants (Tib. i. 5. 36). Adj. Armēnius, et, Armēniacus, a, um. Armēnla dra, the coast of Armēnla (Hor. Od. li. 9. 4). Armēnlāca arbōres, apricot trees; Armēnlāca mūla, apricots.

Armēnlius, i, m. a Thessalian, who went with Iāson to Cōlchis, and gave his name to Armēnla. Some maintain that he was a native of Armēnios, a town near the lake Bæbēis (Strab. 734). Bochart's derivation is very different.

Armes, is, m. a Scythian commander, of little bravery, who endeavoured to compensate for the want of courage by stratagem and deceit (Val. Flacc. vi. 530).

Armillātus, i, m. a lawyer, of consular dignity, who acted as a spy and informer to the Emperor Dōmitianus, on that account stood high in his favour (Juv. Sat. iv. 53).

Arminius, i, m. a man of influence and treachery, who distracted the Cattiāns by his factious measures, and occasioned the destruction of both Vārus and his legions. He had violently seized on the daughter of Sēgēstes, the other chief of that people, whom Strābo calls Thūsnēlda, and this ferocious act inflamed their mutual animosity. The wife of Arminius fell into the hands of the Romans, and after that event was delivered of a boy, who was brought up at Rāvēnna. His disasters, says Tacitus, made him the sport of fortune, which that historian promises to relate, but no narrative of that kind occurs in his writings which have been transmitted to modern times. Arminius had more of the qualities of a good soldier than of a deep politician. Aspiring at the sovereignty, he fell at last by the treachery of his own relations, in the thirty-seventh year of his age, after a career of fame and power, which he supported during twelve years against the Romans. Tacitus calls him the deliverer of Germania, stating that he was sometimes victorious, often defeated, but in the issue of the war still unconquered (Tac. Ann. i. 55—ii. 88. Flor. iv. 12). By Strābo, his son is named Thūmēlicus, and from this author it appears that he adorned the triumph of Gērmānicus.

Armōricæ, v. Arēmōricæ civitatēs, were those of the Cūriōsōlites, Rhēdōnes, Amb-béri, Calètes, Osismii, Lémovices, Vénètes, Unelli, and perhaps some others who inhabited the western part of the countries, between Ligëris, the Loire, and Sëquana, the Sciæc. They had this name from their situation on the sea coast; Armor signifying, in the language of the ancient Gauls, on the sea. Pliny states that Arémorica anciently denoted that part of Gallia afterwards called Aquitania. See Aquitania. Inh. Armōrica, orum, m. Adj. Arēmōricus, a, um.

Armoſata, e. Arsamoſata q. v.

Arna, e, f. Civitate d'Arno, a town of Umbria, on the confines of Etruria, Tuscany. Tiber, the Tevere, separates it from Perusia, Perugia (Sil. Ital. viii. 456). Inh. Arnates, ium, m. (Plin. i. 364).

Arneus, i, m. an Ithacan beggar, called also Irus, a man of prodigious size and great cowardice (Hom. Od. xviii. 5).

Arnē, es, f. a Thracian, whom Ovidius calls insipia, for having received a bribe to betray one of the islands in Mare Egæum, the Archipelago, which he does not name. For this crime she was transformed into a daw (Ov. Met. vii. 465). The readings here are various, and consequently doubtful.—2. A daughter of Æolus, who gave her name to a city of Beotia, and to another of Thessalia (Paus. ix. 40).

Arnē, es, f. a town of Doris (Plin. i. 428). Strophæus makes it a city of Thessalia, inhabited by a colony from Beotia, and Homerus, a city of Beotia, adding, that it abounded with grapes (Il. ii. 507). Pausanias states, that it belonged to the Chæroneuses, of course was in Beotia, that it had its name from Arnē, daughter of Æolus, and that there was also a city of this name in Thessalia, Thessaly. The account of Pausanias reconciles the different writers, some mentioning the one, and some the other (ix. 40).—2. A fountain in Arcadia, near which Neptūnus was brought up, by shepherds, to whom his mother had entrusted him, to prevent his being devoured by his father. The fountain received its name from the Greek word (ἀρνίον, arnion) signifying a lamb (Paus. viii. 8).

Arnus, i, m. a son of Faunus, hence Silius Italicus calls him Faunigēna. He was king of Etruria, Tuscany (Sil. Ital. v. 7).

Arno, i, m. the Arno, a river of Italy, between Florëntia and Pise (Liv. xxi. 2).

Aron, onis, m. a nobleman of Cölchis, distinguished by his wealth and bravery (Val. Flacc. v. 591 seq.).

Arpi, orum, m. a city of Apulia, now in ruins. See Argyripa. Martialis has Arpi disertu, eloquent, from its being a city of Apulia, and Hörätius born in that district (liv. 35). Virgilius has Ætolii Arpi, because it was built by Diomēdes, a native of Ætolia, under whom it was the royal residence (Æn. x. 28). Inh. Arpāni, e. Arpini, orum, m. (Liv. xxiv. 45). Adj. Arpānus, e. Arpinus, a, um. Arpānus ager, the territory of Arpi, in which sown grain never grows (Plin. i. 242).

C. Arpineus, C. Arpinu, m. a Roman knight, whom L. Aurunculeius Cotta and Quintus Titurius sent along with Quintus Junius, a Spaniard, to converse with Ambiorix, after that prince had made an attack on their camp (Ces. B. G. v. 7 seq.).

Arpinum, i, n. Arpino, a town of Lätium, which, in ancient times, belonged to the Volsi, and which the Romans recovered from the Samnites, in 307 B. C. (Liv. ix. 44). M. Tullius Cicero and C. Marius were born at Arpinum. Inh. Arpinates, ium (Sing. Arpinas, atis), m. favoured the interest of the Romans, for which they received the freedom of the state (305 B. C.), at the same time with the Trebulani (Liv. x. 1). Arpinas arator, the ploughman of Arpinum, i. e. C. Marius (Plin. v. 73). Adj. Arpinas, as, gen. atis, et, Arpinus, a, um. Arpinas prædium (Cic. Epis. Att. i. 6). Arpina charta, the writings of Cicero (Mart. x. 19). Arpinus agellus (Mart. xi. 51).

Arpus, i, m. a prince of the Cattians, whose wife and daughter Silius, an officer under Germanicus, made prisoners in an irruption, which he made into the territory of that nation (Tac. Ann. ii. 7).

Arracillum. See Aracillum.

Arrētinus Clēmens, Arrētini Clēmētis, m. a favourite of Domitianus, of consular rank, nearly related to the family of Vespasianus, whom Licinius Mucianus made commander of the prætorians (Tac. Hist. iv. 68).

Arrētium, i, n. Arezzo, one of the twelve towns of Etruria, Tuscany, in Italy, on the river Clānis, or Clānius, the Chiana, one of the northern branches of Tiber, the Tevere. During the time Scipio made war against Carthage, this city possessed greater resources than all the rest of Tuscany. But no trace of its ancient beauty and splendour is seen in the modern city, which was plundered first by the Goths, and afterwards by the Lombards. Persius writes Arēti (Sat. i. 129) in the genitive, which should be printed Arēti, a mistake which has escaped most Editors. Plinius also writes Arētium (iv. 470). Inh. Arrētini, orum, m. Adj. Arrētinus, a, um. Arrētina testa, a particular kind of earthenware, which was made at Arrētium, Arezzo. Arrētinus ager (Sal. Cat. 36).

Arria, e, f. the wife of Cæcina Pætus, whom Claudius the Emperor sentenced to death, because he had taken part in the revolt of Scribonianus. Having failed in her numerous and earnest solicitations to procure his pardon, Arria urged her husband to prefer a Roman death to the disgrace of a public execution. After repeated conferences on that subject, finding he had little inclination, if not an aversion, at dying by his own hand, she plunged the sword into her own bosom, and having drawn it out she held it forth, exclaiming, "O Pætus, it gives no pain." Martialis has recorded this saying (l. 14). Plinius the younger has given some excellent traits of her character (iii. 16).—2. Daughter of the former, who married Thrasea, whom Nero doomed to death, and she resolved not to survive. Thrasea intreated her to remain longer in life, to support and comfort their daughter in her tender years (Tac. Ann. xvi. 34).—3. The mother of two sons whose fate Höros, an astrologer, foretold (Prop. iv. l. 89).

Arria Galla, Arriæ Gällæ, f. a woman who had great elegance of form, and nothing else which could recommend her. She had been first married to Domitius Silus, and seduced from her husband by C. Cæpurnus Piso q. v. (Tac. Ann. xv. 59).

Arrius, i, m. a man whom Catullus ridicules for affected pronunciation (lxxxiv. 2).

Arrius Antoninus, Arrii Antonini, m. was to assemble a council at Nice, in the year 325, when the doctrine of Arius was condemned, his books ordered to be burned, and capital punishment denounced against all who kept them. Sentence of banishment was pronounced against himself, which, being revoked at the end of five years, Arius gave in a confession of his faith, so artfully framed as to satisfy the Emperor, who ordered Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, to receive him, but he died that evening. Athanasius, his zealous opponent, having been promoted to the See of Alexandria after his banishment, continued dissatisfied with his creed, and refused to admit him into communion (Amm. Mar. Excerpt.).

Arīsius, a, um. See Arvis.

Armēnes, is, m. son of Nābis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, who was given as a hostage to T. Quinctius Flamininus, and adorned the triumph of that victorious general, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 52). Eutrōpius mentions the same circumstance (iv. 2).

Armēnia, æ, f. a large country of Asia, divided into Māior and Minor. Armēnia Māior, now called Turcomania, was bounded on the S. by Sýria and Mēsōpōtāmia, on the E. by Mēdia, on the N. by Iberia and Cōlchis, which two countries extended from Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, to Mārē Cāspium, the Caspian Sea. It was made tributary to the Medes by Astyāges, and Cýrus reduced it to a province. Alexander the Great also subdued this country, which afterwards fell under the power of Antiochus the Great, who sent two deputies, Zādriādes and Artāxias, to take the command of it. But these governors, stimulated by love of power, excited the Armenians to revolt, carried on a successful war against several neighbouring states, and shared between them the sovereignty of the country. By them it was first divided into Armēnia Māior, and Armēnia Minor; the former of which fell to the lot of Artāxias, and the latter to Zādriādes. Armēnia Māior, Turcomania, was, according to Strābo, who was a native of Cāppādōcia, a neighbouring province, bounded on the N. by part of Mount Caucāsus, on the E. by Mēdia and Atrōpātēna, on the S. by Taurus, which separates it from Mēsōpōtāmia, and on the W. by the river Euphrātes, or Armēnia Minor, and the mountain Parýādes, Jildiz Dag, which divide it from Cāppādōcia and Pōntus. The boundaries of Armēnia Minor, were on the S. Mount Taurus, separating it from Cilicia, on the E. the Euphrātes, and on the N. and W. that chain of mountains known by the names of Amānus, Alma-dag, Antitaurus, and Sōrdiscus. The limits assigned to these two countries by ancient geographers, are not materially different from those above-mentioned, which were generally adopted by subsequent writers. Of Armēnia Minor little is known. Tigrānes, king of Armēnia Māior, made a brave and long resistance against the Romans, but was at last subdued by Pompey. From that time the kings of this country were tributary to the Romans, till the reign of Trajan, when it was reduced to a province. Under Justin II. it was subdued by the Saracens, who retained their possession until they were conquered by the Turks, who gave it the name of Turcomania. On regaining their freedom, the Armenian princes ascended the throne, and continued even during its subjection to the Tartars. But in the year 1522 the Turks again subjected it to their power, and it has ever since been a province of the Turkish empire, except the eastern part, which is included in the Persian dominions. Armēnia in general is mountainous. The most remarkable are Taurus and Antitaurus. It is, however, reckoned one of the most fruitful countries of Asia, and is watered by several large rivers. The Lycus and Phāsis, which fall into the Black Sea, the Araxes and Cýrus which run into the Caspian Sea, and Euphrātes which flows into the Persian Gulf; besides others of less note, have their sources in Armēnia. Annibustundis Armēnia Syrtaque, for defending the rivers of Armēnia and Sýria; the Euphrātes and Tigris, i. e. the eastern boundaries of the Roman empire (Juv. Sat. viii. 169). Iuh. Armēni, oftener, Armēni, orum, m. Claudianus describes them as having curled hair, and wearing clothes of a greenish colour, the dress of the poorer Romans (v. 108). Odorati Armēni, the sweet scented Armenians, i. e. the Armenians, whose country produced numerous aromatic plants (Tib. i. 5. 36). Adj. Armēnius, et, Armēniacus, a, um. Armēnia ora, the coast of Armēnia (Hor. Od. ii. 9. 4). Armēniaca arbōres, apricot trees; Armēniaca mēla, apricots.

Armēnius, i, m. a Thessalian, who went with Iāson to Cōlchis, and gave his name to Armēnia. Some maintain that he was a native of Armēnos, a town near the lake Bœbēis (Strab. 734). Bochart's derivation is very different.

Armes, is, m. a Scythian commander, of little bravery, who endeavoured to compensate for the want of courage by stratagem and deceit (Val. Flacc. vi. 530).

Armillātus, i, m. a lawyer, of consular dignity, who acted as a spy and informer to the Emperor Dōmitianus, on that account stood high in his favour (Juv. Sat. iv. 53).

Arminius, i, m. a man of influence and treachery, who distracted the Cattiāns by his factious measures, and occasioned the destruction of both Vārus and his legions. He had violently seized on the daughter of Sēgēstes, the other chief of that people, whom Strābo calls Thūsnēlda, and this ferocious act inflamed their mutual animosity. The wife of Arminius fell into the hands of the Romans, and after that event was delivered of a boy, who was brought up at Rāvēnna. His disasters, says Tacitus, made him the sport of fortune, which that historian promises to relate, but no narrative of that kind occurs in his writings which have been transmitted to modern times. Arminius had more of the qualities of a good soldier than of a deep politician. Aspiring at the sovereignty, he fell at last by the treachery of his own relations, in the thirty-seventh year of his age, after a career of fame and power, which he supported during twelve years against the Romans. Tacitus calls him the deliverer of Germany, stating that he was sometimes victorious, often defeated, but in the issue of the war still unconquered (Tac. Ann. i. 55—ii. 88. Flor. iv. 12). By Strābo, his son is named Thūmēlicus, and from this author it appears that he adorned the triumph of Gērmānicus.

Armōricæ, v. Arēmōricæ civitatēs, were those of the Cūriōsōntes, Rhedōnes, Ambli-

Arpi, Calètes, Oisimili, Lēmōvices, Vēnēti, Lucii, and perhaps some others who inhabited the western part of the country, between Ligēris, the Loire, and Sēquāna, de Seis. They had this name from their situation on the sea coast; Arpi signifying, in the language of the ancient Gauls, on the sea. Pliny states that Arēnōrēica anciently denoted that part of Gallia afterwards called Aquitānia. See Aquitānia. Inh. Arēnōrēici, um, m. Adj. Arēnōrēicus, a, um. Arēnōrēica, v. Arsamōsāta q. v.

Arna, a, f. Civitate d'Arno, a town of Lucania, on the confines of Etruria, Tuscan. Tiber, the Tevere, separates it from Perusia, Perugia (Sil. Ital. viii. 456). Inh. Arnates, um, m. (Plin. i. 364).

Arneus, i, m. an Ithacan beggar, called also Irus, a man of prodigious size and great voracity (Hom. Od. xviii. 5).

Arnē, es, f. a Thracian, whom Ovidius calls impia, for having received a bribe to betray one of the islands in Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, which he does not name. For this crime she was transformed into a fox (Ov. Met. vii. 465). The readings here are various, and consequently doubtful.—2. A daughter of Æolus, who gave her name to a city of Boeotia, and to another of Thessalia (Paus. ix. 40).

Arnē, es, f. a town of Dōris (Plin. i. 428). Stephanus makes it a city of Thessalia, inhabited by a colony from Boeotia, and Hōmēras, a city of Boeotia, adding, that it abounded with grapes (Il. ii. 507). Pausanias states, that it belonged to the Cherōnēses, of course was in Boeotia, that it had its name from Arnē, daughter of Æolus, and that there was also a city of this name in Thessalia, Thessaly. The account of Pausanias reconciles the different writers, some mentioning the one, and some the other (ix. 40).—2. A fountain in Arcadia, near which Neptunus was brought up, by shepherds, to whom his mother had entrusted him, to prevent his being devoured by his father. The fountain received its name from the Greek word (agne, αγνε) signifying a lamb (Paus. viii. 8).

Arnus, i, m. a son of Faunus, hence Silius Italicus calls him Faunigēna. He was king of Etruria, Tuscan (Sil. Ital. v. 7).

Arnus, i, m. the Arno, a river of Italy, between Flōrēntia and Pisae (Liv. xxi. 2).

Aron, ōnis, m. a nobleman of Cōlchis, distinguished by his wealth and bravery (Val. Flacc. v. 591 seq.).

Arpi, orum, m. a city of Apulia, now in ruins. See Argghipa. Martialis has Arpi disertis, eloquent, from its being a city of Apulia, and Horatius born in that district (iv. 35). Virgilius has Ætoli Arpi, because it was built by Diomēdes, a native of Ætolia, under whom it was the royal residence (Æn. x. 28). Inh. Arpāni, v. Arpini, orum, m. (Liv. xxiv. 45). Adj. Arpānus, v. Arpinus, a, um. Arpinus ager, the territory of Arpi, in which sown grain never grows (Plin. i. 242).

C. Arpineus, C. Arpinei, m. a Roman knight, whom L. Aurunculeius Cotta and Quintus Titurius sent along with Quintus Junius, a Spaniard, to converse with Ambiorix, after that prince had made an attack on their camp (Cæs. B. G. v. 7 seq.).

Arpinum, i, n. Arpino, a town of Latium, which, in ancient times, belonged to the Volsi, and which the Romans recovered from the Sannites, in 307 B. C. (Liv. ix. 44). M. Tullius Cicero and C. Marius were born at Arpinum. Inh. Arpinates, um (Sing. Arpinas, ātis), m. favoured the interest of the Romans, for which they received the freedom of the state (305 B. C.), at the same time with the Trebulani (Liv. x. 1). Arpinas arator, the ploughman of Arpinum, i. e. C. Marius (Plin. v. 73). Adj. Arpinas, as, as, gen. ātis, et, Arpinus, a, um. Arpinus prædium (Cic. Epis. Att. i. 6). Arpinæ charta, the writings of Cicero (Mart. x. 19). Arpinus agellus (Mart. xi. 51).

Arpus, i, m. a prince of the Cattiis, whose wife and daughter Silius, an officer under Germanicus, made prisoners in an irruption, which he made into the territory of that nation (Tac. Ann. ii. 7).

Arracillum. See Aracillum.

Arrētinus Clēmēns, Arrētini Clēmētis, m. a favourite of Dōmitianus, of consular rank, nearly related to the family of Vespasianus, whom Licinius Mucianus made commander of the prætorians (Tac. Hist. iv. 68).

Arrētium, i, n. Arezzo, one of the twelve towns of Etruria, Tuscan, in Italy, on the river Clānis, or, Clānius, the Chiana, one of the northern branches of Tiber, the Tevere. During the time Scipio made war against Carthage, this city possessed greater resources than all the rest of Tuscan. But no trace of its ancient beauty and splendour is seen in the modern city, which was plundered first by the Goths, and afterwards by the Lombards. Pērsius writes Arēti (Sat. i. 129) in the genitive, which should be printed Arēti, a mistake which has escaped most Editors. Plinius also writes Arētium (iv. 470). Inh. Arrētini, orum, m. Adj. Arrētinus, a, um. Arrētina testa, a particular kind of earthenware, which was made at Arrētium, Arezzo. Arrētinus ager (Sal. Cat. 36).

Arria, a, f. the wife of Cæcina Pætus, whom Claudius the Emperor sentenced to death, because he had taken part in the revolt of Scribonianus. Having failed in her numerous and earnest solicitations to procure his pardon, Arria urged her husband to prefer a Roman death to the disgrace of a public execution. After repeated conferences on that subject, finding he had little inclination, if not an aversion, at dying by his own hand, she plunged the sword into her own bosom, and having drawn it out she held it forth, exclaiming, "O Pætus, it gives no pain." Martialis has recorded this saying (l. 14). Plinius the younger has given some excellent traits of her character (iii. 16).—2. Daughter of the former, who married Thrāsēa, whom Nēro doomed to death, and she resolved not to survive. Thrāsēa intreated her to remain longer in life, to support and comfort their daughter in her tender years (Tac. Ann. xvi. 34).—3. The mother of two sons whose fate Hōros, an astrologer, foretold (Prop. iv. l. 89).

Arria Gālla, Arrie Gāllæ, f. a woman who had great elegance of form, and nothing else which could recommend her. She had been first married to Dōmitius Silus, and seduced from her husband by C. Cālpiurnus Piso q. v. (Tac. Ann. xv. 59).

Arrius, i, m. a man whom Cātullus ridicules for affected pronunciation (lxxxiv. 2).

Arrius Antōninus, Arrū Antōnini, m. was the colleague of M. Celsus in the consulship, from July till September, in the year 70. Otho made this foolish appointment. According to some, he was the maternal grandfather of the Emperor Antoninus Pius (Tac. Hist. i. 77).

of Arrius Varus, Arrii Vári, m. an officer in the army of Corbulo, who commanded a cohort. From the few particulars respecting him mentioned by Tacitus, we know little of his history, except that he defeated the favourers of Vitellius, became prætorian præfect, and obtained prætorian ornaments (Tac. Ann. xiii. 9: Hist. iii. 16—iv. 14).

of C. Arrius, C. Arrii, m. a friend of Cicero, whom the orator mentions in a letter to his brother Quintus, as having acted insincerely and deceitfully towards him (i. 3).

of Q. Arrius, Q. Arrii, m. a man of low birth who stood high in the favour of the people, for his fluency of speech. He was elected prætor and appointed to the government of Sicily, in 73 B. C. In place of going to his province, the senate ordered him against the gladiators, and in that command he defeated and killed Crixus, but was, with L. Gellius Pöplio, defeated by Spartacus, the other commander of these gladiators (Liv. Ep. 96).—2. The son of Q. Arrius, to whom C. Julius Cesar had been under obligations, and whom he thwarted in his canvass for the consulship. In honour of his father, he gave a feast in the temple of Castor, mentioned by Horatius (Sat. ii. 3. 86), with the view, most probably, of obtaining the support of the people, and thereby securing his election. From Cicero, who was intimate with him, it appears probable, that this entertainment was soon after the death of his father (in Vatin. 13).

of Arrubas, v. Arrýbas, m. brother of Neöptölémus, and king of the Mölössi, who married Tröas, sister of Olympias, the wife of Philippus, and mother of Alexander the Great. By this affinity with Philippus, he expected to enlarge his kingdom, counting on the good offices of his brother-in-law, who acted a very different part, by seizing on his kingdom, and driving Arrubas into banishment, where he died. Justinus commends him as a legislator (vii. 6 seq.). According to Pausanias, he was the fifteenth in descent from Pýrrhus son of Achilles (i. 11).

of Arruns, úntis, m. one of the Etrusci whom Tärcho brought to Enéas. He killed Camilla, and was himself killed by Opis, one of Diana's nymphs (Virg. Æn. xi. 759, 864).

—2. A Tuscan prophet, who lived at Lúca, Lucæ, and foretold future events from lightning, the entrails of animals, and from the flight or appearances of birds (Luc. Phar. i. 586).

of Arrüntius Stëlla, Arrüntii Stëllæ, m. a man to whom the Emperor Néro entrusted the care of the public spectacles which he intended to exhibit in the year 55 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 22).

of L. Arrüntius, L. Arrüntii, m. a distinguished Roman, who held the consulship with M. Claudius Márcellus 24 B. C. He commanded the left, under Augustus, in the naval engagement at Actium (Vel. Pat. ii. 77 seq.).—2. A Roman, who moved that the titles of all the laws of Augustus, and the names of the conquered nations should be carried before the body in the funeral procession. Augustus entertained a high opinion of his talents, but the freedom with which he delivered his sentiments, exposed him to the suspicion of Tiberius. In the year 15, Tiber, the Tevere, overflowed the lower part of Rome, and the Emperor appointed L. Arrüntius, and C. Atëus Capito to adopt means to prevent future inundations. Of his power some idea may be formed from the Emperor's complaining in a law-suit, of his weight and influence. A prosecution raised against him and others for an alleged course of adultery with Albucilla, involved them as accomplices in all her crimes. Arrüntius, now advanced in life, resolved to end his days, on purpose to avoid the trial and its consequences. After an excellent speech, which Tacitus has recorded, he opened his veins, and bled to death. His accusers suffered the punishment merited by their false evidence. In talents, respectability and moral rectitude, L. Arrüntius appears to have been one of the first characters in Rome. He held the consulship with M. Æmilius Lëpidus, in the year 6 (Tac. Ann. i. 8—vi. 48).

T. Arrüntius, T. Arrüntii, m. a man whom Cn. Cälpurnius Piso desired, along with others, to plead his cause, which they declined (Tac. Ann. iii. 11).

Arsa, æ, f. a city of Bætica in Spain (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 294).

Arsäces, is, m. a governor of Média, appointed by Alexander the Great, in place of Oxydätes (Curt. viii. 3).—2. The founder of the Parthian monarchy, who, having expelled the Macedonian præfects, established the kingdom, and thus rendered himself as distinguished among his countrymen as Cýrus was among the Persians, Alexander the Great among the Macedonians, or Römulus among the Romans. He died in old age, and the Parthians, from respect to his memory, called all their kings by his name (Just. xli. 4, 5). To him Tacitus alludes (Hist. v. 8). Arsäcides, æ, m. a kind of patronymic assumed by the successors of Arsäces, as if they had been descendants from the father of the Parthian monarchy. Arsäcides dominus Parthörum nascitur (Luc. Phar. viii. 409). Adj. Arsäcius, a, um. Arsäcius fästus (Claud. xviii. 415).—3. (11.) Son of the former, who succeeded his father in the throne of Parthia, in 254 B. C. (Just. xli. 5).—4. (III.) Surnamed Priäpätius, whom Justinus makes the third Parthian king, passing over Artabänus I., who obtained the crown in 217 B. C., and died in 209 B. C., the year in which the reign of Priäpätius commenced, and it terminated in 194 B. C. (Just. xlv. 1).—5. A king of Parthia, who sent ambassadors to L. Cornëllus Sulla, requesting the friendship of the Roman people, in 97 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 70).—6. The eldest son of Artabänus the second, king of Parthia, whom his father placed on the throne of Armënia, which had become vacant by the death of Artäxias the third, in the year 53.

Mithridätes prevailed on the servants of this monarch to cut him off by poison, in the same year (Tac. Ann. vi. 31—33). See Mithridätes and Pharasménès.—7. Arsäcia, æ, f. Rha, a town of Média, according to Sträbo the same with Euröpus. This is also the idea of Stëphänus, but Ammianus Marcellinus makes them different (xxiii. 6).—8. Arsämes, is, m. præfect of the Dränge under Alexander the Great, afterwards superseded by Stašnor, in 328 B. C. (Curt. viii. 3).—2. Father of Hystaspes, and grandfather of Darius (Herod. i. 209 seq.).

Arasabōsāta, orum, n. Simul, a town of Armenia near Euphrates, the El-Frat (Plin. l. 664). Tacitus mentions it only as a castle or fort (Ann. xv. 10).

Arasānes, is, m. governor of Cilicia, who desolated that country on the approach of Alexander the Great, in 333 B. C. (Curt. iii. 4).—2. Son of Darius, and Artystonē, daughter of Cyrus (Herod. vii. 69).

Arasānas, is, m. the Aras, a small river of Armenia Major, which runs in a southwest direction, and falls into Euphrates, the El-Frat (Plin. l. 580). Rennel considers it the same with the Telēbōas of Xenophon, now the Ak-sou.

Arases, is, m. a man in the army of Hannibal, killed by Q. Fabius Maximus at the time that noble Carthaginian had surrounded the troops of M. Minicius Rufus, the colleague of Fabius in the dictatorship (Sil. Ital. vii. 598).

Arasā, is, m. the Aras, a small river, which divides Hyrcania from Istria (Flor. ii. 5). By changing the course of this river, the Roman consul, C. Claudius Pulcher, took Nesatum q. v.

Arasā Silva, appears to have been at no great distance from Jancitulum. We find it called likewise Arslum Nēmus. The diversity of opinion respecting the place occupied by this wood, arises, most probably, from its having been cut down early in the Roman state, as scarcely two authors agree with regard to it (Liv. ii. 7).

Arasāna, m. f. a town of Sūsāna (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Arasdeus, i. m. son of Dātāmes, sent by his father with an army against the Pisidae, by whom he was killed in battle (Cor. Nep. Dat. 6).

Arasidōē, es, f. a daughter of Ptolēmaeus, king of Egypt, and wife of Lysimachus, by whose orders she administered poison to his son Agathōcles. By Lysimachus she had two sons, Lysimachus and Philippus, both killed by her brother Ptolēmaeus Ceraunus, on which she went into exile at Sāmōthracia (Just. xvii. 1—xxiv. 3).—2. Sister of Antigonus Gōnatas, and wife of Magas, king of Cyrenē, by whom she became the mother of Bērēnice q. v. (Just. xxvi. 3).—3. Daughter of Ptolēmaeus Lāgus, king of Egypt, who put Achilles to death, and appointed Gānymēdes, a eunuch, commander-in-chief of the army, in his place. C. Julius Caesar, after he had conquered Egypt, led her in triumph through the streets of Rome (Luc. Phar. x. 521).—4. A daughter of Ptolēmaeus Aulētēs, king of Egypt. To gain the favour of her elder sister Clēōpātra, M. Antonius deprived her of life.

Arasidōē, es, f. a city of Libyā, so called from Arasidōē, sister and wife of Ptolēmaeus Philādēphus.—2. Another, now Fium, or Faiana, in Cyrenāica, or Syrtis Major, of which the original name was Tauchira.—3. A city of Syria, in Aulon, of which the circumference was eight thousand stadia, according to Stēphānus. No other author mentions this town, and the space assigned to it exceeds all belief.—4. One in Cilicia (Plin. l. 583).—5. One in Cyprus (id. i.

614).—6. One on Rubrum Mārē, the Red Sea, a hundred and twenty-five Roman miles from Pēlūsium (id. 564).

Arsōpēs, arum, m. a Scythian nation (Orph. 1052).

Artābānus, i. m. son of Hystaspes, brother of Darius, and uncle of Xērxēs, appears to have been a man of great judgment, prudence, and consideration. It had been well for his relations that they had listened to his counsel, uniformly dictated by wisdom (Herod. iv. 83 seq.).—2. Son of Artasyras, a prefect of Xērxēs, to whom that monarch showed great kindness and attachment. In expectation of succeeding to the crown of Persia, he, with his seven sons, all of uncommon strength, murdered his master, and, in his turn, fell by the hand of Artāxērxēs (Cor. Nep. Reg. 1. Just. iii. 1).—3. (I.) King of Pārthia, ascended the throne in 217 B. C. and died in 209 B. C.—4. (II.) Succeeded his nephew, Phrāates II., in the throne of Pārthia, in 128 B. C., made war on the Thōgarīi, a Scythian nation, died in consequence of a wound in the arm, in 124 B. C., and was succeeded by his son, Mithridātes III. (Just. xlii. 2).—5. A descendant of Arsāces, who had been educated among the Dāhas, and, having defeated Vōnōnes the first, ascended the throne of Pārthia. Haughty in his conduct to the Romans, and cruel to his countrymen, he neither conciliated the affections of the latter, nor commanded the confidence of the former. Finding himself deserted on every side, he chose for his body guards men destitute of every good principle, and ready to perpetrate any crime. With these ruffians, attached to him merely by hire, he fled to Scythia. On Tiridates ascending the throne, the fickle Parthians despised his youth, and still more his Roman education, went in quest of the exiled monarch, whom they found in Hyrcania, reduced to the lowest degree of wretchedness, depending for his subsistence on his bow and arrow. Having collected a number of Scythians, he returned to Pārthia, and had little difficulty in overcoming the unwelcome Tiridates, who fled from danger, when his troops divided, part returning to their own houses, and part flocking to the standard of Artābānus. He cut off the greater part of the family of Arsāces (Tac. Ann. ii. 3—vi. 48).

Artābāzānes, is, m. a son of Darius, who disputed with his brother Xērxēs for the sovereignty (Herod. vii. 2 seq.).

Artābāzes, is, m. a son of Tigrānes.

Artābāzus, i. m. son of Phārnāces, prince of the royal youth of Persia under Darius. After the death of that monarch, he was treated with great respect and honour by Alexander the Great, who sent him against Satibarzānes, and appointed him governor of Bactria, but he soon declined office on account of his advanced age (Curt. iii. 13 seq.).—2. A prefect of Xērxēs, whom that monarch sent to Pausānias, on purpose to encourage him in the accomplishment of the traitorous designs which he had formed against his native country (Cor. Nep. Paus. 2).

Artābūs, i. m. a river in Gedrosia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). The proper reading seems to be Arābūs, v. Arābis, the Pooralee. See Arābus.

Artācāna, is, f. a town of Pārthia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). This is perhaps the city called by Curtius, Artācāna, is, f. (vi. 6).

Artāces, v. Artōces; is, m. a king of Ibēria in Asia, conquered and taken by Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus, about 66 B. C. (Eutrop. vi. 14).

Articlē, es, v. Artācia, ae, f. a spring, at which the companions of Ulysses met the daughter of Antiphātes, who had gone there for water. It supplied the town of Læstrygōnia (Hom. Od. x. 108. Tibul. iv. 1. 60).

—2. Another spring of this name, celebrated for being visited by the Argonauts, in the vicinity of Cŷzicus (Apol. Rhod. i. 957).

Artai, orum, m. the ancient name of the Persians (Herod. vii. 61).

Artāmēnes, is, m. a king of Cāppādōcia, and father-in-law to Antiochus Hērax (Just. xxvii. 3). Diōdōrus Siculus calls him Artāmenes.

Artānes, is, m. brother of Dārius, son of Hystāspes, and grandson of Arsāmes. His daughter Phrātīgūna was married to Dārius, by whom she became the mother of Abrōcōmes and Hypērānthes (Herod. vii. 224).

Artānes, is, m. the Vid, a Thracian river, which falls into the Danube, on the north bank (Herod. iv. 49).

Artānus, i, m. a friend of the poet Mār-tiālis, to whom he appears to have sent a present of his book (Mart. viii. 72).

Artāphēnes, is, m. brother of Dārius, under whom he had the government of Sār-des. According to Justinus, he was appointed umpire by his nephew Artābāzānes, or Artemēnes, and Xērxes, in order to determine which of these two should ascend the throne of Pērsia (ii. 10. Herod. v. 25).—2. Son of Artāphēnes and nephew of Dārius. To Dātis and Artāphēnes that monarch gave the command of a fleet of fifty ships, and of an army consisting of two hundred thousand infantry, and ten thousand cavalry, with a view to reduce Greece under his dominion (Cor. Nep. Milt. 4).

Artātus, i, m. a river in Penēstia, on which stood Oenēum q. v. (Liv. xlii. 19).

Artāvāsdes, is, m. king of Armēnia, whom M. Antōnius, the triumvir, treacherously induced to come to him, under promise of protection, and whom he put into prison, bestowing the kingdom of that monarch upon a son of his own by Clēōpātra, queen of Egypt, in 36 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 131). Tacitus says that Antōnius basely murdered him, but mentions nothing of a son of Antōnius and Clēōpātra being seated on his throne (Ann. ii. 3). From respect to the rank of the Armenian king in prison, his chains were of silver, and, when he adorned the triumphal procession, of gold. Greek writers call him Artābāzes.—2. Artāvāsdes the second, by order of Augustus, succeeded, on the demise of the children of Tigrānes the third, to the throne of Armēnia, in 6 B. C. Although supported by the resources of the Roman empire, he did not retain the kingdom above five years. About three years after his expulsion, C. Cesar placed the crown on the head of Ariōbāzānes q. v. (Tac. Ann. ii. 3).

Artāxāta, orum, v. e. Artāxāta, ae, f. Ar-des, the chief city of Armēnia Major, stands on the river Arāxes, the Arash, built by Artāxius, appointed by the Armenians their king, from whom the name is derived. Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus took it, and spared both the inhabitants and city, but, in the reign of Nēro, the Romans, under Corbūlo, levelled it with the ground, in the year 58 (Tac. Ann. xlii. 41. Juv. Sat. ii. 170).

Artāxērxes, is, m. (i. e. a great warrior), son of Xērxes, called by the Greeks Artāxērxes Macrōchēir, and by the Latins, Lōngimānus (i. e. long-handed), because, when standing upright, his hands reached his knees. Strābo mentions this particular, which does not appear to have been the idea of Cōrnēlius Nēpos, who states, that he was remarkable for the very large and the very handsome make of his person, which he rendered still more conspicuous by his extraordinary merit as a soldier, for no Persian surpassed his bravery in battle. According to our ideas of the human form, a man whose hands reached his knees would not attract notice for personal symmetry, however much he might be stared at for his deformity. The Geographer above-mentioned makes the length of his arms an exception from the beauty of his figure. Artābānus, induced by the contempt into which Xērxes had sunk, on account of his voluptuousness, murdered him, and placed Artāxērxes Lōngimānus on the throne, in 473 B. C., with the view of ultimately securing the crown to himself. For the perfidy and ingratitude of Artābānus to his sovereign, and his designs on the government, Artāxērxes put him to death. In order to secure the tranquillity of his government, he deprived his brother Hystāspes of life. After a successful reign of forty years, he died, leaving his kingdom to his only legitimate son Xērxes. By his concubines he had seventeen sons, one of whom, named Sōgdianus, killed Xērxes, and usurped the throne. For this murder, Sōgdianus atoned by a cruel death, inflicted by another of these illegitimate sons, called Ochus, known in history by the name of Dārius Nōthus q. v. According to some authors, Artāxērxes Lōngimānus is the Ahasuerus mentioned in the book of Esther.—2. The eldest son of Dārius Nōthus, by Pārysātis, a daughter of the former Artāxērxes, whose original name was Arsāces, but took that of Artāxērxes on ascending the throne, in 404 B. C. On account of his uncommon memory, he had the surname of Mnēmōn. A younger brother, Cŷrus, prompted by his mother, who wished him to succeed his father, avowedly because he had been born after his father was king, but really because he was her favourite son, endeavoured to dethrone his brother, and, with that view, engaged a number of Greeks to march with him from Asia Minor, of which he was governor, into Pērsia. The bravery of his auxiliaries would probably have secured to him the object of his wishes, had he not, in battle, rashly and ferociously attempted to kill his own brother, and lost his life by that unjustifiable act. In consequence of his death, the Greeks, having been deserted by the Persians, resolved immediately to return home, which they accomplished under Xēnōphon, the philosopher and historian, through a rugged, mountainous, and almost inaccessible tract, annoyed every-where by the enemy. This remarkable march is called, in history, the Retreat of the ten thousand, and forms, perhaps, the most remarkable military expedition accomplished by any army in any country. Ar-

Artaxerxes, from an unaccountable weakness, gave up to his mother the very men who had saved his own life by killing Cyrus, and she displayed a barbarous ingenuity in putting them to death by exquisite torture. His whole reign exhibited his unfitness for so extensive and unsettled a kingdom. Fresh commotions arose in every quarter of his dominion, at a distance from the seat of administration, either from the unskillfulness or infidelity of his governors, or from the oppression of his exactions. The jealousies which agitated the different states of Greece, put it in his power to conclude agreements with either party on very advantageous terms, whereas their union would have secured the independence of their country against foreign domination, and might have even driven the Persians from Asia Minor. The dispute at court respecting his successor distressed him in the latter years of his life, on which account he at last declared his eldest son, Darius, king, and invested him with the royal authority. His ambition, far from being satisfied by this liberal grant, stimulated him to attempt the murder of his father. The plot having been discovered before the time fixed for its execution, the conspirators expiated their crime under the hands of the public executioner. Artaspes, his second son, from dread of his younger brother, Ochus, effected his own death by poison. Besides these three legitimate sons, Artaxerxes Mnemon had a hundred and fifteen by his concubines, and of these illegitimate sons Arsames was his favourite. This youth, highly esteemed for his virtues, Ochus poisoned, and grief at these enormities sunk the spirits and destroyed the health of Artaxerxes, who died, oppressed with sorrow, in the ninety-fourth year of his age, and forty-third or forty-sixth of his reign (Cor. Nep. Reg. 1). Plutarchus writes his history at great length.—3. A legitimate son of the former, whom he succeeded in the throne, in 338 B. C. His original name was Ochus, but he prefixed that of Artaxerxes on his coming to the crown. His reign was marked by deeds of enormous cruelty, regardless of kindred, sex, and age. Bagoas, an Egyptian physician, deprived him of life by poison (Just. x. 3).

Artaxias, m. the second, son of Artabanes, who succeeded his father in the throne of Armenia, in 20 B. C., and from the fate of his father conceived a strong aversion to the Romans. With the assistance of the Arsacids, he defended himself and kingdom against the Romans, until he fell by the treachery of his own relations, when Augustus placed the crown on the head of Tigranes (Tac. Ann. ii. 3).—2. Artaxias, the third, a name given to Zeno by the Armenians, in allusion to the place of his coronation (Tac. Ann. ii. 56).

Artamenes, m. the eldest son of Darius, whom Herodotus calls Artabazanes (vii. 2), disputed with Xerxes respecting the succession; the former claimed it from priority of birth, and the latter from his having been born after his father had ascended the throne of Persia. Justinus says they referred it to their paternal uncle Artaphernes, and Herodotus states that it was determined in the lifetime of their father. Whether the monarch himself or his brother decided the dispute, all agree that Xerxes succeeded his father (Just. ii. 10).

Artamidorus, m. a painter mentioned by Martialis and ridiculed by the poet, because, whilst he painted Venus, he paid homage to Minerva, and wondered that the graces were wanting to his picture. Martialis introduces different persons of this name, of whom nothing more is known than what the epigrams in which these characters occur, contain (v. 41).

Artēmis, idis, f. a name of Diana, as goddess of childbearing.

Artēmis, m. a river of Bactriana (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Artēmisia, m, f. daughter of Hecatomnus, wife of Mausolus q. v., who mixed the ashes of her husband with wine, which she drank, and erected to his memory one of the most splendid structures of antiquity, esteemed one of the seven wonders of the world. From it magnificent tombs have been called Mausolea (Cic. Tusc. iii. 31). Grief, on account of her husband's death, gradually consumed her frame, and she died in deep regret for his loss. She offered rewards of great value to the writer who excelled in praise of Mausolus; amongst the candidates appeared Theopompus, Theodectes, and Naucrites. The first obtained the prize, and the second wrote a tragedy to which he gave the name of Mausolus (Gel. x. 18).—2. Daughter of Lygdamis, a queen of Halicarnassus, who came at the head of a reinforcement to Xerxes, and excited, with great ardour, the Persian monarch to war (Just. ii. 12).

Artēmisium, i, n. Syrochori, a promontory of Eubœa, Negropont, in the northern part of that island. Its situation in the Strait induced Themistocles, near it, to attack the Persian fleet, when Xerxes invaded Greece, in order to prevent his being surrounded by the greater force of the enemy. Adj. Artēmisius, a, um. Artēmisium litus (Cor. Nep. Them. 3).

Artēmita, m, f. Beladroud, a city of Parthia (Tac. Ann. vi. 41).—2. Van, a town of Armenia.

Artēna, m, f. a town of the Völsei, which the Romans took and destroyed in 403 B. C. There was another town of this name between Cære and Veii (Liv. iv. 61).

Artētārus, i, m. a native of Illyricum, whom Persæus, king of Mæcedonia, put to death because he had communicated to the Roman people some facts regarding his conduct which he wished to conceal from them. The defence of the king, when charged with this crime by the Roman ambassadors in 174 B. C., appears unsatisfactory (Liv. xlii. 13—41).

Artimpāsa, m, f. the Venus of the Scythians (Herod. iv. 59).

Artiscus, i, m. the Salsdere, a Thracian river, which flows through the country of the Odræse into Hæbrus, the Maritza (Herod. iv. 92).

Artogerassa, m, f. a town of Armenia, of which nothing is certainly known (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 12).

Artōrius, v. Artūrius, i, m. a man of mean birth, who had risen to affluence by vicious practices (Juv. Sat. iii. 29).—2. A physician, who attended Augustus, and from the state of his health forbade his joining in the battle at Philippi. Plutarchus, in the life of Brū-tus, mentions this physician, as does also Velleius Paterculus (ii. 70).

Arūs, a, m. the name given by Jūstinus to a son of Moses; but there is error both in the name and relationship, for the name is Aaron, and he was the brother, not a son of Moses. Besides, the historian makes him priest of the Egyptians, and adds that from his having been a priest, and afterwards a king, these two offices were always united in the same person (Just. xxxvi. 2).

Arulēnus Rūsticus, Arulēni Rūstici, m. a tribune of the people, a young man of great warmth of temper, and ambitious of praise. His commendation of Petus Thrāsca cost him his life, but not before he had held the office of praetor, and had established his character as a man of great respectability, and of unsullied integrity. He was the brother of Jūnius Mauricus q. v. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 26 &c.).

Aruns, ūntis, m. son of Dāmārātus, a Corinthian, and brother of Lūcūmo, afterwards called L. Tārquinius q. v. He predeceased his father, and left his wife pregnant, which was unknown to Dāmārātus when he made his will, and consequently the infant was unprovided for, whence he was called Egerius q. v. (Liv. i. 34).—2. Son of Pōrsēna, sent by his father to besiege Aricia in 508 B. C. He fell in the first engagement with the Aricini (Liv. ii. 14).—3. A man of Clūsiūm, Chiusi, who, from resentment against Lūcūmo, his pupil, or ward, because he had corrupted his wife, carried wine to the Gauls, on purpose to induce them to invade Italy, and acted as their guide across the Alps, that they might besiege Clūsiūm. Livius maintains that the Gauls, who invested that city, were not the first who crossed the Alps, for some of that nation had passed into Italy two hundred years before that period (v. 33).

Arūpinus, i, m. a town of Illyris (Strab. 455). Inh. Arūpinātes, *i*um (Sing. Arūpinas, ātis), m. Pauper Arūpinas, from the barrenness of their country (Tib. iv. l. 110).

Arūseius, i, m. an informer, on whom the Roman senate pronounced sentence of condemnation. He and Sānquinus were the accusers of L. Arrūntius (Tac. Ann. vi. 7).

L. Arūseius, L. Arūseii, m. a man of some distinction, who suffered a violent death under the Emperor Tiberius in the year 36 (Tac. Ann. vi. 40).

Arūsinaus, a, um. Arūni campi, plains in Lucania, on which the Romans gained a complete victory over Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, Lower Albania (Flor. i. 18).

Arvāci, orum, m. a people of Spain, near the river Suco (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 279).

Arva, arum, f. a town mentioned by Curtius, but by no other author (vi. 4).

Arvernī, orum (Sing. Arvernus, i), m. the Arvernians, a people of Gallia Celtica, whose territories lay between the sources of Eleaver, the Alier, and Dūrānius, the Dordogne, branches of Ligēris, the Loire, and Gārūnna, the Garonne. From the numerous wars which they had carried on against the Romans, Strābo infers their power and resources must, in former ages, have been very great. Like the Romans, they boasted of being descended from the Trojans. Arvernique aussi Latios se fingere fratres sanguine ab Illiaco populi (Luc. Phar. i. 427). The Arvernī received Hasdrūbal in a very friendly manner, and accompanied him to Italy, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 39). The district Auvergne retains their name.

Arvernī, orum, f. Auvergne, a town and district of Aquitania (Amm. Mar. xv. 11).

Arvirāgus, i, m. a king of Britānnia, Britain, who, according to Pōlydōrus Virgīlius, embraced the Christian religion through the agency of Jōsēphus Arimatheus, or at least gave him and his companions Glasgow for a residence in his kingdom, and allowed him to preach the Gospel (Juv. Sat. iv. 127).

Arvis, v. Arūs, is, m. a mountain in the island Chios, Scio, according to Viblius Sēquēster. Adj. Arūsus, a, um. Arūsianum, was in high esteem among the ancients, and is still famous. Strābo says it was the best of all the Grecian wines. Arūsus ager, was mountainous, without harbours, of nearly three hundred stadia, which is about one third of the circumference of the island (Strab. 924).

Arybas, ātis, m. a Sidonian of great wealth, whose daughter the pirates carried off, and sold for a slave (Hom. Od. xv. 425).

Arzanēna, a, f. a district of Mēsōpōtāmia. The chief town was Arzē (Amm. Mar. xxv. 7).

Asārōton, i, n. a kind of pavement, of great elegance, resembling what is now called Mosaic, of which Plinius has given a description (v. 340 seq. Stat. Syl. l. 3. 56).

Asasis, is, m. a commander under Masinissa, who deserted from him and joined Hasdrūbal. In this act of perfidy Sūba, joined with him in command, followed his example (Ap. Bel. Pun. 38).

Asbameus, i, m. a name of Jūpiter, in Cāppādōcia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). Other writers give this name to the hot spring there, which boils as in a chaldron, at one time, at another it disappears.

Asbōlus, i, m. (Coal black), one of Aetæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 218).

Asbūtes, a, m. a man in the army of Ænēas, killed by Turnus (Virg. Æn. xii. 362).

Asbyste, arum, m. an African nation, to the south of Cūrēnē (Herod. iv. 170).

Asbūtē, es, f. daughter of Iarbas. She joined Hānnibal, in Spain, and displayed great bravery at the siege of Sāgūntum. Despising marriage and female employments, she delighted in arms, and, before the town above-mentioned, she killed Lēus, Thāmyris and Eurūdāmas. This female warrior fell by the hand of Thēron (Sil. Ital. ii. 53 seq.).

Ascālāphus, i, m. a son of Achēron, by Orphnē. When Prōsērpina was carried by Plūto to the Infernal Regions, Ascālāphus was appointed to watch over her. On Cēres obtaining from Jūpiter her daughter's freedom, on condition that she had not tasted of the fruit which grew in the infernal groves, Ascālāphus informed Plūto she had eaten some pomegranates. In consequence of this, the king of the gods ordered her to remain annually six months with Plūto, and the rest of the year with her mother. For giving this information, Prōsērpina, in revenge, sprinkled water from the river Phlēgēthon, on the head of Ascālāphus, and turned him into an owl (Ov. Met. v. 539 seq.).—2. A son of Mars, and one of the Argonauts, according to Apollōdōrus.

Ascalon, ōnis, f. Ascalon, an ancient city of Syria, at the distance of seven hundred and twenty stadia from Jerusalem. Ammianus Marcellinus states, that in the tract about Ascalon, Gaza, &c., there was no navigable river, but warm fountains, possessing sanative qualities, sprung up in many places (xiv. 8). Inh. Ascalōnū, orum, m. (Just. xviii. 3). Adj. Ascalōneus, a, um.

Ascula, ō, f. a city and district of Phrygia.—2. Another of Mysia (Hom. II. ii. 833: xlii. 733).

Ascīntas, ō, m. Burdoor, a salt lake near Colossæ.

Ascūmā, ō, f. a mountain in the country of the Sācie, called by Ptolemy, Ascatanens (Arin. Mar. xlii. 6).

Ascīnus, i, m. the son of Æneas and Crēusa. See Iūles.—2. Son of Hippōtion, a commander of the Phrygians (Hom. II. xlii. 792).—3. An Italian, who had joined Hannibal after his descent into Italy, and was killed by Völēsus (Sil. Ital. xlii. 244).

Ascīnus, i (Lācus), m. Lago di Niece, a lake of Bithynia, whence issues a river of the same name, to which Virgilius applies the word Sōnans, roaring, probably to denote the rapidity of its current (G. iii. 270). The lake was near the foot of mount Olūmpos, which is of great height, and some of the streams which run into it may have their source in that mountain. Perhaps one of them had the name of Ascīnus.

Aschētos, i, m. the horse of Amphīarāus, whom Statius calls the Argive prophet (Stat. Th. vi. 463).

Aschburgum, i, n. Asburg, a town of Germany, on the bank of the Rhine. It is now only a village (Tac. Hist. iv. 33).

Asclēas, arum, m. See Arābia.

Asclepiādes, is, m. a philosopher of Erētria, who became blind, and bore that calamity with great evenness of temper (Cic. Tusc. v. 39).—2. A physician, a man of great eloquence, who was a friend of Crassus. In early life he taught rhetoric, a profession which he gave up for that of medicine, as being more lucrative. To his patients he recommended exercise and abstinence, prescriptions which raised his character high, in the opinion of some next to Hippocrātes. He was born at Prusa, and lived to a great age (Cle. de Or. i. 14. Plin. ii. 58).—3. A native of Mēdes, who, in his books on the worship of the gods, relates a fiction respecting Athē the mother of Augustus (Suet. Oct. 94).

Asclepiōdōrus, i, m. an officer under Alexander the Great, who brought a reinforcement of Syrians to the Macedonian army, after it had been considerably reduced by frequent engagements in Asia. He conspired against the life of Alexander, in 328 B. C. (Curt. vii. 6 seq.).

Asclepiōdōtus, i, m. commanded two thousand Gallic soldiers in the army of Perseus, king of Mācedōnia, in 179 B. C. Two years after, that monarch sent him to Volustāna, the highest point of Cāmbūnū mōntes, with ten thousand light infantry, on purpose to guard the passes against the Roman army (Liv. xlii. 51 seq.).—2. The praetorian prefect of the Emperor Cōstantinus, who overcame Allectus q. v., and restored Britain to the government of Rome, about the year 293 (Entrop. ix. 22).—3. A native of Lesbos, one of the conspirators against Mithridates. On the discovery of the plot, the traitors were put to death by torture (Ap. Bel. Mith. 202).

Asclētario, ōnis, m. an astrologer, whom the Roman Emperor Dōmītiānus asked "to what end he himself thought he would come?" The astrologer replied, "I shall, in a short time, be torn to pieces by dogs." To prevent the fulfilment of the prophecy, and to show the uselessness of the art, Dōmītiānus ordered him immediately to be killed and carefully buried. By an accident the funeral pile was overturned, from which the half-consumed body of Asclētario fell, and was torn to pieces by the dogs as he himself predicted. This event made a deep impression on the mind of the Emperor (Suet. Dom. 15).

Ascōlus Lābēs, Ascōlū Lābēōnis, m. the tutor of the Emperor Nēro, who requested the senate to confer on him consular ornaments (Tac. Ann. xlii. 10).

Q. Ascōlus Pēdīanus, Q. Ascōlū Pēdīāni, m. a native of Pātāvium, Padua, who, according to Eusēbius, flourished under Vespasianus, was a man of great learning, lived to an advanced age, lost his sight twelve years before his death, and left several valuable works, all of which are lost, except some annotations on Cicero. He was the intimate friend of the poet Silius Italicus, who has delineated his character under a fictitious personage, whom he calls Pēdīanus (xli. 212).

Ascōrdus, i, m. a river of Mācedōnia, on which the Roman consul, Q. Mārcius Philippus, encamped in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 7).

Ascrā, ō, f. Zaglāra, a village of Boōtia, built by Ephialtes and Otus, about forty stadia from Thēspis, celebrated as the birth place of Hēsiodus. Its situation, high and rugged, is to the right of Hēlicon. Dodwell supposes Neochorio is on the site of Ascrā, which Pausānias says was at the foot of Hēlicon, and Hēsiodus near that mountain. Adj. Ascræus, a, um. Ascræus senex, Hēsiodus (Virg. B. vi. 70). Ascræus pōtū, Hēsiodus (Virg. Cu. 98). Ascræum carmen, Hesiod's poem on husbandry (Virg. G. ii. 176).

Ascūa, ō, f. a town of Spain, taken by the Romans in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 27). It appears to have been in the south of Spain, probably not far from Frētum Gādītānum, the Strait of Gibraltar.

Asculum Picēnum, Asculū Picēni, n. Ascoli, the chief city of the Picēni, on the river Trūentus, the Tronto, at which Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, Lower Albania, was defeated by Fabricius. It was taken by the consul P. Semprōnius Sōphus, 270 B. C. (Flor. i. 19). The adjective Picēnum is added to distinguish it from a town of the same name in Apūlia. It is sometimes written Esculum. Inh. Asculāni, orum, m. (Gel. xv. 4). Adj. Asculēus, v. Esculēus, et, Asculānus, a, um. Esculēa arx (Luc. Phar. ii. 469). Asculāna defectio (Aur. Vic. Vir. ii. 65).

Ascūris, idis, f. Mauri Limni, a marsh in Mācedōnia, on the confines of Thessaly (Liv. xlii. 2). Here the readings vary.

Asia, ō, f. the wife of Prōmēthēus, who gave name to that division of the globe (Herod. iv. 45).

Asiā, ō, f. Asia, one of the three divisions of the ancient world. It is bounded on the W. by Mārē Rēgūm, the Archipelago, Hēlēspōntos, the Dardanelles, Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmōra, Thracius Bōsphōrus, the Strait of Constantinople, Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, Cimmērius Bōsphōrus, the Strait of Caffa, Pālus Mēōtis, the Sea of Asoph, and Tānāis, the Don, which separates it from Europā, Europe. The other western boundaries of Asia, are the Mediterranean, the Isthmus of Suez, and Mārē Rūbrum, v. Sinus Arabicus, the Red Sea, or, the Arabian Gulf. The last two divide it from Africa. On the remaining three sides, Asia is encompassed by the ocean. The name is said to be derived from Asiā, a daughter of Ocēānus. It is situated between 26° and 190° of E. long. and between 2° and 77° N. lat. being 7,583 miles in length, and 5,250 in breadth. A small tract only of this extensive country was known to the Greeks and Romans. That part of it which lies between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean received, in the middle ages, the appellation of Asia Minor, Anatolia, or Natolia, a name which does not occur in any classic author, called by Cūrtius and Appianus, Chērsōnēsus. The Romans divided it into Asia, Cis, v. Intra Taurum, and Asia Ultra, v. Extra Taurum. In Met. xiii. 484, Ovidius uses Asia instead of Troja, to give a magnificent idea of the wealth and grandeur of that city: Inh. Asiāni, orum, m. Asis, idis, f. of Asia, applied to a noun feminine. Adj. Asius, Asiācus, Asiānus, et, Asiāticus, a, um. Asia pālūs, a fenny country, which received the overflowings of Cāyster, the Kutchukmeinder (Virg. Aen. vii. 701); probably the same with Asia prāta (Virg. G. i. 383). Asiāna expeditio (Just. ii. 5). Asiāni equites, Asiatic knights, i. e. slaves from Asia, who, by wicked means, had acquired wealth entitling them to be ranked as knights (Juv. Sat. vii. 14). Asiaticī Græci (Sal. Frag.) Asiāticum, v. Cārpāthicum mārē (Plin. i. 593. Flor. iii. 6). Asinus, a, um, occurs only in Luc. Phar. viii. 195, where the reading is very doubtful, and probably ought not to be Asina, but Pejoria cautes.

Asia, ae, f. a maritime district of Asia Minor, Natolia, extending from Pērgāmus in Mysia, to Cāria. It formed the kingdom of Attālus, whom Livius calls king of Asia (xxvi. 24).—2. The province to which the Romans gave this name included Phrygia, Mysia, Lydia, and Cāria. In the history of Livius, Asia generally occurs in the former of these restricted senses.

Asias, ae, m. son of Cōtys, from whom, according to the Lydians, Asia has its name (Herod. ii. 45).

Asiaticus, i, m. a commander of Gallia, whom the army demanded for punishment, because he had fought for Vindex, during the time Vitellius harangued the troops (Tac. Hist. ii. 94).—2. A freedman of Vitellius, who atoned for his improper exercise of power by suffering the death of a slave (Tac. Hist. ii. 57—iv. 11).

Asillus, i, m. the twin-brother of Hiērus, commended by Mārtialis for his beauty (ix. 106).

Asilus, i, m. a Tuscan soldier, made prisoner at Trāsimēnus, the Lake of Perugia, became the servant of Bērās, who allowed him to return to his native place, a kindness which Asilus afterwards repaid by saving the life of his former master, who had nearly fallen by his hand in battle, before they recognised each other (Sil. Ital. xiv. 148 seq.).

Asinē, es, f. Viteas, a city of the Argivi (Hom. II. ii. 560).

Asinlus, i, m. a man addicted to theft, whom Cātullus calls ironically Mārricius. The poet says he makes a bad use of his left hand, insinuating that he stole, a mode of expression common among the Romans (xii. 1).

Asinlus Epicādus, Asinli Epicādi, m. a Parthian, who formed a conspiracy against Augustus (Suet. Oct. 19).

Asinius Mārcellus, Asinli Mārcelli, m. great-grandson of Asinius Pōllio, whose name will live for ever in the writings of Virgilius and Hōrātius. The favourite maxim of Asinius Mārcellus gives no very exalted idea of his moral principle. He held poverty to be the worst of evils, hence it can excite no wonder, that he became an accomplice of Vālērius Fābiānus, who forged a will for his relation Dōmītiūs Bālbis. The fraud having been discovered, the senate condemned the other conspirators to banishment on an island; but the favour of the prince, and the dignity of his ancestors, preserved Asinius Mārcellus from punishment, not from infamy, although his previous character had been without a stain (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40).

Asinius Pōllio, Asinli Pōllionis, m. a prefect of cavalry under Lūcēus Allbūus, governor of Mauritānia Cēsāriēnsis, who, for attachment to his superior officer, was murdered (Tac. Hist. ii. 59).

Asinius Sālōninus, Asinli Sālōnini, m. was the son of Gāllus Asinlus and Vipsānia Agrīppina, who had been the wife of Tibērius, by whom she became the mother of Drusus. The grandfather of Asinius obtained the surname of Sālōninus from his victory over the Sālōni, a people of Dalmātia. M. Vipsānius Agrīppa was his maternal grandfather. He died in the year 22 (Tac. Ann. iii. 75).

C. Asinius Pōllio, C. Asinli Pōllionis, m. a Roman of considerable eminence as a historian, an orator, and a poet. Virgilius, who was in terms of friendship with him, has celebrated his poetical talents in his third pastoral, and alludes to his high rank in the state in his fourth pastoral, which is commonly inscribed Pōllio. C. Jūlius Cēsār, not long before his death, appointed him governor of Hispānia, Spain. After the assassination of his benefactor, he attached himself to M. Antōnius. In his letters to Cicēro he appears the zealous friend of liberty, and it is probable that he despaired of the restoration of the republic on a stable or permanent basis, otherwise he would not have adopted the interest of that ambitious and unprincipled citizen. His military talents promoted the success of Antōnius in the war in Pērūsia, where he commanded seven legions (Vel. Pat. ii. 76). The year after he had been consul, he triumphed over the Pārthini, a people who lived on the east of Mārē Sūpērum, the Gulf of Venice, and from that period seems to have retired from all public offices, and to have spent his time in literary pursuits. He had considerable influence with Augustus, and a rupture between M. Antonius and Augustus was prevented, on one occasion, by the united intercession of Pólio and Mæcenas. He wrote a history of the civil wars, which Tacitus and other Roman authors have commended, but of which a few fragments only remain. Hörätius alludes to this work (Od. ii. 1), and the same poet has commended his dramatical talents. His orations obtained the approbation of Quintilianus, although that critic says, that, in point of elegance, they were greatly inferior to those of Cicero. He was the intimate friend of Hörätius as well as of Virgilius, and to his patronage both owed many obligations. He is said to have lived to a great age. Both his military and literary talents entitle him to a high rank amongst the distinguished of his countrymen. In the protection and patronage of genius he scarcely yielded to Mæcenas.—2. Held the consulship with C. Antistius Vetus, in the year 23 (Tac. Ann. iv. 1).

L. Asinius Gállus, L. Asinii Gállus, m. was the colleague of P. Mærius Cæsus in the consulship, in the year 62 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 48).

M. Asinius Agrippa, M. Asinii Agrippæ, m. held the consulship with Cossus Cornélius Léntulus, in the year 25, and died towards the end of next year. Tacitus calls him an illustrious man, of noble ancestors, and of upright conduct (Ann. iv. 61).

M. Asinius Mærcellus, M. Asinii Mærcelli, m. was consul in the year 54, with Mænius Acilius Aviola (Tac. Ann. xii. 64).

Asinius, i, m. a man against whom the orator Cælius delivered an oration, which he afterwards published (Tac. Or. 21).

Asius, i, m. a Trojan commander, son of Hýrtæus, and father of Acamas. He was killed by Idómeneus (Hom. Il. xii. 96 seq.).

Asides, æ, m. Acamas (Hom. Il. xii. 140).—2. Son of Dýmas, brother german of Hécula, wife of Priamus. He was born on the river Sangárius (Hom. Il. xvi. 717).—3. A son of Imbrásus, hence called Imbrásides, æ (Virg. Æn. x. 123).

Asmîra, æ, f. a mountain and town in Scythia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). Asmîræ, arum, m. a people of Sérica, who inhabited the mountain Asmîra (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). Adj. Asmîræus, a, um.

Asnæus, i, m. Trebechina, a mountain of Illyricum, separated from Aërópus by the river Aôus, the Pollonia. On this mountain Athênagóras, with the light infantry, encamped, whilst Philippus, king of Mæcédônia, had possession of Aërópus, when he went to make war against the Roman consul, P. Villius Tappûlus. The Macedonian army were defeated, and driven from that height (Liv. xxxii. 5 seq.).

Asopichus, i, m. a native of Orchóménos, who gained a prize for running, when a boy, and his competitors were of the same age (Pin. Ol. xiv).

Asopódorus, i, m. a Theban nobleman (Pin. Ist. i. 50).

Asôpus, i, m. a river of Bæotiâ, which, after heavy rains, overflows its banks, and becomes difficult to cross. According to Dodwell, it rises in Katabathron, a mountain about four miles north of Thêrmôpylæ, Thërma; but Clarke says that it has its source in the plain near Cithæron, Elatias, runs through that of Plátæa, Platâna, and falls into Eurîpus, the Strait of Negropont. In summer it is nearly dry.

Holland makes it a branch of Spêrechêus, the Hellada. According to Apollodôrus, Asôpus was the son of Océanus and Têthys, or of Néptûnus and Pêro, or of Júpiter and Eurýnômê, who married Mêtôpê, by whom he had two sons, Ismênus and Pêlâgon, and twenty daughters, of whom Júpiter carried away one, Egîna, who gave her name to that island in Sinus Sârônîcus, the Gulf of Egîna. Enraged at this rape, Asôpus dashed his waves against the skies, but Júpiter, incensed at that rash act, darted his thunderbolts at him, which soon procured the submission of the river (Stat. Th. vii. 315 seq.). By the king of the gods, Egîna became the mother of Eâcus. Asôpides, um, f. daughters of Asôpus; Asôpiæ, Egîna (Ov. Met. vi. 113). Asôpi, orum, m. people who lived on the banks of this stream (Herod. ix. 15). Asôpiâdes, æ, m. Eâcus, from his grandfather Asôpus (Ov. Met. vii. 484). Adj. Asôpius, a, um. Asôpius Hýpsêus (Stat. Th. vii. 723).—2. A river which flows by Lâodîcêa (Plin. i. 595).—3. A river of Sicýon. According to fiction it is the Mæander of Asia Minor, which runs under the Archipelago, rises in Phlîasiâ, flows through Sicýonia, and falls into the sea near Corinth (Paus. ii. 5). Pausânias mentions a similar fiction with respect to Nilus and Euphrâtes.—4. A river which runs into Málîæus Sinus, the Gulf of Zeiton (Liv. xxxvi. 22).—5. A river of Lâcônîa, which is dry in the summer months.

Asphabôta, æ, f. a town of Scythia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Aspacûræ, arum, m. a people of Sérica, whose town was Aspacûra, æ, f. (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Aspar, âris, m. a Numidian, on intimate terms with Bôcchus, whom Jûgûrtha sent to that monarch after he had invited L. Córnelius Sûlla to his court, on purpose secretly to obtain information respecting his intentions with regard to himself and the Roman people. These two outwitted Aspar, the deputy of Jûgûrtha, said little on the subject in his presence, only Bôcchus promised to give an answer to the Roman on the tenth day. Instead, however, of waiting ten days, Bôcchus gave Sûlla a private audience during next night, and he assented to measures for delivering Jûgûrtha into the hands of the Romans, which he soon afterwards executed, and thus put an end to the Numidian war (Sal. Jug. 108—112).

Asparâgium, i, n. a town of Græcia, Greece, on the south bank of the river Apus, the Crevasta. It probably belonged to the inhabitants of Dýrrâchium, Durazzo, from which it was about 34 miles distant; hence Cæsar says, Asparâgium Dýrrâchinorum (B. C. iii. 30).

Asparâta, æ, f. a town of the Sêres (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Aspâsia, æ, f. a woman of lewd character, whom Artaxêxes married, after she had been a concubine to his brother Cýrus (Just. x. 2).

Aspâstes, is, m. a governor of Cármanîa, in 326 B. C. During Alexander the Great's absence in India, he attempted to raise a revolt, for which that monarch put him to death (Curt. ix. 10).

Aspathènes, is. m. father of Præxæpes q. v.

Aspendus, i. f. a town of Pamphylia, on Eurymedon, the Kapri-su, which falls into Mære Pamphylum, the Gulf of Adalia. Inh. Aspendii, orum, m. informed Eudæmus, the commander of the Rhodian fleet, that the fleet of Antiochus, king of Syria, was at Sida, Eski-Adalia (Liv. xxxvii. 23).

Asphalion, onis, m. a servant of Ménélaus (Hom. Od. iv. 215).

Asphaltes, æ, m. called also Mære Mōrtium, the Dead Sea, is a lake of about fifty miles in length, and twelve or thirteen in breadth, into which the river Jōrdānes, the Nahr-El-Arden, or El-Sharia, empties itself. The fetid limestone of its shores emits an effluvia owing to the presence of sulphuretted hydrogen, and the water has a similar odour. Every thing about it, says a late traveller, is in the highest degree grand and awful. Its desolate, although majestic, features, are well suited to the tales related concerning it by the inhabitants of the country, who all speak of it with terror, seeming to shrink from the narrative of its deceitful allurements and deadly influence. Beautiful fruit, say they, grows on its shores, which on being touched becomes dust and bitter ashes. This fruit is the Solanum Melongena, which abounds on the shores of the Dead Sea, and when attacked by an insect (Tenthredo), the inside turns into dust, yet the skin remains entire and retains a beautiful colour. It is now known that the waters of this lake swarm with myriads of fishes; that certain birds make it their peculiar resort; that shell fishes abound upon its shores; that bodies sink or float in it in proportion as their gravity exceeds or falls short of the gravity of the water; that its vapours are not more unwholesome than those of any other lake; that numerous Arabs people the neighbouring district; that its waters are perfectly transparent; and that five pounds' weight of water contains one of salt. Modern observation has confuted the fictions of antiquity, that clouds of smoke perpetually exhale from the sulphur of the lake; that no living creature exists in it; that no bird can fly over it without being killed by the pestilential vapour; and that the country is black and desolate for miles around it. Tacitus records all the absurd and fictitious tales respecting it (Hist. v. 6), and Justinus has added several (xxxvi. 3). Conjecture has placed the sites of Sodom and Gomorrah on the ground now covered by this lake.

Aspis, idis, f. Aklibia (Sil. Ital. iii. 244). See Clūpæa. There was also a promontory of Ethiopia, near Egypt, of this name.—2. A city of Mæcedonia, built by Philippus. The island Arconneus sometimes occurs under the name of Aspis.—3. Another island near Psylla.—4. A third, mentioned by Clæon, which had no trees.—5. One beyond Pissæ. All of these appear to be of little note, probably also sterile and uninhabited.

Asplædon, onis, f. Polea, a town of Bœotia (Hom. Il. ii. 511).

L. Asprénas, L. Asprénātis, m. proconsul of Africa, was appointed, according to some, to send assassins to the island of Cérceina, Kerkeni, to murder Sēmprōnīus Græchus q. v. in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 53). Velléius Pâtérclūlus mentions one of this name, who was a lieutenant-general in Germany, at the time P. Quinctilius Vārus lost the army in that country (il. 120).

Aspūna, c. Aspōna, orum, n. a free town of Gālātia (Amm. Mar. xxv. 10).

Assa, æ, f. a town on Mount Athos (Herod. vii. 122).

Assacānus, i. m. a king in India, whose capital, Mazāge, was of great strength (Curt. viii. 10).

Assæus, i. m. a Grecian chief, killed by Hēctor (Hom. Il. xi. 301).

Assāræus, i. m. the second son of Tros, king of Troy. He was the father of Cāpys, grandfather of Anchises, and great-grandfather of Ænēas (Virg. G. iii. 35). Tellūs Assāræci, the Troad, or district of Troy (Hor. Epod. xiii. 19). Ad umbras Assāræci, to the shades of Assāræus; to the ghosts of his ancestors, i. e. to a peaceful death (Juv. Sat. x. 259).—2. Two Trojans of this name (Virg. Æn. x. 124).

Assēnsio, onis, f. In the Roman senate, assent was given in three ways. 1st, By words, which might either be done in a single sentence, or more, as the person chose; or by a single word, assēntio. 2d, By a nod, and raising up the hand. 3d, By the senator rising from his seat, and going to the individual, or party, whose motion he approved. This was expressed by pedibus in sententiam allatus ibat. The last only when a division took place, and was probably at one time the practice in the British Parliament, whence originated the phrases, the House divided, a division took place, on a division, &c.

Assus, i. f. Beyram, a town of the Troad, on Adramyttæus sinus. The ruins of the ancient town are said to be sufficient to employ any person two days in a mere survey. Many inscriptions exist there, hitherto unobserved by European travellers. Adj. Assius, a, um. Assius lapis, a kind of stone found at Assus, possessed of wonderful properties, according to Plinius, which being wholly fabulous need not be repeated (Plin. v. 320 seq.).—2. A town of Lycia.

Assyria, æ, f. Curdistan, a large country of Asia, the extent of which was very different at different times. Assyria was at first bounded on the E. by Mædia, on the S. by Bābylōnia, on the W. by Mēsōpōtāmia, and on the N. by Armēnia. But in its flourishing state the limits of this empire were greatly enlarged. The Assyrian monarchy, of which some authors make Ninus, and others Belus, the founder, was esteemed the most ancient in the world, and continued from 2059 B. C. to the reign of Sārdānāpālus, 820 B. C. Pinguis Assyria (Tib. iii. 2. 24). Inh. Assyrii, orum, m. sometimes confounded, both in Latin and Greek authors, with the Syri, which, according to Justinus, became their common name (i. 2). Adj. Assyrius, a, um. Assyrius orbis, the Assyrian world; the extensive Assyrian empire (Juv. Sat. ii. 108). Assyria cades, the slaughter of the Assyrians (Claud. vii. 36). Assyrii odoræ, Assyrian perfumes (Tib. i. 3. 7). Assyrius color, purple (Virg. Cu. 61), which the same poet calls Assyrium cōnūm, in contempt at the native whiteness of Italian wool being sullied by that expensive dye (G. ii. 465). Assyriae litteræ, i. e. the first letters, in the opinion of Plinius, by which he probably means the Hebrew, although he allows that some thought they were discovered by the Syri, and others that Mercurius communicated them to the Egyptians (Plin. ii. 94). Assyria maulus, the citron tree (Plin. iii. 272). Assyrium stagnum, the Sea of Galilee (Just. xviii. 3).

Asta, æ, f. Asti, a town of Ligūria, near which the Goths experienced a severe defeat, hence Vindica Asta (Claud. xxviii. 203). The modern city gives name to the district in which it stands, and may be considered its capital. The site of Asti is pleasant, in a fertile valley, watered by Tānārus, the Tanaro.—2. Xerez de la Frontera, a town in the South of Spain, taken by C. Atinilius, prætor, who, in approaching the walls, too incautiously, received a mortal wound, of which he died in a few days, in 188 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 21). Adj. Astēnsis, is, e. Astensis ager, the territory of Asta (Liv. xxxix. 21).

Astābōras, æ, m. the Tacazzé, a river of Abyssinia, one of the eastern branches of the Nile, which it joins considerably below the place where that river receives Astāpus, the Abassi.

Astāciā, æ, f. a town of Bactria, called by Ptolemy, Astāciāna (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Astācus, i, m. a Theban, whose sons distinguished themselves during the siege of their native city. Mēnālippius, who wounded Tydeus, was his youngest son (Apol. iii. 6). Astāclides, æ, m. a son of Astācus; Mēnālippius (Stat. Th. vii. 718).

Astācus, i, f. a city on Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Astāpa, æ, f. Estepa, a town of Spain, on Bætis, the Guadalquivir. Inh. Astāpenses, im, m. in 208 B. C., in consequence of their alliance with the Carthaginians, ravaged the lands belonging to the Roman allies, which brought on them the vengeance of that people who invested their town, which could not have long resisted the enemy. Either from ferocity of disposition or apprehension of Roman cruelty, the Astāpenses formed the resolution of destroying themselves, which they executed in the most shocking and barbarous manner (Liv. xxviii. 22, 23).

Astāpus, i, m. the Abassi, or Bahr el Azerge, an eastern branch of Nilus, the Nile, the sources of which have been frequently, says D'Anville, mistaken for those of the Nile. That geographer supposes Mēroë lay between this stream and Astābōras q. v., both of which take their rise within ten degrees of the equator.

Aster, ēris, m. the father of Anchimōlius (Hesod. v. 63).

Astēria, æ, f. one of the ancient names of Idus q. v., so called from the daughter of Geus, who fled from Jupiter, and was transformed into a quail, hence also from her called Ortygia (Ov. Met. vi. 108). This name is frequently written by the poets Astēris.—2. The ancient name of Rhōdos (Plin. i. 616).

Astēris, es, f. the wife of Gyges, to whom Hæcates addresses the seventh ode of book third.

Astēriōn, ōnis, m. a son of Minos, king of Creta, Crete, a man of great strength, killed by Thēseus (Paus. ii. 31).—2. Son of Claetes, one of the Argonauts, whom his father brought up at the junction of Enipeus and Apidāmus, the Epideno, or Satalde (Val. Flacc. i. 355. Paus. v. 17).—3. Son of Eschylus, a statuary (Paus. vi. 3).

Astēriōn, ōnis, m. a river of Argolis, at the distance of fifteen stadia from Mycēnæ, Corinthi, disappears below ground. According to ancient fiction, Eubœa, Prōsyrina and Ascrea, nurses of Jūno, were daughters of this stream (Paus. ii. 15 seq.). Cēter Astēriōn (Stat. Th. iv. 122).

Astēris, Idis, f. a small island between Ithāca and Sāmos, afterwards Cēphallēnia, with good harbours, at which the suitors of Pēnelōpē watched the return of Tēlēmachus, intending to kill him (Hom. Od. iv. 846). Apollōdorus describes it nearly in the same manner as Hōmērus, in which he differs from Strābo. It had a cognominal town, and another called Alālōmēnæ.

Astērium, i, n. a well-built city of Thēssa (Hom. Il. ii. 735).

Astērius, i, m. a native of Pellēnē.

Astērōdēa, æ, f. a Caucasian nymph, who became the mother of Absyrtus by Æetes, king of Cōlchis, before his marriage with Idyia, who bore him two daughters Chālciopē and Mēdēa (Apol. Rhod. iii. 242).

Astērōpæus, i, m. a Trojan commander, son of Pēlēgon and Pēriboea. He was the bravest of all the Pæones, and was killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xvii. 217 seq.).

Astīdāmia. See Hippolytē.

Astii, orum, m. a nation of Thrace, who appear to have lived to the north of Mārē Ægæum, and were neighbours to the Cæni, Madnatēni, and Cōrēli. These four nations attacked the Roman army under Cn. Manlius Vulso in 190 B. C., returning from Asia, and carried off a considerable part of the booty, besides killing a number of men (Liv. xxxviii. 40).

Astrea, æ, f. the daughter of Astræus, king of Arcadia, one of the Titans; and Anrōra, or, according to others, of Jupiter and Thēmis, was the goddess of Justice, often taken for justice itself. Virgo Astræa, the Virgin Astræa, i. e. Justice (Ov. Met. i. 149). During the golden age, like many of the other celestial deities, she had her residence on the earth. But when mankind became wicked, grieved and provoked at their crimes, she ascended to her native skies, and was translated into the Sign Virgo. Hjginus says that Erigōnē was transformed into this sign (130). Of all the celestial deities, Astrea was the last who, in consequence of the iniquity of men, forsook the earth. Astræa jubet lentos descendere pisces (Luc. Phar. ix. 535).

Astræum, i, n. a town of Peōniā, to which Philippus, king of Macedonia, sent his son Dēmētrius with Didas, to whom he had given instructions to put Dēmētrius to death, which order was obeyed at Hēraclea in 183 B. C. (Liv. xl. 24).

Astræus, i, m. one of the Titans, who married Aurōra, by whom he had the winds and the stars (Hes. Th. i. 378 seq.). Adj. Astræus, a, um. Astræi fratres, the winds (Ov. Met. xiv. 545).

Astrāgon, i, n. a fort in Strātōnicēnsis ager, taken by Pausistrātus and the combined army of the Rhōdi in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 18).

Astræus, ēos, m. a man, whose mother was a native of Palestina, killed by Percus at his nuptial feast. His father was unknown (Ov. Met. v. 144).

Astu, ūs, n. a name of Athēnæ, Athens, used chiefly by the Greeks (Cor. Nep. Them. 4).

Astur, ūris, m. commander of three hundred Cæretini, who joined Æneas against Turnus (Virg. Æn. x. 180.).

Astūra, æ, f. v. Astūra, orum, n. the Esia, a river of Astūria in Spain (Flor. iv. 12).—2. The Astura, a river of Lātium (Liv. viii. 13), in which was an island of the same name. Upon it Cicero had a villa. This river is also called Stūra (Suet. Octav. 97.).

Astūria, æ, f. a district of Hispania, Spain, bounded on the north by Sinus Cāntabricus, the Bay of Biscay, on the east by Cāntabria, and on the west by Callæcia. From ancient writers, this district appears to have abounded with gold mines. Inh. Astūres, um (Sing. Astur, ūris), m. Pallidus Astur, the pale Asturian (Claud. xxix. 75). The paleness referred to was probably a consequence of their working in mines below ground, as their country abounded with valuable metals, to which Silius Italicus alludes (i. 231), and Martialis (x. 16). Adj. Astur, ur, et, Astūricus, v. Astūrius, a, um. Astur equus (Mart. xiv. 199). Astūrica gens (Plin. ii. 212. Sil. Ital. xvi. 583). Astūrium aurum (Luc. Phar. iv. 298). Some copies have Asgrum, unquestionably a false reading.

Astūricus, i, m. a man of wealth and rank. The word is differently written, and the name supposed to be fictitious (Juv. Sat. iii. 212).

Astūges, is, m. a man who was turned into stone at the marriage of Pērcūs and Andrōmēda, by looking at the Gorgon's head (Ov. Met. v. 203).—2. A king of Mēdia, who gave his only daughter, Mandānē, in marriage to Cambyses, a man of mean birth, in order to prevent the fulfilment of a prediction, declaring that his grandson would acquire much greater distinction than himself, and the consequence would be, the loss of his kingdom. The plans which he adopted failed in accomplishing his intentions, for the life of the child, Cýrus, was preserved, by whom he was afterwards conquered and dethroned, in 551 B. C. With him ended the kings of the Medians (Just. i. 4–6).

Astūlus, i, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Pölýpetes (Hom. Il. vi. 29).

Astānax, ætis, m. the son of Hēctor and Andrōmāchē, whom his mother concealed, on the taking of Troy; but he was discovered, and tumbled headlong, by the Greeks, from the fort whence his mother had often pointed out to him his father fighting for his native country. That nation dreaded lest he should inherit his father's bravery, and at a future period re-establish the Trojan kingdom; on which account they deprived the noble youth of life, an act of ferocity to which they were encouraged by the advice of Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 415–417).

Astūdānia, æ, f. the wife of Hērcules, and mother of Hēpōlēmus (Pin. Ol. vii. 43). Hōmērus writes this word Astūschia.

Astūlos, i, m. an augur, who, at the battle of the Centaurs, sought safety by flight. He had, to no purpose, dissuaded his countrymen from having recourse to war, and, consistently with his own advice, he withdrew from the contest (Ov. Met. xii. 308).

Astymēdes, is, m. a Rhodian, who, with Philocrates, was at the head of an embassy sent to the Roman senate, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 25).

Astynōmē, es, f. daughter of Chryses, priest of Apollo at Lyrnēssus. On that town being taken by the Greeks, she became the property of Agāmēmon, who refused to restore her for ransom. See Chryses.

Astynōus, i, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Diōmēdes, at the same time with Hýpēnor (Hom. Il. v. 144 seq.).—2. Son of Prōtiāon, succeeded Clitus, as charioteer of Pölýdamas (Hom. Il. xv. 455).

Astýochē, es, f. the mother of Pentheüs, who fell at the siege of Thēbæ, Theba (Stat. Th. iii. 171).—2. The daughter of Acton, and mother of Ascālaphus and Iālmēnus by Mars (Hom. Il. ii. 513).

Astýpālea, æ, f. Stampalia, an island in Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, to the north of the eastern extremity of Crēta, Candia. At the time when Plinius wrote, Stampalia was a free state (i. 460). Adj. Astýpāleus, a, um. Astýpāleia regna (Ov. Met. vii. 461).

Astýpýlus, i, m. a noble Pæonian, killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xxi. 209).

Astyr, ūris, m. the armour-bearer of Mēmon. Silius Italicus states, that, after the death of his master, he came into Spain, and settled in that part called afterwards, from him, Astūria. This can only be considered a poetical fiction, not a historical fact (iii. 334).

Asychis, ūdis, m. a king of Egypt, who built a pyramid of bricks (Herod. ii. 136).

Asýlas, æ, m. one of the Tuscan commanders who joined Æneas. He was a brave man, and skilled in augury (Virg. Æn. x. 175).

Asýllus, i, m. a gladiator, distinguished for his skill in that art (Juv. Sat. vi. 267).

Atābūlus, i, m. a wind peculiar to Apūlia, and often calamitous, from which the name has been derived (ἀτὰρ βούλος). Plinius has described the injurious effects of this wind (iii. 410).

Atābýrium, i, n. a very high mountain in the island Rhodus, on which Júpiter had a chapel. Adj. Atābýrius, a, um. Atābýrius Júpiter. Appianus writes Tābýrius (Bel. Mith. 187).—2. A mountain in Sicily (Pin. Ol. vii. 160).

Atacotti, orum, m. a warlike people, who invaded Britain, with the Picts, Scots, and Saxons, in the year 364 (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 4).

Atālānta, æ, v. Atālāntē, es, f. daughter of Schoenēus, king of Scýros, Scyro, an island in Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago (an Arcadian, Apol. i. 8). The ancients represent her as a woman of uncommon beauty. From aversion to marriage, she requested her father not to betrothe her to any of her numerous lovers, whom her beauty had captivated. In compliance with this request, her father, not choosing to offend them by a positive denial, had recourse to a stratagem, which he expected would secure the wish of his daughter. She excelled in running, and he informed each of her admirers, that he must first contend with her in the race. The lover, unarmed, started first; she followed, with a weapon, and, if she overtook him within a given distance, the failure was to cost him his life, and his head to be stuck up in the stadium. After she had surpassed in speed and killed several, who had adventured their lives in this manner, at last Hippomaneus, son of Megareus and Merope, by a stratagem, reached the goal in safety. Venus presented him with three apples of uncommon beauty, and instructed him how to use them. When on the point of being overtaken in the race, he dropped them singly, and, while she stopped to lift them up, the youth arrived at the end of the stadium, consequently received Atalanta in marriage. On his way to his native country, he sacrificed to Jupiter Victor on Mount Parnassus, Liakura, but, forgetful of the favour of Venus, made no acknowledgment to the goddess; on which, transported with rage, she excited Hippomaneus to profane the temple of Jupiter, who, for this improper indulgence, transformed him into a lion, and Atalanta into a lioness (Hyg. 185. Ov. Met. x. 565 seq.). Apollodorus makes Milonion the successful lover.—2. Daughter of Iasius, a native of Tegea, a town of Arcadia. She was one of the hunters at Calydon, and the first who wounded the boar. On that account, Melæager, who killed that ferocious animal, presented her with the skin. She married Milonion. From her father she is called Iasis (Prop. i. 1. 10). Ancient writers, among whom Statius, in the Thebaid, frequently confound this Atalanta with the one above-mentioned, and also their husbands. See Hippomaneus and Milonion. Every reader of taste must admire the manner in which Statius introduces Atalanta, and the appropriate speech, full of maternal feeling and sentiment, which she utters, on learning that her son was marching against the Thebans. The disconsolate mother breathes in every line, and her severe trial commands the sympathy of every heart not dead to the sensibilities of human nature (Th. iv. 309 seq.). Manilia Atalantæ, Arcadian Atalanta (Sat. Th. vi. 563). Atalantiades, æ, m. a patronymic of Parthenopeus, son of Atalanta, by Melæager, according to Hyginus (70. Stat. Th. ix. 789). See Parthenopeus. Adj. Atalanteus, a, um. Atalantæ aures (Stat. Th. iv. 309). Atalantæ labores (Manil. v. 179).

Atalantæ, æ, v. Atalantæ, es, f. an island which, either wholly or in a great part, sunk, about the time of the Peloponnesian war (Senec. N. Q. vi. 24. Thuc. iii. 89).—2. An island in Eurius, the Strait of Negropont (Liv. xxxv. 37).

Atarne, es, v. Atarnia, æ, et. Atarneus, es, f. Dikeli, a town of Mysia (Herod. vii. 42).

Atarnes, is, m. a river of Thracia, which flows into the Danube (Herod. iv. 49).

Atax, æcis, m. the Aude, a river of Gallia Narbonensis, which rises in mount Gaspir, and, after traversing the marsh of Sygeam, by means of a canal of hewn stone, falls into Gallicus Sinus, the Gulf of Lyons, below Narbonne. Perhaps there was a cognominal village near its banks (Cat. xcv. 5). Adj. Atacensis, a, um. Varro Atacinus. See Varro.

Atedius Mellor, Atedii Melloris, m. a friend of Statius, whom he endeavours to console for the loss of his freedman Glaucias (Syl. ii. 1. 1). Martialis writes an epigram to Atedius Mellor (viii. 38). Both poets sympathize with him, not only on the death of Glaucias, but also of Bhesus, who was likewise his servant.

Atæius Philologus, Atæi Philologi, m. a freedman, was born at Athens. Of him Capito Atæius says, "he was a rhetorician among grammarians, and a grammarian among rhetoricians." From a quotation in Suetonius we find him called Atæius Prætextatus, so that Philologus seems to have been a professional, rather than a proper, name. With many of the most eminent characters in the Roman state, he appears to have lived in terms of the greatest intimacy. It is enough to mention C. Crispus Sallustius, the historian, and Asinius Pollio. None of his writings have been transmitted (Suet. II. Gram. 10).

C. Atæius Capito, C. Atæi Capitonis, m. the uncle of the historian C. Velleius Paterculus, a man of senatorian rank, who seconded Agrippa in his accusation of C. Cassius Longinus (Vel. Pat. ii. 69).—2. Was entrusted with the care of preventing inundations in the lower parts of the city Rome. In this commission he had L. Arruntius for his colleague, and they proposed in the senate to give a new direction to the lakes and rivers which empty themselves into Tiber, the Tevere. The inhabitants, whose country was watered by the tributary streams which fall into that river above the city, opposed the plan, and the senate declared against the innovation. Skilled both in sacred and civil law, he possessed many virtues, but he tarnished the lustre of his reputation by servile flattery to the Emperor Tiberius. From his ancestry he derived little advantage; his father having been only prætor, and his grandfather a centurion under L. Cornélius Sulla. With him the gifts of nature supplied the place of noble descent, and raised him to the first eminence in the state. M. Antistius Labeo, a strenuous assertor of civil liberty, besides a great favourite with the populace, was his rival, and, like himself, had risen to distinction by his talents, and by a knowledge of jurisprudence. The flexibility of Atæius rendered him a favourite with Augustus, who exalted him to the consulship during the year 5, whilst the unaccommodating political principles of Antistius prevented his rising above the rank of prætor. Atæius died in the year 22 (Tac. Ann. i. 76—iii. 75).

Atella, æ, f. Aversa, a town of the Osci in Campānia, equidistant from Capua and Næapōlis, Naples. Inh. Atellani, orum (Sing. Atellanus, i), m. revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ. On the taking of Capua, the Atellani surrendered to the Romans, and the senate decreed that they should be free, unless they or their parents had joined the enemy, but that none of them should be capable of becoming a Roman citizen, or a Latin confederate. Afterwards they were ordered by the senate to remove to Calatia, and the Nucerini took possession of Atella (Liv. xxii. 61—xxvii. 3). Adj. Atellanus, et. Atellanicus, a, um. Atellana fabula, seem to have been somewhat like modern farces, and the collections, chiefly from them, called Exodia, interludes, properly speaking, endings, i. e. not connected with the plot. The performance of these by the younger citizens did not either degrade them from their tribe, or render them inadmissible to the army.

(Liv. vii. 2). Atellāticum exōdium (Suet. Tib. 45).

P. Atellius Hister, P. Atellii Histri, m. the governor of Pannonia, in the year 50 (Tac. Ann. xii. 29).

A. Atērius, A. Atērii, m. a Roman, who was consul in 454 B. C., and, with his colleague Sp. Tarpeius, passed a law, fixing the price of sheep and oxen as a fine. Livius does not mention this enactment. Seven years after, they were both chosen plebeian tribunes, although of patrician and consular dignity (Liv. iii. 31, 65). Adj. Atērius, a. um. Atēria lex (Gel. xi. 1).

Atērnūm, i. n. Aterni (Pescara, Cluv.), a town of Lucania, a district of Italy, at the mouth of Aternus, the Pescara, taken in 215 B. C., by P. Sēmprōnīus Tādītānus (Liv. xiv. 47). Inh. Aternēnses, iūm. Adj. Aternēnsis, is, e. Aternensis ager (Cluv.).

Aternus, i. m. the Pescara, a river of Italy, which separated the Vēstīni from the Marrūcīni (Cluv.).

Atētē, is, n. Eate, a town of Italy, a little to the southwest of Pātāvium, Padua (Tac. Hist. iii. 6).

Atētīna, a, f. a Sabine, by birth, and wife of Clēmēs, to whom Mārtiālis sent some unpublished verses (x. 93).

Athā, a, m. a boy who surpassed in running, mentioned by Mārtiālis (iv. 19).

Athācus, i. f. perhaps a town of the Dāsārētīi, near which Philīppus, king of Mācēdōnia, fortified a rising ground, in 202 B. C., at the distance of little more than two hundred paces from the Roman camp (Liv. xxxi. 34).

Athagōrē, arum, m. a people of Sērica (Amm. Mar. xxi. 6).

Athāmānia, a, f. a district of Aetolia (Plin. i. 407). Others place it in Epirus, bordering on Thessaly. Inh. Athāmānes, um (Sing. Athāmas, ānis), m. the Athamānians, frequently mentioned by Livius, in the war with Philīppus, king of Mācēdōnia. Adj. Athāmānus, a. um. Athāmānia littora (Prop. iv. 6. 15).

Athāmas, antis, acc. tu, m. a king of Boeotia, and the son of Aēolus. He had Phryxus and Hellē by Nēphēlē, whom he afterwards divorced, and then married Ino, a daughter of Cādmus, by whom he had two sons, Lēārchus and Mēlicērtēs, v. Mēlicērtēs. The children of Nēphēlē, to avoid the cruelties of their step-mother, who plotted their destruction, quitted their native country on a golden ram, which Mercūrius gave them. In consequence of the wrath of Jūno, who envied the prosperity of Ino, Athāmas became mad. He supposed his wife to be a lioness, and her two children whelps, upon which he killed Lēārchus; and Ino, to escape his fury, threw herself and her other son into the sea. Neptūnus, in pity to her fate, changed both into sea deities. On recovering his reason, Athāmas, being childless, adopted Cōrōnus and Alārtus, the sons of his nephew Thērsānder. Vālērīus Flaccus says nothing of the madness of Athāmas, but states that he unwittingly killed Lēārchus in hunting (iii. 68). Athāmāntis, idos, f. Ino, or, Leucōthōē; of Athāmas, or, of Thessalia, applied to a noun feminine (Ov. Fast. iv. 903). Athāmāntiādes, a, m. a son of Athāmas; Pālēmōn (Ov. Met. xiii. 919). Adj. Athāmāntēus, et, Athā- māntēus, a. um. Athāmāntēi (sinus) (Ov. Met. iv. 496). Athāmāntium aurum, the golden fleece (Mart. viii. 25).

Athānāgia, a, f. the capital of the Bār-gētes q. v., which Cn. Cōrnēlius Scipio took in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 61).

Athānāgōras, a, m. an officer, whom Pharnābāzus set over Chios, with Apōllōnides, with whom he shared the same fate (Curt. iv. 5).

Athārias, a, m. an officer who served first under Philīppus, and afterwards under his son Alexander. He apprehended Philōtas, and afterwards distinguished himself in battle at Hālicārnāssus (Curt. vi. 8 seq.). He is probably the person called Adarchias (v. 2).

Athēas, a, m. a king of the Scythians, who requested assistance from Philīppus, through the Apōllōniēnses, when distressed by the Istrians, and promised to adopt Philīppus, that he might succeed to the kingdom of Scythia. Like other barbarians, selfishness and a disregard of promise marked his conduct. Philīppus resented the infidelity of Athēas by making war on the Scythians, in which, however, he obtained neither gold nor silver, but a great quantity of cattle, among which were twenty thousand mares, which he sent to Mācēdōnia to propagate the breed, in 340 B. C. (Just. ix. 2).

Athēne, arum, f. Athens, the capital of Attica, a country of Greece. It is said to have been founded fifteen hundred and fifty-six years before the Christian era by Cērops, and a colony from Egypt. From its founder it was called Cēropia, afterwards Athēna, in honour of Minēra, who was the protectress of the city. Athens was long the seat of learning. In it many of the sciences and fine arts were cultivated and improved, and some carried to a degree of perfection which later times have not been able to imitate, much less to excel. The modern town contains from 1,200 to 1,300 houses, which in general are not well built or commodious; the streets are narrow and irregular, which was the case in ancient times, and the water in the wells is brackish. Population about twelve thousand, nine-tenths of whom are Greeks, the rest Turks. A reservoir at Hymēttus, Trelo-couni, supplies an ornamental fountain at the foot of the rock on which the citadel stands: Erichthōa Athēna, Athens, of which Erichthēus was king (Virg. Cir. 22). Inh. Athēniēnses, iūm (Sing. Athēniēnsis, is), m. the Athenians, shone unrivalled in oratory, music, painting, and statuary. They were early distinguished by their ardent love of freedom, and were as eminent for their skill and bravery in war, as for their ingenuity and industry in the arts of peace. The Athenians put criminals to death by administering hemlock, to which Tacitus alludes (Ann. xv. 64). An ancient author of great respectability asserts, that Athēne was the only democracy that acquired great distinction, which he attributes to the prudence of the inhabitants, and their strict observance of the laws. Adj. Athēniēnsis, is, e, et, Athēneus, a. um. Athēniēnsē bellum (Just. v. 11). Athēnaca mania (Lucr. vi. 749).

Athēneum, i. n. a fort of Athāmānia, near the frontiers of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xxxviii. 1).

Athēneus, i. m. a brother of Eumēnes, king of Asia, who, with his brother Attalus, joined the Roman consul, Cn. Manlius Vulso, in the war against the Gallograeci, in 191 B. C. These three brothers crossed into Greece to assist the Romans against Persius, king of Macedonia, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 12 seq.).

Athénagoras, m., a governor of Chios, appointed by Pharnabazus, an officer under Darius; these two, with Apollonides, were bound and given up to the Macedonians, in the service of Alexander the Great (Curt. iv. 5).—2. A praefect of Philippus, king of Macedonia, who made an unsuccessful attack on L. Apulcius, a lieutenant-general under P. Sulpicius Galba, consul, as he was returning with the troops under his command, loaded with spoil, from having taken several forts and towns in Macedonian Illyricum, in 202 B. C. He seems to have been an active commander (Liv. xxxi. 27 seq.).—3. An officer under Persius, king of Macedonia, who, with Esmenes, commanded at Thessalonica, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 32).—4. A friend of Martialis, mentioned by him in two of his Epigrams (viii. 41: ix. 97). From the former, the poet appears to have been on intimate terms with Athénagoras, but the latter suggests a different idea.

Athénodorus, i., a Greek, who served under Alexander the Great, and, from love of dominion, assumed the title of king, and induced the people in Bactria to revolt, in 327 B. C. (Curt. ix. 7).

Athēsis, is, m. the Adige (Etsch, by the Germans), a beautiful and rapid river of Italy, which takes its rise in the Alps, and, running eastward, falls into Mære Hadriaticum, about thirty miles to the south of Venice. It is next in size to the Po, passes through Verona, and nearly surrounds the principal part of the town by its winding. On this stream the Cimbrî defeated the Romans, in 103 B. C. (Val. Max. v. 8). Amazones Athēsis (Virg. Æn. ix. 680).

Athis, idis, f. a daughter of Cranius, the second king of Athens, who, according to Justinus, gave her name to the district Attica (ii. 6).

Athis, r. Atys, idos, acc. tin. m. an Indian, the son of Lîmnâtê, or, Lîmnâcê, daughter of the Ganges, who assisted Phineus in endeavouring to prevent the marriage of Andromeda with her deliverer, and was killed by Persius with a burning log of wood (Ov. Met. v. 47).

Athos, i., m. Monte Sancto, a mountain of Macedonia, which stood between Sinus Sinaiticus, the Gulf of Monte Sancto, and Sinus Strymonicus, the Gulf of Contessa, which, towards the west end of Athos, are so near each other, that the distance does not exceed one mile and a half. It is more wooded than Parnassus, Lickura, and has a greater variety of trees and shrubs, some of which are not found in any other part of Greece (Wal. ii. 242). Through this isthmus, Xerxes, king of Persia, dug a canal so broad that two ships could pass one another, which Juvénalis mentions as a fiction of the Greeks (Sat. xi. 174). The ancients reckoned that the circumference of this mountain was about 100 miles, that it projected its shadow 75 miles, and that the sun was seen on its top two or three hours sooner than at the bottom. These assertions greatly exceed the truth.

Its height cannot be estimated at more than 4560 feet; of course, the sun will not be visible at its summit above six or seven minutes before he can be seen at the foot of it, or on the plain. From the twenty monasteries which are upon it, containing four thousand monks, it has derived the modern name Monte Sancto, i. e. the sacred mountain. Mēdus Athos (Luc. Phar. ii. 677).

Athribis, is, f. Athrib, a city of the Delta in Egypt, from which the Nômos or government was called Athribites (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Athrys, ÿis, m. a Thracian river, which falls into the Danube (Herod. iv. 49).

Athyr, ÿris, m. a man skilled in the charming of serpents. He fell by the hand of Murex (Sil. Ital. i. 412).

Athyras, æ, f. a town on Prôpôtis, so called from a river of the same name, now the Glycynero, on which it stood (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Ati, orum, m. a people who lived near the cataracts of the Nile (Amm. Mar. xxii. 15). Some think the reading ought to be Æti.

Atia, æ, f. daughter of M. Atius Balbus and Julia, sister of C. Julius Caesar, was the mother of Augustus, whom she educated, and of Octavia Minor (Tac. Or. 28). From her perhaps comes the adjective Atius, æ, um (Virg. Æn. v. 568).

Atia, æ, f. a city of Cămpăniă.

Atidius Gēmīnus, Atidii Gēmīni, m. prætor of Aethiopia in the year 25 (Tac. Ann. iv. 43).

Atilius, i, m. a man's name (Virg. Cat. iv. 5).—2. Another mentioned by Martialis (ix. 57).—3. The son of a freedman, who built an amphitheatre at Fidēniæ, Castel-Giubileo, with the view of making money. The structure being superficial gave way at the first exhibition, and not less than fifty thousand persons lost their lives. For this, Atilius was banished (Tac. Ann. iv. 62, 63). Suetonius says the number was above twenty thousand (Tib. 40).

Atilius Rufus, Atilii Rūfi, m. an officer of consular rank, who died whilst governor of the province of Syria (Tac. Ag. 40).

Atilius Vergilio, Atilii Vergiliōis, m. the standard-bearer of the cohort which remained with Galba. At the arrival of the prætorians he tore the colours, on which the soldiers declared for Otho (Tac. Hist. i. 41).

Atilius Vērus, Atilii Vēri, m. the first centurion of the seventh legion, who performed wonders of valour in the army of Vitellius, near Crēmōna, in the last struggle for the empire against Vespasianus. After a dreadful carnage Atilius fell fighting with great bravery (Tac. Hist. iii. 22).

A. Atilius Calātinus, A. Atilii Calātinus, m. consul with P. Sulpicius Păterculus, was rescued from a dangerous place, surrounded by the Carthaginians, into which he had incautiously marched his army, by the bravery of M. Călpurnius Flamma, a tribune of the soldiers in 260 B. C. In this perilous situation he probably vowed the temple to Hope, which Germanicus dedicated in the year 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 49). He was appointed dictator, and was the first who, in that office, led an army out of Italy in 250 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 17 seq. Flor. ii. 2). A. Atilius Serranus, A. Atilii Serrani, m. elected praetor in 195 B. C., and afterwards in 175 B. C., when the senate directed him and Q. Mārcius Philippus to visit Epirus, and other parts of Greece. In Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, they met P. Cornēlius Lēntūlus, and, on inquiry, found that Pērseus, king of Mācedōniā, was completely prepared for war. Against this monarch they preferred certain charges, heard his reply, and, with seeming reluctance agreed to a delay, that he might send ambassadors to Rome. The truth, however, was, that the Romans at this time found themselves not in a condition to meet him upon equal terms, on which account these ambassadors were particularly desirous to procure time until sufficient reinforcements could be provided, and, on their return to Rome, piqued themselves not a little on having overreached the Macedonian monarch. The younger senators commended their conduct, whilst those of more advanced years, and of ancient morals, recognised nothing Roman in that transaction, and considered it deserving severe censure. In 172 B. C., Atilius obtained the consulship (Liv. xxv. 10 seq.).

C. Atilius, C. Atilii, m. See M. Pāpilius.—2. See C. Acilius.

C. Atilius Bālbis, C. Atilii Bālbis, m. a noble Roman, who held the consulship first with M. Fābius Būtō in 247 B. C., and afterwards with T. Mānlius Tōrquātus in 237 B. C. His second consulship was rendered memorable by the temple of Jānus having been shut for the first time, after the reign of Nūma Pōmpilius.

C. Atilius Serrānus, C. Atilii Serrāni, m. a praetor in 220 B. C., sent to the relief of L. Mānlius with one Roman legion and five thousand auxiliary troops. Two years after, when pontiff, he stood candidate for the consulship without success (Liv. xxi. 26 seq.).

—2. A duumvir, who dedicated the temple to Concord in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 21).—

3. Elected a curule edile in 196 B. C. and praetor nine years after (Liv. xxxiv. 54 seq.).

—4. Was consul in 108 B. C. with Q. Sērvilius Cēpio q. v. (Vel. Pat. ii. 53).

L. Atilius, L. Atilii, m. One of the first military tribunes with consular authority, appointed in 443 B. C. (Liv. iv. 7).—2. Elected to the same office in 398 B. C. (Liv. v. 13).—3. A tribune of the people in 311 B. C. (Liv. ix. 30).—4. A quaestor who fell in the battle at Cānnæ in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 49).—5. A tribune of the people in 212 B. C. who consulted the people respecting the Campanians and others who had submitted to the power of Rome (Liv. xxvi. 33).—6. Chosen praetor in 200 B. C. and obtained Sārdinia as his province (Liv. xxxii. 27, 28).—7. The commander of the garrison of Lōcris in 217 B. C., who privately escaped from that town, on which the gates were opened to Hāsdrūbal and the Carthaginians (Liv. xxiv. 1).—8. A Roman youth, who addressed a speech to the Samothracians against Evānder, who had almost murdered Eumēnes, near Dēlphi, and had taken refuge in their island (Liv. xlv. 5).

M. Atilius, M. Atilii, m. elected city praetor in 216 B. C., but he likewise exercised the jurisdiction of his colleague, M. Emilius, the foreign praetor, and freed the populace from the new religious observances, which then almost distracted the citizens.

He fought at Cāpua, where he showed the fortitude of a Roman. The senate afterwards sent him ambassador to Ptolēmius (Liv. xxiv. 43 seq.).—2. A duumvir appointed to consecrate the temple of Concord, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 21).

M. Atilius (v. Acilius) Pāficānus, M. Atilii Pāficāni, m. a man of low birth, was distinguished by loquacity rather than eloquence (Quint. iv. 2). He was a native of Picēnum, a district of Italy (Sal. Frag.).

M. Atilius Rēgulus, M. Atilii Rēguli, m. obtained the consulship with M. Valērius Cōrvus, in 334 B. C. His colleague appears to have been, at least in the opinion of the senate, a better soldier; since, at their request, the war against the Ausonians, who inhabited Cāles, was assigned to him without a reference to the lots. After subduing the enemy, and enjoying the honour of a triumph, the senate ordered both consuls to lead the forces against the Sidicini, that Atilius might not be without a share of the honour (Liv. viii. 16).—2. Was elected consul with L. Pōstūmius Mēgellus, in 296 B. C. Samnium was decreed to both consuls, in consequence of the Samnites having raised three armies, one to recover Etrūria, Tuscany, another to ravage Campānia, Campagna, and a third to defend their own frontiers. Atilius marched against them alone, from his colleague being sick, and had nearly suffered a defeat by their attacking his camp in a very thick mist. By the judiciousness of his measures, and the bravery of his troops, he repulsed the enemy, drove them from the camp, and, being afterwards joined by Pōstūmius, the Samnites did not venture to face them. The consul having scattered them in different directions, proceeded to desolate their lands, and to besiege their towns. The Samnites, however, met Atilius in the territory of Lūcēria, Lucera, and defeated him. Next day he renewed the engagement with no better success at first; but, after his troops had been routed, he compelled them to rally, gained a complete victory, killed four thousand eight hundred, and made seven thousand three hundred prisoners, whom he sent under the yoke. He cut in pieces another army of the Samnites, which had attempted to seize Interamna, in which they failed, and contented themselves with plundering the country. The senate denied him a triumph for these victories, both because he had lost a number of men, and because he had merely sent the prisoners under the yoke, without imposing any other condition (Liv. x. 32—36).—3. Consul, defeated the Carthaginians in a naval engagement, on which he passed over to Africa, in 257 B. C. Here he killed a serpent one hundred and twenty feet long, on the banks of Bāgrāda, the Mejerda, but not without great loss of men. His success against the enemy induced the senate to continue him in command, of which he complained in a letter to the senate, assigning as a reason, that his small property was going to ruin from the mismanagement of hired stewards. The Carthaginians having solicited aid from the Lacedaemonians, the latter sent them a general, Xānthippus, who defeated Rēgulus in battle, and took himself prisoner, in 255 B. C. After five years' imprisonment, the Carthaginians deputed him to Rome, to procure a treaty of peace, and an exchange of prisoners, binding him by oath to return, if his mission failed. Atilius dissuaded the senate from agreeing to these propositions; then, in fulfilment of his oath, went back to Carthage, where he was put to death by torture (Liv. Ep. 18), to which Stätius refers, lacera umbra, his mangled shade. The ancients believed that the spirit retained the mark of the wounds inflicted on the body (Syl. i. 4. 88). Hörätius has celebrated the heroic sentiments, and dignified conduct of Atilius in one of his most beautiful and animated odes (iii. 5. 13 seq.). Silius Italicus alludes to him (ii. 343).—4. Created consul by Q. Fabius Maximus, dictator, in room of C. Flaminus, and received the command of the army in 219 B. C. This was his second consulship, ten years before, he and P. Valerius Flaccus held that office. The greatest harmony subsisted between him and his colleague, Cn. Servilius Geminus. They adopted the plans of Fabius, harassing Hannibal on his march, cutting off stragglers, and surprising his foraging parties, but never hazarded a general engagement. To such distress did they reduce that noble Carthaginian, that, had he not feared a retreat would have had the appearance of a flight, he would have returned into Gaul. This judicious conduct obtained the approbation of the senate, and procured their continuance in command another year. On account of the state of his health, Atilius requested leave to return home, which was granted as soon as the consuls had arrived at the camp. Next year he was appointed a public banker with L. Æmilius Papius and L. Scribonius Libo, from there being such a scarcity of money at Rome. In 216 B. C., Q. Fabius held an assembly for the appointment of censors, when the choice fell on Atilius and P. Furius Philus. The emptiness of the treasury saved them the trouble of erecting public works, and, therefore, they turned their attention to the regulation of morals. They instituted a number of judicious inquiries, and pronounced judgment with moderation and discernment. On the death of his colleague, Atilius abdicated the censorship (Liv. xxii. 25—xxiv. 43).

M. Atilius Serranus, M. Atilii Serrani, m. nominated a triumvir for settling colonies at Placentia and Crémōna, in 192 B. C. Eighteen years after, on being chosen prætor, the province of Sardinia fell to his lot (Liv. xxxvii. 46 seq.).

P. Atilius Philiscus, P. Atilii Philisci, m. a man who, by his conduct towards his daughter, gave a singular proof how highly the Romans, before the state became corrupted, esteemed female chastity. In him it was the more remarkable, that having been born in slavery his master had compelled him to gain money by personal abuse (Val. Max. vi. 1.).

Atilla, w. f. the wife of M. Annæus Mella, and mother of the poet Lucanus, whom he implicated as an accomplice in the conspiracy against the Emperor Nero. She was then, probably, of an advanced age, as the tyrant allowed her to pass the remainder of her days in silent obscurity, without either being condemned or acquitted (Tac. Ann. xv. 56, 71).

Atimæus, i. m. the freedman of Domitia, and of the Emperor Nero. Agrippina makes him a paramour of Domitia, in her indication of her own innocence with respect to the conspiracy against Nero, which he had undertaken at the request of Iturius and Calpurnius to convey to the ear of the Emperor. This false accusation, which did not originate with Atimæus, cost him his life (Tac. Ann. xlii. 19—22).

Atina, w. f. Atina, a powerful city of the Volsci, taken by the Roman dictator, C. Pontellius, in 313 B. C. (Liv. ix. 28). Inh. Atinates, im (Sing. Atinas, atis), m. Adj. Atinas, as, as; atis. Atinas ager, the territory of the Atinates (Liv. x. 39).

Atinas, atis, m. one of the commanders of the Rutuli (Virg. Æn. xi. 869).

C. Atinlus, C. Atinli, m. a military tribune of the fourth legion, in a desperate engagement with the Gauls, in 196 B. C., snatched the standards from the bearers, and threw them among the enemy. The struggle to recover them proved successful, and compelled the enemy to give way (Liv. xxxiv. 46).—2. Was created prætor in 190 B. C. The south of Spain became his province, in which he overpowered the Lusitani, and took Asta, but approaching the wall too carelessly he was struck, and, in a few days, died of the wound, in 188 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 35 seq.).

—3. A plebeian, one of the chief priests and founders of the Baccanalia, who confessed his crime to the Roman consul, in 183 B. C., and from what is stated by Livius, it is probable he was put to death (xxxix. 17, 18).

C. Atinius Labeo, C. Atinli Labëonis, m. a tribune of the people who, with C. Ursanius, prevented the consuls, C. Cornélius Cethegus, and Q. Minucius Rufus from putting in their claims together for a triumph, in 199 B. C., in consequence of their having defeated the Gauls in the north of Italy. He afterwards obtained the office of prætor peregrinus (Liv. xxxiii. 22 seq.).—2. Elected prætor in 193 B. C., and received the province of Sicily, with the army there, from M. Æmilius (Liv. xxxvi. 45 seq.).—3. A tribune of the people, who ordered Q. Cæcilius Metellus Macedonicus, censor, to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock, in 133 B. C., because the name of Atinius had been struck out of the list of the senate by the censor who would for this act, probably of moral propriety, have lost his life, had not the other tribunes protected him (Liv. Ep. 59). From Cicero and Plinius we learn that Metellus did expel this tribune from the senate.

M. Atinius, M. Atinli, m. a Roman who commanded a small garrison at Thuris, in 214 B. C., and was betrayed by the Thurini in marching against the Carthaginians, under Hanno and Mago. The mildness of his government induced the Thurini to open their gates for his admission, which they had shut as soon as the Romans were without the walls, that they might be cut off by the enemy (Liv. xxv. 15).—2. A præfect of the allies, killed by the Gauls, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 47).—3. A plebeian, one of the chief priests and founders of the Baccanalia. See C. Atinius.

T. Atinius, T. Atinli, m. a plebeian, who had a dream respecting the games; and not communicating it to the consuls, as ordered by Jupiter, the god punished his delay by the death of his son. Though warned that unless he delivered the message to the consuls, a greater evil awaited him, still he lingered until he had a stroke of the palsy, after which he consulted his friends, who caused him to be carried immediately to the consuls, and they to the senate-house, where he related the particulars, and on finishing the narrative, recovered the use of his limbs, and walked home without assistance, in 491 B. C. (Liv. ii. 36).

Atintānia, v. f. a part of Epirus (Strab.), of Mæcēdōnia (Steph.). It is also written Atintānis, Idis, f. et. Atintānium, i. n. It appears to have belonged to the Romans before 210 B. C., as the Achæans then wished it to be restored to the Romans. Atintānia, Stymphālis, and Elymīōtis, formed part of the fourth division of Mæcēdōnia after that kingdom had been reduced to a Roman province in 169 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 30 seq.).

Inh. Atintānes, um, et. Atintānii, orum, m. L. Atius, L. Atii, m. first tribune of the second legion, by whose bravery and speech to the soldiers the Roman camp was retaken from the Istri in 180 B. C. (Liv. xli. 3).

M. Atius Bālbis, M. Atii Bālbis, m. a noble Roman who married Jūlia, a sister of C. Jūlius Cæsar, by whom he had Atia q. v.

Atizyes, is, m. a Phrygian governor, killed in the battle at Issus (Curt. iii. 11).

Atlas, ātis, voc. Atla, m. a celebrated king of Mauritānia, Morocco and Fez, a country of Africa, to the south of Frētum Gādītānūm, v. Hērclūm, the Strait of Gibraltarr, was a son of Iāpētus and Clēmēnē. He had a great number of flocks of every kind, and to him also belonged the beautiful gardens so celebrated in antiquity, which contained the golden apples, and abounded with every species of fruit, the care of which he entrusted to a dragon. Being informed by an oracle that a son of Jūpiter would dethrone him, he refused to Pērseus, who pretended to be a son of that god, the rites of hospitality, and even offered him violence. Pērseus being inferior to the Mauritanian king in strength, showed him the head of Mēdūsa, on which Atlas was changed into a mountain of the same name, which runs across the deserts of Africa from east to west, and so high that the ancients thought the heavens rested on its summit (Ov. Met. iv. 656). Strābo says the Greeks called it Atlas, and the barbarians Dyris; the Arabs still give it the name of Daran or Darah. Virgilius describes it as covered with perpetual snow. The fable of Atlas supporting the heavens most probably arose from his being the inventor of the Sphere, from his knowledge of astronomy, and from often observing the motions of the heavenly bodies on the top of that mountain. Atlas was, from his father, called Iāpētōnides. Atlāntīādes, m, m. Mērcūrius, the son of Jūpiter and Maia, a daughter of Atlas (Ov. Met. i. 682). Atlāntīādes, v. Atlāntīdes, um, f. the daughters of Atlas; seven of whom, from their mother, Plēiōnē, received also the name of Plēiādes. After death, they were converted into a constellation, in the sign Taurus, under the latter appellation. Eōa Atlāntīdes abscondantur, let the morning Plēiādes be hidden or set, i. e. let the Plēiādes be set in the morning, which, according to Columella, happened on the thirty-first day after the autumnal equinox (Virg. G. i. 224). Atlāntīādes sōrōres, the Plēiādes (Sil. Ital. xvi. 136). Atlāntīs, Maia (Ov. Met. ii. 685). Atlāntēi, orum, m. the inhabitants of mount Atlas, who, according to Ammianus Mārcellinus, never dream

(xv. 2). Adj. Atlānticus, Atlāntēus, v. Atlāntēus, et. Atlāntīlācus, a, um. Mārē Atlānticum, the Atlantic Ocean; from its washing the western base of that mountain. Atlāntica mūnēra, the gifts of Atlas, i. e. the wood which grew on that mountain, more valuable than gold in the opinion of Mārtilis (xiv. 89). Atlāntēus finis, the boundary of Atlas, i. e. the western extremity of the earth (Hor. Od. i. 34. 11). Atlānticum aquor (Hor. Od. i. 31. 14), v. Atlāntēus ōcēānus, the Atlantic Ocean (Luc. Phar. v. 598).—2. A Spaniard who attacked Appius in the battle at Trāst-mēnus; but displayed cowardice rather than bravery, and fell a victim to the courage of that Roman (Sil. Ital. v. 271 seq.).—3. One of the competitors for the prize given by Scipio Africānus at the conclusion of the Spanish war, for excelling in the chariot race. The horse Caucāsus was his property (Sil. Ital. xvi. 367).

Atlas, ātis, m. a Thracian river, which has its rise in Hēmus, and falls into the Danube (Herod. iv. 49). It received this name from Atlas, king of Arcādīa.

Atlēsīs, is, m. a prince of Thrācia, who made inroads into the territories of Cōtyes, king of the Odrýsæ, and took the district called Mārēnē (Liv. xlii. 67).

L. Atrātīnus, L. Atrātīni, m. a man whom M. Cælius Rufus accused of bribery in his canvass for office about 53 B. C. (Cic. pro Cæl. Suet. Clar. Rhet. 2).

Atrax, ācis, m. a son of Pēncēus and Būra, who built a town in Thēssālīa, Thessaly, ten miles distant from Lārissa, on Pēncēus, the Salampria, to which he gave his own name. Inh. Atrāces, um (Sing. Atrax, ācis), m. came originally from Pērthæbia, and, from Līvius, appear to have been both active and brave. Atrācides, v, m. a descendant of Atrax, a Thessalian; hence Ovidius calls Cæcēus, Atrācides (Met. xii. 209). Adj. Atrācius, a, um, of Atrax; Thessalian; magical. Atrācia ars, magical art (Stat. Th. i. 106). Atrācia virgo, Hippodāmīa (Val. Flacc. i. 141).

Atrax, ācis, m. the Micro Tzigota, one of the northern branches of Pēncēus, the Salampria.—2. A river of Athāmānia, which runs into the Ionian Sea (Plin. i. 407).

Atrēbātes, ium, v. um (Sing. Atrēbas, ātis, Cæs. B. G. vi. 6), m. a people of Gallia Bēlgica, the neighbours of the Mōrini, whose country lay along the English Channel, opposite to Dover. Their chief city Nemetacum, v. Nemetocenna, afterwards Atrēbātes, Atrax, is called by the Flemings, Atrēcht. Adj. Atrēbāticus, a, um.

Atrēus, ēos, m. a son of Pēlōps, king of Pisa, and Hippodāmīa. Being suspected by his father of the murder of Chrysippus, a natural son of Pēlōps, he fled to Eurysthēus, king of Mycēnæ, whose daughter, Aērōpē, he married, and succeeded his father-in-law in the throne. According to some authors, he had by Aērōpē three sons, Plisthēus, Agāmēmnon, and Mēnēlaüs. But it has been maintained that Plisthēus was the husband of Aērōpē, to whom she bore Agāmēmnon and Mēnēlaüs, and that Atrēus, having brought them up with paternal affection and solicitude, came to be accounted their father. In Grecian history they are, almost without a single exception, called the sons of Atrēus. Atrides, v, m. a patronymic of Agāmēmnon.

In the singular number this term seldom means Mênélâus. In the plural, Atrides includes both Major Atrides, Agamémnon, from his being the elder of the two; and Minor Atrides, Mênélâus, because he was the younger brother; hence majoris frater Atrides, the brother of the elder son of Atrêus, i. e. Mênélâus (Ov. Met. xiii. 359). Atride gemini, Agamémnon and Mênélâus (Virg. Æn. ii. 415). Superbi Atride, the courageous sons of Atrêus (Hor. Od. i. 10. 13). Juvénalis uses Atrides, to denote any husband whose wife has determined to poison him (Sat. vi. 659). Adj. Atrêus, a, um. Atrêus sanguis (Stat. Th. viii. 742).

L. Atrêus, L. Atrêi, m. of Fréglæ, in whose house, Livius records, a spear burned for two hours without being consumed in 171 B. C. (xliii. 13).

Atrîa. See Hadria.

C. Atrius Umbri, C. Atrîi Umbri, m. a common soldier, and a ringleader of the mutiny at Suro in 208 B. C. Having been appointed joint-commander with C. Albinus Calênus, they assumed the badges of supreme command, the rods and fasces, which, on the quelling of the mutiny, were applied to their own backs and necks. It is probable that Atrius was a native of Umbria, hence his surname (Liv. xxviii. 24 seq.).

Q. Atrius, Q. Atrîi, m. an officer to whom Cæsar gave the command of the shipping, which had carried him and his army to the west of Britain (Cæs. B. G. v. 9).

Atropâtus, i, m. an officer of Alexander the Great, on whose death he obtained Média Mînor; and the father-in-law of Pêdiceas, Média Mînor (Just. xiii. 4). Strâbo says this part of Média was from him called Atropâtia, or Atropâtênê, which Ammiânus Marcellinus mistakingly calls Acrôpâtênê (xxiii. 6). Isak. Atropâtênî, orum, m.

Atropos, i, f. one of the three Pârce, or Fates. It was her office to cut the thread of life. Her name (from at, priv. and epior, I turn), denoting inflexible, inexorable, expresses her character; hence immôta Atropos (Stat. Th. i. 328). Atropos ignâra mûceri (Stat. Th. iii. 68). Ferrêda Atropos (Stat. Th. iv. 601). The poets sometimes use Atropos to denote the period of human life, hence alba Atropos, prosperity (Stat. Syl. iv. 8. 19). Albini flum. conveys the same idea.

Atropos, i, m. the summit of Êta, from which Xêrxes attacked Lêônidas and the Lacedæmonians, at Thermôpyle (Ap. Bel. Sp. 97).

Attâlus, i, m. a general of Philippus, king of Macedônia, whose sister, or rather sister's daughter, Clêôpâtra, was married to that monarch. He was a very great enemy of Alexander the Great, by whose orders Parandis put him to death (Just. ix. 5—xii. 6).

—2. A general of Alexander the Great (Just. iii. 6).—3. A man who informed Epicydes, in 214 B. C., that a plot was entered into, for taking up Syracuse to the Romans. The discovery, which Attâlus communicated because he was not entrusted with the secret, proved fatal to all concerned; for they not only lost their lives, but were put to death by Scurus (Liv. xxv. 23).—4. Son of Eumênes, king of Pêrgâmus, was the first of the Pergamene princes of that name. In 213 B. C. the Roman people formed a treaty with the Attâli, to which Attâlus was included. From that period, the Romans experienced great advantages from his activity and fidelity. At the request of the senate, he conducted to Pêsinus in Phrygia, the Roman ambassadors, to whom he delivered the stone which the natives said was the mother of the gods; in Roman mythology, Mater Idæa, Cybele, &c. The superstitious Romans considered this gift a very particular favour, received it into their capital with the utmost solemnity, and preserved it with the greatest care. His friendship for the Grecian states excited him to great exertion, besides forming many useful schemes which might, had they been properly executed, have accomplished the deliverance of that ingenious people. The inroads of his enemies frequently obliged him to quit Greece, where he commanded in person, on purpose to defend his own territories. In general his aid was more powerful on sea than on land; yet the number of his land forces was frequently considerable, nor were they deficient either in courage or enterprise. The Romans, in return for his good offices, conferred particular honour on Attâlus, besides increasing both his wealth and power. In an assembly of the Beoti at Thêbæ, in 199 B. C., Attâlus was the first who stood up to speak, but, being advanced in age and feeble, his voice failed, and he dropped down. His attendants removed him to Pêrgâmus, where he died soon after, in the seventy-second year of his age, and forty-fifth of his reign. Except riches, fortune had given Attâlus nothing which could excite the hope of a kingdom. By a prudent and splendid use of his wealth, he appeared, first to himself, and afterwards to others, not undeserving of a crown. He assumed the title of king on his defeating the Gallogræci, a nation more terrible to Asia, as they had but lately appeared in that country. His government was distinguished by the strictest justice towards his subjects, and fidelity towards his allies. A wife and four children survived him, and his kingdom descended to the third generation. Of the Asiatics, he had the merit of being the first who refused to pay tribute to the Gauls. Attâlis, Idis, f. a purposed tribe of the Athenians, in honour of this king (Liv. xxxv. 15).—5. A son of the former, and brother of Eumênes, who succeeded his father in 198 B. C. Four years after, he went to Rome, on purpose to inform the senate, that the Êtoli had an army in readiness to join Antiochus, king of Syria, who had crossed Hellêspôntus, the Dardanelles. For this proof of fidelity, the senate returned thanks to him and his brother Eumênes, who was not present, treated him with the highest respect, and honoured him with very valuable presents. Attâlus was a man of fidelity, courage, and military skill, which he displayed on every opportunity, and thereby contributed to the complete defeat of the Syrian monarch. In the war carried on by Cn. Mânlius Vulso against the Gallogræci, his services were of great importance, as well as in that against Pêrseus, king of Macedônia. On the conquest of that country, to which he himself had greatly contributed, he went to Rome to congratulate the senate, where he appears to have had views of a private nature, more justifiable on the principle of ambition than of fraternal affection (Liv. xxxv. 23—xlv. 20). See Strâbus.—6. Surnamed Philômêtor, the last king of Pergāmus, who died in 135 B. C. without children, leaving the Roman people his heir; Attālus heredem voluit te Rōmare linguā (Claud. xviii. 215). This gift proved injurious to the morals of the Romans, by introducing a love of the most profuse extravagance (Plin. v. 72). Attālus was the reputed son of Eumēnes II., and grandson of Attālus I.; but not acknowledged by his father. The invention of cloth of gold is ascribed to him, hence Attālica (Plin. ii. 231). According to Jūstinus he murdered his friends, punished his relations, and put to death both his mother, an old woman, and his wife Bērēnicē; after which he put on mourning, allowed his hair and beard to grow, and never appeared in public. Of him it may be said, that he did nothing like a man in his senses. Neglecting the administration of government, he digged in his garden, sowed seeds, and mixed wholesome with noxious, tainted the whole with poison, and sent them in presents to his friends. Afterwards he amused himself working with wax and brass. A stroke of the sun deprived him of life (Just. xxxvi. 4). After the death of this monarch, his kingdom became a Roman province, called Asia Propria, of which Pergāmus was the capital. Tib. Sēmprōnius Grāchus, a tribune of the people, proposed that the immense wealth of Attālus should be divided among those who were entitled to land by Lex Sēmprōnia. This motion excited against Grāchus the violent indignation of the senate, which was only appeased by his death. Adj. Attālicus, a, um. Attālica opes, an enormous expense (Virg. Cu. 62). Attālica conditōnes, on condition that he should receive the wealth of Attālus (Hor. Od. i. 1. 12).—7. A busybody ridiculed by Mārtiālis (i. 80). The wit of this epigram consists in the play on the word ago. The same person falls again under the lash of the epigrammatist (ii. 7; iv. 34).

Attānes, is, m. a prince of the Tūrdētāni, who deserted Hāsdrūbal, son of Gisgo, after the decisive victory which P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus gained over him at Bēcūla in 208 B. C. Besides the great number of his countrymen who accompanied him to the Roman camp, his revolt was followed by delivering up two fortified towns, with their garrisons, to Cōrnēlius (Liv. xxviii. 15).

Attārras, æ, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, who was active in apprehending the conspirators against his sovereign's life, in 330 B. C. (Curt. vi. 8).

Attēgūa, æ, f. a town of Spain. Inh. Attēgūenses, ium, m. (Val. Max. ix. 2).

Attes, æ, m. a priest of Cýbēlē, of whose birth two different accounts are given, both probably fabulous. He was incapable of getting children, hence perhaps originated the practice of emasculation being uniformly observed by the priests of that goddess (Paus. vii. 17). See Attis.

Atthis, idis, f. daughter of Crānāus, who was the most wealthy and powerful citizen of Athens, of which, by means of his riches, he obtained the government. He had other daughters besides Atthis, but she probably was either the eldest or most distinguished for personal or mental accomplishments, otherwise it would be difficult to account for her giving name to that district of Greece, formerly called Actæa (Lucret. vi. 1114. Paus. i. 2). Atthisides, um, f. Athenian women (Stat.

Th. xli. 536). Mārtiālis uses it in place of hirundines, because Prōcnē, the daughter of Pāndion, was changed into a swallow (vi. 68).—2. A favourite of the poetess Sappho (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 18).

Attica, Acta, v. Actica, æ, originally Actē, es, f. a country of Græcia, Greece, of which Athēnæ, Athens, was the capital. Some derive the name from Actæus, who conquered that part of Greece, to which he gave the name of Attica. His daughter, Aglauros (3 syl.), was married to Cécrops, who is generally considered the first king of Athens. The soil is light, calcareous, and arid, deficient in water, on which account the Athenians could not rear many horses. It contained, anciently, a hundred and twenty-four towns, rather villages (δυνας), besides the capital, and its population was probably about a million and a half of souls. From several of its streams becoming dry in the summer months, originated the fabulous contest for the region between Nēptūnus and Jūno, recorded by Pausānias (ii. 15). Attica abounded with good ports, and its air is still the best in Greece. Its olives, imported from the source of the Danube, by Hērclēs, according to Pindar, and honey, are reckoned to surpass those of any other country, the wine indifferent, meat bad from want of pasture, and the fish scarce. It abounds with many varieties of owls, hence the proverb γλαυκὰ ἐκ Ἀθηνῶν, coals to Newcastle. The Atticans considered the owl an auspicious bird, while almost all other nations held an opposite opinion. The inhabitants were divided into four classes, husbandmen, artists, soldiers, and priests, a distinction which continues to be observed in modern times. Actias, ādis, f. of Attica, or, Athens, applied to nouns feminine. Actias Orithyia, Athenian Orithyia (Virg. G. iv. 463). Adj. Actæus, et, Atticus, a, um, of Attica, Athenian. Actæa acies, Athenian lines, or armies (Stat. Th. xli. 196). Actæa area (Ov. Met. i. 313). Attici fines, the coast of Attica (Hor. Od. i. 3. 6). Attico lepore, with Attic elegance (Mart. iii. 20). Attica terra, the district of Athens (Liv. xxviii. 8).

Atticilla, æ, f. a woman with whom Mārtiālis appears to have been intimate, and to whom he writes an Epigram (xii. 81).

A. Atticus, A. Attici, m. was the præfect of a cohort in the Roman army, under Agrippina, and fell in the battle with the Caledonians, near the Grampian hills (Tac. Ag. 37).

Attilius, i, m. a Roman senator, who, from fear of a trial, fled to Mithridates, against whom he plotted, and on being discovered was, by the order of that monarch, put to death, but not by torture in consequence of his rank (Ap. Bel. Mith. 228).

Attin, inis, et, Attis, idis, m. a youth of Phrygia, distinguished for personal beauty, with whom Cýbēlē, the mother of the gods, fell passionately in love. She prevailed on him to vow perpetual chastity to her, and, having violated his promise by intercourse with the nymph Sīgāritis, the goddess struck him with madness, on which he mutilated his person, and all the priests of that goddess followed his example. He was changed into a pine tree, which is sacred to Cýbēlē. From the mountain Bērēcýnus, thus he is called Bērēcýnthiādes (Ov. Ib. 508). Cýbēlēus Attis (Ov. Met. x. 104).

Bēvējāthūs Attis (Pers. i. 93). Both adjectives are used from his being a favourite with Gōbbēs. Probably Attin and Attes were names of the same person.

Attinnas, a, m. commanded the country possessed by the Massāgētē, and at that time plundered by the Bactriāni. In that enterprise, which he conducted in a very unsoldier-like manner, he and his whole force fell by the hand of the enemy (Curt. viii. 1).

Attius, i, m. a friend of Pompey, who took possession of Auximum, Osimo, but fled at the approach of Caesar.—2. One of the Pēlignī, hence called Pēlignus, who, with Lūcrētius, restrained the inhabitants of Sūlmo, Sulmona, a town of the Pēlignī, from putting themselves under the protection of Caesar. When M. Antony advanced with a few cohorts to the gates, the people opened them, and welcomed his arrival. Lūcrētius and Attius endeavoured to escape over the wall, but the latter was taken, carried before Antony, and afterwards set at liberty by Caesar (Cæs. B. C. i. 18).

Attius Rufus, Attii Rufi, m. a partisan of Pompey, who impeached L. Afrānius before that general, for the loss of the army in Spain (Cæs. B. C. iii. 83).

Attius Tūllus, Attii Tūlli, m. a Volscian prince, and an inveterate enemy of the Romans. With him C. Mārcius Cōrōlānus lodged after he had retired from Rome, in consequence of the unjust prosecution to which he had been subjected. The Volscian, from an old animosity, and Mārcius, from fresh resentment, sought the first opportunity of revenge against the nation detested by both. The plans which they adopted soon provoked hostilities, and added to the military character of Mārcius, who, by the splendour of his achievements, soon eclipsed Attius Tūllus, the commander-in-chief, and placed him at the head of the army. He fought no battle which he did not gain, and stormed no town which he did not take. See Mārcius. To Attius the command of the army would naturally return, but, although he displayed great bravery in battle, the Volscian troops had little success against the Romans, while he was their general, nor can his character be ranked high as a soldier (Liv. ii. 35–39).

P. Attius Vārus, P. Attii Vāri, m. the praetor in Africa, at the commencement of the civil wars. His name occurs frequently in the writings of Cicero. C. Scribōnius Cūrio, a lieutenant-general of Caesar, drove him from Africa, 51 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 110. Luc. Phar. ii. 4 seq.). He is probably the lieutenant-general who fought a desperate naval battle with Didius, at the Strait of Gibraltar, in which both fleets were wrecked (Flor. iv. 2). Adj. Attianus, a, um.

Q. Attius Vārus, Q. Attii Vāri, m. a Roman of considerable distinction, whose name frequently occurs in the civil wars, as a prefect of the cavalry. After serving under Caesar, he joined the republican forces, and was in the army in Africa, over which Caesar gained a decisive victory (Eutrop. vi. 24). Caesar frequently calls him simply Vārus, suppressing his nomen.

T. Attius Lābiēnus, T. Attii Lābiēni, m. one of Caesar's lieutenant-generals in the Gallie war. In the beginning of the civil war he deserted to Pompey, escaped from the battle of Pharsalia, and was killed in that of Mūnda (Cæs. B. G. i. 21 seq.). To him Lucānus alludes (Phar. v. 346), and Jūstinus (xlii. 4). Adj. Lābiēnānus, a, um, used, perhaps, only in the masculine gender, and chiefly applied to the soldiers who were under his command.—2. Son of T. Attius Lābiēnus, who fell at Mūnda, took the command of the Pārthi, who were of the party of Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus, and having defeated L. Dēclidius Sāxa, a lieutenant-general under M. Antōnius, the triumvir, possessed themselves of the whole province of Sŷria, in 42 B. C. P. Vēntidius Bāssus, a lieutenant-general of M. Antōnius, defeated the Pārthi in battle, drove them out of Sŷria, and killed their general T. Attius Lābiēnus (Liv. Ep. 127. Flor. iv. 9).—3. A Roman, whose writings were suppressed by a decree of the senate, on account of their immorality. By order of the Emperor Cāligūla, these books were allowed to be brought from their obscurity, and to be read by the public (Suet. Cal. 16). Adj. Lābiēnānus, a, um. Lābiēnāni Gālli (Hir. Bel. Af. 29).

Attūārī, orum, m. a tribe of the Franks, whose name is very differently written (Amm. Mar. xx. 10).

Attus Claudius, Atti Clausi, m. afterwards called, by the Romans, Appius Claudius, and in the consular calendar Appius Claudius Sābinus Rēgillēnsis, fled with a great number of dependants from the Sabines, and settled at Rome. The senate assigned them lands beyond Anŷo, the Tererone, and all the privileges of the state. They had the name of vetus Claudia tribus, to distinguish them from the new tribes which came from the same part of the country, and were added to this tribe. Appius having been elected into the senate, soon equalled in dignity the first of the nobles (Liv. ii. 16–44). He was elected consul in 495 B. C., the year in which Tarquinius Sūperbus died. His conduct in the subsequent years of his life was that of a man of prudence and a steady patriot. Tacitus says he came at the head of the Sabine nobility, and from him descended the whole Claudian family (Ann. iv. 9). L. Dōmītiūs Ahēnōbārbus, better known in history by the name of Nēro, was the first adopted by the Claudian family (Tac. Ann. xii. 25). Adj. Claudius, a, um. Claudia gens.

Attus Nāvius, Atti Nāvii, m. a celebrated augur in the reign of L. Tārquinius, who insisted that no alteration or addition should be made to the Rāmnēnses, Titiēnses, and Lūcēres, as instituted by Rōmūlus, without the sanction of the birds. In contempt of his art, the king said, "Discover by your augury whether my present intention can be executed." Nāvius, after due examination, according to the rules of augury, answered, "It could." "Then," said the king, "I was thinking whether you could cut a whetstone with a razor, take these and perform what your birds foretell to be practicable." Nāvius easily cut the stone in two with the razor. In the place where this transaction happened, a statue of Nāvius was erected, with a fillet on his head. With respect to the truth of this story, Livius judiciously indicates a considerable degree of doubt (i. 36).

Atiūtūci, a. Adūātūci, orum, m. a people of Gāllia, France, whose territories lying between the rivers Mōsa, the Meuse, and Scāldis, the Scheldt, were adjoining to those of the Nervii and Toxandri. Their capital was Atuatua, ae. f. Tongres, in Brabant (Cæs. B. G. ii. 4 seq.).

Atur, uris, et. Atūrus, v. Atūrrus, i. m. the Adour, a river of Gallia Aquitania, in the country of the Turbelli (hence called Turbellius Atūrrus, Auson. Id. x. 468), which falls into Mare Cantabricum, the Bay of Biscay (Th. i. 7. 4).

Atymnius, i. m. father of Mydon, charioteer of Pylæmènes, hence he is called Atymniades (Hom. Il. v. 581).—2. Son of Amisodarus, a Lycian, wounded mortally by Antilochus (Hom. Il. xvi. 317 seq.).

Atys, ŷis, m. son of Hércules and Omphale (of Manes, Herod. i. 7), was king of Macedonia, in Asia Minor, the father of Lydus and Týrrhēnus. The former continued to possess his native territory, which, from him, took the name of Lýdia, and Týrrhēnus, from an overgrown population, set sail with a number of his countrymen, and settled on the western coast of Italy (Tac. Ann. iv. 55). See Týrrhēnus.—2. A young Trojan, the favourite of Iulus. Adj. Atius, a, um. Atii Lati, i. e. Romani, so called from being descendants of Atys, according to Virgilius (Æn. v. 568). Atia gens, the family or clan of the Atii.—3. A youth born at Cýrrha, betrothed to Ismēnē, on whose account he went to the Theban war, where, in the army of Etēocles, he made a conspicuous figure, rather as a hero in romance, than a brave warrior. He is decked out in all the finery of a modern fop, and when he wished to gain some renown, by his bravery in arms, he unfortunately met with Týdeus, who addressed him in a short speech, full of the most sarcastic contempt, levelled him with a javelin, and left him, disdainful to bear away his arms and ornaments, which were so effeminate, that the gallant conqueror considered them unfit to be presented to his own wife. He is carried into the palace, and Ismēnē, at his earnest request, enters the apartment, weeps over his wounds, and closes his eyes. This final interview Státius describes with great feeling and tenderness (Th. viii. 554—638 seq.).—4. An Alban king, son of Albas, and father of Cápys (Liv. i. 3).

Atys, ŷis, m. the Carabi, a river of Sicily, called also Acithis and Carabis, whence the modern name (Cluv.).

Avāricum, i. m. Bourges, was the chief city of the Bitūriges, and afterwards known by their name. It had its former appellation from the river Avāra, the Eure, one of the south branches of Ligēris, the Loire. At the time Cæsar invaded Gallia, France, Avāricum appears to have been one of the finest cities in that country. It was strongly fortified by its natural situation, being nearly surrounded by a marsh and the river. That general made himself master of it by considerable labour and difficulty, and his merciless ruffians, on entering the walls, massacred without distinction the inhabitants of all ages, and of both sexes (Cæs. B. G. vii. 13 seq.). Inh. Avārici, orum (Sing. Avāricus, i. m. Adj. Avāricēnsis, is, e.

Auāstomates, im, m. a people of Africa (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Auchāte, arum (Sing. Auchātes, ae, m. a people of Scythia, in whose country, according to Plinius, Hýpānis, the Bog, takes its rise (l. 471). This author calls them Auchāte, and others Auchātes (Val. Placc. vi. 132).

Auchēnius, a, um. Auchēnium genus, the same with Anicia gens (Claud. i. 8).

Auchus, i. m. a commander of the Cimærii, in the Argonautic expedition, killed in battle by Iāson (Val. Placc. vi. 619).

Audēna, ae, m. the Ula, or Aula, a river of Gallia Cisalpina (Liv. xli. 19), one of the branches of Maera, the Magra.

Aveia, ae, f. Alano, an inland town of the Vēstini in Italy (Sil. Ital. viii. 518).

Avēns, ēntis, m. an Umbrian, swallowed by the serpent which M. Attilius Rēgulus afterwards killed on the banks of Bāgrāda, the Mejerda (Sil. Ital. vi. 167 seq.).

Avēnticum, i. n. Avenches (French), Wifisprung (Germans), the principal city of the Helvetians (Tac. Hist. i. 68).

Avēntinus, i. m. the son of Rōmulus Silvius (Liv. i. 3), Rōmulus Silvius (Ov. Fast. iv. 49). He was the thirteenth king of Alba, and, after a reign of thirty-seven years, was killed by lightning. The hill on which part of Rome was afterwards built, bore his name, in consequence of his being buried there. Dionysius of Hālicarnāssus does not mention the manner of his death. Adj. Avēntinus, a, um, et, Avēntiniēnsis, is, e. Avēntinus mons, Monte Aventino, first occupied by the inhabitants of Pōlitōrium, afterwards by those of Tēllēne and Ficūna, during the reign of Ancus Mārcius. Rēmus chose this mountain for taking the omen which was to decide the sovereignty claimed both by him and Rōmulus, and on it he is said to have been buried; hence Avēntinus Rēmus (Prop. iv. 1. 50). A law passed for disposing of it as public property, to be built upon and inhabited, in 456 B. C. At that time, the greater part of it, although within the walls of the city, was covered with wood. The Roman army at Algidum, on hearing the tragical fate of Virgīnia, mutinied, came to Rome, and pitched on mount Avēntinus, where they were soon after joined by the other army (Liv. i. 6—iii. 50). In extrinso Avēntino, on the most distant part of Monte Aventino (Hor. Epist. ii. 2. 69). Avēntiniēnsis Dīana (Val. Max. vii. 3).

Avērnus, i. m. Lago di Averno, a circular sheet of water in Cāmpānia, of about a mile and a half in circumference. The ground on the one side is low, on the other high, but not steep, and cultivated all around. The earth, which separated between this lake and that of Lūcrinus, was removed by Augustus, who thus opened a communication betwixt them. Besides, he connected them with the sea by means of a canal, and used them for naval exercise, that he might have a fleet superior to that of Sextus Pōmpēius, whom he wished to subdue (Liv. xxiv. 12). A large octagonal brick building stands on the southern bank, called by some the temple of Prōserpina, by others of Avērnus. On the opposite bank of the lake is the opening of a subterraneous gallery, called by the natives Grotto della Sibylla, into which Eustacē penetrated as far as the second gallery; but was stopped by the walls having fallen in. His opinion was, that it might lead to a subterraneous city. He adds, that the steeping of flax in this lake renders the air unwholesome during the summer. Adj. Avērnus, a, um, et, Avērnalis, is, c. Aetna Jūno (Ov. Met. xiv. 114). Aetnales aqua, the water of Lago di Averno (Hor. Epod. v. 26).

Avërrūcus, i. m. the same with Robigus q. v. Some think that the Dii Avërrūci were talismanic figures (Gel. v. 12). To them the Greeks sacrificed such things as they considered necessary to avert evil (Paus. ii. 11).

Aufidēna, a. f. Alfidena, a city of the Sāmnites, which Cn. Fūlvius, the consul, took by assault, in 300 B. C. (Liv. x. 12).

Aufidia, a. f. the wife of Cervinus, whom he divorced, and whom he afterwards passionately loved on her being married to another man (Mart. iii. 70).

Aufidēnus Rufus, Aufidēni Rūfi, m. the praefect of the camp, who rose from the ranks to that office. Some legions in Pannonia, under his command, adding insolence to disobedience, revolted, and treated Aufidēnus with contempt, because he had endeavoured to recall the strictness of ancient discipline (Tac. Ann. i. 20).

Aufidius, i. m. a noted debauchee, held up to infamy by Juvēnalis (Sat. ix. 25), and by Martialis (v. 62).

Aufidius Bassus, Aufidii Bāssi, m. a historian commended by Quintilianus for his history of the German war. That critic considers some of his other works as below himself (Tac. Or. 23).

Aufidius Lūscus, Aufidii Lūsci, m. a man who had, in early life, been a scribe, and afterwards attained the praetorship of Fūndi, Fundi. Hōrātius ridicules him for his vanity, because he presented himself to strangers with all the ornaments and ensigns of dignity which belonged to the praetors of Rome (Sat. i. 5. 34).

Cn. Aufidius Orestes, Cn. Aufidii Orēstis, m. was the colleague of P. Licinius Lēntulus Sūra in the consulship, in 73 B. C. (Eutrop. vi. 8).

M. Aufidius Lūreo, M. Aufidii Lūrcōnis, m. a Roman, who, according to Plinius, was the first that fed peacocks, by which he made sixty thousand sesterces annually (ii. 405). Vāro mentions the same fact, and nearly in the same words (iii. 6). Hōrātius condemns his taste (Sat. ii. 4. 24).—2. A Roman, who carried a law against bribery, in 62 B. C. when he was a tribune of the people (Suet. Cal. 23).

Aufidus, i. m. the Ofanto, the chief river in Apulia, which takes its rise high in the Apennines, and, running eastward, falls into the Gulf of Venice. Its current is rapid, like other mountainous streams, consequently heard at a distance, hence Hōrātius, vīlens obstruat Aufidus (Od. iii. 30. 10). Both the Carthaginian and Roman armies were encamped on this river the day before the battle of Cānna, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 4). Crācentus Aufidus, alluding to that battle (Flor. ii. 6). Adj. Aufidus, a. um. Aufidii stagna (Sil. Ital. x. 170).

Aufilēna, a. f. a woman of infamous morals, to whom Cātillus addresses some of his poems.—2. A beautiful girl (Catul. c. 1).

Q. Aufilēnus, Q. Aufilēni, m. the brother of the beautiful Aufilēna. He appears to have been a native of Vērona (Catul. c. 1).

Aufurn, i. n. Karahissar, a town of Asia Minor, to the west of Synnada.

Augē, ea. f. daughter of Alēus, king of Ar- cādia, who became the mother of Tēlēphus by Hērēcles. At his birth she exposed the infant, whom a stag nourished, and, on that account, when the shepherds found him, they called him Tēlēphus q. v. Augē, dreading her father's displeasure, fled to Tēuthras, king of Moesia, who, being childless, not only admitted her into his family, but treated her as his daughter (Hyg. 99). To the violation of Augē, Ovidius alludes (Ep. Her. ix. 49). Manālis Augē, Arcadian Augē (Stat. Syl. iii. 1. 40).

Augēas, a. m. one of the Argonauts, son of Sol and Naupidāmē (Apol. Rhod. i. 172), was king of Elis. Hērēcles cleaned, in one day, the house in which three hundred of his cattle had been for thirty years, by turning into it the river Anigrus. After the work had been completed, Augēas refused the promised reward, at which the hero, being provoked, put him to death, and gave the crown to his son Phylēus, because he had agreed in opinion with Hērēcles, that, the conditions being fulfilled, the remuneration was justly due. In revenge for this judgment, his father had banished him to Dulichium. This account is partly in accordance with the narrative of Pausanias (v. 1).

Auginus, i. m. Monte Codoro, a mountain of Liguria, to which the Friniates Ligures fled on concealing a part of their arms, and were pursued by the consul, C. Flāminius, who obliged them to abandon it, in 189 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 2).

Augur, iris, m. an augur, one who pretends to predict future events chiefly by the flight, feeding, or chirping of birds. Among the Romans, the augurs had most frequently recourse to these means, yet they had many other ways which they occasionally employed. Besides, it was their duty to explain certain phenomena, and prescribe the manner of expiation, when that was judged necessary. Hence augurium was of more extensive signification than auspicium, which properly referred to the inspection of birds. As a body, the augurs possessed very great authority, since nothing of importance to the public was ever attempted without previously consulting them. From Livius, they appear to have been instituted by Nūma Pōmpilius. The three ancient tribes, the Rhānnes, the Titiēnses, and Lūcēres had each its own augurs, and Livius says that it was a law that the number ought to be odd; hence he cannot understand that there were four augurs in 302 B. C., when an additional number was proposed, except by the death of two. But if the odd number was to be strictly observed, when more augurs were required, the three tribes could not each elect one, otherwise the number would have been six, which, being even, the law did not allow. Some suppose that the number of each tribe being one, and the tribes being three, on being doubled, might still be considered odd, referring to the original number three; but, from the passage already referred to, the augurs were increased to nine, which does not favour that idea. Of this pretended art, which was wholly deception, the Romans acquired their knowledge from the Tuscans, and the sons of the chief men at Rome, were sent by a decree of the senate to the twelve states of Etruria, on purpose to be instructed in augury. During the monarchy and the republic, every attention was paid to the observances of this institution, which, however, gradually declined in reputation as knowledge became more general, afterwards was observed chiefly for form's sake, and, at last, wholly neglected.

Augūsta, æ, f. daughter of the Emperor Néro and Poppæa, was born in the year 63. The Emperor bestowed the same title on Poppæa. Augusta died before she had completed her fourth month. The adulation of the Romans, besides deification, decreed her a temple, a bed of state, a priest, and religious ceremonies (Tac. Ann. xv. 23).

Augūsta Taurinōrum, Augūstæ Taurinōrum, f. Turin, the capital of the Taurini, in the north of Italy, at the foot of the Alps. It stands at the junction of the Po and Doria, and is the capital of Piedmont (Tac. Hist. ii. 66).

Augūstāmnica, æ, f. a division of Egypt, of which the chief town was Pelūsium (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Augūstōdūnum, i, n. Autun, of which the ancient name was Bibractē, the capital of the Ædūi. From Augustus it took the name of Augūstōdūnum, of which Autun is a corruption (Tac. Ann. iii. 43). See Bibracte.

Augūstōnēmētum, i, n. Clermont, the capital of the Arverni q. v.

Augūstōphratēnsis, is, f. a name afterwards given to Commagēnē. It is also written Euphratēsia, and Augūsto Euphratēsia.

Augūstus, i, m. a name given to Octavius by the senate, on the motion of L. Mūnātius Plancus, in preference to that of Rōmūlus, which some had proposed, because it was both new, and of greater dignity. Suetonius is uncertain whether Augustus is derived from Auctus, acium gestus, or acium gustus (Oct. 7). See C. Octavius. Adj. Augūstus, a, um, et, Augūstālis, is, e, of Augūstus, imperial. Postes Augusti, the gates of Augustus (Ov. Met. i. 562). Augūstales sodales, priests consecrated to the Julian clan, by the Emperor Tiberius. Tacitus mentions this priesthood (Ann. i. 54. Suet. Claud. 6).

Avīdīēnus, i, m. surnamed Cānis, the dog, from his extreme avarice. He ate olives five years old, which were generally reckoned useless after two years. The rest of his food seems nearly of the same description, nor could any thing but the extremity of sordidness have induced the wealthy miser to swallow what was only fit for the dunghill (Hor. Sat. ii. 2. 55).

C. Avīēnus, C. Avīēni, m. a military tribune of the tenth legion, whom Cæsar broke at Thāpsus, on account of his rapine, and licentious behaviour in Italy, and filling one of the ships from Sicily with his own equipage and attendants (Cæs. B. Af. 54).

Avīōnes, um, m. a people of Germany, neighbours to the Angli and Rēudigni (Tac. Mor. Ger. 40). A late writer supposes they inhabited part of the duchy of Mecklenbourg, and that from them the Avæ has its name.

Aulēi, orum, m. See Arēbia.

Aulērci, orum, m. Of this name some reckon four nations of Gallia, France. Aulērci Brannōices, whose territories, Morienne, were adjoining to those of the Ædūi, Sēgūlāni, and Ambivariti. Aulērci Cēnōmāni, whose country, Mans, lay between the rivers Sārtæ, the Sarte, and Ledus, the Lez, two of the northern branches of the Loire. Sutudūnum, v. Sūddūnum, i, n. afterwards Cēnōmāni, on the Sarte, was their chief city. Aulērci Eburōnes (Cæs. B. G. vii. 75) inhabited the left bank of Sēquāna, the Seine, below Lūtētia, Paris. Their chief town was Mēdiolānum, afterwards Eburōvices, Everci. The Aulērci Diablintes, Diablitæ, et Diaditæ, lived between the two last mentioned nations. Neodūnum, afterwards Diablintes, Jublentis, was their largest town. Cæsar uses Diablintes simply without Aulērci, as he does also that appellation twice, most probably from the last three forming but one people, and from their being with more propriety denominated tribes than distinct nations (Cæs. B. G. iii. 34 seq.).

Aulēstes, is, m. a Tuscan king, who joined Æneas, and was killed by Mēssāpus (Virg. Æn. xii. 290).

Aulis, idos, voc. Auli, f. Megalo-Vathi, a small sea-port town of Bēōtia, on Eurypus, the Strait of Negropont, with a large harbour, at which the combined forces of Greece were detained from sailing against Troy, until Agamemnon appeased the wrath of Dīana, by the sacrifice of his daughter Iphigēnia (Ov. Met. xiii. 182). To this circumstance Lucānus alludes, ad iniquam clāssibus Aulin (Phar. v. 236). See Eubæa. Inh. Aulidēsens, ium, m. According to Pansānias they were all potters (ix. 19). Adj. Aulidensis, is, e.

Aulium, i, n. a cave on Pōntus Euxinus (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Aulius. See Emilius. Aulius, m. a prefect of the allies, who was killed with the consul M. Claudius Mārcellus q. v., in 210 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 26, 27).

Aulon, ōnis, f. a city of Lācōnia.—2. Another of Arcādia.—3. A third of Crēta, Candia.—4. Aclona, a seaport town of Epirus.

Aulon, ōnis, m. a hill in Cālābria, near Tārētum, Taranto, which Hōrātius has celebrated for its fertility in vines (Od. ii. 6. 18). Mārtilis has also mentioned the excellence both of its grapes, and of the wool yielded by sheep which pastured on this height (xiii. 125). It had a cognominal town, now Castel Velere, and the latter poet may either refer to it, or to the mountain.

Aulus, i, m. a man killed by Scæva (Luc. Phar. vi. 236).—2. A standard-bearer of Tuscan descent, who lost his life by the sting of a serpent (Luc. Phar. ix. 737).

Aunus, i, m. an inhabitant of Apenninus, the Appennines, whose son Cāmilla killed. Virgilius describes this Ligurian as deceitful and cunning, timid and cowardly. The son, whose name the poet does not mention, inherited his father's dispositions (Æn. xi. 700 seq.).

Auras, m. the Taban, one of the great rivers which flow from mount Hamus, and pour their waters into the Danube (Herod. iv. 49).

Aurēlla, æ, f. the wife of C. Jūlius Cæsar, and mother of the first Roman Emperor. We learn from Tācītus, that she formed the mind of her son in early life, and, from other authors, she appears to have been a woman of uncommon talents (Tac. Or. 28).—2. A dealer in fish. Some suppose her to have been a rich childless matron or widow, who received so many presents of excellent fish from expectants, that she was under the necessity of selling part to prevent their becoming useless. The former is the more probable idea (Juv. Sat. v. 98).

Aurēlia Orēstilla, Aurēlia Orēstilla, f. a woman in whom men of virtue saw nothing to praise except her beauty. L. Sērgius Cātīlina conceiving a violent attachment to this woman, offered her his hand in marriage, which she refused to accept, merely because he had a son of a former marriage, arrived at man's estate. To remove this objection, Cātīlina put his son to death, and, by that atrocious act, cleared his house for their impious nuptials. Sallustius mentions it as a fact generally believed, but Valērius Māximus (ix. 1) states expressly that he took off his son by poison, and lighted at his funeral pile his second nuptial torch, gratifying Orēstilla with his childlessness in place of a marriage gift. Cicero insinuates, that to accomplish the same purpose, he would have by similar means cleared the house of his former wife. It is easy to conjecture what sort of a woman Aurēlia Orēstilla must have been, who readily formed a union with such a monster as Cātīlina, and when their marriage was preceded by such enormity (Sal. Cat. 15). Ancient authors allege, she was his own daughter, by the wife of Cn. Aurēlius Orēstes, with whom he had an intrigue; and Cicero publicly declares, that by one criminal act he obtained both a mistress and a daughter.

Aurēlianus, i. m. the successor of Claudius II. in the Roman empire. History has neither transmitted the name of his parents, nor the country which gave him birth. In ancient authors, we find him a native of Stridum, of Pannōnia, of Dacia, and of Moesia. Aurēlius Victor informs us, that his father cultivated the lands belonging to a Roman senator called Aurēlius; and this statement agrees with his entering the army as a common soldier. He passed through all the gradations of rank, and, in the war against the Goths, he held the important office of commander-in-chief of the cavalry. In every station he displayed a degree of valour which astonished even the soldiers. From the rigid discipline which he maintained, and the ability with which he formed his plans, scarcely any enterprise failed of success. This soldier of fortune was adopted by Ulpius Crispinus, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and, with his immense wealth, raised Aurēlianus from poverty to affluence and grandeur. Quintillus, brother of Claudius II., having been declared emperor by the troops which he commanded at Aquileia, to prevent the inroads of the barbarians, and Aurēlianus having obtained the same honour from the legions under him in Illyricum, both prepared to support their nominations by the sword. Quintillus, deserted by his soldiers, opened his own veins, and his death left his rival in the peaceful possession of the empire. The ardent passion for war which Aurēlianus displayed from infancy, continued through life, and the Goths, Alani and Mārcomanni, Grōthungi, and Vāndāli, were compelled to sue for peace. On returning to Rome, he doomed to death several illustrious senators, merely on suspicion of their having excited sedition: nor did the public hatred fail to follow, as the just reward of his cruelty. He then began to rebuild the fortifications of Rome, and extend the limits of the city, of which the circumference, according to the historians of that period, measured about fifty miles; a work which his successor, Prōbus, completed. Zēnōbia q. v. having added several countries to her territories, Aurēlianus quitted Rome, defeated her in battle, and reduced the city Palmīra to the greatest distress; on which she fled, but was overtaken by a detachment of the horse, and brought back to the royal presence. She and her son, Vaballath, were permitted to live; but sentence of death was pronounced on her ministers and counsellors, whose crime consisted in faithful adherence to their sovereign. In that number was Lōnginus, whose writings have perpetuated his name. Not long after, Palmīra revolted, when it was given up to be plundered by the soldiers, and the inhabitants of both sexes and of every age were massacred. Firmus, who had usurped the government of Egypt, next added to the number of his victories; and, on returning to the west, he re-united France, Spain, and Britain to the empire, over which countries Tétricus had usurped dominion for six years. The modesty and simplicity which marked the beginning of his reign now disappeared, and, in a splendid triumph, he led Zēnōbia and her children, loaded with gold and diamonds, and Tétricus, who had voluntarily surrendered. In justice to Aurēlianus, it must be added, that he treated these personages with kindness and generosity. Many of his acts indicated his love both of justice and good order; yet his severity, which he carried to an unjustifiable length, gave birth to a conspiracy, by which he lost his life at Canōphrurium in Thrācia, in the year 275. Aurēlius Victor appears to have had a very unfavourable idea of his character; nor can it be denied that his reign is disgraced by many bloody and cruel actions. He assumed a number of surnames, from the countries which he had subdued; but rejected with scorn that of Cārpicus, decreed to him by the senate, for conquering the Cāрпи, a Thracian nation.

Aurēlius, a. um. Aurēlia via, led from Rome, through Tuscany and the maritime Alps, to Arēlatum, Arles (Eutrop. vii. 16).

Aurēlius Cōtta, Aurēlii Cōtta, m. grandson of the orator M. Valērius Mēssala Cōrvinus, to whom the Emperor Nēro granted an yearly pension, although his distress was the result of his own dissipation (Tac. Ann. xiii. 34).

Aurēlius Fūscus, Aurēlii Fūsci, m. a distinguished pleader, who was much addicted to intemperance, which produced the effect at which Juvēnalis sneers (Sat. xvi. 46).

Aurēlius Opillus, Aurēlii Opilli, m. the freedman of an Epicurean, was first a teacher of philosophy, afterwards of rhetoric, and at last of grammar, in the Roman sense of the term. On giving up his school he followed Rātīlius into banishment, and lived with him at Smyrna, in his advanced years. In his writings, which were numerous, he showed great erudition. He is frequently mentioned by Festus (Suet. II. Gram. 6).

C. Aurēlius, C. Aurēlii, m. a lieutenant-general under M. Claudius Mārcellus, in 218 B. C. He held a command at the battle of Nōla, in which Hannibal was defeated (Liv. xxiii. 16).—2. A prætor, to whose lot Sardinia fell, in 188 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 6, 8).

C. Aurēlius Cōtta, C. Aurēlii Cōttæ, m.

was elected prætor, and the jurisdiction of the city fell to his lot, in 204 B. C. Two years after, he obtained the consulship, and in that office had P. Sulpicius Galba for his colleague. Italy fell to his province, in the northern part of which the Gauls had taken up arms, but had been conquered by L. Furius Purpureo, prætor. The victory obtained by Furius did not prevent the consul from going to his province, where, Livius remarks, he obtained more spoil than honour (Liv. xxx. 26 seq.).—2. Held the office of consul with L. Octavius, in 77 B. C., and passed a law empowering the tribunes of the people to hold other offices, which L. Cornélius Sulla had rendered them incapable of obtaining. After his consulship he went to Gallia, France, appointed to him as his province, from which he never returned. A speech of his to calm the tumult of the enraged multitude, on the defeat of the Roman arms in Hispania, Spain, and Mæcedonia, is preserved among the fragments of Sallustius. He was esteemed one of the most celebrated orators of his age, and the misfortunes which befel the state under his consulship, called forth the utmost efforts of his eloquence to pacify the turbulent citizens of Rome (Sal. Frag. 3).

L. Aurélius, L. Aurélii, m. a city quæstor, in 198 B. C. A keen dispute respecting the liability of the augurs and pontiffs to contribute to the support of the state, was maintained for some time between the city quæstors and these two orders. In vain did the latter appeal to the tribunes of the people, who supported the quæstors, and both the pontiffs and augurs were compelled to pay their proportions (Liv. xxxiii. 42).

L. Aurélius Cotta, L. Aurélii Cotta, m. a military tribune, who, with Sextus Julius Cæsar, commanded the third legion, in 183 B. C. (Liv. xl. 27).—2. Accused of extortion by P. Cornélius Scipio Æmilianus Africanus Numantinus, and after the cause had been heard, and postponed seven different times, he was acquitted on the eighth hearing, lest his condemnation should have been attributed to the dignity of the prosecutor (Tac. Ann. iii. 66. Val. Max. viii. 1).—3. Youngest son of M. Aurélius Cotta, held the office of prætor (72 B. C.), and that of Censor four years after. He and L. Manilius Torquatus were consuls, 67 B. C. The right of judicature which C. Sempronius Gracchus had taken from the senate and bestowed on the knights, but afterwards by Sulla restored to the senate, was, through his interest, equally divided between these two bodies (Vel. Pat. ii. 32). L. Sergius Catilina, and P. Autronius Pæstus formed the resolution of murdering both these consuls in the capitol on the kalends of January. The design having transpired, the discovery saved the lives of the consuls, and obliged these traitors to defer their intended massacre to a future day (Sal. Cat. 18). To the proposal of a law for recalling Cicero from banishment he declared himself averse, because the Orator had been illegally convicted. A quinquagennary of this name stated that it was mentioned in the Sibylline books, that the Parthi could not be conquered but by a king, and, therefore, C. Julius Cæsar should be called Rex (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 79).

L. Aurélius Orestes, L. Aurélii Orëstis,

m. consul, quelled an insurrection in Sardinia (Liv. Ep. 60).

M. Aurélius, M. Aurélii, m. surnamed Antoninus Pius, was the adopted son of the Roman Emperor, T. Antoninus Pius, who gave him in marriage his daughter Faustina, by whom he had three sons, two of whom died young, and the third, L. Antoninus Commodus, succeeded him in the empire, besides several daughters, one of whom, Lucilla, became the wife of L. Annius Antoninus Vêrus, whose original name was Commodus. The title of Cæsar followed him, becoming the son-in-law of the emperor who raised him to the consulship. At his own request, and for his particular advantage, Antoninus sent for a celebrated Stoic philosopher from Chalcis in Syria, to whom he acknowledged great obligations. Elevations of rank did not divert the mind of the young nobleman from literary pursuits, which he continued to prosecute with unwearied application. Nine years after his adoption, he received the tribunical and proconsular powers from Antoninus, nor can it be denied that his virtues justified the honours as well as the confidence of the Emperor, with whom he lived in the closest intimacy during nearly twenty-three years, administering the sovereign power in common, without distrust, jealousy, or ambition. This perfect harmony necessarily resulted from the good dispositions and undeviating rectitude of both. On the death of Antoninus, Aurélius drew the character of that prince in a style creditable to the abilities of the writer, and to the virtues of the deceased. To the memory of Antoninus the senate erected a monument, which forms the principal ornament of modern Rome, and is still called the pillar of Antoninus. A remarkable instance of generosity, on the part of Aurélius, appeared in his requesting the senate to associate with him in the empire, Commodus, son of the late Emperor, on whom his father had bestowed no office or title which would justify him in assuming sovereign power, and, on that account, Aurélius had succeeded to the purple without opposition. They two were the first who had the title of Augustus, and they held the consulship together. In every good quality Aurélius greatly surpassed Commodus, whose mind was not naturally powerful, nor improved by education. The command of the army in the east, instead of reclaiming Commodus from effeminacy, opened a wider field for indulgence, which his troops did not fail to embrace, yet the armies commanded by his lieutenant-generals, conquered Armenia, Parthia, and Media; on which account the soldiers gave him the surnames of Armeniacus, Parthicus, and Medicus. Aurélius had given him, in marriage, his daughter Lucilla, whom Commodus met at Ephesus, returned with her to Rome, where he carried his vices to greater excess. The troops under Commodus carried with them, from the east, a plague which threatened desolation to the empire. Aurélius used every effort to alleviate the public calamity, but Commodus only wallowed in debauchery. Besides performing with minute fidelity all the duties of a senator, Aurélius adopted every mean to render that character honourable, passed a number of excellent laws for the administration of justion, ordered the names of every child, free-born in Rome, to be enrolled within thirty days from its birth, and similar registers to be kept in the provinces. This law, originally enacted by Servius Tullius, had gone into desuetude. The old law which restricted succession to the relations of the father, he abolished, and ordained that mothers should succeed to their children, and children to their mothers. To repel the Mærcōmāni, the two Emperors quitted Rome, in the year 167, proceeded to Aquilæa, whence Cōmōdus proposed to return to Rome, but died in Vēnētia, and Aurēlius ranked him among the gods, notwithstanding his notorious vices, which the Emperor both knew and regretted. After defeating the Iazyges, Aurēlius subdued the Mærcōmāni, on which he took the surname of Germānicus, brought under subjection the Quadi, overpowered, according to report, by a shower of fire from heaven, which Claudianus (xxviii. 330) ascribes to the virtues of Aurēlius, but Eusebius, to the prayers of the Christians. The whole German nations in succession submitted, and, in this war, Pōmpēianus, the husband of Lucilla, the widow of Cōmōdus, acquired great fame. A rebellion, headed by Avidius Cilius, was soon crushed, and the Emperor set out for the east, carrying with him his wife, Faustina, whose enormous lewdness he adopted no plan to restrain, and after her death paid divine honours to her memory, a monstrous absurdity which the senate sanctioned. From that period he continued to live with a concubine, a practice tolerated by Roman law, but repugnant to the purity of moral principle. Returning from the east, after he had adjusted matters to his will, he associated with him his son Cōmōdus, a measure which had no precedent, and which the notorious vices of that youth should have prevented. The restless spirit of the Mærcōmāni rendered it necessary to place himself at the head of the army; and he expired at Vindobonæ, Vienna, in the year 180, in the fifty-ninth of his age, and twentieth of his reign, not however before he had gained great victories in Pannonia, Mœsia, and Dacia. The wickedness of Cōmōdus, who accompanied him in this expedition, gave rise to suspicions respecting the nature of his death which authentic history does not confirm. In the science of morals, he had no equal in that age, nor can it be doubted that he was one of the greatest men and one of the best princes whom Rome ever saw.

M. Aurēlius Antōninus Bāsiliānus, M. Aurēlii Antōnini Bāsiliāni, m. whose original name was Bāsiliānus, from his maternal grandfather, Bāsiliānus, priest of the sun in Phœnicia; instead of which, his father, the emperor Sēvērus, substituted the respected names of M. Aurēlius Antōninus; and, from an attachment to a robe worn by the Gauls, called Cārācālla, he received that name by which he is generally known in history. He succeeded his father, who died at York on the 4th of February, in the year 211; and his reign exhibited many acts of dreadful ferocity, of which he gave very early indications. Soon after his marriage with Plautilla, daughter of Plautinus, the prætorian præfect, his brother Gēta obtained the title of Augustus, and their mutual hatred, in which they had indulged from their early years, assumed a more dreadful appearance, and threatened immediate destruction. Cārācālla attempted the murder of his brother, which the resolute conduct of Sēvērus frustrated; and he then resolved to destroy his father with his own hand. On a march, the unnatural son drew his sword, with the intention of giving to his father a mortal stab; but the cry of those who had observed his design, disconcerted the parricide, and in a few days the emperor died of the gout. Sēvērus knew that the election to the empire was vested, not in the senate, but in the army, and therefore kept his two sons always with him in the camp. By his will he had appointed them joint-sovereigns, nor could Cārācālla prevail on the soldiery to proclaim him sole emperor. Not long after their return to Rome, he caused his brother to be assassinated in the arms of his mother, to whom he had fled for protection. This crime appears to have tormented him during life, since, at Pērgāmus, Pergamo, he employed the assistance of Æsculāpius to relieve him from frightful visions which harassed his mind. He often thought that his father and brother pursued him with naked swords in their hands. From the soldiers, with whom his brother was a greater favourite, on account of his comparative mildness of disposition and courteousness of behaviour, Cārācālla procured forgiveness by immense bribery. Now without restraint, he deluged Rome with the blood of her citizens. By his orders, his wife and her brother, Plautus, had been murdered, after they had been sent into exile. To relate every instance of his cruelty would occupy much space, and could only shock the reader by the ferocity and perfidy with which they were attended. The largesses, obtained by rapine and extortion, secured him the favour of the army, for by every other class of citizens he was hated and detested. Conscious of public abhorrence, he employed spies in all places, a practice which tended to vitiate the morals of both sexes, even in the higher ranks of life. Meanness and vice frequently unite; hence Cārācālla employed the lowest and vilest of men in every office connected either with his person or government. His debaucheries too excited disgust, and added contempt to hatred. Consistency seldom appears in characters of remarkable profligacy; hence this monster of vice and licentiousness, whilst he corrupted public morals by his example, punished adultery with death, and pretended great zeal for religion. Deceit not only marked his conduct, but the coin of his reign; copper passed for gold, and gilded lead for silver. One of the most remarkable acts of his government was conferring the privileges of Roman citizens on all inhabitants of the empire. His military expeditions scarcely deserve notice; in Gaul and Germany he purchased peace from the natives, and in the east gained no victory of any note. For the bitter sarcasms and pointed railery of the Alexandrians, he nearly exterminated them. Against the king of Parthia he led an army, because that monarch had refused him his daughter in marriage; and, on quitting the country after some inconsiderable actions, he took the title of Parthicus. Mēcrinus, one of his prætorian præfects, who dreaded his displeasure, conspired against him, and, by means of Mārtialis, a centurion, accomplished his death at Edessa, Orfah, in the year 217, in the thirtieth year of his age, and seventh of his reign. For ridding the world of this second Cālīgūla, Mācrinus received the purple (Eutrop. viii. 20).

M. Aurēlius Antonīnus Bāsslānus, M. Aurēlii Antonīni Bāsslāni, m. of whom Bāsslānus was the original name, from his great grandfather (see former article), was the son of Jūlia Sōemīs, v. Sōēmēa, wife of Varius Mārcellus, by the Roman Emperor Cārācālla, according to the report industriously spread by Mēsa, his maternal grandmother, whose activity and address, added to bribery, and every other means which ambition could devise, obtained the purple for him, at the age of fourteen. His attachment to the worship of the sun, called Hēliōgābālus at Emēsa, procured him that name, by which he is best known. No stronger instance can be given of the dangers and miseries resulting from a military government, than the election to the sovereignty of the greatest empire that mankind ever obeyed, of this boy, by birth a Syrian, and unallied to any Roman family, whose only recommendation was his being the reputed son of one of the worst emperors that ever filled the throne. The vices which have consigned his name to infamy, appeared in very early life, and the imperial power enabled him to indulge them without restraint. By the dexterous conduct of Mēsa, who was the sister of the Empress Jūlia, the troops sent against him by Mācrinus, deserted and joined Hēliōgābālus. This infamous woman openly avowed the infidelity of her daughter Sōemīs, and her criminality with Cārācālla. The soldiers pretended to discover the features of the late Emperor in the countenance of this youth; and, disliking Mācrinus, crowded to his standard, and gained a victory over his opponent, who was taken by the pursuers and killed. Without consulting the senate, Hēliōgābālus assumed all the titles of imperial power. Among numerous instances of cruelty, may be mentioned, his murdering, with his own hand, his tutor Gānnys, who laid the plan for his obtaining the dignity of Emperor, and by his uncommon talents, though without military experience, gained the victory which secured the crown to his pupil. In lewdness, cruelty, and vice, as well as in meanness and buffoonery, he at least equalled the most flagitious of his predecessors. His detestable conduct excited against him the indignation of all ranks. Having failed in an attempt to destroy the morals of his cousin Alēxānus, he wished to deprive him of life, even although he had adopted him as his son. A violent hatred of Alēxānus sprung up in the mind of the Emperor, who would have instantly caused his death, but for the remonstrances of his mother and grandmother, which they enforced by assuring him, that the displeasure of the soldiery would be the result of the murder of his adopted son. It appears that the army suspected his intention, for they insisted one day on seeing Alēxānus, and, showing a decided partiality for him, enraged Hēliōgābālus, who ordered some of them to be apprehended. A riot ensued, and he fell in the year 217, a sacrifice to the fury of the troops, in the eighteenth year of his age, and third of his reign (Eutrop. viii. 22).

M. Aurēlius Cōtta, M. Aurēlii Cōtta, m.

a plebeian edile who, with his colleague, M. Claudius Mārcellus, celebrated the plebeian games, which were thrice repeated, in 218 B. C. After commanding at Pūtēoli, and being appointed a decemvir of sacred rites, he was one of three ambassadors sent to Philippos, king of Mācedōnia, to remonstrate against his ravaging the lauds of the Roman allies. When the other two quitted that country, Aurēlius remained, levied troops, and protected the cities in alliance with Rome, a measure which had the approbation of the senate. He died in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 30 seq.).—2. A noble Roman, whom L. Cōrnēlius Scīpio sent with the ambassadors from king Antiochus, and king Euraēnes, and deputies from the Rhodians, from Asia to Rome, after his victory over Antiochus. Aurēlius, first in the senate, and, afterwards by order of the senate, in an assembly of the people, gave an account of the military operations in Asia, on which a decree was passed, ordaining a supplication of three days' continuance, during which forty greater victims should be sacrificed, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 52).—3. A noble Roman, consul with L. Licinius Lūcūllus, in 76 B. C., whom Mithridātes, king of Pōntus, boasted, in a letter to Arsāces, that he had conquered at Chalcēdon, Kadi-keui (Sal. Frag. 4. Liv. Ep. 93).—4. Was consul in the year 20; when he and his colleague, M. Valērius Mēssāla, went out at the head of the senate to meet Agrippina on her return from the east with the ashes of her husband Gērmānicus (Tac. Ann. iii. 2—17). To him Jāvēnūllus has been supposed to allude in Sat. v. 100. Others think Cōtta there mentioned was M. Aurēlius Cōtta, who held the consulship with L. Licinius Lūcūllus, in 76 B. C.

M. Aurēlius Piauvōnius Victōrinus, M. Aurēlii Piauvōnii Victōrini, m. held the principal authority under Pōsthūmus in Gāllia, and, after the soldiers had killed Pōsthūmus and his son, attacked, defeated, and killed Ulpus Cōrnēlius Lēliānus, whom the army had proclaimed Emperor, and he had assumed that title. Pōsthūmus himself, as well as Lēliānus and Victōrinus, were usurpers during the reign of Gāllienus. No man was more fitted than Victōrinus for the supreme authority of Gāllia at that period, and settling the commotions by which it was agitated. Trājanus did not excel him in military skill, or Antonīnus in clemency, Nerva in commanding respect, or Sēvērus in military discipline; but his unrestrained debauchery provoked the merited hatred of the troops, and an inferior officer, Eutrōpius says a clerk, formed a conspiracy against him, which was executed at Cōlōnia Agrippina, Cologne. The wound did not produce immediate death, and, by the advice of his mother Victōria, or Victōrina, he named his son Caesar. This title appears to have incensed the soldiers, who murdered him immediately after the death of his father, and inscribed their tombstone with this short epitaph: "Here lie the two Victōrini, who were usurpers" (Eutrop. ix. 9).

M. Aurēlius Prōbus. See Prōbus.

M. Aurēlius Scaurus, M. Aurēlii Scauri, m. a lieutenant-general, whose army the Cimbri routed, and made himself prisoner, in 107 B. C. Bōjōrix, their king, put Aurēlius to death, because, on purpose to dissuade them from crossing the Alps into Italy, he, in council, assured them, that the Romans could not be conquered (Liv. Ep. 67). Tā hīn Tacitus alludes, and writes his name Senius Aurelius (Mor. Ger. 37).

P. Aurelius Pēcūtiola, P. Aurelii Pēcūtiolus, ae, a Roman officer, whom his own relation, C. Aurelius Cotta, caused to be beaten with rods, and afterwards to do the duty of a common soldier among the foot, because by his fault the rampart had been burned at Lāpāra, and the camp almost taken (Val. Max. ii. 7).

Sextus Aurelius Prōpērtius, Sexti Aurelii Prōpērtii, ae, was a native of Umbria, a district of Itālia, Italy, and seems to have been born in 58 B. C. Nine towns contended for the honour of giving birth to this celebrated elegiac poet. His father, who was of the same name, possessed considerable wealth, but taking part with L. Antōnius, he lost his life, by order of Augustus, who seized his property, and reduced his children to great distress. Soon after that calamity, Prōpērtius, when very young, only about seventeen years of age, went to Rome, where his poetic talents soon obtained distinguished notice, and procured for him the friendship of Mecēnas, and of all the eminent poets, who frequented the house, and enjoyed the patronage of that celebrated Roman. It has been inferred from Horātius never mentioning his name, that they had no attachment to each other. An ancient writer has expressly stated, that both were actuated by mutual envy; and that Horātius calls Prōpērtius, sinius, probably from his imitating Cāllimāchus, and Philētās. He died about the age of forty. Few particulars of his life have been transmitted, consequently his character must be sought for in his works. He wrote four books of elegies, which merit higher praise for purity of language than purity of sentiment. His lines possess not the easy versification of Tibullus, or the sweetness of Ovidius. His poems show a mind familiar with the writings of the Greeks, and contain a store of mythological fiction. For a reason above-mentioned, the compositions of Prōpērtius are never put into the hands of youth, and, on this account, are less read and less known than they would otherwise have been. Quintilianus mentions that some preferred Prōpērtius to Tibullus (x. l. 30). His pentameters sometimes end in words of more than two syllables, a fault which should be avoided by the young scholar. Lucius Prōpērtius (Mart. viii. 73).

Sextus Aurelius Victor, Sexti Aurelii Victoris, ae, a Roman historian, who flourished in the reigns of the Emperors Constantius and Jullianus. He is said to have been born in Africa, and to have retained the religion of his ancestors, although Christianity, before that period, had spread over the whole of the Roman empire. The writings now generally attributed to this author are, a short history of the origin of the Roman people, from Jānus and Stāturnus, till the tenth consulship of Constantinus, compiled from different authors. Here the reader will find much that is new, at least not recorded by the historians whose works have come down to modern times, and not a little in direct opposition to Lānius and others. 2. The lives of illustrious Romans, of which the first is that of Prōcas, king of Alba Longa, and the last that of Cn. Pōmpēius Magnus. To these are added a few characters, taken from MSS., not previously published, beginning with Jullus Caesar, and ending with Clēopātra. His third book contains the lives of the Cesars, from Augustus to the tenth consulship of Constantius, and the third of Jullianus. His last is an Epitōmē of the lives and manners of the Roman Emperors, again beginning with Augustus, and carried down to the Emperor Theōdōsius the Great. This last part has been attributed to a writer of a later age than Aurelius, with what propriety critical readers may judge. It adds little to the value of his works, as it contains few ideas which do not occur in the preceding parts, particularly De Casāribus, and most commonly expressed in the very same language. Objections have been made to the purity of his style, in some instances it must be acknowledged justly, yet, from the shortness of the lives, perspicuity of his sentences, and agreeableness of narrative, his writings can scarcely fail to be very amusing to young readers. A good edition of this author is a desideratum in Roman literature. The Delphin edition is miserably poor, and that of Arutzenius, although greatly superior in the text, still requires the hand of a master.

Aurēum vellus. See Vellus.

Aurēus, i, m. Matheegh, a mountain in Moesia, which the Emperor Prōbus planted with vines (Aur. Vic. Ep. 37).

Aurinia, ae, f. a German woman, held in great veneration by her countrymen on account of her supposed inspiration (Tac. Mor. Ger. 8).

Aurinā, ae, f. afterwards Sātūrnia q. v. Inh. Aurinūi, orum, m. (Plin. i. 322).

Aurinx, ingis, v. Auringis, is, f. a city of Hispania Batica, to which the Carthaginians fled after the battle of Mūnda, and were again defeated, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 42).

Aurōra, ae, f. the goddess of the morning, daughter of Hypēriōn and Thēa, and sister of the sun and moon. She married Astræus, by whom she had the winds and the stars. Hence, in allusion to the winds, Ovidius says, tanta est discordia fratrum (Met. i. 60). From their father, the same poet calls them Astræi fratres (Met. xiv. 545). Hōmērus mentions the marriage of Aurōra with Orion (Od. v. 121). Ovidius and others make her the daughter of Pallas, from whom she is called Pallantias. By some of the ancient poets, Aurōra is represented drawn in a rosy-coloured chariot by two horses, which Hōmērus calls Lāmpus and Phāēthōn, opening the gates of the east, and sending down dew upon the earth; but others represent her very differently. She always appears before the sun as his forerunner; Fracta luctu tendens Phæbo Pallantias inficit orbem (Ov. Met. xv. 190). Mēmnonis in rosæis lūta mater equis, the yellow or tawny mother of Memnon in her rosy-coloured horses, i. e. in her rosy-coloured chariot drawn by white horses (Ov. Fast. iv. 714). Aurōra is often put for the morning, and also for the east.

Aurūca, ae, f. Suessa, Sessa, or, Setto, a town of Cāmpānia, on Liris, the Gargilano. Magnus alumnus Aurunca, the great foster-child, or pupil, of Aurunca, i. e. Lucilius q. v., who was a native of Aurūca, Suessa (Juv. Sat. i. 20). Inh. Aurūci, orum (Sing. Aurūceus, i), also Suessāni, orum, m. made war on the Romans, by whom, although they surrendered, their nobles were put to death, and the colony sold for slaves. They afterwards, at different times, attempted war without success, and having fled from the Sidicini they fortified Suessa, thence called Aurunca. They lived on both sides of Liris, the Garigliano, and from their name seldom occurring in Roman history, it may be inferred that they were less warlike and enterprising than some of their neighbours (Liv. ii. 17). A. Gellius makes the Aurunci, Sicani and Pēlāgi, the first inhabitants of Italy (i. 10). Adj. Auruncus, a, um. Auruncus Actor (Juv. Sat. ii. 100). Aurunca cūssis (Sil. Ital. iv. 516).

C. Aurunculeius, C. Aurunculei, m. was praetor in Sardinia in 211 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 6, 7).—2. A tribune of the soldiers in the third legion, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 41).

L. Aurunculeius, L. Aurunculei, m. elected city praetor in 192 B. C. Next year his name occurs among the ten commissioners appointed to settle the affairs in Asia (Liv. xxxvii. 2 seq.).

L. Aurunculeius Cotta, L. Aurunculei Cotta, m. a lieutenant-general of Caesar, who suspected the stratagem of Ambiorix, and, therefore, endeavoured to convince his colleague, Q. Titurius Sabinus q. v. of the impropriety of following the treacherous advice of that crafty Gaul; but without effect. Unwilling that any enmity, from difference of opinion, should exist between them, he, at last, yielded; and his compliance cost him his life. Ambiorix, at the distance of two miles from the camp, lay in ambuscade; and, when crossing a large valley, made a furious attack on the Roman forces, in which Aurunculeius, after displaying singular bravery, was killed, together with almost the whole of the troops. To him Lūcānus alludes (Phar. i. 429) and Flōrus (iii. 10).

Auschise, arum, m. an African nation, on the west of the Ashyā, extending from above Barca to the neighbourhood of the Hesperides on the seacoast (Herod. iv. 171).

Ausci, orum, m. a people of Aquitania, in Gallia, France. Their capital was Climberris, v. Climberrum, Augusta, and, at a later period, Ausci, Auch, which stood on the west bank of the Ger, one of the southern branches of Gārūnna, the Garonne (Cæs. B. G. iii. 27).

Ausēses, ium, m. a people of Africa, bordering on the west of the lake and river Tritonis, and had the Machlyes on the opposite side (Herod. iv. 180).

Ausētāni, orum, m. a maritime people who inhabited the N. E. part of Spain. Their territories lay between the rivers Rubricatus, the Llobregat, and Sāmbroca, the Fer. The Pyrenees were their northern boundary, and their principal city was Gērūnda, Gerona (Cæs. B. C. i. 60). Adj. Ausētānus, a, um. Ausētānus ager (Liv. xxxix. 56).

Ausōna, v. f. a town of Lātium, near Lācus Fūdānus, the Lake of Fondi, betrayed to the Romans by the citizens, on which the inhabitants, without any proof of guilt, were extirpated in 314 B. C. (Liv. ix. 25). The site of this town is now unknown. Inh. Ausōnes, um, et, Ausōnidae, arum, m. (Virg. Æn. x. 564) first settled in Lucania and Bruttius ager, and, having been dispossessed by the (Enōtri, they took possession of the banks of Viltūrnus, the Volturno, and Liris, the Garigliano. The Romans conquered them and the Sidicini in a single battle, in 335 B. C. At that time they inhabited the city Cāles, Calvi (Liv. viii. 16). Their cities Ausōna, Mintūrnæ, and Vēscia, were afterwards betrayed into the hands of the Romans by some of the young men of the principal families. The soldiers, some in disguise, and others, who had been concealed in ambuscade near the walls, entered when the commanders were not present, and utterly destroyed the Ausōnes, without any proof of their having actually revolted. Ausōnia, v. f. an ancient name of Italy, from the Ausōnes (Virg. Æn. iii. 477). Ausōnis, idis, f. Italy, also, Ausonian, or Italian, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine (Ov. Fast. ii. 94). Adj. Ausōnius, a, um, of Ausōnia, Italian. Ausōnium mārē, the sea between Sicilia, Sicily, and Sallentinus ager, in Calābria, according to Pōlyblus (Plin. i. 336). Ad Ausōnas urbes, to the cities of Italy (Hor. Od. iv. 4. 56).

Auster, tri, m. the south wind, the same with Nōtus. Adj. Austrālis, is, v. et, Austrinus, a, um. Austrinus calor (Virg. G. ii. 271.)

Austoriāni, v. Austuriāni, orum, m. a people of Aquitania (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 4).

Authōcus, i, m. a son of Apollo and Cŷrēnē (Just. xiii. 7).

Autochthōnes, um, m. the name given by the Greeks to the original inhabitants of a country, corresponding to Abōrīgines or Indigēne. In some instances it is manifest the Latins understood, by the latter term, natives of the soil; probably the Greeks might annex the same idea to Autochthōnes. In ancient authors we find some were of opinion that the first men were formed by the heat of the sun acting on the earth newly created, and retaining part of its original moisture (Paus. ii. 15 seq.).

Autōlōles, um (seldom Autōlōlæ, arum), m. a Getulian nation, represented by Pīnius as addicted to rapine. He calls them Autōlōlum gens (i. 523). Both Pīnius and Sōlinus describe them as inhabiting the banks of Sāla, the Salé, on which was a cognominal town. Some make Salé the modern name of the town, and Buzagzag the name of the river. Silius Itālicus describes them as remarkably swift (iii. 306).

Autōlōycus, i, m. son of Mērcūrius and Chlōnē, to whom his father imparted the art of stealing with great dexterity, and, to prevent detection, bestowed on him the power of making whatever he had stolen assume any form or colour which he chose; but Sisŷphus, who was also celebrated for dishonesty, detected the thief by marking the hoofs of his cattle, which had escaped the notice of Autōlōycus, and therefore he had allowed them to retain their natural appearance. Anticlēa, daughter of Autōlōycus, became pregnant to Sisŷphus, and was afterwards the wife of Lāērtēs; hence Ulysses suffered the reproach of being accounted by some the son of that notorious thief. He was one of the Argonauts (Apol. i. 9). Valērius Flāccus makes him a companion of Hērclēs (v. 115). Appianus says, that he was driven by a storm to Sīnōpē, Sinub, where he became king, and, after his death, had an oracle there (Bel. Mith. 227). Picāta mānus Autōlōyci, the pithy hand of Autōlōycus (Mart. viii. 59). This phrase is nearly the same with the Scottish expression lurey-fingered, i. e. dishonest.—2. The husband of Mētra, v. Mētra, daughter of Erīśichthian, whom some suppose to be the Autōlēus above-mentioned, and attempt to reconcile the statement of Ovidius with that of other writers by whom he is mentioned, by supposing that Autōlēus was twice married (Ov. Met. viii. 738).

Autōmēdon, ōtis, m. son of Diōrēus, was the armour-bearer and charioteer of Achilles (Virg. Æn. ii. 477). Jūvēnālīs uses Autōmēdon to denote any charioteer (Sat. i. 61).

Autōnōf, ōs, f. a daughter of Cādms and Hērāklōnē, who married Arīstaeus, by whom she had Actaeon. Adj. Autōnōfēus, a, um. Autōnōfēus Heros (Ov. Met. iii. 198).

Autophrādētēs, is, m. a satrap, or, governor, of Lydia (Cor. Nep. Dat. 2).

Autosidōrum, i, n. (Autisiodūrum, D'Anv.) Auterre, a town of Gallia, France, belonging to the Sēdōnēs (Amm. Mar. xvi. 2).

Autrigōnēs, um, m. a people in the south of Spain (Flor. iv. 12. Pom. Mel. iii. 25).

P. Autroniūs Pētus, P. Autroniū Pētī, m. a Roman of senatorial dignity, who was appointed consul elect. Suspected of bribery during his canvass, he was brought to trial, found guilty, degraded from the rank of a senator, and declared incapable of holding any office under government in future. This disgrace, perhaps, led him to associate with such men as Catīlinā, whom he joined in his traitorous measures against the state. After the defeat of that party by the activity of M. Tūllius Cicēro, whose schoolfellow he had been in youth and colleague in the questorship, he effected his escape, and the Orator, during his banishment, dreaded the revenge of Autroniūs and his associates. He had a readiness of utterance, which fitted him for taking part in the conspiracy. Besides, the agreeableness of his voice charmed the ear of his hearers, and diverted their attention from the weakness of his arguments, and the incorrectness of his statements (Sal. Cat. 17).

Auxima, ōs, f. a town of Spain (Flor. iii. 22).

Auximon, v. Auximum, i, n. Osimo, or, Osimo, a town of the Picēni, near Mārē Sūpērūm, the Gulf of Venice, to the south of Anōnā (Ces. B. C. i. 15). Iuh. Auximātes, um (Sing. Auximas, ātis), m. (Plin. i. 362).

Auxēa, ōs, f. Burg Hamza, a fort of Maurītāniā (Tac. Ann. iv. 25).

Axēnus, i, m. an ancient name of Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea. It signifies inhospitable, and the cruelty of some of the nations who inhabited its coast rendered it a very proper appellation (Ov. Trist. iv. 4. 56). See Euxinus.

Axis, is, m. an axis. In geography, Axis is an imaginary straight line passing through the centre of the earth, about which it performs its diurnal revolution. In astronomy, axis is the line around which the whole sphere seems to revolve. To the latter Ovidius alludes (Met. i. 255). The poets use this term to denote the whole heavens, as, sub axe Æthēris, under the expanse of the sky. When employed to signify the extremity of the axis, or the Pole, it means the Northern, as, Sub axe, under the North Pole.

Axiūs, i, m. the Vardari, or, Vardan, a river of Mācēdōniā, which rises in Mount Scārdus, Tchar, a western branch of Hæmus, Balkan, pursues a southeast course of about two hundred miles, and falls into the Gulf of Salonica (Liv. xxxix. 53). Hērōdōtus makes it the boundary between Mýgdōniā and Bōttinīs (vii. 123).—2. The Aszzy, a branch of the Orontes q. v.

Q. Axius, Q. Axī, m. a Roman senator, who corresponded with Cicēro during his banishment. In the writings of the Orator he is also called a usurer: perhaps the senator and usurer were different persons (Att. iii. 15 seq. Suet. Jul. Cæs. 9).

Axōna, ōs, m. the Ainc, or, Aisne, a river of Gallia, which Ausōniūs calls Præceps, from its rapidity (Cecxxxiv. 461). Its source was in the territories of the Rēmi, which form the department of the Meuse. It runs in a southwest direction, joins Isāra, the Iere, a little below Campaigne, and both fall into Sēquāna, the Seine, about five miles south of Pointoise (Cæs. B. G. ii. 5).

Axýlos, i, f. a district of Gállōgræciā, which had its name from being woodless, destitute even of brambles and any kind of firewood. The inhabitants burned cow's dung for fuel (Liv. xxxviii. 18).

Azan, ānis, m. a son of Arcas and Erāto, and brother of Aphidas and Ellātus. Azāniā, ōs, f. the part of Arcādīā which fell to the share of Azan (Paus. viii. 4). Iuh. Azānēs, um, m. Strābo considers the Azānēs, Parhāsīi, and other Arcadian tribes, to have been the most ancient of the Greeks (562).

Azan, ānis, m. a mountain of Arcādīā, where Cēphēlē was worshipped with great noise, to which Stātiūs alludes, Idais ululātibus amūlus Azan (Th. iv. 292).

Azēlus, i, m. a king of Dāmāscus (Just. xxxvi. 2).

Azmōrna, ōs, f. an inland city of Hýrcāniā, of which nothing is known (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Azōrus, i, f. Derenitsi, a city of Thēssālīā, built by Azōrus, one of the Argonauts, which surrendered to Pērsēus, in 173 B. C. Azōrus, Dōliche, and Pythium, gave name to the district Tripōlis (Liv. xlii. 53).

Azōtus, i, f. Asdood, a city of Sýriā, which sustained a siege of twenty-nine years by Psāmmētichus (Herod. ii. 157).

B

Bābilus, i, m. an astrologer, who recommended to the Emperor Nēro a measure of the greatest cruelty, which that monster readily adopted (Suet. Ner. 36).

Bābilon. See Bābylōniā.

Bābylōniā, ōs, f. called also Chaldēa, a large province of Assýriā, of which Bābylon, ōnis, f. was the capital. According to Ovid, Sēmīrāmis founded this city, but others are of opinion, that Bēlus planned and built part of it. Nebuchadnezzar, whose name occurs frequently in Holy Writ, put the last hand to this celebrated city, which was never wholly completed. He encompassed it with brick walls; but respecting both their height and thickness, historians are not exactly agreed. Pliny makes them 60,000 paces in circumference, 200 feet high, and 50 feet thick, each foot three inches more than a Roman foot; and Herodotus states that their length was 480 stadia, their height 200 royal cubits, and their breadth or thickness 50 royal cubits. They formed a square, of which each side was about 15 miles long, and contained 25 gates, all of solid brass. The hanging gardens, esteemed one of the wonders of the world, were the work of the same monarch. The palace and temple of Belus were probably built during the reign of different princes. The canals which conducted the waters of the Euphrates, when the river rose to a certain height, into the Tigris, before they reached the town, and the artificial lake, 35 feet in depth, and 160 miles in circumference, or 40 miles square, were said by some to have been dug by Sémiramis, while others maintain that they were the work of Nebuchadnezzar. Cyrus, by means of canals, gave the current of that branch of the river which divided the city into two parts nearly equal, a new direction, and thus dried its ancient channel, through which he marched his soldiers during the night into the city, and took it, 538 B. C. Bābylon has been long in ruins. Pērsēa Bābylon (Luc. Phar. vi. 449). Longa Bābylon (Mart. ix. 77). Inh. Bābylonii, orum (Sing. Bābylonius, i, m. (Strab. 1056. Just. i. 7). Adj. Bābylonius, Bābyloniacus, Bābylonicus, a, um, et, Bābylonēnsis, is, e, of Bābylon, Babylonian; also astrological, from the Babylonians being greatly addicted to astrology. Bābylonī nūmērī, astrological calculations (Hor. Od. i. 11. 2). Bābylonica texta, embroidery (Mart. viii. 28). Bābylonica Chaldaeorum doctrina (Lucr. v. 726). Bābylonica unda, the waters of the Euphrates (Manil. iv. 578).

Bacabāsus, i, m. a nobleman whom Artābanus invited as a participant in his plans, after he had killed Darius. Satisfied with his present situation, and probably detesting the criminality of Artābanus, Bacabāsus betrayed the matter to Artāxerxes, who instantly formed a plan for the preservation of his own life, and the death of the regicide, which was soon executed, about 473 B. C. (Just. iii. 1).

Bacāsīs, idis, m. appointed governor of Mēdia by Mithridātes, king of Pārthia, in 163 B. C. (Just. xli. 6).

Bāccāra, æ, m. a man ridiculed by Mārtiālis for his vanity, displayed in the variety of his winter-dresses (vi. 59).

Bāccāra, æ, m. a man held up to ridicule by Mārtiālis for breach of promise (vii. 91). He is probably the person mentioned by the poet, xi. 75. Some editions read Bāccāra, in both the instances above-mentioned.

Bāccāliādæ, arum, m. a people of Corinth, who had their name from Bacchis, son of Prumnis (Paus. ii. 4). Being expelled from that city, they went to Sicily, possessed themselves of part of the island, and, according to Ovidius, founded Syracūsæ, Saragossa. But Thucydides says that a Corinthian colony under Archias built that city. The Bāccāliādæ, though strictly speaking but one family or tribe, yet, in consequence of their number, wealth, and dignity, and their having held the government of the city for two hundred years, Ovidius, perhaps, used their name as a general appellation for the natives of Corinth (Met. v. 407). Bāccēis, idis, f. an ancient name of Corinthus, Corinth; also of Corinth, applied to females or nouns feminine. Bāccēis Ephyrē (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 34).

Bāccilius, i, m. a famous gladiator, whom Hōrātius ranks as the equal of Bithus (Sat. i. 7. 20).

*Bāccus, i, m. the god of wine, was the son of Jūpiter and Sēmēlē. During her pregnancy, Sēmēlē was, by an artifice of Jūno, burned to ashes, and Bāccus was, with difficulty, saved from the flames. After the death of his mother, he was put into his father's thigh, where he remained until the time at which he should have been born; hence he was called Bimāter, Ignigēna, Sātus itērum, &c. Tācītus hints that love of glory enrolled him amongst the gods, which proves that he considered him a man, not of divine origin (Ann. iv. 38). In different countries, he had different names. We find him called Liber in Bœotia, Osiris in Egypt, Phanaces in Mysia, Dionysos in India, Bāccus in Italy, Adōnēus in Arabia, &c. He was nursed by his aunt Ino, on which account he received the appellation of her Alumnus (Ov. Met. iv. 421). The traditions respecting his education are various and contradictory, probably from there being more than one of that name. He is represented as an effeminate young man, with fine hair flowing loosely over his shoulders, crowned with vine or ivy leaves, and holding a Thyrsus in his hand. Sometimes he appears naked in the arms of Silēnus, or riding on the back of Pan. He is, at other times, drawn in a chariot by tigers, lions, or lynxes. To him the parrot and magpie, among birds, were sacred; and, among trees, the fir, the yew, the fig-tree, the vine, and the ivy. Bāccus had a number of names, of which fourteen are mentioned by Ovidius (Met. iv. 11—17). Nōvus (Ov. Met. iii. 520) is ambiguous, and may signify either a new god, or newly arrived in Greece, or a new Bāccus, there being older of that name than he. Bāccānālīa, ium (v. orum, Sal. Frag. 3), &c. the rites of Bacchus, of which Livius has given a most horrible description. To consider nothing unlawful, was the grand maxim of the religion of the Bacchanals. Hence nothing wicked, nothing flagitious, which they did not practice. The senate, by a decree, abolished these infamous rites and punished the initiated, in 188 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 8—18). Bāccā, æ, f. a female worshipper of Bāccus. The votaries of this god, with dishevelled hair and blazing torches, ran to Tiber, the Tevere, and, after dipping their torches in the water, drew them out again unextinguished, because they were composed of native sulphur and charcoal (Liv. xxxix. 13). Vivunt Bāccānālīa, i. e. Bāccicē, e, modo Bāccānālīum (Juv. Sat. ii. 3). Adj. Bāccāus, Bāccēus, Bāccius, Bāccilius, v. Bāccicus, a, um, et, Bāccānālīs, is, e. Bāccāus cultor, a priest of Bāccus (Stat. Th. vii. 603). Bāccēla sacra (Ov. Met. iii. 691). Bāccēus ululātus (Ov. Met. xi. 17). Bāccēla sacra (Ov. Met. iii. 518). Bāccēla buxus, a Bacchanal's pipe, made of the boxwood tree (Stat. Th. ix. 479). *Bāccēla sēta, garlands worn by the worshippers of Bæchus (Mart. vii. 62). Bæchânâlis chîrîs (Aur. Vic. Cas. 3).

Bæchylides, is. m. a lyric poet, born in the island Cos. Of his writings some fragments have been transmitted, of which the best edition is that of Henr. Stephânus (Amm. Mar. xxv. 4).

Bacenis, is. f. Höhe Rh'ne, a forest of Germany, supposed, by some, to be now known by the appellation of the Black Forest, and by others, a part of the Silva Hercinia q. v. The latter opinion receives some confirmation from the language of Caesar, who says it was of prodigious extent (infinita magnitudinis), and, like a natural wall, prevented the mutual incursions of the Sûevi and Chêrûci (B. G. vi. 10).

Baculum, i. m. an island near the city Phœaca, which the Roman fleet, with Eumenes and the Rhôdii, pillaged of the numerous decorations with which it abounded, in 192 B. C. It had a cognominal town, which the Romans could not take, as Antiochus had reinforced it with three thousand armed men (Liv. xxxvii. 21).

Bacis, ides. m. a very celebrated poet (Aristoph. Av. 963).

Bactra. See Bactria.

Bactria, v. Bactriana, v. f. a country of Asia, once a part of the Persian empire, the capital of which was Bactrum, i. v. Bactra. orum. m. formerly Zariaspe, now Balk, said to have been taken by Ninus, through the cunning of Sémiramis. Propertius seems to have anticipated a period when Bactra would be the boundary of the Roman empire (iii. l. 16). It stood on Bactrus, the Denash, a branch of Oxus, the Gihon Anu, which runs into the Lake, or Sea, of Aral. Inh. Bactri, et. Bactriani, orum. m. Ammianus Marcellinus describes them as a very warlike nation (xxiii. 6). Adj. Bactrius, et. Bactrianus, a. um. Bactrius Halcypencus, a native of Bactra (Ov. Met. v. 135). Bactriani campi, the plains of Bactria (Tac. Ann. xi. 6). Bactrianum imperium (Just. ii. 3).

Bactrus, i. m. the Denash, Mannertus says the Anderah, a river of Bactria, from which that country probably received its name (Curt. vii. 4). Others are of opinion that Bactrus is the same with Oaxes, which may have been mistaken for Araxes. Lucanus makes it a Scythian river (Lucan. Phar. iii. 267).

Badius, i. m. a native of Cămpănia, who challenged T. Quinctius Crispinus, with whom he had been in intimate friendship, to fight him in single combat. In consequence of Badius having been his guest, Quinctius first declined the challenge; but afterwards, being provoked by more abusive language from the Campanian, he accepted it, ran his sword through the left shoulder of his antagonist, and dismounted on purpose to despatch him as he was lying. Badius saved his life by running off to his own party, leaving his horse and buckler in the hands of the conqueror (Liv. xxv. 18). Valerius Maximus gives a different account (v. 1).

Badahenna, m. f. Holk-Pade, according to Ernestus, and Seven Wolden, according to Broter, a large forest of Germany, in the territory of the Frisii (Tac. Ann. iv. 73).

Bæbius, i. m. a man who was mangled during the civil wars in Italy (Luc. Phar. ii. 119). There appear to have been two of this name, one killed by the party of Sulla, and the other by that of Marius, who was torn to pieces by the hands of the assailants (Flor. iii. 21).

Bæbius, v. Bæbius Mæssa, Bæbii Mæssa, m. an imperial procurator in Africa, and a notorious informer, mentioned by Tacitus (Hist. iv. 50), and by Plinius the younger (vii. 33). Another, whom Juvénalis does not name, surpassed him in this infamous employment, and kept him in fear (Sat. i. 35).

A. Bæbius, A. Bæbii, m. a man condemned for having furnished some Roman soldiers for the murdering of the Ætoli, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 28, 31).

C. Bæbius, C. Bæbii, m. a tribune of the people, on whom Jügürtha prevailed, by extreme bribery, to espouse his cause, and by whose advice that Numidian refused to answer a single question at the bar of the Roman senate. Jügürtha showed his knowledge of mankind in selecting this tribune to regulate his conduct at Rome, as he proved his bulwark in open defiance of law and justice. The daring impudence of Bæbius treated with equal contempt the authority of the Senate, and the opinions of his constituents. His character seems a compound of determined resolution and matchless effrontery (Sal. Jug. 33, 34).

Cn. Bæbius Tămpihilus, Cn. Bæbii Tămpihilli, m. a Roman, who, having been appointed tribune of the people, in 206 B. C., summoned M. Livius Sălinator, and C. Claudius Nêro, the censors, on the expiry of their office, to a trial before the people, in consequence of their scandalous contention. The senate interfered and prevented the trial, lest the censorship should in future be subject to the caprice of the people. Two years after, he was elected prætor, and obtained Ariminum, Rimini, for his province. He incautiously entered the territory of the Insubres Gălli, who attacked him at a disadvantage, and he lost above six thousand and six hundred men. This defeat called from the city L. Cărnilius Lăntulus, consul, who took the command of the army, reprimanded with severity Cn. Bæbius Tămpihilus, and sent him home to Rome. After being appointed a triumvir, with L. Scribănius Libo and M. Tăcilius, for planting colonies at Săpăntum and Buxăntum, he was elected consul with L. Ėmilius Pănilius, in 184 B. C. The senate decreed Ligŭria a province for both consuls, and, adds the historian, nothing memorable occurred during their consulship. He presided at the elections when his brother, M. Bæbius Tămpihilus, with P. Cărnilius Căthęgus, were elected consuls (Liv. xxix. 37: xl. 17, 18).—2. A city prætor, in 170 B. C., and afterwards one of the commissioners sent to Illyricum (Liv. xlv. 17 seq.).

L. Bæbius, L. Bæbii, m. a Roman, of whose history nothing is known, except that he was one of three commissioners sent into Măcădăntia, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 18).

L. Bæbius Dives, L. Bæbii Divitis, m. prætor, in 191 B. C. The Ligurians surrounded him on his way to his province, Spain, killed great part of his attendants, and wounded himself. Notwithstanding his wound, he escaped, but without the victors, to Māssilia, Marseilles, where he died in three days (Liv. xxxvii. 57).

M. Bæbius, M. Bæbii, m. sent with other two as ambassadors to Carthage, by Scipio, afterwards surnamed Africanus, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 25).

M. Bæbius Tāmphilus, M. Bæbii Tāmphili, m. a Roman, brother of Cn. Bæbius Tāmphilus, was a man of some consideration. Conjoined with Dēcius Jūnius Brūtus, and M. Hēlvius, he led a Roman colony to Siptuntum, in 196 B. C., and, on obtaining the prætorship, he received orders to march the legions from the territory of the Bruttii to Brundisium, Brindisi, and afterwards to cross to Epirus. He acted in concert with Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, and took a number of cities in Thessaly, which raised him to distinction as a soldier, and secured him the confidence of the army. The consul deputed him, Q. Cæcilius Mētellus, and Tiberius Sēmprōnius, to decide a difference between Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, and Eumēnes, king of Asia, of which commission they gave an account to the senate. He was elected consul with P. Cōrnēlius Cēthēgus, in 183 B. C., and had Ligūria decreed a province for both. The senate continued them in command next year. After some success by maneuvering against the Apūni Ligūres, they proposed to the senate to remove that nation to the land formerly occupied by the Taurasini, in the territory of the Sannites, which had become the property of the public, giving it as their opinion, that there would be no end to the war with these Gauls in their present situation. The senate approved of their plan, nominated them and other five commissioners to apportion the lands, and afterwards granted them a triumph, the first which had been attained without fighting the enemy. Hostages only were led before the chariots, and their procession was without either spoils or captives (Liv. xxxiv. 45 seq. Flor. ii. 3). Adj. Tāmphiliānus, a, um. Tāmphiliāna dōmus (Cor. Nep. Att. 13).

Q. Bæbius, Q. Bæbii, m. a tribune of the people, who possessed the common quality of that order, hatred to the patricians, whom he charged with multiplying wars and harassing the people, for which he was severely reprimanded in the senate, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 6).

Q. Bæbius Hērēnnius, Q. Bæbii Hērēnnii, m. a tribune of the people, who delivered a violent harangue against the patricians, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 34).

Q. Bæbius Tāmphilus, Q. Bæbii Tāmphili, m. one of the ambassadors sent by the Roman senate to Carthage, in 230 B. C., to enquire whether Hannibal had attacked Sāgūntum of his own accord, or by order of his government. He had been previously sent to Hannibal himself, at Sāgūntum (Liv. xxi. 6, 18).

Q. Bæbius Sūla, Q. Bæbii Sūlae, m. one of the five ambassadors sent to Pērseus, king of Mæcēdōnia, in order to obtain a correct knowledge of the state of affairs in that kingdom, as the senate suspected he was making preparations for war (Liv. xlii. 6).

Bæcūla, a, f. a town of Spain, near Cástulo, according to Pōlybius and Applānus; but Stēphānus places it near the Strait of Gibraltar. Near Bæcūla, in 211 B. C., P.

Cōrnēlius Scipio Africanus gained a complete victory over Hāsdrūbal, son of Hāmilcar, which decided the fate of Spain (Liv. xxvii. 18). Adj. Bæcūlonenses, um, m. (Plin. i. 302).

A. Bæcūlonius, A. Bæcūloni, m. a standard-bearer of the second legion, a man of known bravery, who distinguished himself in retaking the Roman camp from the Istri in 180 B. C. (Liv. xli. 4).

Bæticus, i, m. a Spanish youth, who competed for the prize in the foot race given by P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Africanus, when he had conquered that country (Sil. Ital. xvi. 469).

—2. A man whom Mārtiālls ridicules for the depravity of his taste, from which the poet infers that he was addicted to base practices, and expressly charges him with most detestable conduct (iii. 77 and 81).

Bætis, is, m. the Guadalquivir (i. e. the Great river), a river of Hispānia, Spain, which has its source in Sierra Morena, runs in a direction considerably south of west, and, after a course of nearly three hundred geographical miles, falls into the Bay of Cadiz by one channel. Of this noble stream the ancient name was Tārtēssus. When the Phœnicians first went beyond Frētum Gādītānum, the Strait of Gibraltar, it divided into two branches, which, with the Bay of Cadiz, formed an island called Tārtēssus, on which stood a cognominal town. From Silus Itālicus, olives appear to have grown luxuriantly on its banks (iii. 405). This poet states that it washed the horses of the sun, from the ancients believing the west of Spain the extremity of the diurnal course of the sun (xvii. 638). Plācidus Bætis (Mart. ix. 62). Tārtēssūcus Bætis (Mart. viii. 28). Bæticōla, a, m. an inhabitant of the banks of Bætis (Sil. Ital. i. 146). Bætigēna, a, m. one born on the Guadalquivir (Sil. Ital. ix. 234). Adj. Bæticus, a, um, of Bætis, of Spain, Spanish. Bætica lāna, Spanish wool (Mart. xli. 65), which does not appear to have required dyeing (Mart. xiv. 133). Bætica (provincia), the southern division of Spain, so called from being watered by Bætis, the Guadalquivir (Plin. i. 288). Bæticātus, i, m. a man wearing a cloak or upper robe manufactured in that country (Mart. i. 97).

Betūria, a, f. a part of Hispānia Bætica, between the rivers Bætis, the Guadalquivir, and Anas, the Guadiana (Liv. xxxix. 30).

Būgas, a, m. a man in the army of Hannibal at the siege of Sāgūntum, whom Mōpsus killed (Sil. Ital. ii. 111).

Bāgaudæ, e. Bācaudæ, arum, m. a people who lived on the Alps and likewise in Gallia, France. This name seems to designate a class, rather than a people or nation, and appears to have denoted what we call outlaws or banditti (Aurel. Vic. Cæs. 39). During the reign of Diocletianus, the peasants in Gallia, France, made an insurrection, and took the name of Bāgaudæ, whom that Emperor, by his general Māximianus Hērēclēus Cæsar, soon overpowered, and restored peace to the country in the year 286 (Eutrop. ix. 20).

Bāgēsus, i, m. a man in the Carthaginian army at the battle of Cānna, who mounted the horse of Clōlius after he had fallen severely wounded (Sil. Ital. x. 459). See Clōlius.

Balgenni, orum, m. an Alpine nation (Vel. Pat. i. 15). the same with Vägenni q. v. (Sil. Ital. viii. 605).

Balgines, is, m. a Babylonian nobleman, who went from the camp of Darius to Alexander the Great, to inform him that their sovereign was in danger either of death or chains (Curt. v. 13).

Balgus, a, m. a eunuch, whom Darius put to death (Curt. vi. 3).—2. Another, given in a present to Alexander the Great (Curt. vi. 5 seq.).

Balogphates, is, m. the keeper of the citadel and royal treasures at Babylon, when that city was taken by Alexander the Great (Curt. v. 1).

Balgus, i, m. the name of a eunuch to whom Ovidius addresses an elegy (Amor. ii. 2).

Bagrada, a, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, killed at the siege of Soguntum by Murrus. On his shield was engraved a representation of the river whose name he bore (Sil. Ital. i. 407).—2. An African, king of the Nubæ, who fell in Italy by the hand of Cæcilius during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. vii. 663).

Bagrada, v. Bagradas, a, m. the Megrada, or Megerda, a slow-running (Lentus Bagradas, Luc. Phar. iv. 583) river of Africa, between Ufrica and Carthage, which has its rise in a chain of mountains to the W. of the city Mäscula. Curius had his camp on this river, when he was saluted by his whole army with the title of Imperator; near which, at an after period, he and all his troops were cut in pieces by Juba, king of Mauritania, Morocco and Fez. There Atilius Regulus killed a huge serpent of 120 feet (100 yards, Sil. Ital. vi. 153), in length, against which he had to employ his military engines.—2. A river of Persia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Bais (2 syl.), arum, f. Baia, a town of Campania celebrated for the pleasantness of its situation and the wholesomeness of its waters. It is said to have received the name from Baius (2 syl.), a companion of Ulysses, who was buried there (Sil. Ital. xii. 114). Jānua Baiarum, i. e. Cūma, through which travellers from Rome to Baia had to pass (Juv. Sat. iii. 4). Adj. Baiānus, a, um. Baia aqua, for Baiæ aqua, which Propertius calls crimen æstivæ, from their tendency to impurity (i. 11. 30). Seneca seems to have considered Baia as a place of excessive licentiousness (Epist. 51). Baiānus sinus (Plin. i. 250). Baiānus murex, the burret of Baia. It appears to be a kind of oyster, and was found in Baiānus sinus (Hor. Sat. ii. 4. 32).—2. Bayas, a town on the maritime pass of Ambracius, Abundoghy.

Balares, arum, m. a people of Africa (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Bala. See Alexander.

Balærus, i, m. a prefect of Alexander the Great, who defeated Idarnes, an officer under Darius, and took the city Milæus (Curt. iv. 5 seq.). Curtius gives Balæri as the name of a nation, an assertion probably incorrect, as it is not supported by any other writer of antiquity (iv. 13).

Balærus, i, m. a chieftain of the Gauls, who offered assistance to the Romans against Perses, for which he had the thanks of the senate, presents of a golden chain of two pounds' weight, golden bowls of four pounds' weight, a horse caparisoned, and a horse-man's armour. His nation is not mentioned (Liv. xlv. 14).

Balæri, orum, m. a people of Sardinia, who assisted the Ilenses in making war on the states that were at peace in 180 B. C. The Roman consul, Tib. Sémpronius Græchus, defeated the combined forces of the Ilenses and Balæri, killed twelve thousand, and took their camp in 179 B. C. Next day he collected their arms and burned them as an offering to Vulkānus (Liv. xli. 6—12).

Balærus, i, m. a commander of the Vettōnes, a people of Lusitania, Portugal, between Durius, the Douro, and Anas, the Guadiana (Sil. Ital. iii. 378).

Balatro. See Servilius.

Balbi, orum, m. a Spanish family which settled at Rome. At the request of P. Cornélius Léntulus, Pompeius made the first Balbus a Roman citizen, on which account he took the name of L. Cornélius Balbus (Tac. Ann. xi. 24).

C. Balbillus, C. Balbilli, m. was appointed governor of Egypt in the year 55 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 22). Seneca extols him as the best of men, and a scholar of very singular attainments.

Balbīnus, i, m. a man whom Hōstilius ridicules for his extravagant fondness of Agna, taking pleasure in the loathsome complaint to which she was subject (Sat. i. 3. 40).—2. A man of obscure birth, who obtained the title of Augustus about the year 238. At that time, besides Balbīnus, Gordianus and Puppienus had risen to the same distinction, so that there were three expectants of the purple at once. Balbīnus and Puppienus were put to death in the palace on the arrival of Gordianus at Rome (Eutrop. ix. 2).

Balbus, i, m. a man mentioned by Cicerulus (lxvii. 3).—2. Another, noticed by Martialis, perhaps a fictitious name (ii. 32).

Balbus, i, m. a mountain on the confines of Carthage, to which Māsinissa fled after he had been defeated by Syphax in 206 B. C. A number of families, with their tents and cattle, which constituted their whole wealth, retreated with the king to this mountain, which abounded with grass and water, consequently well adapted for the feeding of cattle, the flesh and milk of which supplied abundance of food to the people who subsist entirely on these two articles (Liv. xxix. 31).

Baldomarius, i, m. a king of the Germans, made prisoner by Constantius (Aur. Vic. Ep. 42).

Balæres, ium, f. (insule), the islands Major, et Minor, Majorca, and Minorca, on the coast of Spain, about 50 miles S. E. of the mouths of Iberus, the Ebro. The former is 60 miles long, and 53 broad; but the latter is only about 30 in length, and 12 in breadth. These islands were distinguished by this epithet among the Greeks, who also called them Balærides, um, f., from the ancient natives being excellent slingers, an art for which the modern inhabitants are likewise remarkable. From Florus we learn that among this people a boy received no food from his mother until he had hit it, placed at a proper distance, with a stone from his sling (iii. 8). Adj. Balæricus, a, um, et, Balæris, is, e. Balæricus actor, a Balearian slinger (Stat.

Ach. ii. 420). Bälērica funda (Ov. Met. iv. 708). Bälēris verber (Sil. Ital. i. 314).

Bälēus, i, m. a companion of Hērclēs, whom he left at Bälēares, Majorca and Minorca, when he sailed to Gērŷon. From him some derive the name Bälēares (Liv. Ep. 60).

Bälissus, i, m. a river of Pārthia, in which the troops of Crāssus quenched their thirst immediately before their first engagement with the Parthians (Ap. Bel. Par. 143).

Bälista, æ, f. Monte Penese, a mountain in Ligūria (Liv. xxxix. 2 seq.).

Bällista, æ, f. a military engine used by the Romans for throwing darts, hence the name (Βαλλιστήριον). Of the various kinds of Bälliste, Vitruvius (lib. x.) has given a minute and tolerably satisfactory account. Lipsius too has treated of this instrument of war with minuteness and accuracy; but an elaborate description of this engine of destruction, unless accompanied with drawings, would be of little use to the young student.

Bällönöti, orum (Sing. Bällönötus, i), m. a Scythian nation, whose country is not certainly known, mentioned by Valērius Flācus (vi. 161).

T. Bälvēntius, T. Bälvēntii, m. a man of distinguished courage, who had both his thighs pierced with a dart, in the attack which Ambiorix made upon the legions which he had deceitfully persuaded to leave their camp (Cæs. B. G. v. 35).

Bändusia, æ, m. a fountain in the property which Hōrātius had in the territory of the Sabines. It was also the name of a district of that territory. To this spring Hōrātius addresses Od. iii. 13. The Abbé Capmartin de Chaupy, who has written three large octavo volumes on the situation of the villa of Hōrātius, maintains, that there was no spring of that name in the estate of the poet, but that it was about six miles distant from Vēnūsia, Venosa, the town at which he was born.

Bānūræ, arum, m. a people of Africa, whose country probably bordered on that of the Gētūli (Sil. Ital. iii. 303. Plin. i. 527). Ptolēmeus makes them a people of Mauritānia, and Ammianus Marcēllinus calls them Baūræ. Different authors write their name differently.

Bāntia, æ, f. St. Maria di Vanze, a town of Apūlia, not far from the confines of Lūcānia, now in ruins. Between this town and Vēnūsia, the Roman consuls, M. Claudius Marcēllus, and T. Quinctius Crispinus, encamped, and near it the former was killed by an ambuscade, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 25—27). Inh. Bāntini, orum, m. (Plin. i. 351). Adj. Bāntinus, a, um. Bāntini saltūs, the woods or forests of St. Maria di Vanze (Hor. Od. iii. 4. 15).

L. Bāntius, L. Bāntii, m. a native of Nōla, who encouraged the inhabitants to revolt from the Romans, on which account he dreaded the resentment of the prætor Claudius Marcēllus. He formed the design of betraying his native city, in 218 B. C., and, if that failed, he resolved to attach himself to Hānnibal. The kindness of Marcēllus induced him to change his plans, and, from that period, he was one of the bravest and most zealous friends of the Romans (Liv. xxiii. 15).

Baphyrus, i, m. a river of Māccēdōnia, the mouth of which forms a large morass, occupying one-half of the space between mount Olympos and the sea (Liv. xlv. 6).

Bāpta, æ, et, Bāptæ arum, m. priests of Cōtŷtto, who had this name from dipping themselves in water, after committing horrid impurities in honour of that goddess, and by which they considered themselves completely purified (Juv. Sat. ii. 92). See Cōtŷtto.

Bārābba, rect. Mārāba q. v.

Bārādon, ōnis, m. a place or town of Spain, which had beautiful oak groves (Mart. iv. 55).

Bārātha, orum, n. Bour, a town near the source of the western branch of Hālys, the Atoc-sou.

Bārāthrus, i, m. the name of a character, perhaps, rather than of a man, on whom benefits or advantages bestowed were lost and absorbed as by a whirlpool (Lucr. iii. 967).

Bārāna, æ, m. the Bojana, or, the Moracca, a river of Illyricum, which flows from Lācus Lābēātis, washes the walls of Scōdra on the west side, and afterwards unites with Clausāla, which passes that town on the east side (Liv. xlv. 31).

Bārāria, æ, f. a name given by Hōrātius to Phrygia, probably, as he is then treating of a Grecian subject, in reference to the practice of the Greeks, who called all nations barbarians except their own (Epist. i. 2. 7).

Bārātius, i, m. quæstor of M. Antōnius, an artful and designing man (Ap. Bel. Civ. 688).

Bārbitāni montes, which Ptolēmeus writes Arbīta, mountains in the eastern part of Pērsia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Bārbius Prōcūlus, Bārbi Prōcūli, m. an accomplice of Otho. It was the duty of Bārbius to carry the watchword to the guard, and his cunning, conjoined with dauntless intrepidity, rendered him a fit instrument for maturing and executing a conspiracy (Tac. Hist. i. 25).

Bārbosthēnes, is, m. a mountain at the distance of ten miles from Lācēdæmon, at which Philōpōmen, prætor of the Achæi, encamped, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 27).

Bārēni, orum, m. a people of Hŷrcania, whose name may be recognised in the modern Balkan. In the army of Dārius, this nation amounted to two thousand horse and ten thousand infantry (Curt. iii. 2).

Bārēas, æ, m. a surname of the family of which Hānnibal was a descendant. Perhaps the founder of the tribe had this name, a conjecture which Silius Itālicus seems to support (i. 72). Adj. Bārēinus, a, um. Bārēina factio (Liv. xxi. 2). Familia Bārēina (Liv. xxiii. 13). Secundum Bārēnos (homines, e. fratres, i. e. Hānnibālem, Hāsdrubālem, et Māgonem) (Liv. xxviii. 12).

Bārē, es, f. a Phœnician, nurse of Sŷchæus, who was the husband of Dido (Virg. Æn. iv. 632).—2. A Carthaginian woman, who bore three sons, Critias, Eumachus, and Xānthippus, at a birth, to Lacedæmonian Xānthippus. They all fell in the second Punic war, by three brothers, born also at a birth (Sil. Ital. iv. 356 seq.).

Bārē, es, f. a town of Libŷa, built of bricks, afterwards called Ptolēmais, which now gives name to the modern district Barca, on which it stood. Arida Bārē (Claud. xv. 159). Inh. Bārēi, orum, m. taught to rear horses by Nēptūnus, and to train them for the chariot by Minēra (Virg. Æn. iv. 43).

Adj. Barceus, a, um.—2. A city built by Alexander the Great, to commemorate his victories in India. It stood to the west of the mouth of Indus, the Sind (Just. xii. 10).—3. A district of Bactriana regio, assigned by Darius to the Barceans, who were carried captive by the Persians (Herod. iv. 204).

Bardanes, is, m. brother of Artabānus and Gotārzes. The latter having killed the former, with his wife and son, seized on the throne of Persia, which he did not obtain without shedding much blood. The Parthians, dreading his cruelty, invited Bardanes to take possession of the crown. Nature formed him for enterprise, and he soon compelled Gotārzes to consult his safety by flight. They afterwards united, swore to mutual fidelity, and Gotārzes, on purpose to avoid all suspicion, retired to the extremity of Hyrcania. Here he repented of his abdication, and, being invited by some of the Parthian noblemen to return, the brothers had recourse to the sword, and, Gotārzes having been defeated, Bardanes was left in the peaceful possession of the throne. The success of the latter against his enemies rendered him proud and oppressive, on which account a conspiracy was formed against his life; and, whilst enjoying the pleasures of the chase, he fell, in the vigour of youth, under the repeated blows of his murderers (Tac. Ann. xi. 8—10).

Bardī, orum, m. a class or order of the Druids, who celebrated in heroic verse the brave actions of illustrious men, and sung poems to the notes of the lyre (Amm. Mar. xv. 9).

Bardo, onis, f. a town in the south of Spain, which, from Livius, appears to have been of considerable note (xxxiii. 21).

Barēsa, r. Barēsa, Sōrānus, Barēsa Sōrāni, is, a man of great virtue, condemned and put to death through the agency of P. Egnātius Cōler, whose friend and scholar he had been; and who procured that sentence by false evidence (Juv. Sat. iii. 116). Tacitus records this fact, and bears honourable testimony to the character of Barēsa Sōrānus (Ann. xvi. 21—23: Hist. iv. 10).

Barēnē, es, f. a town near Ecbātāna, which Cyrus gave to Cræsus, king of Lydia, whom he had conquered. Here the common reading is Barē, which is inaccurate (Just. i. 7).

Barētoras, is, m. a name of Jōānnes q. v. (Tac. Hist. v. 12).

Bargūm, i, n. a town of Illyricum, which, in the treaty with Philippus, king of Macedōnia, was to belong to the Romans, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 12).

Bargūll, orum, m. a people of Hispania Tarracōnensis, whom the Roman ambassadors, after they had declared war at Carthage, solicited to join their countrymen, and appear to have succeeded, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 19).

Bargylla, arum, f. (Bargylla, orum, n. Steph.), a city of Caria. Inh. Bargyllæ, arum, et, Bargyllæ, arum, m. Adj. Bargyllæticus, et, Bargyllæticus, a, um. Bargyllæticus sinus, the gulf of Asyn Kale (Liv. xxxvii. 17). Bargyllæci cāpi (Plin. l. 601).

Baria. See Varia.

Barinē, es, f. a woman, to whom Hörātius addresses the eighth ode of the second book. He charges her with different crimes, from which it is manifest, if a real character, she must have been destitute of moral purity and rectitude.

Bārisas, antis, m. a Scythian commander, killed by Cālās, whose name only occurs in Valērius Flaccus (vi. 557).

Bārium, i, n. Bari, a town of Apūlia, on the sea coast, hence Hörātius calls it piscisum. Festus states it was built by the inhabitants of Bāra, a small island near Brūndisium, Brindisi. Adj. Bārianus, a, um.

T. Barrūlus, T. Barrūli, m. the intimate friend of Lēntūlus Spīnther (Val. Max. vii. 8).

Barsinē, es, f. a wife of Alexander the Great, whom Cassānder murdered, and Hēracles, her son by that monarch. According to Arriānus, she was a daughter of Dārius, king of Persia; according to Plūtarchus, of Artabāzus; and according to Eusebius, of Pharnabāzus (Just. xi. 10).

Bartholōmaeus, i, m. one of the Apostles. Claudianus, who was a heathen, sneeringly introduces into one of his poems the name of Bartholōmaeus.

Bārzentēs, is, m. a satrap of Arāchōsia, who, with Bessus, conspired against the king and fled from punishment to India. To Alexander he was afterwards given up in chains (Curt. vi. 6 seq.).

Barzala, orum, n. a fort in Mēsōpōtāmia (Amm. Mar. xviii. 7).

Basilides, is, m. the priest of mount Carmel, according to Tacitus, but Suetonius calls him a freedman. With the view to reconcile the discrepancy of these authors much has been written, still the matter is undetermined. Among Jews and Egyptians, priests were noblemen, on that account some have supposed that the word libertus in Suetonius should be thrown out. Vespasianus offered a sacrifice on this mountain, and Basilides uttered a prediction in mysterious language, which Tacitus has recorded (Hist. ii. 78).—2. An Egyptian priest, a man of great distinction, whom Vespasianus saw, or pretended to see, in the temple at Alexandria, although he ascertained that Basilides was at that time at the distance of eighty miles from him. Of this fabulous story Tacitus has given a full account (Hist. iv. 82).

Basilus, i, m. an eloquent pleader (Juv. Sat. vii. 146). The same poet introduces him again as defrauding the allies (Sat. x. 222). Different opinions respecting Basilus in the latter passage have been advanced, and it is not improbable that different persons are referred to, as their characters appear so unlike.—2. A native of Istria, who joined Cæsar in the civil war (Luc. Phar. iv. 416. Flor. iv. 2).

Bassa, is, f. a woman of great wealth and luxury, one of whose practices Martialis mentions (i. 38). The poet frequently introduces Bassa into his writings, holding her up to censure, contempt, or disgust.

Bassania, r. Bassiana, is, f. Obriesh, a town of Illyricum, which Gentius, king of the Illyrii, besieged, but quitted it on the approach of the Roman prætor, L. Anicius Gallus. It was five miles distant from Lissus. Inh. Bassanite, arum, m. were allies of the Romans, on which account Gentius, king of the Illyrii, invested their town, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 30).

Bassareus, is, m. a name of Bæchus, of which various etymologies have been given. Some derive it from his wearing shoes made of fox-skin (baccæque), and others from a robe which hung down to his heel, made at Bässara, a place in Lydia. It is unnecessary to mention more, since the first is probably nearest to the truth, as the priestesses of Bæchus were frequently called Bässarides, um (Sing. Bässaris, idis), f. (Pers. Sat. i. 101). In their orgies the Bässarides moved in a circular direction, hence Stätius, Bässaridum rôtator Evau (Syl. ii. 7. 7). Hörätius calls Bässarëus, cündidus, which, applied to the mind, would denote sincere; but as he enjoyed perpetual youth, it may be applied to his countenance, and would then signify fair, beautiful. Adj. Bässaricus, a, um. Bässarica cōma, the hair of Bæchus (Prop. iii. 17. 30).

Bässus, i, m. a man who excelled in drinking (Hor. Od. i. 36. 14).—2. A poet of considerable note, who obtained high commendation for his lambics (Prop. i. 4. 1), mentioned also by Ovidius (Trist. iv. 10. 47).—3. A man to whom Märtialis addresses several of his epigrams, and relates several of his practices, which would have been better to have remained unknown (iii. 58 &c.).—4. A man enriched by the Emperor Séptimius Sévërus (Aur. Vic. Ep. 20).

Bästärna, e. Bästärna, arum, m. (Välč-rius Fläccus writes Bätärna, which must be considered a poetical license, vi. 96), a German nation, to the east of Vistula, the Vistula. D'Anville places them near the sources of Hÿpänis, the Bog. Some authors consider them as Scythians; but that was not the idea of Lívius or Tácitus, although the latter seems less decided. Philippus, king of Mäcëdōnia, requested their assistance, and they sent some of the royal family, one of whom promised, in 184 B. C., his sister in marriage to the son of Philippus, with which the Macedonian monarch was much pleased. At his solicitation they crossed Dänüblus, the Danube, in great force, three years after, when he intended to extirpate the Därdäni, and to give their country to the Bästärna, where they might leave their wives and children, and proceed to ravage Italy, by which measure Philippus promised to himself a double advantage, the destruction of the Därdäni, his inveterate enemies, and harassing the Romans, who had sent reinforcements into Greece. Death frustrated his plans. The Thracians, with whom he had pactioned to allow the Bästärna a passage through their country, took up arms against them, but were defeated, and they might have advanced peacefully, had they not pursued them to a high mountain, called Donüca, where they were discomfited by a terrible storm of thunder and lightning, on which they fled precipitately, declaring, that not only the gods had put them to flight, but that the sky was falling upon them. A consultation was held by the survivors of this disaster, after their pursuit of the Thracians, when a disagreement ensued, some wishing to return home, and others to advance to Därdänia. About thirty thousand, under the command of Clöndicus, proceeded according to their original plan, the rest recrossed the Danube, and returned to their native country (Lív. xl. 5 seq.). Përsëus endeavoured to embroil the Därdäni and Bästärna in war, and the latter appear to have been victorious, having had the support of the Thracians and Scördisci, but the particulars are unknown, from the forty-first book of the history of Lívius being imperfect. M. Licinius Crassus conquered them, together with the Mœsi and other neighbouring nations (Liv. Ep. 134). Ovidius places them next the Saurömäte (Trist. ii. 198). Adj. Bästärnicus, a, um. Bästärnica gens (Strab. 428).

Bästia, e, f. wife of Papius Müttilus, who refused him admittance when he came privately to the backdoor of his house, because he was proscribed. Enraged at her unfeeling conduct, he killed himself, besmearing the door with his blood (Liv. Ep. 89).

Bätävia, e, f. e. Insula Bätävörum, the United Provinces, often called Holland, from its being the largest of them; a country at the mouth of the Rhine. It was denominated an island, from its being bounded on two sides, by the southern and northern branches of the Rhine, and on the third by the sea. The modern is considerably larger than the ancient country, from not being confined within these limits. No part of the old world has changed its appearance so much as Holland. Being low and level, it is both exposed to the encroachments of the sea, and to the inundations of the Rhine. Some islands once inhabited, are now covered by the ocean, and others are threatened with a similar fate. A considerable extent of territory has been gained from the German Sea, but it is with great difficulty secured against the violence of that tempestuous expanse of water. The lands along the coast are below the level of the sea, against which they are protected by dykes of prodigious thickness. Euménus gives the following striking description of Bätävia at the time he wrote: "This country, if I may use the expression, is not land. It is so penetrated and soaked with water, that not only the parts, which are evidently boggy, sink and give way under the foot, but even what appears firmer shakes and trembles when trodden upon, and the widely-extending agitation proves that only a thin, light crust covers vast bodies of water." The canals in Holland are numerous, run in all directions, and serve the same purpose as roads in other countries. In general they are about 30 feet higher than the fields through which they pass, and the water, which inundates the country in winter, is raised into them by wind-mills, in the spring months. Before the Revolution, the inland navigation of this country yielded a very great annual revenue. The soil of the country is better than the climate, which is cold and damp, and not favourable to health. The transitions from heat to cold are sudden and violent. The summer is hotter, and the winter colder, than in Britain. By the treaty of Paris, 1815, a very considerable part of Gallia Belgica, which has latterly been called the Netherlands, was annexed to Holland, and both are now formed into one state, under the name of the Kingdom of Holland and Belgium. Inh. Bätävi, orum, were a branch of the Catti, a German nation. Trüces Bätävi (Luc. Phar. i. 431). Auricōmus Bätävus (Sil. Ital. iii. 608). Adj. Bätävus, a, um. Bätävica spuma (Mart. viii. 33). Bätävus ager (Tac. Ann. ii. 6).

Bätävödürum, i, n. Durstadt, a town on the bank of the Rhine, not far from the mouth of that river (Tac. Hist. v. 20).

Bätärna. See Bastarna.

Bäthÿcles, is, m. the son of Chälcon, a native of Hellen, a man of great courage, killed by Glaucus (Hom. Il. xvi. 594).

Bathylus, i. m. a boy celebrated in the odes of Anacreon. He was a native of Samos, an island in the Archipelago, hence Hōrātius has Salmus Bathylus (Epod. xiv. 9).—2. A musician, whose statue was erected in the temple of Jūno, at Samos, by the tyrant Polycrates (Juv. Sat. xiii. 119).—3. An eminent pantomime in the reign of Augustus, who, with Pylades, invented the pantomimic dance (Pers. v. 123). Macēnas was a passionate admirer of this actor, and the attentive reader will observe, with disgust, the kind of intimacy which subsisted between them (Tac. Ann. i. 54).

Bathys, v. Bättum. See Apsorus.

Bätia, æ, f. an Amazon.—Also the name of a rising ground near Troy. By men it was called Bätia, v. Bätien, and by the gods Mýrianē (Hom. Il. ii. 813).

Bätinē, es, v. Bätus, arum, f. Adanē, a celebrated town in Osdrōnē, a place of great trade, chiefly in goods from India and Sérica. It is said to have been built by Macedonians, and its situation rivalled in beauty the Antiochian Dāphnē. Ammianus Marcellinus makes it a town of Anthēmūla q. v. (xiv. 3).

Bätō, ōis, m. a Carthaginian, the pilot of the ship of Himilco, who killed himself after that commander had deserted the vessel set on fire by the Romans off Sicily, in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 422).—2. Son of Lōngārus, king of the Dardāni, came to P. Sulpicius Galba, consul, and offered assistance to the Romans, after L. Apicius, a lieutenant-general of that consul, had made a successful inroad into the territories of Philippos, king of Macēdōnia, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 28).—3. A general of the Pannonians, whom the Emperor Tiberius loaded with valuable presents, and sent to Ravenna, in gratitude for his having allowed him and the Roman army to escape from a place where they were completely at the mercy of their enemy (Suet. Tib. 20).

Bätis, idis, f. a woman who was a native of Cos, Largo, beloved by Philētus, an elegiac poet (Ov. Trist. i. 5. 2).

Bätius, i. m. son of Pōlymnēstus and Phrōsima, a native of Lācēdemon, who, with acedon from the island Thēra, built Cýrēnē. Pausanias calls him Thēraus, probably supposing him to have been born in that island, but Hērōdōtus makes Lācēdemon the place of his birth. The latter mentions that, according to common report, he had this name from the shrill sound of his voice, and stuttering; but in his opinion the oracle at Delphi called him Bätius, an African word, denoting a king, from foreknowing that he would afterwards be a king in that country. He reigned forty years, and was succeeded by his son Arcēsilāus (iv. 150—159). Justinus calls his father Grinus (xiii. 7). Other two kings of Cýrēnē had this name (Herod. iv. 159 seq.). Bättiades, æ, m. Cāllimachus, the poet, from his being a native of Cýrēnē, or from his being a descendant of Bätius; the former is the more probable explanation (Catal. lxx. 16). Bättiade, arum, m. inhabitants of Cýrēnē (Sil. Ital. ii. 61).—2. A shepherd, whom Mērcūrius, for his perfidy, changed into stone (Ov. Met. ii. 688).

Bättum, i. a. Padulū, a town of Cāmpānia, the inhabitants of which espoused the cause of Tūrnus against Ænēas (Virg. Æn. vii. 739).

Bätus, i. m. a soldier in the army of Hannibal, trampled to death by the horse of the Roman consul, Scipio, in the first engagement with Hannibal in Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 239).

Baucis, idis, f. an old woman, the wife of Philēmon, a Phrygian, q. v. (Ov. Met. viii. 631, 705 seq.). Her name is frequently used to denote any old, poor, pious, woman.

Bauli, orum, m. a country seat in Italy, near the promontory Miseno, to which Nēro conducted Agrippina with the view of accomplishing her death by drowning (Tac. Ann. xiv. 4).

Bautis, is, m. the Hoang-Ho, a river of Scythia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Bāvius, i. m. a bad poet, who was the enemy both of Virgilius and Hōrātius. The former poet, in a single couplet, holds up to perpetual ridicule both Bāvius and Māvius (B. iii. 90, 91).

Bāzāria, æ, f. a part of Sōgdāna (Curt. viii. 1). The reading is doubtful, and the word does not occur in any other author.

Bebasē, es, f. a village in Mēsōpōtāmia (Amm. Mar. xviii. 7).

Bēbriacum, et, Bēdriacum, v. Bēdriacum, i. n. Caneto, a small village between Vērōna and Crēmōna, remarkable for two dreadful havocs of the Romans; one between Otho and Vitellius, in which the former was conquered, and killed; and another between Vitellius and Vespasianus, in which the latter was victorious (Tac. Hist. ii. 23). Adj. Bēbriacēnsis, is, e. Bēbriacēnsis victōria (Suet. Vitell. 10).

Bēbrýcia, æ, f. an ancient name of Bithýnia, from its inhabitants, Bēbrýces, um (Sing. Bēbryx, ýcis, m. Their kingdom after the death of Amýcus was destroyed by Lýcus, king of the Mārīandýni. Adj. Bēbrýcius, a, um, et, Bēbrýciensis, is, e. Bēbrýcium nēmus, the grove of Bēbrýcia, afterwards Bithýnia. Amýcus compelled every one who passed this wood to fight him at the cestus, and in that exercise he lost his life, having been overpowered and killed by Polux (Stat. Th. iii. 353).

Bēbryx, ýcis, m. a king of Spain, who was the father of Pýrēnē, whose name is perpetuated by the mountains which divide France from Spain (Sil. Ital. iii. 423). Adj. Bēbrýcius, a, um. Bēbrýcia virgo, Pýrēnē (Sil. Ital. iii. 420).

Bēdriacum. See Bēbriacum.

Begorritis, is, m. a lake of Macēdōnia, on which Pērsēus encamped, when he advanced against the Romans in 173 B. C. (Liv. 42. 53).

Bēlātes, æ, m. one of the Lāpithæ, who, at one blow, stretched on the ground Amýcus with the foot of a maple table, which he had torn off, and, at the second, deprived him of life (Ov. Met. xii. 255).

Bēlbina, v. Belēmnia, æ, f. a part of Lācōnia (Paus. iii. 21).—2. A town of Arcādia (Paus. viii. 35). Bēlbīnutes ager (Liv. xxxviii. 34). The reading various, perhaps it should be Belbinātis.

Bēlgæ, arum (Sing. Bēlga, æ, m. the Belgians, a people originally of German extraction, who inhabited the third division of Gallia, France, which was bounded on the S. by Mātrōna, the Merne, and Sēquāna, the Seine; on the E. and N. by Rhēnus, the Rhine, and on the W. by Frētum Britānnicum, the English Channel. Strictly speaking, Frētum Britānnicum, v. Gāllicum, was confined to the Strait of Dover, but seems generally to have had a more extended signification, and to have nearly corresponded to the modern appellation, the English Channel. Caesar calls it Ocēānus, i. e. Atlānticus, of which the English Channel and German Sea form only a very small part. In the division of Gāllia, France, made by Augustus, whose object was to render the different provinces more equal in point of extent, the countries of the Hēlvētii and Sēquāni, which, till that time were included in Gāllia Cēltica, were added to Gāllia Bēlgica. According to Caesar, the Bēlgæ were, of all the Gauls, the most warlike; and he attributes their superiority in arms to their being strangers to luxury and refinement. Claudianus does not mention them as warriors, but as people subsisting chiefly by pasturage, pascat Bēlgæ pēcus (xxi. 226). Perhaps when he wrote they had lost the martial spirit of their ancestors, and cultivated the arts of peace. Adj. Bēlgicus; a, um. Bēlgicus canis (Sil. Ital. x. 77).

Bēlgium, i, n. is, in general, used by Caesar to denote a part of Gāllia Bēlgica, not the whole country (B. G. v. 24 seq.). See Bēlgæ and Bātavia.

Bēlgus, i, m. a leader of the Gauls, who sent ambassadors to Ptolēmaeus Cēraunus, offering him peace, if he wished to purchase it (Just. xxiv. 5). In Diōdorus Siculus he appears to be called Brinnus.

Bēlias, æ, m. the Beles, one of the branches of the Euphrātes (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 3).

Bēlita, æ, m. a people mentioned by Curtius, but unknown. Perhaps the reading should be Arbēlita (iv. 12).

Bēllērōphon, ōtis, v. Bēllērōphōntēs, æ, m. was the son of Glaucus and Eurynōmē. Having unwittingly killed his brother Dēliades, or Piren, or Alcimēnes, he fled to Prætus, king of Argos, by whom he was purified of the murder. Sthēnōbœa, who was also called Antēa, the wife of that monarch, became enamoured of Bēllērōphon, who rejected with disdain her unlawful advances, on which account Hōrātius calls him cæstus (Od. iii. 7. 15). Indignant at the refusal, Sthēnōbœa complained to her husband that Bēllērōphon had offered violation, which Prætus believing, ordered his father-in-law, Iōbātes, to accomplish the death of the youth. Instead of immediately executing this order, Iōbātes ordered Bēllērōphon to kill the Chimæra, not doubting that he would lose his life in the attempt. The event proved quite otherwise. Mounted on Pēgæus, a winged horse which he had previously broke with the assistance of Minerva, he attacked and killed that monster. On his return, Iōbātes ordered him to fight against the Sōlými whom he conquered. By order of the same monarch, he then went against the Amazons, and with the same success. Assassins lay in wait for him by the king's appointment, but they all fell by his sword, after which, in admiration of his bravery, Iōbātes gave him his daughter Philōnōē in marriage, by whom he had Isāndrus, Hippōlōchus and Lāōdāmīa, and appointed him his successor in the crown (Apol. ii. 3). Hyginus relates, that, after his conquest of the Chimæra, he wished to fly to heaven, in which attempt he failed. On his having risen to the immediate vicinity of the skies, he looked down on the earth, when fear made him lose his seat, and he was killed by the fall (Poet. Ast. 18). Adj. Bēllērōphōntēs, a, um. Bēllērōphōntēs equus, Pēgæus (Prop. ii. 3. 2).

Bēllica, æ, f. the name of one of the gates of Utica (Cæs. B. C. ii. 25).

L. Bēllīenus, L. Bēllēni, m. the prætor at Utica, whom C. Mārius summoned to attend a meeting at Cirta, Constantina, towards the end of the war with Jūgūrtha king of Nūmidia. According to some, Bēllīenus was the maternal uncle of Cātūlina (Sal. Jug. 104).

Bēlligēnes, is, m. a man to whom the Romans gave four hundred acres of land in Sicily, because he had prevailed on Mercurius q. v. to join them, in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 21).

Bēllōcāssi, ōrum, v. Vēllōcāsses, ium, m. a nation of the Bēlgæ, whose territories were of considerable extent, and bounded on the E. by the river Isāra, the Isere, on the S. by Sēquāna, the Seine, on the W. by the district of the Calēti, and on the N. by that of the Bēllōvāci (Cæs. B. G. vii. 75).

Bēllōna, æ, f. the goddess of war, sister and wife of Mars, anciently called Dēllōna. Bēllōnārīi, ōrum, m. priests of Bēllōna, who used to cut their arms and shoulders, when employed in celebrating her rites. She had, at Rome, a temple, without the city, near Pōrta Cārmēntālis, in which the senators gave audience to generals returned from war, and to foreign ambassadors.

Bēllōvāci, ōrum, m. were a numerous and powerful tribe of the Bēlgæ, adjoining to the Bēllōcāssi, Calēti, Ambliani, Vēromāndūi, and Silvanectes (Cæs. B. G. ii. 4 seq.).

Bēllōvēcus, i, m. a sister's son of Ambigātus, one of the Bītūriges, king of the Celts, who quitted his native country in the reign of Tārquinius Priscus, in consequence of an overgrown population, carrying with him not only the superfluous numbers of the Bītūriges, but Arvērni, Sēnōnes, Edūi, Ambārri, Carnūtes, and Aulerci. On arriving at the Tricastini, the Alps, which had not then been crossed, unless we believe the fables of Hērclēs, presented a barrier seemingly insurmountable, which, however, after they had assisted the colony from Phōcæa in forming a settlement at Māssilia, Marseilles, they passed through the Taurini, routed in battle the Tusci near Ticinus, the Tessin, and, hearing that the territory in which they had halted was called Ager Insubrium, the name given to a district of the Edūi, they embraced the omen, and to the town, which they first built, they gave the name of Mēdiolānum, Milan (Liv. v. 34).

Bēllus, i, m. a nobleman of the Illyrii, sent along with Teuticus, by Gēntius their king, to L. Anicius Gāllus, prætor, to request a truce, after that monarch had been defeated at Scōdra, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 31).

Belon, ōnis, m. an officer under Alexander the Great, a man of distinguished bravery, but ignorant of the arts of peace. Curtius has recorded a violent and ferocious speech of his at the time Philōtas was accused of conspiring against the life of his sovereign (vi. 11).

Bēlus, i, a king of Egypt, the father of Ægyptus and Dānūs. Bēlides, is, m. a son of Bēlus. Bēlides fratres, Ægyptus and Dānūs (Stat. Th. vi. 291). Bēlis, Ides, Flur. Bēlides, um, f. the fifty daughters of Dānūs, who all, except the youngest, Hypērmenēstra, on their wedding night, killed their husbands, who were the sons of their uncle Ægyptus. For this barbarous deed, perpetrated at the request of their father, they were condemned, in the infernal regions, to fill with water a tub perforated in the bottom, so that their labour had no end (Ov. Met. iv. 462).—2. A king of Phœnicia, was the father of Dido who founded Carthage, and of Pygmalion, who succeeded him in the crown. According to Virgilius, he appears to have been a powerful monarch. Bēlides, sc, m. a descendant of Bēlus; Palāmidēs (Virg. Æn. ii. 82); Barcas, the father of Hānnibal, from being descended from Bēlus (Sil. Ital. i. 75); Hānnibal (Sil. Ital. iii. 650).—3. A god, whom the Assyrians worshipped with the greatest sanctity, whom some have supposed to be the sun, and the same with Mithres of the Persians (Plin. v. 411). Others think that Bēlus was the Jūpiter, and others the Hercules, of the Romans. Claudius seems to have adopted the latter idea, xxi. 62, where some copies read bēlis, instead of Bēli, which destroys the sense.—4. The father of Ninus, and grandson of Bēlus (Herod. i. 7).—5. The father of Cēphēus, and grandfather of Andrōmēda (Herod. i. vi. 61).

Bēlus, i, m. the Kardānē, a river of Jūdaea, which flows from the foot of Carmēlus, Mount Carmel, and, running westward, falls into the Mediterranean Sea. The sand of this river is easily vitrified, and glass is said to have been first found on its banks. The Venetians used to carry the sand of the Kardānē to Venice, and used it only in the making of glass (Plin. i. 573). Tācītus says, that the sands, collected at the mouth of this stream, being mixed with nitre, melt by the action of fire, and when cooled become glass (Hist. v. 7).

Bēnēus, i, m. Lago di Garda, a lake of Italy, between Verone and the Bressau, about thirty miles long, and from two to seven broad. It is so very clear, that the bottom is visible at the depth of twenty or twenty-five feet. It takes its name from Garda, a town on its banks. At Peschiera, it contracts into Mincius, the Mincio; hence Virgilius, Mincius (ex) patre Bēnāo (Æn. x. 205). Its depth varies from ten to three hundred feet, and it is subject to violent storms. Cātūlus calls the waters of this lake Lýdia unda, because it was in the territory of the Rhēti, who were of Tuscan origin, and the latter considered themselves as descendants of the Lýdi (xxxii. 13).

Bēndis, Idia, f. Diana, so called by the Thracians. Adj. Bēndidius, a, um. Bēndidūa templum, a temple of Diana in Thracia (Lýr. xxxviii. 41). Bēndidūa sacra, festivals in honour of Diana (Strab. 685).

Bēnevētum, i, n. Beccento, a town of the Sānnites, anciently called Mālevētum, to which a few of that people effected their escape, after they had been defeated by the Roman consuls. M. Portēlius and C. Sūlpicius, who, according to some historians, killed or took prisoners thirty thousand, in 314 B. C. At Mālevētum, P. Dēcius Mus encamped in the way of the Apūli, who were on their march to join the Sānnites, brought them to an engagement, killed two thousand and put the rest to flight, in 300 B. C. Thirty years after, the Romans established a colony at this town, which Hānnibal plundered (Liv. ix. 27 seq.). Inh. Bēnevētāni, orum (Sing. Bēnevētānus, i, m. (Liv. xxvii. 10). Adj. Bēnevētānus, a, um. Bēnevētānus ager (Liv. xxii. 13). Bēnevētānus sutor, Vātinus q. v. (Juv. Sat. v. 46).

Bērecyntus, i, m. a mountain and a fort of Phrygia, not a town, according to Sērvius. Strābo uses Bērecynthi, orum, f. and Bērecynthia, e, f. as the name of the district (688: 969). Inh. Bērecyntes, ium, m. who were a Phrygian nation (Strab. 683). Adj. Bērecyntus, a, um, of Bērecyntus, Phrygian. Bērecyntus tractus, the district in which this mountain stood. Bērecyntia māter, Cybēlē (Virg. Æn. vi. 784). Cum Bērecynthio cornu, with a Phrygian horn (Hor. Od. i. 18. 13).

Bērenicē, e, Bērenicē, es, f. the mother of Agrippa, whose name occurs frequently in the history of the Jews, both from her high rank and personal influence.—2. A daughter of Agrippa, king of Jūdaea, a woman of enormous lewdness, who was first married to Hērōdes, her father's brother, afterwards to Pōlēmōn, king of Pōntus. She twice visited Rome, with the view of enticing Titus to marry her, and so strong was his attachment to this princess, that, at one period, she had almost the certain prospect of being Empress. Dread of the people only deterred him from making a foreigner his wife. Vēspāsianus too loved her; but it does not appear that her influence over him had ever been so powerful, as it was over his successor. Jūvénalis calls her incesta, from the general belief that there was an unlawful connexion between her and her brother (Sat. vi. 158). See Agrippa. Adj. Bērenicēus, a, um. Bērenicēus vertex (Catul. lxxvi. 8).—3. An Egyptian, distinguished for her beauty, who was the wife of Ptolēmæus Lāgus, and mother of Ptolēmæus Philādēlphus.—4. A daughter of Ptolēmæus Philādēlphus, whom Antiochus, king of Sýria, having first divorced his wife, Lāodicē, married. At an after period, Lāodicē was recalled. In revenge for the previous conduct of her husband, she put him to death by poison, murdered Bērenicē with her child, and placed her own son on his father's throne. Justinus says, Bērenicē and her child were murdered by Sēlēucus Callinicus (xxvii. 1). For the cruel treatment of Bērenicē, her brother made war on Antiochus, and would have overrun his whole kingdom, had not an insurrection recalled him home. See Ptolēmæus Evergētes.—5. Wife of Mithridātes, king of Pōntus, who, in obedience to her husband's orders, after he had been defeated, attempted to poison herself; but, that drug having failed to destroy her, one of the eunuchs strangled her.—6. A daughter of Ptolēmæus Philādēlphus and Arsinōē, who, agreeably to the laws of Egypt, married her own brother Ptolēmæus Evergētes. She vowed to Vēnus all the hair in her head, if her husband returned victorious from an expedition in which he was then setting out, and, her prayer having been heard, she fulfilled her vow; The beautiful locks, some time after, could not be found in the temple, and Cōnon, a Samian mathematician, declared publicly that Jūpiter had carried them off, and formed them into a constellation. The cruelty of her own son at last deprived her of life.—7. Only daughter of Magas, king of Cýrenē, and Arsinoē, betrothed by her father to the son of his brother Ptōlēmæus, king of Egypt. Her mother wished to marry her to Dēmētrius, brother of Antigōnus, king of Măcēdōniă, but after his arrival at Cýrenē, the natives put him to death, for a criminal intimacy with Arsinoē, who would probably have shared the same fate had not the affection of her daughter Bērēnicē interposed, and saved her life. Bērēnicē then followed the opinion of her father, by marrying her cousin, Ptōlēmæus Evērgētes (Just. xxvi. 3).—8. Wife of Attālus (Just. xxxvi. 4). Other princesses of this name occur in the history of Egypt, particularly during the reigns of the Ptōlēmæi.

Bērēnicē, es, v. Bērēnicis, Idis, f. a town of Epirus, built by Pýrrhus, the younger (Stephanus). Plūtarchus, in the life of Pýrrhus, calls it Bērēnicis.—2. Quilfit, another, built by Ptōlēmæus Philădēlphus, on the Red Sea.—3. A city of the Trōglodytæ, mentioned by Plinius (i. 227).—4. A fourth, formerly called Chlus.—5. A town of Cilicia.—6. A town at the most inland part of Sýrtis Major, of which the original name was Hēsperis. The ancient name probably arose from its vicinity to the famous gardens of the Hēsperides (Luc. Phar. ix. 524. Plin. i. 541). It nearly retains its ancient name, being now called Bernichio. There were probably other towns of this name, of which it is unnecessary to give an enumeration. Bērēnicis, Idis, f. a district of Cýrenăica. Undosa Bērēnicis (Sil. Ital. iii. 249).

Bērgistāni, orum, m. a people in Hispania Tarracōnēnsis, seven of whose forts revolted from the Romans, in 197 B. C., on a false report, that M. Pōrcius Căto, consul, then in their neighbourhood, was to withdraw to Turdētāniă. He marched against this nation, and with ease reduced them to submission; but these same people soon afterwards revolted, and, in place of the mild treatment which they had formerly received, Căto sold them by auction, that they might not again disturb the peace of the country by their rebellion (Liv. xxxiv. 16).

Bērgōmum, i, n. Bergamo, a town in the north of Italy, near to Cōmum, built by the Gauls (Just. xx. 5). Inh. Bērgōmātes, ium, m.

Bērniūs, i, m. a mountain of Măcēdōniă, at the foot of which stood the town Bērea (Liv. xlv. 29).

Bērōē, es, f. daughter of Ocēānus (Ocēānitis) (Virg. G. iv. 341).—2. A native of Epidauros, and nurse of Sēmēlē (Ov. Met. iii. 278).—3. The wife of Dōryclūs, a Thracian, whose form Iris, at the command of Jūno, assumed, to persuade the Trojan dames to burn their ships, and to settle in Sicily (Virg. Æn. v. 620).—4. The wife of Glauclās, king of Illyricum (Just. xvii. 3).

Bērea, as, f. Cară Veria, a town of Măcēdōniă, on one of the southern branches of Erigon (Liv. xliii. 19). Străbo places it at the foot of the mountain Bērniūs (480), and Plinius seems to have considered it the second city of that country. Inh. Bērēvsi, orum, m. (Liv. xxiii. 39). There was another city of this name in Sýria. Inh. Bērēvses, ium, m. (Plin. i. 579).

Bērŷas, as, m. a Carthaginian, deputed to ratify a treaty with Hicrōnŷmus, king of Sicily, and, finding the Siculi or Lēontini at war with the Romans, he joined them, to which Silus Itălicus alludes (xiv. 152 seq.). See Asilus.

Bērŷtus, i, f. Berut, one of the principal towns of Phœnicia (Tac. Hist. ii. 81. Amm. Mar. xiv. 8). Inh. Bērŷti, orum, m. (Suet. II. Gram. 24). Adj. Bērŷtius, a, um, et, Bērŷtensis, is, e.

Bēsa, as, m. a god among the Egyptians, from whom a city was called Bēsa, afterwards Bēsāntinōus, from Bēsa and Antinōus (Amm. Mar. xix. 12).

Bēsāntio, v. Bīsōntii. See Vēsāntio.

Besāsides, is, m. a Spanish commander, whom, with Budăres, Q. Minūcius Thērmus defeated at Turba, and Budăres was taken prisoner, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 44).

Bēsibicus, i, m. Pocokio, a small island near Proconēsus, Marmora (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Bēsidiās, arum, f. Bisignano, a town of the Bruttii, which revolted from the Carthaginians to the Romans, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 19). It was afterwards called Besidiānum.

Bēssa, as, f. a city of Lōcris, called by the common people of Attica, Bēsa (Hom. II. ii. 532).

Bēsī, orum, m. a ferocious people of Thracia, Romania, who lived to the west of Hēbrus, the Maritza, near the source of that river (Cæs. B. C. iii. 4).

Bēsūs, i, m. a satrap of the Băctriāni, by whom Dărius was both betrayed and killed. For this crime Alexander the Great gave him to Oxathres, a brother of Dărius, that he might be put to death by torture (Just. xii. 5 seq. Curt. iv. 6: vii. 5).

Bēstius, i, m. a man frugal and fond of money (Pers. vi. 37).

Bētæ, arum, m. a people of Sērica (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Bētāsi, orum (Sing. Bētāsius, i), m. the Betasians, a people of Găllia, France, adjoining to the Nervians (Tac. Hist. iv. 56).

Bētis, is, m. defended with great bravery the treasures of Dărius, king of Pērsiă, nor did he show less courage when taken prisoner and carried before Alexander, whose rage he provoked by his intrepidity, and he dragged him at his chariot wheels, boasting that he acted in imitation of his ancestor, Achilles (Curt. iv. 6).

Bētriăcum. See Bēbriăcum.

Bētūs Chilo, Bētū Chilonis, m. a man of rank, murdered in Găllia (Tac. Hist. i. 37).

Bēndos Vētus, Bēndēos Vētēris, n. Bayad, a town of Phrygia, Ptōlēmæus inaccurately says of Pămphyliă, since it was to the north of Sŷnnăda (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Bēvus, i, m. a river of Macedonian Illyricum (Liv. xxxi. 33), which passed the town Bēva (Steph.).

Bēzăbdē, es, f. Jezirah, a town on the Tigris, called anciently, Phœnicia (Amm. Mar. xx. 7), at which there is a well known pass over the river.

Bēzira, as, f. a city of India, which Alexander the Great besieged, in 325 B. C. (Curt. viii. 10).

Blāhor, ōris, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Agamemnon (Hom. II. xi. 92).—

2. A son of Tiber and Māntō, surnamed Ocnus, was king of the Etrusci, and built Mantua, which he so called in honour of his mother (Virg. Æn. x. 197 seq.).—3. A centaur, whom Theseus killed at the nuptials of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 345 seq.).—4. A nobleman of the Acarnānes, who, with Archēsilāus, recommended, in the assembly at Lōicas, convened by L. Quinctius Flāminius, lieutenant-general, an alliance with the Romans, for which they were both afterwards condemned as traitors. Resolved either to be acquitted or suffer whatever should happen, they, with the praetor Zenixidas, went into an assembly of the people, and spoke at first in the manner of suppliants, afterwards stated their case with more boldness, and at last complained of the cruelty and injustice which they had received, by which the people were so much affected, that they repealed the decree respecting them, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 16).

Bias, āntis, m. father of Lāōgōnus and Dārdānus, who were both killed by Achilles (Hom. II. xx. 469).—2. Son of Amŷthāon, and one of the five Pylia chiefs who fought under the banners of Nestor at Troy (Hom. II. iv. 236 seq.).—3. A native of Prīlē, a town of Iōnia, and one of the seven wise men of Greece. When that place fell into the hands of the enemy, he fled nearly naked, taking none of his property with him. On being asked why he did so, he answered, "Omnia mea mecum porto" (Val. Max. iv. 1).

Bibāculus, i. m. a poet, who wrote sarcastic verses on the family of the Caesars (Tac. Ann. iv. 54). By the Caesars, the historian must have meant either Julius Caesar or Augustus. Biblus, i. f. a reed, or aquatic plant, which grew in Egypt, used as paper first at Mēmphīs, Monakee a Dashed, hence Lūcānus, Nondum fūmāneās Mēmphīs contēdere biblos, nōderat (Phar. iii. 222).

Bibrāctō, is. n. afterwards Augūstōdūnum, i. n. Autun, the largest and richest town of the Edūi, stood upon the Arroux, one of the northern branches of Ligēris, the Loire, towards the source of that river. At this town in the 7th year of the Gallic war, a general assembly of the whole country was held, to choose a commander-in-chief, on whom the uncontrolled direction of all their military operations should be conferred. The Edūi, who claimed that honour, had to submit to the unanimous election of Vercingetōrix q. v. (Caes. B. G. i. 23 seq.).—2. Bray, the chief town of the Bibrōci, a British nation, who inhabited what now forms the northwest part of Berkshire.

Bibrax, ācis, f. Bievre, a town of the Rēmi on Axōna, the Aisne (Caes. B. G. ii. 6).

Bibrōci, orum, m. a British nation, who inhabited what now forms the northwest part of Berkshire. Their chief town was Bibrāctō, Bray. At the time Caesar invaded Britain, they, with the Cēnōmāgūi, Ancārites, and Cāsili, seem to have been subject to Cassivellaunus (Caes. B. G. v. 21).

Bibūla, ae. f. a woman, with whom Sertōrius was in love. Both appear to be fictitious names (Juv. Sat. vi. 142).

Bibulus, i. m. a Roman, who was killed by a wound received from a spear, on which he had accidentally fallen, in the battle between Hannibal and the dictator, M. Minucius Rufus (Sil. Ital. vii. 623).

C. Bibulus, C. Bibuli, m. held the office of edile, in the year 22 (Tac. Ann. iii. 52).

Bices, v. Býces, is. m. Gniloc-mare, a lake in Chersōnēsus Taurica. The Latins called it Putris lācus, which the modern name denotes in the language of the inhabitants of that country (Val. Flacc. vi. 68). This word is variously written; Plinius has Býges, Pōmpōnius Mēla, Býces. There was a river of this name, which the lake received, as well as Gerrhus and Hýpānis q. v.

Bicon, ōnis, m. a Greek, who procured the death of Mācerianus by the agency of one Boxus (Curt. ix. 7).

Biēnor, ōris, m. a man of rank and influence among the Cýzicēni, killed on the return of the Argonauts to the town of Cýzicus, Chizico. Vālerius Flaccus adds, he was a man of greater bravery than his father (iii. 112). See Pyrrhus.

Bigērra, ae. f. a town of Hispania Tarrācōnēsis, besieged by the Carthaginians, Hādrūbal, Māgo, and Hādrūbal, the son of Gisgo; but, at the approach of Cn. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō, they retreated without a battle, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 41).

Bigērrōnes, v. Bigērrōnes, iūm. m. a people of Aquitānia, who, with several other adjoining tribes, surrendered to P. Crāssus, a lieutenant-general of C. Julius Caesar. Their territory was bounded on the S. by the Pyrenees, and was nearly at equal distances from the Mediterranean and the Bay of Biscay (Caes. B. G. iii. 27).

Bilbilis, is. f. Baubola, a town of Spain, situated near Salo, the Xalon, one of the southern branches of Ibērus, the Ebro, on a river of the same name. The water of Bilbilis was supposed to possess the quality of giving an excellent temper to steel (Just. xlv. 3). The name of this town frequently occurs in the epigrams of Martiālis, and appears to have been a place of considerable note, although not of great extent. Bilbilis superba auro et ferro (Mart. xii. 18).

Bilistāges, is. m. a petty prince of the Ilērgētes, who sent his son and two other ambassadors to M. Pōrcius Cāto, on his arrival in that country, in 197 B. C., requesting aid in the most humble manner, because their fortresses were besieged, and they had no hope but in the assistance of the Romans. Cāto pretended that he would send them instant assistance, but did not do it (Liv. xxxiv. 11–13).

Billeus, i. n. the Falios, a river of Bithynia, which falls into the Black Sea.

Bingium, i. n. Bingen, a town in Gallia, France (Tac. Hist. iv. 70).

Blon, ōnis, m. a deserter, who warned Alexander the Great of a stratagem practised by Dārius, in order to overcome his cavalry, before the battle at Arbēla (Curt. iv. 13).—2. A philosopher and a poet, who wrote in the bitterest strain of satire. His severity was not confined to the poets of the lower order, for he attacked Hōmērus. His name occurs in Cicēro, Plūtārchus and Diōgēnes Laērtius, who surname him Bōrysthēnites. Adj. Blōnēus, a. um. Blōnēis sermōnibus, in keenest satire (Hor. Epis. ii. 2. 60).

Birrius, i. m. a noted highwayman (Hor. Sat. i. 4. 69).

Bisaltia, ae. f. a town and district of Mā-ecēdōnia, on both sides of Strýmon, the Strumona, in which all the hares were said to have double livers. Inh. Bisáltē, arum, (Sing. Bisáltēs, ē), m. described by Livius as very brave (xiv. 30). Bisáltis, idis, f. of Bisáltia, applied to females or nouns feminine. Thēophānē, daughter of Bisáltus, from whom the name of the town and country is probably derived, whom Neptūnus transformed into a ewe and himself into a ram, bore to him Chrysomallus q. v. that carried Phryxus to Colchis, and whose golden fleece Iason carried off from the grove in which Æetes had suspended it (Ov. Met. vi. 117). Adj. Bisálticus, a, um.

Bisānthē, es, f. Rodosto, a town of Thrācia, on Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 7. Herod. vii. 137).

Bison, ōntis, v. ōnis, m. a kind of buffalo or wild ox, of which Caesar has given the best description to be found in the writings of the ancients (B. G. vi. 26). The natural history of this animal is unknown.

Bisōntii, orum, f. Besançon, a town in the territory of the Sēquani. It is sometimes written Bēsāntio and Vēsōntio q. v. (Amm. Mar. xv. 11).

Bistōnla, ē, f. a city of Thrācia, Romania, said to have received its name from Biston and Cālirrhōē, a daughter of Nēstus, the brother of Odōmas and Edōnus (Steph.). Inh. Bistōnes, um, m. often used to denote the Thracians. Their shields were either like the half-moon or a crescent (Sil. Ital. ii. 76). Bistōnis, idis, f. a lake in the vicinity of the town. Bistōnis, idis, f. applied to nouns feminine. Bistōnis ora (Ov. Ep. Her. xvi. 344). Adj. Bistōnulus, a, um. Bistōnulus rex, Tereus (Virg. Cu. 251). Bistōnulus vates, Orpheus (Sil. Ital. xi. 473). Bistōnulae aves, cranes (Luc. Phar. iii. 200).

Bistula, v. Visula, v; m. See Vistula.

Bitaxa, v, f. Badkis, a town of Arīa (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Bithus, i, m. a celebrated gladiator, mentioned by Hōrātius as the perfect equal of Bāchus. There is keen satire in this comparison, indicating that Rūpilius Rex and Pērsius were on a footing of similar equality (Sat. i. 7. 20).

Bithyas, v, m. an officer in the army of Gulussa, who, after the death of Māsīnissa, with eight hundred cavalry, deserted to the Carthaginians against his countrymen and the Romans (Ap. Bel. Pun. 67).

Bithyas, v, m. a river, near which the Thracians Bithyni lived (Ap. Bel. Mith. 171).

Bithynia, ē, f. anciently called Bēbrēcia, a considerable country of Asia Minor, Natolia, which had Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, on the N., Bōsphōrus Thrācius, the Strait of Constantinople, Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, and Mýsia on the W., Mýsia, Phrygia, and Gālātia on the S., and Pāphlāgōnia on the E. Although it does not appear to have ever been of great extent, it was certainly, at one period, a very powerful kingdom. It appears to have been a hilly country, which Mānilius has beautifully expressed, jūgis Bithynia dīes (iv. 759). Xēnōphon calls it Asiatic Thrace. Inh. Bithyni, orum (Sing. Bithynus, i), m. the Bithynians. According to Hērōdōtus and Strābo, both the Bithyni and Thyni were originally colonies from Thrācia. The Thyni inhabited the coast of the Black Sea, and the Bithyni the inland part of Pōntus. Hērōdōtus always distinguishes them. In process of time the whole were called Bithyni, to which Claudianus alludes, Thyni Thracas arant quia nunc Bithynia fertur (xx. 247). Bithynis, idis, f. applied to females or nouns feminine. Bithynis Mēlēr (Ov. Amor. iii. 6. 25). Adj. Bithynus, Bithynius, Bithynicus, Bithyniacus, a, um, et, Bithyniacensis, is, e. Bithynia cārīna, a Bithynian ship, from the Bithynians excelling in a knowledge of nautical affairs (Hor. Od. i. 35. 7). Bithyni equites, Bithynian knights, i. e. men raised from poverty to that rank (Juv. Sat. vii. 15). Bithynicus Vāllēsius (Juv. Sat. xv. 1).

Bithynicus, i, m. a man described by Mār-tialis as a legacy-hunter. Love of money seems to have been his ruling passion, and, in reference to that bent of his inclination, the same poet frequently introduces his name (ii. 26).

Bitias, v. Býtias, v, m. a Tyrian, who went to Carthage with Dido, in whose court he held a high rank (Virg. Æn. i. 738).—2. A Trojan, son of Alcānor, who lived in mount Ida, by Iera, was one of the companions of Æneas, and killed by Tūrnus. He was the brother of Pāndārus, and a man of great stature, as well as of great strength and bravery (Virg. Æn. ix. 672—709).

Bitis, is, m. son of Cōtys, king of Thrācia, was taken prisoner in the army of Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, led in triumph by L. Æmillus Paulus, and then sent into custody at Cārsēōli. Soon after the triumph, Cōtys sent ambassadors to Rome, with money to procure the release of his son and the other hostages, whom the senate instantly returned without ransom, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 42).

Bitotus, i, m. a Gaul, i. e. a Galatian, who killed Mithridātes at his own request, in 67 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 102).

Biton, ōnis, m. a son of Argia, a priestess of Jūno, who, with his brother, Clēōbis, drew their mother in her chariot to the temple, a distance of forty-five stadia, when the oxen were not ready in time. For this act of filial affection, the priestess prayed the goddess to confer on them the greatest reward which could be given to man. After feasting with their mother, they fell asleep, and next morning were found dead, from which Sōlon infers, that death was the greatest blessing (Herod. i. 31). To these brothers Claudianus refers (l. 39).

Biton, ōntis, v. Bitōntus, i, f. Bitonto, a paltry town in the south of Italy (Mart. ii. 48).

Bitūltus, i, m. a king of the Arvēni, who joined the Allobrōges, and was defeated in 122 B. C. In that engagement he lost eleven hundred and twenty men, and having come to Rome to satisfy the senate, he was sent into custody at Alba, because it was judged unsafe to allow him to return to Gallia, France. Not satisfied with this unjust imprisonment, the senate decreed that Congentiātus, son of that monarch, should be seized and brought to Rome (Liv. Ep. 61). Eutrōpius says that Bitūltus surrendered himself to the consul, Dōmītius Calvīnus, who carried him to the capital (iv. 22), and Flōrus, that he was led in triumph, and formed the most conspicuous figure in the procession, from his riding in a silver chariot just as he had fought (iii. 2). In Valērius Māximus he is called Detultus (ix. 6).

Bitūriges, um (Sing. Bitūrix, igs), et, Bitūriges; arum, m. a nation of Gallia Celta, who lived on the west side of Ligūris, the Loire, which separated them from the Edūi. Their chief city, Avāricum, was afterwards called from its inhabitants Bitūriges; hence the modern name Bourges. They burned 20 of their own towns in one day, to distress the Romans. According to Livius, the supreme government of the Celts was in the hands of the Bitūriges (v. 34).

Bivius Cūrius, Bivii Cūrii, m. an officer of the cavalry in Caesar's army (Ces. B. C. i. 24).

Bizes, is, m. a river of Bithŷnia, mentioned by Ammianus Mārcellinus (xxii. 8), where the proper reading seems to be Lŷcus q. v.

Blesus, i, m. a man mentioned by Stātiŷs, supposed by some to be Jūnius Blesus whom the Emperor Vitēllius ordered to be put to death (Suet.).—2. A servant of Atēdilius Mellor, whose death he lamented. Adj. Blesianus, a, um. Facis Blesianum (Mart. viii. 38).

Blānda, a, v. Blāndie, arum, f. Maratea, a town of Lūcŷnia (Plin.); of Brutlius ager (Mela), besieged and taken by Q. Fābius Māximus, the Roman consul, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 20).

Blāndŷsia. See Bandŷsia.

Blasŷphomices, um, m. a people of Lūsitānia (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 286).

Blāttāri, a, m. a man of most infamous practices (Mart. xi. 48).

Blāttius, i, m. a leading man of Sālāpla, who favoured the Romans, and at last prevailed on Dāsius, the other leading man in the town, to surrender it to that people when it was in the possession of Hānnibal in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 38).

Blēmŷe, arum, m. a people of Africa near Nilus, the Nile, whom Pōmpōnilius Mēla considers as scarcely men, alleging that they bore a greater resemblance to animals. This author calls them Blēmŷes (i. 37). According to ancient history, they had no head, and their mouth and eyes were fixed in their breasts (Plin. i. 549). About the year 296, these barbarians opposed themselves to the power of the Romans, and the Emperor Diocletianus prevailed on the Nobātē to quit their ancient habitations in the deserts of Lŷbia, and allowed them to occupy the territory about Sŷenē, Essouan, on condition that they should guard the frontiers of the empire from the Blēmŷes and other enemies. Per Merēa Blēmŷasque fēros atramque Sŷenē (Claud. xvii. 19).

Blēplius, i, m. a native of ŷgina. Blēplianus, a, m. one of his descendants (Pin. Ol. viii. 99).

Blitius Cātullinus, Blitii Cātullini, m. a man whom the Emperor Nēro banished to an island in the Archipelago. Besides Blitius, four were condemned at the same time to the same punishment (Tac. Ann. xv. 71).

Blitor, ŷris, m. governor of Mēŷŷpŷtāmŷa, dismissed by Antigŷnus, because he gave a free passage to Sēlcus (Ap. Bel. Syr. 121).

Blosi, orum, m. two brothers, natives of Cāpua, who formed a conspiracy with the intention of setting fire to the huts covered with straw, in which the Roman troops were lodged, near that town, in 212 B. C. To the humanity of the slaves, the Romans were indebted for their safety, and the lives of the conspirators atoned for their crime (Liv. xxvii. 3).

C. Blosius, C. Blosii, m. a native of Cūma, was the intimate friend of Tib. Sēmprŷnius Grācchus, whose character and measures he defended with more zeal than prudence, after that ambitious Roman had been deservedly put to death, says Valērius Māximus, because he preferred his own power to the safety of his country. Leaving Italy, where his life was in danger, he fled to Aristŷnicus, on whose affairs becoming desperate he killed himself, about 133 B. C. (Val. Max. iv. 7).

Boadicā, a, f. wife of Prasutāgus, king of the Icenians, a nation of South Britain. On the death of Prasutāgus, the Roman centurions pillaged his house, seized on his property, as lawful plunder, disgraced his widow by stripes, and violated his daughters. Enraged at the violence of the Romans, the Icenians flew to arms, and the Trinobantians joined them. Boadicā, in a warlike car, with her two daughters before her, took the field, and harangued the troops as they advanced to a general engagement, imploring them to revenge the injuries suffered from the Romans. The undisciplined Britons could not withstand the first onset of the Roman army, and betook themselves to flight as soon as they had discharged their missile weapons, which they did at random, rather than with steady aim. Their brave queen put an end to her life by poison (Tac. Ann. xiv. 31—37).

Boē, arum, f. an island of Dalmātia (Amm. Mar. xxii. 3).

Bōagrius, i, m. a river of Lŷeris, called likewise Mānes (Hom. Il. ii. 533).

Bōcchar, āris, m. king of the Mauri, who gave Māsīnissa troops sufficient to protect him to the frontiers of his kingdom, as he returned from Hispānia, Spain; but would not assist him in the war for the recovery of his hereditary dominions, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 30).—2. A man of activity and enterprise, one of the prefects of Sŷphax, whom that prince sent with an army against Māsīnissa, on whose head he had set a price. From the number of his troops, Bōcchar defeated Māsīnissa, who fled with not more than five hundred horse, but the conqueror pursued him, and, on the level ground about Clāpēa, surrounded him, when he and only other four escaped. The pursuit was continued until they came to a large river, into which Māsīnissa and the surviving four plunged their horses. Two of the four were drowned, but Māsīnissa and the other two escaped to the farther side, on which Bōcchar returned and reported to the king, that Māsīnissa was dead (Liv. xxxix. 32). Bōcchar and Bōccher were common names in Mauritānia. Jūvēnalis uses it as a general appellation, to denote an African, alluding to their offensive smell from anointing themselves with oil (Sat. v. 90).

Bōcchŷris, idis, m. a king of Egypt, who, according to Tacitus, was on the throne of that kingdom when the Israelites were expelled from that country (Hist. v. iii). Diŷdŷrus Sicŷlus describes this monarch as slender in person, but surpassing, in genius and knowledge, all the kings who had been before him (i. 65).

Bœchus, i, m. king of Maurîtânîa, Morocco and Fez. He was the father-in-law of Jûgûrtha (Sal. Jug. 80), and assisted him, after C. Mârius had driven him out of Nûmîdiâ. He had heard of the name of the Romans only, but was an entire stranger to their character as a nation, and to the extent of their dominions. Like other savages, for he does not appear to have been much above that rank of human beings, he had some fortitude, but more cunning. Selfishness entirely regulated his conduct: for generosity, or greatness of mind, is seldom found amongst uncivilised nations. An unsuccessful battle or two made him withdraw from the interest of the Numidian king, and the promise of additional territory induced him to deliver up Jûgûrtha in chains to C. Mârius, in 108 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 66). L. Cœnilius Sûlla, lieutenant-general of Mârius, treated with him respecting Jûgûrtha; and in that transaction he displayed all the inconstancy peculiar to uncultivated minds. His guilt, in betraying to his enemies the unfortunate monarch, his own son-in-law, to whom he offered protection in his kingdom, does not exceed the meanness and injustice of the Romans, who impelled him to that measure, in order to get into their hands, by treachery, a prince whom they could not conquer by force of arms.

Bodotriâ, æ, f. the Firth of Forth, which separates the county of East Lothian from that of Fife. It forms the mouth of the river Forth, which has its rise at the foot of Ben Lomond, and, running in a southeast direction, passes Stirling, and falls into the German Sea (Tac. Ag. 23).

Bôdûôgnâtus, i, m. the commander of the Nêrvî, at the time they attacked the Roman army under Cæsar (Cæs. B. G. ii. 23).

Bœa, æ, v. Bœæ, arum, f. Castro, a town of Læcôniâ, near the southern extremity of Mâlêa Promontorium, Cape Malco. In the common editions of Lîvius, Pleias occurs, xxxv. 27, where the reading ought to be Bœas. Adj. Bœâticus, a, um. Bœâticus Sînus, the Gulf of Vatikâ.

Bœbê, es, f. Hadjine, a town of Thessaly, on the coast near Phêræ, Belestina, said to have been founded by Bœbus, son of Glâphûros. Bœbêis, îdis, f. Esero, a deep lake in the vicinity of that town, which stood on a promontory projecting into the water, and of which the ruins are still visible. Both the town and lake were called Xÿnla. The destruction of Cêrcinîum by Amynânder, king of the Athamânes, and the Âtôli, impelled the inhabitants in the vicinity of this lake to quit their cities, and to betake themselves to the mountains, in 201 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 41). Per Ossæam Bœbêida (Luc. Phæ. vii. 176). Adj. Bœbêus, a, um. Bœbêia prôles, the nymphs of that lake (Val. Flacc. iii. 543). Bœbrÿcius, a, um, occurs in Lûcânus (Phæ. vi. 382). The reading here doubtful, but the adjective ought certainly to be derived from Bœbê, and should probably be written Bœbeus, an emendation supported by Stephânus.

Bœôtiâ, æ, f. a country of Greece, bounded by Eurîpus, the Strait of Negropont, on the north; by Attica; Livadia, on the east; Attica and Mægâra on the south; and by Phôcis on the west. The atmosphere of Bœôtiâ was very thick, which was supposed to render the inhabitants dull and stupid. They paid, says Cœrnilius Nêpos, more attention to the improvement of bodily strength than to the cultivation of the mental faculties. Many illustrious men were, however, natives of this country. It is sufficient to mention Epâmînôndas, Pêlôpidas, Plûtarchus, Hêsiôdus, and Pindârus. There is no part of Greece in which strangers are now treated with so little respect as in Bœôtiâ. Inh. Bœôti, v. Bœôtti, orum, m. sent to the Trojan war fifty ships, each having on board an hundred and twenty men, under the command of Pênêleüs, Lêitus, Arcêsîlâus, Prôthôenor, and Clônius (Hom. Il. ii. 494 seq.). In crasso aëre Bœôtum, in the thick atmosphere of the Bœôti (Hor. Epis. ii. 1. 244). Adj. Bœôtus, Bœôtius, et, Bœôticus, a, um. Bœôtiâ mania, Thêbe, Theba (Ov. Met. iii. 13). Bœôticum ingenium, an obtuse understanding.

Bœthôus, i, m. a Spartan of high birth, the father of Etêôneüs. Bœthides, æ, m. Etêôneüs (Hom. Od. iv. 31).

Bœtûs, i, m. a celebrated Carthaginian carver (Virg. Cu. 66. Plin. v. 75. Paus. v. 17).

Bogud, îdis, m. king of Maurîtânîa, and husband of Eunôë q. v. (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 52).

Bôgus, i, m. an augur in the army of Hânîbal, who fell in the battle at Trisîmênus. He showed his eagerness for war by throwing the first dart in the engagement at Ticius, by which Câtus was killed (Sil. Ital. iv. 131: v. 402).

Bôia, æ, f. a town in Gállia Cêltica, the site of which is now unknown (Cæs. B. G. vii. 14).

Boiênum, v. Boiohênum, i, n. a country of Germany, which derived its name from the people who occupied it (Tac. Mor. Ger. 28). Inh. Boii (2 syl.), orum (Sing. Boius, i), m. the Boians, a people of Gállia Cêltica, who inhabited the country watered by the river Sigmânus, Signâtius, v. Igmânus, the Sollac. There were several tribes of the Boii, who lived in different parts of Gállia, France, and of Germâniâ, Germany; one of which must have been adjoining to the Arvêni. In the latter country their name is still recognised in the districts, Bavaria, and Bohemia, Boierheim, i. e. the residence of the Boii.—2. A powerful people in the north of Italy, unquestionably descendants from the Boii in France. The Romans subdued them, but not before 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 39). Like the other Gauls, they often engaged with the Romans, and their name frequently occurs in the history of Lîvius, who mentions that they made cups of the skulls of their enemies (xxiii. 34).

Boiocâlus, i, m. the chief of the Ansibârî, a wandering people whom he offered to place under the protection of the Romans. By his bravery he had gained renown as a soldier, and he distinguished himself by a steady adherence to the interests of Rome. Tacitus has recorded his speech to Dûbius Avitus, the answer of that officer who offered him land, and the refusal of Boiocâlus, who regarded it as the reward of treachery, and, therefore, rejected it with disdain (Tac. Ann. xiii. 55, 56).

Boiohênum, i, n. Bohemia, a country of Germany, of which Marobodûus was king (Vel. Pat. ii. 109). See Boiênum.

Boiôrix, îdis, m. chieftain of the Boii (2 syl.), who, with his two brothers, brought the whole nation of the Boii to make war against the Romans, attacked the camp of Tib. Sēmprōnīus Longus, consul, obtained possession of some part of it; but at last were repulsed with the loss of eleven thousand men, whilst the Romans lost only five thousand (Liv. xxxiv. 46, 47).—2. A king of the Cimbri, who caused M. Aurēlius Scāurus, a lieutenant-general under the Roman consul, to be put to death, in 107 B. C., merely because he had said in the council that the Romans could not be conquered (Liv. Ep. 67). According to Florus, he fell in battle, fighting with great bravery (liv. 3).

Bōla, a, e, Bōla, et, Vōla, arum, f. Poli, a town of Lātifum, taken by the Romans from the Æqui, in 414 B. C., and a colony proposed to be sent thither, but not carried. Inh. Bōlani, orum, m. (Liv. iv. 49). Adj. Bōlanus, a, um. Bōlanus ager, the territory of the Bōlani (Liv. iv. 51).

Bōlānus. See Vēttius.

Bōlātinum ostium. See Nilus.

Bōlānus, i, m. a man mentioned by Hōrātius, of simple and unceremonious manners, who hated impertinence, and always went away from the first appearance of it (Sat. I. 9. 11).

Bōmilcar, āris, m. a noble Carthaginian, nephew of Hāmilcar, who died in Sicily, after he had effected a peace between Agāthōcles and the Syracusans. When Agāthōcles had obtained a decisive victory over the Carthaginians, Bōmilcar intended to join him, had he not been prevented by a sedition in the army of Agāthōcles, and his countrymen, coming to the knowledge of his traitorous intention, put him to death by crucifixion, about 308 B. C. (Just. xxi. 7).—2. The father of Hāmo q. v. who served under Hānibal (Liv. xxi. 27).—3. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet, who, after sailing to Lōcri, entered the great harbour of Syracūse with forty-five ships of war, in 216 B. C. In the knowledge of naval affairs, he appears to have surpassed the Romans, yet his merits did not prevent the town from submitting to the latter (Liv. xxiv. 36 seq.).—4. An officer in the army of Jūgūrtha, king of Nūmidia, to whom he entrusted secret and important business. With the elephants and part of the infantry under his command, he attacked Rūtillus and was defeated. Faithless and unsteady, he conspired against his master, admitted Nābdāsa as an accomplice, to whom he wrote a letter, urging the execution of the plot, which, having accidentally been discovered, cost Bōmilcar his life, and many others accessory to his design (Sal. Jug. 35—72).

Bōna, v. Bonna, a, f. Bonn, a city of Germany, in the electorate of Cologne (Tac. Hist. iv. 19).

Bōnōlia, a, f. Bologna, a town of Gallia Cisalpina, on Rhēnus, the Reno. A Latin colony of three thousand men, settled at Bōnōlia, in 191 B. C., each horseman received seventy acres, and each of the other colonists fifty acres, of the land which had been taken from the Galli Boii, and from the Galli, who had expelled the Tusci (Liv. xxxvii. 37). Three years after the planting of that colony, C. Flāminius, consul, made a road from Bōnōlia to Arrētium, Arrezzo, to keep his soldiers in employment, after he had conquered the Frinīates Ligūres, and Apīani Ligūres.

It was anciently called Felsina. Culta Bōnōlia (Mart. iii. 59). Inh. Bōnōliense, ium, m. Adj. Bōnōliensis, is, e. Bōnōliensis ager (Liv. xxxix. 2).—2. Banastar, or, Bonmunster, a town in Pannōlia (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 11).

Bōnōsus, i, m. a native of Spain, whose mother was a Gaul, but his ancestors were Britons. According to his own account, his father exercised the profession of a rhetorician, whilst others assert, that he taught a grammar school. His education devolved upon his mother, as his father died, leaving him an infant, and her wish appears to have been, that he should prosecute his studies. His natural inclination led him to prefer war to literature. Thus prompted by love of arms, he entered the army, in which he rose to the rank of a tribune, and, at last, obtained the command of the troops which guarded the frontiers of Rhaetia. What distinguished him from other men, was the power of drinking to any extent without being the least intoxicated. This quality procured many advantages to the Emperor, for by drinking with the ambassadors of the barbarians till they became drunk, he elicited all their secrets. The connexions of his wife, who was of the royal blood of the Goths, furnished him with opportunities of obtaining information of great importance for the Emperor to know. Through carelessness he allowed the Germans to burn a fleet which the Romans kept upon the Rhine, dread of punishment induced him to declare himself Emperor, a practice then common among the principal officers of the army, and it was not without difficulty that Prōbus conquered him in the year 280. Bōnōsus fled to Cōlōnia Agrippina, Cologne, where he hanged himself. The soldiers, observing him in that humiliating situation, derided his lifeless body, saying, "there hangs a pitcher, not a man." The Emperor treated with uncommon respect, his widow, a woman of great merit, gave her a pension from the imperial treasury, and permitted her two sons to live (Eutrop. ix. 17).

Bōōtes, is, v. Bōōtes, a, m. the Greek name of a constellation not far from the North Pole, which the Latins called Būbūlicus, i. e. the Ox-driver, because it follows the Ursa Māior, as a driver does the cattle. Some of the writers of antiquity maintained that Icārus, with his daughter Erigōnē, was changed into these stars, and others asserted that Arcas, the son of Jūpiter and Cāllisto, a daughter of Lŷcāon q. v. passed, after his death, into this constellation. Hence the name Arctōphylax, i. e. the keeper of the bear, as if his filial affection for his mother had remained after she had been metamorphosed into the Ursa Māior, and he had suffered a similar transformation. Hypērbōrēus Bōōtes (Mart. iv. 3).

Bora, a, f. a mountain of Mācēdōnia. The readings are various (Liv. xlv. 29). It ought probably to be Bērmlus q. v.

Bōrēas, a, m. the north wind, so called by the Greeks. See Aquilo. Adj. Bōrēus, a, um. Sub Bōrēo axe, under the north pole (Ov. Trist. iv. 8. 41).

Bōrium, i, n. Cape Tejones, a promontory of Cŷrēnālca (Amm. Mar. xxii. 15).

Sp. Borius, Sp. Borii, a, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who procured the repeal of the Agrarian law, on the death of the Græchi (Ap. Bel. Civ. 366).

Börn, orum, m. a fort in Chersōnēsus Thrācia, the peninsula of Gallipoli (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 7).

Borsippa, e, f. a town on the east of Euphrates, to which Alexander the Great repaired in 325 B. C., because the Māgi had foretold that Bābylon would prove fatal to him (Just. xii. 13).

Bōrus, i, m. son of Pēriēres, and husband of Pōlydōra, sister of Achilles (Hom. II. xvi. 177).—2. A noble Lycian, whose son, Phæstus, Idōmēneus slew (Hom. II. v. 44).

Bōrysthēnes, is, m. the Dneiper, a river, anciently of Scythia, now of Russia, which has its source about forty miles above Smolensk, flows in numerous windings, and falls into the Black Sea between Oczakow and Kinburn. Its mouth is very difficult to navigate, in consequence of the north wind leaving it full of shallows, and the sands are continually shifting, which renders the channel so dangerous that ships are seldom seen in the harbour of Cherson. Bōrysthēnidae, v. Bōrysthēnite, arum, m. people who lived upon the banks of the Dneiper, called by Prōpērtius, Hēbēni, wintry, from the coldness of the climate (ii. 17. 18). Adj. Bōrysthēnius, a, um. Bōrysthēnius annis, the Dneiper (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 10. 53).

Bōspōrus, i, m. a strait which forms a communication between two seas (Luc. Phar. vii. 178). The name is derived from an ox or cow being able to swim across (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). Thrācius Bōspōrus, the Strait of Constantinople. Applianus seems to think that the cow, into which Io was changed, gave name to this strait, from her having swummed across it (Ap. Bel. Mith. 240). Cimmērius Bōspōrus, the Strait of Caffa. Bōspōrani, orum, m. people living on Bōspōrus Cimmērius, the Strait of Caffa (Eutrop. viii. 3). Adj. Bōspōrius, Bōspōricus, et, Bōspōranus, a, um. Bōspōricum mārē (Ov. Trist. ii. 298). Bōspōricum mārē, called also Cimmērium and Scythicum (Gel. xvii. 8). Bōspōranum bellum, the war with Mithridātes (Tac. Ann. xii. 63). Bōspōranus tractus (Val. Max. vii. 6).

Bōstar, aris, m. a Carthaginian, who had the command at Sīgūntum in 219 B. C. The crafty sagacity of Bōstar, according to Līvius, was inferior to that of his countrymen, but this was probably in consequence of having been overreached by Abēlux q. v. (Līv. xxii. 22).—2. A noble Carthaginian, who served in the army of Hannibal, and whom that distinguished warrior frequently sent on embassies. He, Gisgo, and Māgo, concluded a treaty in person with Philippus, king of Mācedon, which his ambassadors had formed with Hannibal in Italy. Bōstar and Hāno commanded the Carthaginian garrison at Cāpua when besieged by the Romans, and after Hannibal had failed in his attempts to raise the siege, they wrote him a severe letter on his retiring to Brūtius ager, charging him with the desertion of that town. The Numidians entrusted with the carrying of that letter entered the Roman camp, pretending to be deserters; but a Campanian woman who had lived with one of them discovered the trick, and on being threatened with torture they acknowledged the truth and gave up the letter (Līv. xxvi. 5—12).

Bōstra, is, f. Bosra, the metropolis of the province of Arābia (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8).

Bōtrōdus, i, m. a grove or forest in Cēlībēria, a northern district of Spain. In ancient times there was a cognominal town. Dēlicātus Bōtrōdus (Mart. i. 50).

Bōttia, a, f. a small district of Mācēdōnia on Sinus Thērmāicus (Līv. xxvi. 25). Inh. Bōttiae, orum, m. (Herod. vii. 185).

Bōvlānum, i, v. Bōvlāna, orum, n. Boiano, a town of Italy, in the country of the Sāmītes. From Plīnius there appear to have been two, Bōvlānum vētus, and Bōvlānum Undecumanōrum, from being colonized by soldiers of the eleventh legion (i. 359). It (Bōvlānum vētus) was the capital of the Pēntri Sāmītes, and by far the richest and most powerful in arms and men. The Romans took it by a regular siege, and gave the plunder to the soldiers, in 314 B. C. From Līvius it seems to have been retaken oftener than once by the Sāmītes; but the Romans ultimately retained possession, and the inhabitants, from necessity, submitted to the laws of the conquerors (Līv. ix. 27—x. 41). Inh. Bōvlānēnses, ium, m. Adj. Bōvlānius, a, um. Bōvlānum lustrum (Sil. Ital. viii. 564).

Bōvillae, arum, f. Fratoecchia, a town of Lātium, on the Appian road, near to Rome, on which account Prōpērtius calls it Suburbāna (iv. 1. 33). It had this name from an ox escaping from the altar on Mons Albānus, Monte Albano, and being taken at this place (Clux.). From the temple of Mars to Bōvillae, a road was paved with flint stones, out of the fines levied on the farmers of the public pastures, in 295 B. C. Here T. Annius Milo, a candidate for the consulship, killed P. Claudius Pūleher (Līv. Ep. 107). The ruins of this town are still visible at Fratoecchia (Tac. Hist. iv. 2). Inh. Bōvillāni, orum, m. Adj. Bōvillānus, a, um. Bōvillānus fundus (Cic. Q. Frat. iii. 1).

Boxus, i, m. the agent of Bīcon in the assassination of Mācērianus q. v. (Curt. ix. 7).

Brācra Augusta, Brācrae Augusta, f. Braga, one of the chief towns of the Cāllāici, to the north of Dūrius, the Douro (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 295).

Brāchmāni, orum, m. philosophers of India, considered as a kind of gymnosophists, and were distinguished for the strictness of their lives. It appears they believed in the immortality of the soul, in future rewards and punishments, and in the existence of a Supreme Being. Pūthāgōras is supposed to have introduced a number of their particular notions into his system of philosophy. Applianus allows their great acuteness and wisdom, and he compares them to the Māgi of Pērsia (Bel. Civ. 526).

Brāchyllas, a, m. the governor of Bōeōtia, in 198 B. C. He was at the head of the faction which favoured the interest of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, on which account he was waylaid and assassinated by six armed men, of whom three were Italians and three Ætolians (Līv. xxxiii. 27 seq.).

Brānchus, i, m. a son of Apollo, others say a Thessalian youth beloved by Apollo. The latter opinion has been adopted by Lactantius and Strābo. Like Apollo, he possessed a knowledge of futurity, and had a temple at Dīndyāma. Pausānias makes it a temple of Apollo (vii. 5). Brānchidae, oftener Brānchidae, arum, m. the descendants of Brānchus.

His priests had likewise this name, and, having robbed the temple by giving the treasure which it contained to Xerxes as he returned to Persia, to escape the punishment of their sacrilege, found it necessary to accompany him (Strab. 910).

Brāucus, i, m. an Allobrogian, dispossessed of the kingdom by a younger brother, was, on a reference by the contending parties, restored to the crown by Hannibal, of which the nobles approved, and for that decision aided Hannibal in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 31).

Brānōvices, ium, m. a tribe of the Aulerci q. v. (Cæs. B. G. vii. 75).

Brānōvii, orum, m. a Gallic nation, probably adjoining to the tribe mentioned in last article (Cæs. B. G. vii. 75).

Bratuspantium, i, n. Bretuil, a town of the Bellōvaci. It is supposed to have stood between Cæsariomagus, afterwards Belvācus, v. Belvācum, Beauvais, and Samarobriva, Amiens (Cæs. B. G. ii. 13). This town is not mentioned by any writer after the commencement of the Christian era.

Brauron, ōnis, m. Brauna, a town of Attica, at which Diana had a temple. Brauna is a village, and writers are not agreed whether it is Brauna, or Urania, represents the ancient town Brauron. No vestige of it remained when Pömpönius Mela wrote. He calls it Braurōnia (ii. 70). Xerxes, in his descent on Greece, robbed the temple of the image of the goddess (Paus. viii. 46). Göllidus Brauron (Stat. Th. xii. 615). Adj. Braurōnius, a, um. Braurōnia Diana.

Brēgitto, v. Brēgitto, ōnis, f. Fuzto, a town of Fānōnōia, near the village Szoeny (Ann. Mär. xxx. 5).

Brennus, i, m. the chieftain of the Gauls, who first besieged Clūsium, Chiusi, and afterwards having been enraged at the conduct of the Roman ambassadors, sent to negotiate a peace between him and the Clūsini, marched directly against Rome, defeated the Roman army on Allia, Rio di Missio, advanced straight to the city of which he took immediate possession without resistance. Surprised at the easiness of the victory, and at seeing the gates open, he at first suspected a stratagem, but afterwards finding the city generally deserted by its inhabitants, his troops began the work of destruction by murdering the aged who remained at home, plundering their houses, and setting them on fire. The capitol only held out, and, having failed in carrying it by assault at the first onset, Brēnnus formed a blockade, expecting that famine would compel the garrison to surrender, whose valour he had been unable to subdue. The tediousness of a siege being most repugnant to the fierce and restless disposition of the Gauls, and the Romans in the capitol being nearly overcome by fatigue and hunger, both parties willingly came to terms of accommodation. The Romans agreed to give a thousand pounds' weight of gold, and while it was weighing, the Gauls having used unjust balances, to which the Romans objected, the insolent Gaul, to add to the indignity, not only threw his sword into the scale, but exclaimed "woe to the conquered." Cēmilius in the mean time arrived, declared the transaction was illegal, because the agreement had been made after he was dictator without his knowledge, and immediately ordered the gold to be carried away, the Gauls to prepare for battle, and his own men to recover their country, not with gold but with steel. In the engagement which ensued, he easily put the Gauls to the route, and afterwards, in a more regular battle, in the Gabian way, made an immense havoc, took their camp, and did not leave a single person to report their defeat to their countrymen, in 389 B. C. (Liv. v. 38—49).—2. Another of this name, who invaded Greece, in 279 B. C., with a hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse, overran Mācēdōnia, and marched with an intention to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphi. The oracle had judiciously advised the inhabitants, who fled at their approach, not to remove their provisions nor wine. The Gauls being allowed some time to rest, drank so freely that they became unfit to move, but recovering a little from their intoxication, rushed into battle, and were overpowered by the Delphians, who had profited by the delay, both in securing the place, and collecting troops. A dreadful slaughter of the Gauls ensued, when Brēnnus, unable to bear the pain of his wounds, put an end to his life with a dagger. A storm followed, which proved fatal to a great number, and the states through which they had marched pursued them straggling, and did not allow a single man to escape (Just. xxiv. 6—8). Pausānias gives a detailed account of his military operations, and attributes his death not to self-destruction but to drinking wine, either from fear of his countrymen or rather from shame at the failure of the expedition (x. 19—23). Vālerius Māximus states that he entered the temple of Apollo, and, at the will of the god, turned his hand against himself (i. 1).—3. Another chieftain of the Gauls, who, at the head of a powerful body, quitted his native country and made his way into part of the country of the Dārdāni, where, in consequence of a dissension, twenty thousand separated from him under Leonōrius and Lutārius, about 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 16).

Brēucus, i, m. a man in the army of Hannibal, killed by Scipio, the Roman consul, at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 233).

Brēuni, v. Brēuci, orum, m. a people of the Alps, whom Hörātius calls veloces, because they preferred sudden and unexpected attacks to pitched and regular engagements with the enemy (Od. iv. 14. 11). From Strābo they appear to have lived on the Italian side, and to have extended to Illyricum (289). In many editions of Hörātius, the word is inaccurately written Brennos. The Emperor Tiberius conquered them (Suet. Tib. 9).

Brīāntica regio, formerly Gāllica, a district belonging to the Ciconians (Herod. vii. 108).

Brīārēs, ōes, m. a son of Cēlus and Tellus, according to Apollōdōrus, and, according to Hyginus, of Æther and Tellus, who had a hundred hands and fifty heads, as had also his brother Gēs and Cēus. Adj. Brīārēs, a, um. Brīārētia turba (Cland. xxxvi. 188).

Brīgāntes, um, m. a numerous people of Britain, who inhabited Northumberland, Cumberland, part of Yorkshire, and as far south as Belisāma, the Mersey, besides part of the county of Roxburgh and Berwickshire. Pētillius Cērēālis conquered the greater part of the Brigantes. (Tac. Agric. 17). Castella Brigantum, the forts or castles of the Brigantes, which, from being a warlike nation, were very strong (Juv. Sat. xiv. 196). See Juantes.

Briges, um, m. the original name of the Phryges q. v.

Brigantia, æ, f. Bregents, a considerable town in Tyrol. Adj. Brigantinus, a, um. Brigantinus lacus, the Lake of Constance, at the eastern extremity of which Brigantia stands.

Brigantium, i, n. Briançon, a small town in the Alps, the capital of Briançonnais, through which is one of the principal roads from France into Italy (Amm. Mar. xv. 19).

Brimō, ūs, f. a name of Proserpina, so called by the Greeks, ἀρὸν βρομῶν, from frightening, because she was believed to occasion fear in the night. Stätius calls her cruel, an epithet frequently applied to Proserpina; questus immitem Brimō, having complained of merciless Brimō (Stat. Syl. ii. 3, 38).

Briniates, um, m. a people of Ligūria, who lived on the farther, i. e. the east side of the Apennines (Liv. xxxix. 2: xli. 19). Their capital was Brinium, Brignolo, on the river Boates.

Brinno, r. Brinio, ōnis, m. a man of noble birth, and of great, but ferocious, bravery, was the chief of the Caninefates. His father had been often in arms against the Romans, and he headed a revolt of his countrymen in the year 69. See Caninefates and Civilis (Tac. Hist. iv. 15).

Briseis, æ (Briseus, ōs, Hom. Il. ix. 132), m. a native of Lyrnessus, a city of the Troad. Briseis, idis, f. a patronymic of Hippodamia, daughter of Briseis, who, on Lyrnessus being taken by the Greeks, fell to the share of Achilles, in the division of the plunder and prisoners. On the oracle requiring Agamemnon to give up his captives, he took Briseis from Achilles, which the latter considering an insult, retired in disgust to his ships. Ovidius makes her write a beautiful epistle to Achilles (Heroid. iii.). At an after period Agamemnon restored her, declaring on oath that he had not touched her, from which time nothing further respecting her is known. Horatius calls her serva, by which he means a captive, not that she had been previously a slave (Od. ii. 4. 3).—2. A play of Accius. Some editions of Persius read Brisei Accii, but improperly (i. 76).

Brisōmā, æ, m. a river of Persia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Britannia, æ, et, Britannis, idis, r. Idos, f. Britain, or, Great Britain, anciently called Albion, ii, n. is the largest island in Mārē Atlanticum, the Atlantic Ocean, belonging to Eurōpa, Europe. That part of the Atlantic, which separates Britain from France, was called Frētum Britannicum, strictly speaking, the Strait of Dover, but its signification seems often to have been more extensive, and to have corresponded nearly with the modern appellation, the English Channel; Océānus Vērgīnius, St. George's Channel, flows between Britain and Hibernia, Ireland, on the W. Océānus Cālēdōnicus, the Scottish Sea, washed the W. and N. W. parts of Scotland, Océānus Hýpērbōreus, the Northern Sea, the northern coast, and Océānus Gēr-mānicus, the German Sea, formed its boundary on the E. Caesar's account, both of the form and extent of this island, is not very far from the truth. But of the character, manners, and customs of the Britons, a very general description only is to be found in the writings of the ancients. Nor can the information contained in the pages of Greek and Roman historians, with respect to the face of the country and to its productions, be expected to be either very minute or satisfactory. To that part of the island lying to the N. of the Grampian mountains, the Romans appear to have been entire strangers, till the days of Cn. Julius Agricola, whose fleet ascertained that Britain was an island, by sailing round the northern extremity of Scotland. Livius and Fabius Rusticus resembled the form to an oblong shield, or a two-edged axe. Tacitus allows the comparison to be just, if Cālēdōnia be not included, which, according to his account, jutted out far into the sea, and terminated in the form of a wedge (Agric. 10). Of the mineralogy of Britain they seem to have known very little; but observe, that pearls and precious stones are found in some of the rivers. Only a single mountain (Mons Grampius), or rather a chain of mountains, is mentioned, and the rivers and promontories which occur in their histories are very few. The island is divided into two parts, southern and northern; the former, from its inhabitants, is called Eng-land, and the latter, for the same reason, Scotland. Great Britain is situated between 50° and 58° 30' N. lat., between 1° 38' of E. and 5° 41' of W. long. Its greatest length does not exceed 600 miles, and its greatest breadth 344. Its surface is computed at 77,243 square miles; population, in 1831, 16,260,381. Britannia diducta nostro mundo, Britain separated from our world, i. e. from the continent of Europe (Claud. xvii. 51). Iah. Britanni, oram (Sing. Britannus, i), et, Britōnes, v. Britōnes, um (Sing. Brito, v. Britto, ōnis), m. At the time the Romans invaded this country, the Britons, like many other uncivilised nations, used chiefly boats of wicker work covered with hides, which both Caesar and Pliny mention, and skiffs of this kind may still be seen in some of the rivers of Wales. The Britons excelled in making baskets, which the Romans both highly valued and claimed being the inventors, yet adopted the British term, calling them Bascauda (Mart. xiv. 99). Many rude nations far surpass any thing in that kind of rush work made by people in a more refined state of society. Caesar asserts, that they painted their bodies, which rendered their appearance more terrific in war. They used vitrum for this purpose, hence Ovid calls them virides Britanni, green Britons, by which he probably meant sky blue, or a shade deeper (Amor. ii. 16. 39). His countrymen state that the Britons were more ferocious and barbarous, as their residence was more remote from the coast of Gallia, France. As the brave and hardy natives of the Highlands of Scotland never submitted to the Roman arms, the Roman historians could know but little, if any thing, of the dispositions and manners of the warlike Caledonians. Britanni contenti minima nocte (Juv. Sat. ii. 161). At the summer solstice, there is scarcely any night in the northern parts of Scotland. Adj. Britānus, et, Britānicus, a, um. Britānnum litus (Claud. viii. 28). Britānicus Océanus (Pliny), from the mouths of the Rhine to that of the Seine, i. e. part of the German Sea, the Strait of Dover, and part of the British Channel.

Brütömārtis, is, f. daughter of Jūpiter and Chārmē. Wishing to enjoy perpetual virginity, she quitted Phœnicia, came first to Argos, thence to Cephallēnia, where she was called, by the natives, Lāphria, and received divine honours. She afterwards went to Crēta, Candia, and, in order to escape from the love of Minos, she fled to some fishers, who concealed her under a net, hence the Crētenses called her Dictyōna, and worshipped her under that name. Andrōmēdes, a fisherman, conveyed her to Ēgina, where he attempted violence, on which she fled to a sacred wood where she disappeared. The Ēginētes consecrated the place where she vanished from their sight, called it Aphaa, and her Aphaa. Ignēa Brütömārtis (Claud. xxiv. 251).

Brütōmārus, i, m. the general of the Gauls, under whose command they swore that they would not loose their belts till they had ascended the Roman capitol. This oath was faithfully kept, but the event very different from their expectation (Flor. ii. 4). See L. Emilii Iūpus.

Brixellum, i, n. Bressello, a town of Itālia, Italy, on Pādus, the Po (Tac. Hist. ii. 43).

Brixia, is, f. Brescia, the capital of the Cēnōmāni (Liv. v. 35), built by the Gauls (Just. xx. 5). Cātullus calls Brixia the mother of Vērona, either because it was an elder city, or because a number removed from it to Vērona, or from its being the metropolis of the Cēnōmāni (lxvii. 34). Inh. Brixianī, orum, m. gave their assistance to the Romans, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 25). Adj. Brixianus, a, um. Briziana porta (Tac. Hist. iii. 27).

Brocomagus, i, f. Brunat, a town of Germany, in the territory of the Tribosci (Amm. Mar. xvi. 2).

Brochēlus, i, m. son of Mazæus, at one time governor of Syria (Curt. v. 13).

Brūmulus, i, m. a surname of Bāchus, either from the groans uttered by his mother when she was consuming by fire, or from the noise of the Bacchannals and votaries of that god (Ov. Met. iv. 11).

Brūngus, i, m. the Morava, a river of Illyria, joined by Angrus, and afterwards falls into the Danube (Herod. iv. 49).

Brūtes, is, m. one of the Cyclops (Virg. Æn. viii. 425).

Brūtēs, is, m. the brother of Ammon, a man famous for his skill in the cestus, whom Phileus killed at the nuptials of Pērseus (Ov. Met. v. 107).

Brūtes, is, m. one of the nobles of Cŷzicius, Chizio, whom Iāson left half dead in the battle of the Argonauts, with the Cŷziciāni (Val. Flacc. iii. 152).

Brūchlon, i, n. a division of the town of Alexandria (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Brūctēri, orum (Sing. Brūctērus, i), m. the Bructerians, a very ferocious German nation, whose country bordered on the Hercynian wood, near the district now called Bohemia; perhaps they occupied part of that forest, Brūctērus accōla Hērējūta silvā (Claud. viii. 450). When Tacitus wrote his treatise on the manners of the Germans, a report prevailed, that they had ceased to exist as a nation (Ger. 53), which appears to have been unfounded, since Claudianus describes them as a people, or separate state, when he wrote in the fourth century.

Brūndisium, i, n. Brindisi, a city of Cālābria in Italy, the capital of the Sālētini (Flor. i. 20). Strābo says that it was founded by Thēsēus, who planted a Cretan colony there; but others assert that it was built by Diōmēdes, who settled in Māgna Græcia in Italy, after the Trojan war; and Justinus, by the Ætōli, under Diōmēdes (xii. 2). The ancient name of this city, says Strābo, was Brētēsium, from its resemblance to the head of a stag, hence Lūcānus, circum Brūndisium (Phar. v. 407). It had a large and secure harbour, reckoned one of the best in the world, which the indolence of the Italians has allowed to be greatly choked up. The splendour of the old city is lost in a small ruinous collection of houses, which occupy part of its situation. The immortal poet, Virgil, died at Brūndisium, Brindisi, on his return from Greece, to which he had gone, intending to put a last hand to the Æneid at Athens. The common passage between Italy and Greece, was from this port to Dyrrāchium, Durazzo. Caesar seems to consider the south of Italy, particularly in autumn, less healthy than France and Spain. M. Atilius Rēgulus took Durazzo in 269 B. C. The Romans appear to have accounted Brindisi the extremity of Italy, hence Silius Italicus, Necnon Brundisium quo desinit Itāla tellus (viii. 574). This idea must have originated from its being the port whence they sailed for Greece, Asia, and Egypt; since other parts of Italy were at a greater distance from Rome. Inh. Brūndisini, orum (Sing. Brūndisinus, i), m. Adj. Brūndisinus, a, um. Brūndisinum fœdus, the treaty by which M. Antonius agreed to marry Octāvia, sister of Augustus (Tac. Ann. i. 10).

Brūtia, v. Bruttia, is, f. a particular kind of pitch (Plin. iii. 244). Adj. Brūttius, a, um. Bruttia fascia cālidi visci, Bruttian poultices of warm pitch, i. e. warm poultices of Bruttian pitch (Juv. Sat. ix. 14). Readings here are various.

Brūtidius Nīger, Brūtidii Nigri, m. an orator, rhetorician, and historian, of whom Sēneca speaks in terms of high approbation, and Tacitus has borne honourable testimony to his character and virtues. When edile, he joined Māmērcus Scaurus and Jūnius Otho, in prosecuting C. Jūnius Silānus, proconsul of Asia, for extortion, in the year 22 (Tac. Ann. iii. 66). He is supposed to be the same mentioned by Jūvénalis, with whom the poet appears to have been in terms of intimacy and friendship (Sat. x. 83).

Brūtti, orum (Sing. Brūttius, i), et, Brūttianī, orum (Gel. x. 3), m. the Bruttians, a people of Māgna Græcia, sprung from the Lūcāni. They were generally shepherds, and, according to some, were called Brūttii, from their cowardice in submitting to Hānnibal, in the second Punic war, without making any resistance. But Justinus informs us they took this name from Brūtia, a woman who betrayed the castle, possessed by a band of robbers who infested the country, to 600 Africans sent by Diōnysius, king of Sicily, to quell them. These troops of the Sicilian king built a city, into which the shepherds flocked, and assumed the name of Bruttii. Strabo writes that the Lucani gave them this name, which in their language signifies deserters, or, revolters, adding that they had formerly been the herds of that people, and, encouraged by the effeminacy of their masters, assumed their independence (367). Diōdorus Siculus, besides mentioning the meaning of the word, in which he agrees with Strabo, gives this reason for their name, that the greater part had been slaves. Their territory was called Ager Bruttius. Adj. Bruttius, a, um. Bruttia saxa, rocks of the Bruttii (Pers. Sat. vi. 27). The poet means the rocks on the coast of the Straits of Messina. Bruttia ora (Stat. Syl. i. 3. 33). Bruttii ager (Liv. xxv. 1).

Bruttius, i, m. a Volscian, the standard-bearer of the Roman consul, Flaminius, in the battle at Trasimēnus, the Lake of Perugia. He concealed the eagle under his own body, as he was expiring, that it might escape the hands of the enemy (Sil. Ital. vi. 15 seq.). Bruttus Papius, Bruttii Papii, m. a man of family and power among the Samnites, who prevailed on the state to break the truce with the Romans. On being crushed by the bravery of their enemy, the Samnites passed a decree ordering him to be given up to the Romans, and all that the feciales demanded to be restored. To avoid the disgrace, he terminated his days by a voluntary death, in 322 B. C. The Samnites sent his dead body and his goods to Rome, which the Romans refused to accept (Liv. viii. 39).

Brūnium, i, n. a town of Mæcēdonia, at which Philippus, king of that country, encamped, when he had retreated from the Roman consul, P. Sulpicius Galba, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 29).

Bubacūē, es, f. a district of Sōgdiāna (Curt. viii. 5).

Bubæces, is, m. a eunuch of Darius, who appears to have been faithful to his master at the time a conspiracy was formed against his life (Curt. v. 12).

Bubalia, æ, f. a town of Pannōnia, near Sirmium, at which the Emperor Decius was born (Aur. Vic. Ep. 29).

Bubares, is, m. an officer in the Persian army, under Megabyzus, whom he sent to Mæcēdonia, thinking that he would easily overrun the country. Instead of commencing hostilities, Bubares fell in love with a daughter of Amyntas, the Macedonian monarch, whom he married, and permanent friendship, not only with him but with Darius and Xerxes, was the consequence of this affinity (Just. vii. 3).

Bubastus, i, f. Tel. Eusta, a city of lower Egypt, to the east of Pelusiæum Ostium, which Herodotus writes Bubastis. Bubastis, idis, f. a goddess of the Egyptians, worshipped in this town, from which she probably had her name, supposed by some to be the same with Diana (Ov. Met. ix. 690). Adj. Bubasticus, et, Bubastiānus, a, um.

Bubasus, e. Bubassus, i, f. a city of Cæria, which had this name from Būbasus, a shepherd, who preserved the life of Pōdālirius when driven upon that coast (Steph.). It was also the name of a district of Cæria, mentioned by Plinius (i. 504). Inh. Būbāsi, orum (Seng. Būbasius, i), m. Būbasis, idis, f. of Būbasus, applied to females or nouns feminine (Ov. Met. ix. 643).

Bucēphālē, es, f. v. Bucēphālon, i, n. a city of India, built by Alexander the Great, to which he gave this name, in honour of his horse (Just. xii. 8).

Bucēphālus, i, m. the horse of Alexander the Great, which had this name from his head resembling that of an ox. A. Gellius has given a minute description of him, and mentions that, after he had been killed in battle, Alexander built a town, which from him he called Bucēphālē, v. Bucēphālon, q. v. (v. 2).

Bucinobāntes, ium, m. a people of Germany, oppositeto Moguntiacum, Mentz (Amm. Mar. xxx. 4).

Bucōlicum, i, n. one of the mouths of the Nile. Like Ostium Bōlbitinum, it was not the work of nature, but of art (Herod. ii. 17).

Bucōlion, ōnis, m. the eldest son of Læomædon, king of Troy, born out of wedlock. He followed the occupation of a shepherd, and whilst he tended the sheep had twin sons, Aescus and Pēdāsus, by the nymph Abārbarea. These twins fell by the hand of Eurýalus, in the Trojan war (Hom. ii. vi. 23).

Bucōlus, i, m. the father of Sphelus. Būcōlides, æ, m. Sphelus (Hom. ll. xv. 338).

Budālia. See Būbālia.

Budares, is, m. a Spanish commander, whom, with Besasides, Q. Minicius Therminus defeated at Turba, in 197 B. C. Budares was taken prisoner (Liv. xxxiii. 44).

Budii, orum, m. a Median nation (Herod. i. 101).

Budini, orum, m. a Seythian nation, near Palus Maeotis (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 2). Their name occurs also in Plinius (i. 471), and Pompōnius Mela (i. 177).

Budium, i, n. v. Būdia, æ, f. a town of Boeōtia, which had this name from Būdia, mother of Erginus, a celebrated Argonaut (Hom. ll. xvi. 572).

Bullis, idis, f. a town of Mæcēdonia, on Mære Hædriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, nearly opposite to Hydrus in Italy. Inh. Bullidenses, ium, v. Bullini, orum, m. assisted the Roman prætor, L. Anicius Gallus, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 30). Adj. Bullinus, a, um. Bullinus ager (Liv. xxxvi. 7).

Bumadus, i, m. the Chasir, or, Hazir-sou, a branch of Lycus (Curt. iv. 9).

Bupālus, i, m. a son of Anthērmus, a statuary of great eminence, who, with his brother Athenis, exhibited a likeness of the poet Hippōnax, whose countenance was far from beautiful, so caricatured, as exposed him to the laughter of the public. Hippōnax, in revenge, wrote a satire against them, of such cutting severity, that some say they hanged themselves, and others, that, to avoid derision, they fled from Ephesus (Hor. Epod. vi. 14. Plin. v. 271).

Buphagus, i, m. one of the Argonauts, son of Cōrōnus (Orph. 138).

Buprāsium, i, n. a town, country, and river of Elis. The country is said to have abounded with wheat (Hom. ll. xi. 755).

Būra, æ, f. Diacophthon, a town of Achæia, at a considerable distance from Sinus Cōrinthiæus, swallowed up by an earthquake (Amm. Mar. xvii. 7). Ovid's assertion, that it is to be seen at the bottom of the sea, is one of the many proofs of his geographical inaccuracies, an error too common in the Latin poets. See Buris.

Burdigāla, æ, f. Bordeaux, a seaport town, anciently of Aquitania, the southern division of Gallia, France, at the mouth of Garonna, the Garonne. Of the ancient town few particulars have reached modern times. It is probable that it was inferior, both in the number of houses and in population, to the town which now occupies more than its site. Bordeaux contains about forty thousand inhabitants. In form it resembles a crescent, and has three forts to protect the harbour and town. Ausonius was a native of Burdigāla (Auson. cxcviii. 8). Inh. Burdigalenses, ium, m. Adj. Burdigalensis, is, e. Burdigalensis (ostrea) (Auson. cxcviii. 19). Burdigāli in Martialis (ix. 83) seems doubtful. Some editions have Burdigāle, and others Burdigāle.

Burgundiones, um, v. Burgundii, orum, m. a German nation, supposed to be called Visburgii, by Ptolemaeus. They seem to have lived in the vicinity of Orcinussaltus, and afterwards, crossing the Rhine, took possession of that part of France called, from them, Burgundy. Ammianus mentions their contest with the Alamāni, about salt pits (xviii. 2: xxviii. 5).

Burīl, orum, m. the Burlans, a German nation, who were supposed to have lived near the sources of Vistula, the Vistula (Tac. Ger. 43).

Buris, is, v. Bura, æ, f. a city in Sinus Corinthiacus, the Gulf of Lepanto, which the sea overflowed, and of which some vestiges may be seen, when the surface of the gulf is smooth and clear (Ov. Met. xv. 293). Plinius mentions the same circumstance (i. 239).

Burnūm, i, n. Knin, a town of Illyricum, which is supposed to be the true reading in Livius (xlv. 30), not Durnūm. It was in the district of the Cavii q. v.

Burrus, i, m. a Spaniard, who gained the prize given by Scipio Africanus, at the end of the Spanish war, for throwing the javelin (Sil. Ital. xvi. 567).—2. Son of Pärthenius, the favourite of the Emperor Domitianus, q. s. (Mart. iv. 45: v. 6).

Burrus Afrānū, Burri Afrānū, m. a man of high military character, appointed praetorian praefect, through the interest of Agrippina. To him and Anneus Sēneca was intrusted the education of the Emperor Nero. Burrus instructed him in military science, and the dignity of his manners added weight to his precepts. Both exerted their utmost endeavours to restrain his passions, moderate his desires, impress his mind with a love of virtue, and to give him a taste for what was elegant and innocent. Agrippina threw many difficulties in their way, which, added to the accusation preferred against Burrus, by Päris, that he was a creature of Agrippina, probably induced him to mention the charge which that informer had brought against her, in a tone of greater severity. Nero consulted them respecting the murder of his mother, and, knowing that it was impossible for them to dissuade him from his design, Burrus recommended the execution of that parricide to Anicetus, rather than trust it to the praetorian cohorts, and the Emperor eagerly embraced that idea. Tacitus says that Burrus died about the year 62, universally lamented, and that his virtues were long remembered, and long regretted. Whether his death was natural or violent remains undetermined (Tac. Ann. xii. 42—xiv. 51).

Būsa, æ, f. an Apulian woman of high rank, and great riches, who supplied the four thousand foot, and two hundred horse of the Roman army, who had escaped to Cinūsiūm, after the battle of Cānna, with grain, clothing, and subsistence, for which magnificent act honours were paid her at the conclusion of the war, by the Roman senate (Liv. xxii. 52).

Būse, arum, m. a people of Mēdia (Herod. i. 101).

Būsan, ānis, f. a fort built by the Romans, not far from Amida, Diarbekr (Amm. Mar. xviii. 10).

Būsiris, is, v. Idis, m. son of Nēptūnus and Lysianassa, daughter of Epāphus, was king of Egypt. That country having been distressed by a deficiency of the crops during nine successive years, Thrāsius, who possessed the gift of prophecy, and had just arrived from Cyprus, informed him that the dearth would cease if the Egyptians would every year sacrifice a male guest at the altar of Jupiter. Būsiris first immolated this prophet, and afterwards foreigners. He dragged Hercules to the altar, intending to offer him up to the god, but that hero, having burst asunder his chains, put to death Būsiris, his son Iphidamas, and his herald Chalbes (Apol. ii. 5). On account of his cruelty, Virgilius calls him illaudatus, unpraised, i. e. detested (G. iii. 5). Ovidius has recorded his barbarous practices, for which Hercules put him to death (Met. ix. 183).

Būsiris, is, f. Abousir, a city of Egypt, which gives name to the district (Herod. ii. 59). Adj. Būsiritānus, a, um.

Būta, æ, m. a man killed by Hannibal at Trāsīmēnus (Sil. Ital. v. 540).

Būtes, æ, m. a man of prodigious stature, who asserted that he was a descendant of Amēus, king of the Bēbrēs. Dāres killed him in a combat of the cestus (Virg. Æn. v. 372).—2. The armour-bearer and guard to Anchises, and afterwards the companion of Ascānius. Apōllo assumed the appearance of Būtes, when he advised Ascānius to lay down his arms after he had killed Nūmānus Rēmūlus (Virg. Æn. ix. 647).—3. A Trojan of great size, killed by Cāmilla (Virg. Æn. xi. 690).—4. A son of Pallas, and brother of Clūtus (Ov. Met. vii. 500).—5. A combatant in the army of Adrastus, in the Theban war, from Olēnus, Caminita, a town of Achāia, hence Stātius has Olēnius Būtes. He was killed by Hæmon (Stat. Th. viii. 484).—6. An Athenian, son of Tēlōn, and one of the Argonauts. He had considerable wealth, which, according to Vālērīus Flāccus, he acquired by the produce of his bees (i. 394).—7. A man in the army of Hannibal, killed by Q. Fābius Māximus, dictator, when the Carthaginian general had completely surrounded the troops of M. Minūcius Rūfus, whom the senate had appointed dictator along with Fābius (Sil. Ital. vii. 598).—8. An ancient Athenian. Būtādæ, arum, m. the descendants of Būtes.

Būthrōtum, i, n. v. Būthrōtus, i, m. Bu-trinto, a seaport town of Epirus, Lower Albania, in Greece, opposite to the island Cōr-cyra, Corfu. Ānēas landed at Būthrōtum, as he cruised along the coast of Greece, on his way from Trōja to Itālia, Italy. The ruins of Būthrōtum are distinguishable across the channel from Corfu, although at the distance of eighteen miles. Inh. Būthrōtī, orum (Sing. Būthrōtius, i), m. Adj. Būthrōtius, n., um. Būthrōtia civitas, the state of the Būthrōtī (Cic. Att. xvi. 16).

Būto, ūs, v. Būtus, i, f. Koum el Kanzir, a town of Egypt, in which Lātōna had a temple, consisting of only one stone (Herod. ii. 155). Adj. Būticus, a., um. Būticus lacus.

Būtrōtus, i, m. the Nocto, a small stream which passes Lōcri (Liv. xxix. 7).

Būxēntum, i, n. Policastro, a town of Lūcānia, at the top of a considerable bay, on the western side of that district. The Greeks called this town Pyxus, and Strābo informs us there was a fort, harbour, and river of this name. Micēthus, a Sicilian, conducted a colony thither, of which the greater part soon deserted it (Strab. 364). A colony was ordered to be sent from Rome to Būxēntum, in 198 B. C., and, on its being deserted, another was sent in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 29: xxxix. 23). Lāus sinus, the Gulf of Policastro. Adj. Būxēntius, a., um. Būxēntia pūbes (Sil. Ital. viii. 583).

Bybassia, ae. f. a promontory of Cnidus, on the Archipelago (Herod. i. 174).

Býblis, idis, v. idos, f. daughter of Milētus, and the nymph Cýanēē q. v., who conceived an improper attachment to her brother Cauzus, which he treated with merited abhorrence. She pined away in sorrow at his indignant repulse, and the gods, commiserating her fate, transformed her into a fountain in the district of the Milesians. From her father she is called Milētis, and from her paternal grandfather Apōllo, Phabētia (Ōv. Met. ix. 452 seq.).

Býblos, i, f. Gebael, a town of Phenicia (Curt. iv. 1).

Bylāzor, ūris, m. a place in Paeōnīa, to which Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnīa, wished the Gauls, who lay near Desudaba, in Mācedia, to come, which they refused, because he did not pay the sum stipulated, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26).

Byrsa, ae. f. the ancient name of the citadel of Carthage, according to the Greeks and Romans, who consider it a derivation from Bovae Bores, i. e. an ox's skin, and add, that Dido, on landing, purchased from the native Africans as much ground as she could encompass with the hide of a bull. To show her ingenuity, she cut the skin into the smallest thongs, and to prove her knowledge of mathematics, she laid these thongs in the form of a circle, a figure which contains the largest space in the same bounding line, and on that ground she built the city of Carthage. Līvius makes the ambassadors of Māsīnissa, when they pleaded before those of the Roman state against the Carthaginians, respecting some territory, quote this fiction as authentic history (xxxiv. 62). The word ought to have been traced to the language of Phenicia, in which Bosra signifies a fortified place. It is manifest that the resemblance of this word to the Greek Bores, a skin, gave rise to the fabulous narrative. The poets sometimes use Byrsa to denote Carthage (Sil. Ital. iii. 242). Scipio, the younger, forbade it to be rebuilt (Ap. Bel. Pun. 84).

Býzācium, i, n. a district of Africa, to the west of Syrtis Minor, the Gulf of Kabes. The fertility of Býzācium rendered it a place of great trade, and caused it to be regarded as a granary, or storehouse of provisions. Plinius says it produced a hundred-fold (i. 535). Adj. Býzācius, a., um. Býzācia rūra (Sil. Ital. ix. 204).

Býzāntium, i, n. Constantinople, so called from Cōnstantīnus, surnamed the Great, who transferred the seat of empire from Rome to this city. It stood on Thrāclūs Bospōrus, the Strait of Constantinople, its form was triangular, and its walls of Cycloplan structure. The date of its foundation is unknown, and ancient authors differ respecting its founders. Justinus refers its origin to Pausānias, a king of Lācēdāemon (ix. 1), and Tāctus, to the Greeks, who, having consulted Pythian Apōllo, received for answer, that they should choose a settlement opposite the territory of the blind. This obscure response pointed out the Chalcēdōnīi, because they were the first who visited that part of the world, and might have taken possession of the best situation, but chose the worst. The soil is fertile, and the sea abounds with fish, in consequence of prodigious shoals coming down from Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea. To avoid the shelvy rocks on the Chalcēdonian shore, they make directly for the opposite coast, and come into the bay of Býzāntium (Tac. Ann. xii. 62). The walls of Constantinople are in a mouldering state, consist of materials formerly employed for other purposes, and are about eighteen English miles in circumference. The number of mural towers amount to four hundred and seventy-eight, enclosing a triangular space, of which the three sides are five, six, and seven miles each. Constantinople is unhealthy, from sudden changes of temperature, owing to the current of wind through the strait, as well as from the little attention paid to cleanliness, particularly in the suburbs. Inh. Býzāntīi, v. Býzāntīni, orum, m. The Rhodian ambassadors insisted that Philippus, king of Mācēdōnīa, should restore Perinthus to the Býzāntīi, in 199 B. C., as it had belonged to them (Liv. xxxii. 33). Adj. Býzāntius, Býzāntīens, et. Býzāntīnus, a., um. Býzāntia orca, Byzantian pickle, which was made of a particular fish (Hor. Sat. ii. 4. 66). Býzāntīaci lācērti, a kind of fish taken near Býzāntium (Stat. Syl. iv. 9. 13). Býzāntīni pūcēres (Claud. xx. 136).

Býzas, āntis, m. the king of Býzāntium, Constantinople, when the Argonauts sailed for Cōlchis (Diod. Sic. iv. 49). Claudīanus considers him as the founder of that city (xx. 83), or that Hērēcles built it in honour of Býzas, and called it by his name; hence urbs Hērēclēi nōmīnis, i. e. Býzāntium (Claud. v. 292).

Býzēres, um (Sing. Býzer, ēris), m. a people of Pōntus, adjoining to the Chaldæi, or, Chālýbes. Plinius writes Būzēri (i. 654). Vālērīus Flāccus describes them as a wandering nation, without fixed habitations (v. 153).

Cabala, orum, n. a town of Cilicia, which Pompeius gave to Ariobarzanes (Ap. Bel. Mith. 244).

Cabales, ium, m. an inconsiderable tribe, who lived on the eastern coast of Syrtis Major, the Gulf of Zadic (Herod. iv. 171).

Caballi, orum, m. a people of Asia Minor, included in the second Satrapy, mentioned by Herodotus along with the Mysians, Lydians, &c. (iii. 90).

Căbesus, i, f. r. Căbēsa, orum, n. a city of Thrăcia on Hălespōntus. Some make it a city of Cappadōcia, and others of Lŷcia (Hom. II. xiii. 363).

Căbillōnum, i, e. Căbillōna, orum, n. Chalons, or, Chalons, a town of the Œdūi, on the left bank of Arar, the Saone, about 70 miles N. of Lugdūnum, Lyons (Amm. Mar. xiv. 10. Cas. B. G. vii. 42 seq.). Inh. Căbillōnes, um (Sing. Căbillo, ōnis), m.

Căbira, orum, n. Sivas, a town in Mŷsia, according to Plūtarchus, but Stēphānus assigns it a different situation. Inh. Căbirī, orum, m. (Steph.). Pausānias mentions a people of Bœōtia of this name, only he writes Căbirī, not Căbirīl (ix. 25).—2. A town of Pontus, near the source of Lŷcus. Inh. Căbirī, orum, m. (Ap. Bel. Mith. 224).

Căbūrus, i, m. the chief man among the Hălvī, and father of C. Vălērius Dōnōtaurus q. r. (Cas. B. G. vii. 65).

Căbŷlē, es, f. a town of Thrăcia (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 11).

Căcus, i, m. a son of Vălcănus, who emitted flames from his mouth, and had his residence on Mons Aventinus, Monte Aventino. He was a notorious robber, and stole some of the cattle of Hărcŷles, for which that hero put him to death. Ovidius has given a beautiful description of Căcus and his residence; and in his usual lively manner depicted the contest between him and Hărcŷles (Fast. i. 551 seq.).

Cădētes, um, m. a people of Găllia Căltica. From their being mentioned along with the Oŷimii, Ithēdōnes, Ambibărti, their country must have been adjoining, and most probably, formed part of what was afterwards called Britagne (Cas. B. G. vii. 65). The Cădētes occur but once in Căsar; where Clarke and others have Calētes. Although this be the true reading, they must not be confounded with the Calētes q. r. who are mentioned in B. G. ii. 4.

Cădicia, e, f. the wife of Flăvius Scēvīnus q. r. She was banished from Italy, in consequence of her husband conspiring against the Emperor Nēro (Tac. Ann. xv. 71).

Cădius Rŷfus, Cădŷ Rŷfŷ, m. was accused of extortion by the Bithynians, and found guilty, in the year 49. This sentence expelled him from the senate, to which Otho afterwards restored him (Tac. Ann. xii. 22; Hist. i. 77).

Cădmēa, e, f. the citadel of Thēbæ, Theba (Cor. Nep. Epam. 10), so called from its founder, Cădmus. Its site was elevated, the town stood lower, but afterwards extended nearly to the fort, hence Thēbæ only occurs in the plural number (Paus. ii. 6).

C

Cădmus, i, m. a son of Agēnor, king of Phœnicia, and Tēlēphăssa, or, Agriōpē, who was ordered by his father to go in search of his sister Eurōpa, whom Jūpiter had carried away, and not to return unless he found her. His search being unsuccessful, he is said, about 1550 B. C., to have consulted the Oracle of Apōllo, by which he was commanded to build a city where he saw a heifer stop on the grass, and call the country Bœōtia. Having found the heifer, he sent his men to a fountain, at no great distance, for water, that he might offer a sacrifice in gratitude to the god. But the spring being sacred to Mars, a dragon guarded it, which devoured all his men. By the aid of Minērvā, he overcame the dragon, and sowed its teeth, which grew up armed men, who, on his throwing a stone amongst them, began to fight, and all were killed except five, who assisted him in the building of Thēbæ, Theba. Hence Pēnthēus, in addressing the Thebans, denominated them Anguigēnae, serpent or snake-descended (Ov. Met. iii. 531); and, for the same reason, Ovidius calls their city Drăcōnigēna Urbs. The ferocity of the petty tribes who inhabited that part of Greece, and Cădmus' plan of subduing the natives, by artfully exciting them to fight against each other, until the strength and resources of the contending parties were quite exhausted, satisfactorily explain the fiction of the dragon, the armed men which sprung from its teeth, and the stone which he threw amongst them. He afterwards married Hărmōnia, or, Hărmŷōnē, the daughter of Mars and Vēnus, by whom he had one son and four daughters. To Cădmus the Greeks were indebted for their first knowledge of letters, which he brought from his native country. Hence Cădmi nigellæ filie, filitŷdæ atri colōris, letters. From his father he was called Agēnōrŷdes, and, from his native city, Stidŷnius Hōspes (Ov. Met. iii. 129).

In advanced life, oppressed with sorrow at the fate of his daughter Ino, and her two sons, Lăarchus and Mēlēcērtā, he fled from Thēbæ, Theba, to Illyricum, where both he and Hărmŷōnē were changed into dragons (Ov. Met. iv. 599). Versus Cădmus, metamorphosed, or transformed Cădmus, i. e. transformed into a dragon (Luc. Phar. iii. 189). Cădmēi, orum, m. the Thebans (Hom. II. x. 288). Cădmēis, idis, f. a daughter of Cădmus; of Cădmus, with relation to a noun feminine; Sēmēlē (Ov. Met. iii. 287). Adj. Cădmăus, Cădmēus, et, Cădmēus, a, um, of Cădmus, Theban. Cădmăum limen, the threshold of Cădmus, i. e. the threshold of the palace once inhabited by Cădmus (Stat. Th. i. 123). Cădmēa gens, the people of Carthage (Sil. Ital. i. 6). Cădmēa victōria, a dearly-bought victory (Paus. ix. 9). Cădmēus hēros, Pōlŷnices (Stat. Th. i. 376). Cădmēus virgo, Antigōnē (Stat. Th. xii. 380).—2. A native of Cos, son of Scŷthas, distinguished for his love of justice (Herod. vii. 163).

Cădra, e, f. a hill of Cilicia, taken possession of by the Clitæ, in a revolt which that nation made from Archēlāus, king of Cāpādōcīa, in the year 36 (Tac. Ann. vi. 41).

Cādūcātor, ōris, m. a herald, who goes to the army of the enemy to request a truce. One sent by Philippus, after that monarch had been defeated at Octōlōphus, by the Roman consul, P. Sūlpicius Gālba, requesting a truce to bury the dead; but, in reality, to procure time for Philippus to escape without the knowledge of the Romans. This is the first time the circumstance is mentioned by Livius (xxxix. 38).

Cādūrci, orum, m. a people of Gālīa Cēlīca, who lived between Oldus, v. Oltis, the Olt, and Dūranus, the Dordogne; two of the northern branches of Gārūmna, the Garonne (Ces. B. G. vii. 4 seq.). Adj. Cādūrcus, a, um (Auson. cēvii. 15).

Cādūsia, ae, f. a tract of land between Mārē Cāspium and Pontus Euxinus. Inh. Cādūsii, orum, m. a people of Hīrcānīa, whose country Strābo describes as extensive and mountainous. The Gēlæ and Amārdi were their neighbours (Strab. 741, 744). The ambassadors of Antiōchus, king of Sýria, boasted in a council at Ēgium, Vostitza, that the Cādūsii would assist that monarch, as well as the Mēdi, Elýmæi, and Dāhæ, of which the Romans seem scarcely to have heard before (Liv. xxxv. 48). Dātāmes carried on a successful war against the Cādūsii, killing many thousands of them (Cor. Nep. Dat. 1). From Plinius there appears to have been another nation of this name, called by the Greeks Gēlæ, to the east of Mārē Cāspium, perhaps between the rivers Oxus and Iaxartes (i. 676).

Cādýtis, is, f. a city of Sýria, as large as Sārdes (Herod. ii. 159).

Cæcilia, ae, f. sister of Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Numidicus, of whom Vālērīus Māximus relates an improbable occurrence (i. 5).

Cæcilia Mētēlla, Cæciliæ Mētēllæ, f. was, according to some, the wife of Claudius Æsōpus, who appears to have been a man of prodigious extravagance, of which Hōrātius gives one instance (Sat. ii. 3. 239). See Claudius Æsōpus.

Cæciliānus, i, m. a guzzler, to whom Mārtiālis addresses several of his epigrams. Under this name the poet seems to have had different characters in view.

Cæcilius, a, um, Cæcilia familia, the family, or clan, of the Cæcili (Vel. Pat. ii. 11).

Cæcilius Bāssus, Cæcili Bāssi, m. an officer under C. Jūlius Cæsar, who entrusted him with the charge of the Parthian war (Ap. Bel. Civ. 575).

Cæcilius Cōrnūtus, Cæcili Cōrnūti, m. a man of prætorian rank, whom Vibius Sērēnus accused of supplying with money the conspirators against the Emperor Tiberius. Weary of life, and knowing that a prosecution would end in his ruin, he laid violent hands on himself in the year 24 (Tac. Ann. iv. 28).

Cæcilius Gālba, Cæcili Gālbae, m. a buffoon, who confounded rudeness with wit (Mart. i. 42).

Cæcilius Nīger, Cæcili Nigri, m. surnamed Bārbārus, commanded a considerable body of Lusitanians at Lēnum, whom the friends of Pompēius solicited to assist them in the recovery of Hispālia, Seville (Ces. B. Hisp. 35).

Cæcilius Simplex, Cæcili Simplici, m. a man exceedingly anxious to obtain the consulship, and accused in the senate of a design to purchase it. Vitellius raised him to that honour without a bribe in the year 69, during which there were no fewer than thirteen consuls! (Tac. Hist. ii. 60: iii. 68).

A. Cæcilius, A. Cæcili, m. a plebeian edile in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 35).

C. Cæcilius, C. Cæcili, m. a Roman, who conquered the Sallūvii in Gālīa Trānsāl-pina, who had rebelled in 92 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 73).

C. Cæcilius Mētēllus, C. Cæcili Mētēlli, m. held the office of consul with Cn. Pāpīrius Cārbo in 115 B. C. The Cimbrī and Teutōni, during that year invaded Italy, and defeated Pāpīrius. According to Eutrōpius, C. Cæcilius Mētēllus triumphed over the Thracians on the same day that his brother Marcus triumphed over the Sardinians (iv. 25. Tac. Ger. 37).

C. Cæcilius Rūfus, C. Cæcili Rūfi, m. was consul with L. Pōmpōnius Flāccus in the year 17. Tacitus calls him C. Cæcilius (Ann. ii. 41).

L. Cæcilius, L. Cæcili, m. a Roman prætor, killed with the legions under his command by the Galli Sēnōnes in 235 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 12).

L. Cæcilius Denter, L. Cæcili Dentris, m. prætor of Sicily in 184 B. C. (Liv. xl. 1).

L. Cæcilius Mētēllus, L. Cæcili Mētēlli, m. was consul in Rome with C. Fūrius Pacillus in 253 B. C. In Sicily he defeated a general of the Carthaginians, who came against him with a vast army, in which were one hundred and thirty elephants; all of them fell into his hands, and he left twenty thousand of the enemy dead on the field of battle (Eutrop. ii. 24). For this victory he had the honour of a triumph, and was the first who led elephants in a procession of that kind. He saved the image of Pallas from the temple of Vēsta on fire, at the expense of his sight. For this act of intrepidity in rescuing the palladium of the state, the Roman people allowed him to be carried to the senatehouse in a chariot. He was the first who enjoyed that honour. When Pontifex Maximus he would not permit L. Pōstūmius, priest of Jūpiter, to depart from Rome on account of his office (Liv. xxxvii. 51. Tac. Ann. iii. 71). His son, Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus, commended him for the many excellent qualities which he possessed, in an oration delivered after his death, of which Plinius has recorded the principal topics, and seems to consider some of the statements, if not false, at least doubtful (ii. 65. Flor. ii. 2).—2. A Roman youth, of high rank, who, after the battle of Cānnae, was at the head of a party of young noblemen that formed the design of deserting their native country, but were prevented by P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio. For this crime the censors P. Pārius Philus and M. Atīlius Rēgulus degraded him from the equestrian rank and from his tribe, and had disfranchised him, for which he attempted when tribune of the people, in 216 B. C., to bring them to trial, but the opposition of his nine colleagues thwarted his plan, and they were honourably discharged (Liv. xxii. 53 seq.). To him Silius Itālicus alludes (x. 420).—3. Was appointed consul with Q. Fabius Māximus Sērviānus in 144 B. C. In the preceding year, he was sent an ambassador with Scīpio Africānus and L. Mummīus to Ptolēmaeus Physcon, king of Egypt, q. v. (Just. xxxviii. 8).—4. Held the office of consul with L. Aurelius Cotta, in 121 B. C., and during that year he subdued the Dalmātes, on which account he received the surname of Dalmāticus. Four years after, he and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus obtained the censorship, and disgraced thirty-two senators (Liv. Ep. 62).—5. A Roman praetor, who was successful against the pirates in Sicily in 71 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 98).

M. Cæcilius, M. Cæcili, m. a lieutenant-general, who commanded the legions of L. Furius against the Gauls, besieging Crémōna in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 21).—2. Was one of the ten commissioners appointed to divide the unoccupied lands in Ligūria and the north of Italy, in 175 B. C. Two years after, the senate commissioned three persons of whom Cæcilius was one, to purchase grain in Apulia, both for the army and navy (Liv. xlii. 4, 27).

M. Cæcilius Denter, M. Cæcili Dēntis, m. sent an ambassador with other four to obtain correct information respecting Mæcēdōnia, and afterwards they were to proceed to the court of Ptolēmaeus, king of Egypt, in 175 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 6).

M. Cæcilius Mētēllus, M. Cæcili Mētēlli, m. a Roman, who, after holding the offices of plebeian edile, and praetor urbanus, was one of the five ambassadors sent to Attalus, king of Asia, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 36 seq.).

Q. Cæcilius, Q. Cæcili, m. a plebeian tribune in 438 B. C. (Liv. iv. 16).—2. A Roman knight, who was the maternal uncle of T. Pōmpōnius Atticus. On being adopted by him as his heir, Atticus assumed his name. By these means Atticus became possessed of a large fortune, to which Cicero alludes in a letter addressed to that distinguished Roman (Att. iii. 20). Cōrnēlius Nēpos describes Cæcilius as a man of a very cross and unpleasant temper (Att. 5).

Q. Cæcilius Epirōta, Q. Cæcili Epirōta, m. the freedman of T. Pōmpōnius Atticus, to whom Cicero addresses so many of his letters. Having incurred the displeasure of his patron, he became the intimate of Cōrnēlius Gallus, after whose death he opened a school for the instruction of youth, but admitted none of the nobles, except the children of his intimate friends. To him is attributed the merit of being the first who reasoned extempore in the Latin language, and he was the first who began to read Virgil and the other modern poets (Suet. II. Gram. 16).

Q. Cæcilius Bassus, Q. Cæcili Bassi, m. a Roman knight of Pompey's party, who excited war in Syria, where he was joined by the legion which had been under Sex. Caesar, whom they had first put to death in 48 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 114).

Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus, Q. Cæcili Mētēlli, m. a distinguished Roman, who obtained the offices of a pontifex, plebeian, and curule edile, and acquired celebrity as a soldier, in the battle in which Hāmīlcar fell. M. Livius appointed him master of the horse, and he obtained the consulship with L. Vētūrius Phīlo, in 208 B. C. The senate appointed these consuls to conduct the war against Hāmīlcal, and Cæcilius was proconsul during the following year for the same purpose. The Locrienses complained to the senate against

P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus, and Cæcilius, to put an end to the violent opinions delivered against that noble Roman, moved that deputies should be appointed to ascertain the facts before the senate proceeded either to censure or degrade Scīpio, which was agreed to. The result of this investigation was the acquittal of the accused. From several circumstances mentioned by Livius, it cannot be doubted that he was a man of very considerable influence both in the senate and commonwealth (Liv. xxiii. 21 seq.).—2. One of the three appointed by the consul to report the victory gained over Pērsēus, king of Mæcēdōnia, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 45).

—3. (Surnamed Mæcēdōnicus), was the colleague of Appius Claudius Pulcher in the consulship, 145 B. C., and during that year he defeated the army of Pseudophilippus, made himself prisoner, and killed twenty-five thousand of his men, for which he received the surname of Mæcēdōnicus. At Thērmōpyle, Therma, he overcame the Achæi, although they had the assistance of the Bæoti and Chalcidenses. In consequence of his success against Pseudophilippus, he had the honour of a triumph. He afterwards defeated the Cēltibēri. In the censorship he had for his colleague Q. Pōmpēius Nēpos, and they were the first two plebeians, who held that office together. At the close of the lustrum, he gave it as his opinion that all should be compelled to marry for the sake of the population. His speech on that occasion, Augustus Caesar, the second Roman emperor, read in the senate when he wished to destroy the distinction of rank with respect to marriage, and so fitted was it to answer this end, that it seemed to be written for the period when the Emperor purposed to carry the measure into effect. C. Atinius Lābēo, a tribune of the people, ordered Cæcilius to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock, because he had passed his name in reading a list of the senate; but the other tribunes interfered, and saved his life (Liv. Ep. 50—59).—4. Surnamed Bālēaricus, held the consulship with T. Quinctius Flāminius, when he subdued the Bālēares, Majorca and Minorca, on which account he received the surname of Bālēaricus, v. Bālāricus, in 125 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 60). Eutrōpius does not mention this circumstance, but informs us that Carthage was rebuilt this year by order of the senate, twenty-two years after its destruction, and that Roman citizens settled there (iv. 21). In this author Quintus is inaccurately printed Lūcius. Flōrus falsely makes him the brother of Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Crēticus.—5. Surnamed Nūmidicus, obtained the consulship with M. Jūnius Silānus, 111 B. C. To the former, a man of activity and genius, Nūmidia had fallen by lot as his province. His political sentiments led him to oppose the popular party; yet such propriety marked his conduct, that he maintained a character not only unblemished, but highly respectable. He undertook the duties of his office with a due sense of their importance, and, trusting to the fidelity of his colleague in taking an equal share of the business of the state, he turned his thoughts chiefly to the war he was to conduct, against an able, artful, and resolute enemy. Knowing the insubordination, indolence, and luxury of the army in Nūmidia, he began to provide troops, and every requisite of war, in which he received ready support and voluntary auxiliaries from the allies, all displaying an ardent zeal in calling forth the united strength of the empire. The armament being complete, and the purity of his character superior to the allurements of bribery, a general expectation pervaded the public mind, that his moral principles and military talents would compensate for the avarice, dishonesty, and infamy of the former officers. It required great address to restore the discipline of the troops, to inure them to fatigue, and animate them against danger, in consequence of their having been long slothful, licentious, and cowardly. Jūgūrtha now perceived that he had to contend with a commander very different from his predecessors, whom he could not allure by bribes, surprise by stratagem, or overcome by bravery. Even the advantages arising from a knowledge of the country did not benefit Jūgūrtha, in consequence of the caution and judgment with which Cæcilius regulated his marches in the enemy's territory. Whenever they came to action, he always defeated Jūgūrtha, and always received the proposals of that prince for peace, in such terms as left himself full liberty to act as he should judge best for his own reputation, and for the honour of the Romans. His success had been so uniform, and the troops had acquired such confidence in their commander, that he would soon have brought the war to a final termination, had not C. Mārius, an officer in his own army, shamefully supplanted him, obtaining for himself the consulship, and the command of the war against Jūgūrtha. Every reader must feel for the mortification of this virtuous and noble Roman, insidiously superseded, near the conclusion of the war, by one of the worst of men, and one of the most pernicious citizens that Rome ever beheld (Sal. Jug. 43-89). Livius writes, that for defeating Jūgūrtha, and desolating Nūmīdiā, he received the surname of Nūmīdicus; and Eutrōpius, that he had the honour of a triumph (iv. 27). L. Apūleius Sātūrninus, a tribune of the people, summoned him to trial because he had not sworn to observe the Agrarian law, which this tribune had carried by force; and although all the good citizens supported him, to prevent contention he went into voluntary exile at Rhōdus, Rhodes, where he spent his time in reading and conversing with illustrious men. C. Mārius pronounced sentence of banishment against him, 104 B. C., two years after which he was recalled, with the highest approbation of the state (Liv. Ep. 65, 69). He received this information at Tralles, Sultanhisar, when witnessing some games, and he continued till the end of the exhibition, not indicating the least joy discernible even to those next him, but retaining his countenance unaltered, and showing, says the historian, the same strength of mind in prosperity, which he had done in adversity (Val. Max. iv. 1).—6. The son of Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Nūmīdicus, who, from his uncommon affection for his exiled father, received the surname of Pius. Of his history we know little, except what Eutrōpius relates, that he was sent with L. Dōmīcius, praetor, against Sērtōrius, and triumphed over Spain (vi. 1-5).—7. Surnamed Crēticus, when praetor was appointed to carry on the war against the Crētans. He took Gnōssus, Lētus, Cydōnia, and many other cities, of which he sent an account to the senate, and complained that Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus had treated him with injustice, in sending a deputy of his own to receive the submission of the states. Pōmpēius alleged, that he had acted as duty required. The conduct of Pōmpēius rendered Cæcilius his enemy. Next year Cæcilius, having subdued the Crētans, imposed laws on that island, hitherto free, and, in consequence of his victory, received the surname of Crēticus, in 70 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 98-100). To him Mārtiālis alludes (ii. 2). Flōrus writes that he treated the captives so cruelly, that many ended their days by poison (iii. 7).

Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Cēler, Q. Cæcili Mētēlli Cēleris, m. was the son of Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Bālēricus. In 90 B. C. he obtained the office of tribune of the Roman people. It does not appear that he excelled in oratory, although he spoke with considerable fluency.—2. Son of the former, held the office of praetor in the consulship of Cicēro, 63 B. C., and levied troops against the rebel, L. Sērgius Cātīlina. On the expiry of his praetorship, he obtained the province of Gālha, France, and held the consulship with L. Afrānīus. He married Clōdia, the sister of P. Clōdīus, and lost his life by poison, which his own wife, an abandoned woman, the Lēbia of Cātūllus, administered. Cicēro commends him for his eloquence, which appears to have been of a popular kind, for his virtues as a man, and his integrity as a patriot (Brut. 70). He is mentioned by Hōrātius (Od. ii. 1. 1. Sal. Cat. 30, 42, 57).

Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Pinna, Q. Cæcili Mētēlli Pinna, m. a Roman, who defeated the Mārsi in several battles, on which they sued for peace in 91 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 76). C. Fābius, praetor, defeated him and his associates who attempted to make war on Africa (Liv. Ep. 84). Here he is called Pius, hence the reading in the former Epitōmē is probably wrong. In Spain he carried on war against Sērtōrius, and cut off L. Hērculēius, quaestor, with his army. Over M. Pērpēnna, one of the chief officers of Sērtōrius, he gained some advantages; but Sērtōrius was more than a match for both him and Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus, whom he forced to raise the siege of Calāgūrris, and compelled them to retire in different directions, when Pōmpēius went into France, and Cæcilius into the south of Spain (Liv. Ep. 76-93). He is probably the man called by Eutrōpius, Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Pius q. v. and may have been successful in that country after the death of Sērtōrius.

Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Pius Scipio. See P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Nāsica.

Stātius Cæcilius, Stātī Cæcili, m. a comic poet, who excelled in gravity and propriety of sentiment, in the disposition of fable, and in moving the passions. For these qualities Vārrō has commended him, and to them Hōrātius refers (Epist. ii. 1. 59). He is said to have been a native of Mēdiolānum, Milan, to have been originally a slave, and to have been the intimate friend of the poet, Ennius. Quīntiliānus observes that the ancients extolled his poetical merits, but Cicēro censures his style as bad Latin, probably a consequence of the Gallie being his native tongue, so that he wrote in a foreign language. Adj. Cæciliānus, a, um. Cæciliāna fabūla (Cic. Att. i. 16).

T. Cæcilius, T. Cæcili, m. appointed a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 443 B. C. He and his two colleagues were the first who held that office (Liv. iv. 7).—2. A centurion of the first rank, in the army of Afrānīus, who was killed in an engagement with Cæsar, near Ilēda, Lerida (Cæs. B. C. i. 46).

Cæcina Pætus, Cæcinæ Pæti, m. joined Scribōnīanus, who took up arms against the Emperor Claudius, and, on the death of the former, was carried to Rome. On being condemned to die, Arria, his wife, set him the example of terminating life like a Roman, by plunging the sword into her own breast, and having pulled it out, handed it to her husband, stating that what she had done gave no pain, a saying recorded not only by Mārtiālis (l. 14), but by Plīnius the younger (iii. 16).

Cæcina Tūscus, Cæcinæ Tūsci, m. a man to whom the Emperor Nēro sent a commission to put Būrrus Afrānīus to death. The particular office which he held, Tācītus does not mention, but, from what the historian states, he must have been of considerable rank and opulence (Ann. xiii. 20; Hist. iii. 38). Dio makes him a prefect of Egypt.

A. Cæcina, A. Cæcinæ, m. the author of a virulent libel against C. Jūlius Cæsar, who bore the attack with great moderation, and did not attempt, in the slightest degree, to prevent it (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 75).—2. A man of consular rank, put to death by the Emperor Titus, on suspicion of his intimacy with Bērēnicē (Aur. Vic. Ep. 10). Suetōnius gives a different reason, that Titus found a writing under his hand, containing an account of a plot carrying on among the soldiery (Tit. 6).

A. Cæcina Sēvērus, A. Cæcinæ Sēvēri, m. commanded an army in the N. of Germany, under Germānicus, in the year 14. Courage, prudence, and military skill distinguished the character of Cæcina, and, for his success in arms, he had the honour of triumphal ornaments. He continued in the army during forty years. In the senate he proposed, that no governor of a province should take his wife along with him, and gives some good reasons for that enactment, which a majority of the senators opposed, and therefore it did not pass into a law (Tac. Ann. i. 31—iii. 35).

Cæcūbum, i, n. a town of Cāmpānia. Adj. Cæcūbus, a, um. Cæcūbus ager, the district belonging to Cæcūbum, or perhaps only received its name from that town; it produced excellent wine (Plin. i. 326. Hor. Od. i. 20. 9).

Cæcilius, i, m. a son of Vūlcānus, who founded Prænēstē. He was found, when an infant, on the hearth, which gave rise to the fiction of his being the son of that god, who is said to have become his father in the form of a spark, and, his mother having exposed him on the hearth, the smoke hurt his eyes; hence his name (Virg. Æn. vii. 681: x. 544).

Cædicius, i, m. a judge of great severity, in the time of the Roman emperor Nēro (Juv. Sat. xiii. 197).—2. An eloquent pleader. Some consider him the same with the one above-mentioned; but their characters seem to be different (Juv. Sat. xvi. 46).

C. Cædicius, C. Cædici, m. a lieutenant-general under the Roman consul L. Pāpirius Cūrsor, who, with C. Trēbōnius, commanded the cavalry at the engagement near Aquillōnia (Liv. x. 40).

L. Cædicius, L. Cædici, m. a plebeian tribune, who, with T. Stātilius, brought to trial Sp. Servilius, on the expiry of his consulship (Liv. ii. 52).—2. A prefect of the camp in the army under P. Quinctilius Vārus, and, after the slaughter of the legions, appears to have taken a command when the surviving Roman troops were besieged in their camp (Vel. Pat. ii. 120).

M. Cædicius, M. Cædici, m. a Roman, who, in 390 B. C., told the tribunes that he heard in the dead of night a voice louder than human, announcing the arrival of the Gauls, and commanding it to be told to the magistrates (Liv. v. 32). He is probably the centurion mentioned Liv. v. 45, 46.

Q. Cædicius, Q. Cædici, m. a tribune of the soldiers whom Cato, in his Origins, compares to Spartan Lēōnidas. Others say his name was Valērius (Gel. iii. 7).

Cædeus, i, m. a man of great wealth, who had given to Rēmūlus trappings and a girdle studded with gold, which Eurýalus took from his grandson Rhāmnēs (Virg. Æn. ix. 362).—2. A Latin, who killed Alcāthōus (Virg. Æn. x. 747).

Cælla, æ, f. a woman mentioned by Mārtiālis in several of his epigrams, not always in terms creditable either to her character or conduct.

Cælis Vibēnna, Cælis Vibēnnæ, m. a Tuscan chief, who, at the head of a body of his countrymen, assisted one of the Roman kings, and gave his name to the hill assigned for the residence of himself and people, formerly called by the Tuscans Māstarna, but, according to Tācītus, Querquetulānus, from being covered with oaks. Tācītus and Vārrō call him Cælis, Diōnysius Cælius; and Fēstus says that Cæles and Vibēnna were two brothers. Diōnysius states that the settlement took place in the reign of Rōmūlus, and others make it much later, in the reign of Tārcīnīus Priscus. Adj. Cælius, et, Cæliānus, a, um. Cælius mons (Tac. Ann. iv. 65). Cæliānus exercitus.

Cælius v. Cælius, a, um. Cælius mons, Monte Cælio, one of the hills on which Rome was built. It stands between Mons Avēntinus, Monte Aventino, and Mons Esquilinus, Monte Esquilino. It has been long uninhabited, and is now garden ground. Tullus Hostilius added this mountain to the city, on the destruction of Alba Longa, and chose it for the site of his palace, to induce others to build their houses there (Liv. i. 30). When Campus Mārtius was inundated, military exercises were performed on this hill, hence the name Mārtius. Calimontāna porta, one of the gates of Rome (Ap. Bel. Civ. 385).

Cælius, i, m. a man to whom Mārtiālis addresses one of his epigrams, alleging that he pretended to have the gout, as an excuse for not saluting the nobler citizens in the morning; and the result of this deception was that he really became subject to that disease (vii. 37).

Cælius Cāldus, Cælii Cāldi, m. a young Roman of great bravery, who fell into the hand of the enemy, at the time P. Quinctilius Vārus lost his army in Germany. Disdaining to submit to the cruelty which the Germans exercised on the captives, he dashed out his brains with the chains in which he was bound (Vel. Pat. ii. 120).

P. Cælius, P. Cælii, m. was governor of Placentia at the time that town was taken by Cinna's army, which did not spare the life of Cælius (Val. Max. iv. 7). See L. Petronius.

Cæne, arum, f. Senn, a town on the western bank of Tigris, the Dejlah, opposite the mouth of the little Zab.

Cænēs, eos, m. a son of Elātus, one of the Lāpithæ, who was originally a woman, and her name then was Cænis. She obtained from Nēptūnus, in reward for personal injury, that she should be changed into a man, and be rendered proof against wounds by iron. When in this form, Cænēs was at the hunting of the Calydonian boar, and at the battle between the Centaurs and Lāpithæ, when he put many to death, but sustained no injury, in consequence of being invulnerable. His insolence proceeded so far, that he wished the conquered to worship his spear, for which Jūpiter overwhelmed him with a heap of trees. After death he returned to his original form and sex. Hygīnus is the only author who reckons him one of the Argonauts. From his father he is called Elātēus (Ov. Met. xii. 497. Hom. Il. i. 264. Virg. Æn. vi. 448).—2. A soldier of Enēas, who slew Ortygius, and was himself killed by Turnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 573).—3. An Argive, killed in the Theban war by Hæmon, who severed his head from his body; rapit colla Cænēos Indechū (Stat. Th. vii. 644).

Cænī, orum, m. one of the nations of Thrācia, who, with the Astīi, Maduatēni, and Corēli, attacked the Roman army under Cn. Mānlius Vūlso, returning from Asia, and carried off a considerable part of the booty, killing a number of them, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 40).

Cænina, æ, f. a town of the Sabines (Ov. Fast. ii. 135). Festus says in the vicinity of Rome, so called from its founder Cenis. Inh. Cæninēnses, ium (Sing. Cæninēnsis, is), m. made war upon Rōmūlus for having carried off their daughters, but were defeated, and their general, Acron, killed by Rōmūlus himself. The spoils of Acron formed the first Spōlta Opima. Adj. Cæninus, a, um. Cænina arx (Prop. iv. 10. 9).

Cænīs, idis, f. a freedwoman of Antōnia, and concubine of the Emperor Vēspāsianus, before his marriage with Flāvīa Dōmītilla, and after her death (Suet. Vesp. 3).

Cænīs, is, f. the original name of Cænēs q. v.

Cænophrūrūm, i, n. a place nearly equidistant between Byzāntium, Constantinople, and Hērāclēa, at which the Roman Emperor, Aurēlianus, was killed by Mnestheus, his freedman, whom he had made principal secretary (Eutrop. ix. 15).

Cænōs Gāllicānos, a station in Bithynia, on the confines of Gālātia (Amm. Mar. xiv. 11).

Cæpio Crispinus, Cæpiōnis Crispīni, m. a questor under Grānius Mārcellus, governor of Bithynia, whom he accused of treason, by which is meant, he had spoken defamatory words against the Emperor Tiberius (Tac. Ann. i. 74).

Q. Cæpio, Q. Cæpiōnis, m. a man who acted with Octavius (Sal. Frag. 1).

Cæræsi, orum, m. a nation of Gāllicā Bēlgica, who, with the Cōndrūsi, Ebūrōnes, and Pāmāni, went under the general appellation of Germans, and were supposed to send 40,000 men to the Belgic army, which was raised against the Roman dominion in Gāllicā, France. Their territory was situated between that of the Tréviri, and Mōsa, the Meuse (Cæs. B. G. ii. 4).

Cærē, n. indec. v. Cærē, es, f. (Just. xx. 1), Cerveteri, a wealthy city of Etruria, built by the Pēlāsi, by whom it was called Agylā. Mēzēntius, their king, held his court here, and to this city the vestal virgins carried all the sacred things which they could remove, immediately before Rome was burned by the Gauls, hence sacred rites were called cæremoniæ (Val. Max. i. 1). For this protection the senate passed a law, at the suggestion of Cānillus, that a league of hospitality should be formed with the natives of this town, and the freedom of the city granted them. Inh. Cærītes, um (Sing. Cærēs, Itis), m. were deprived of their right of voting, because they had revolted. Hence, when the censors deprived the citizens of this privilege for misconduct, they were said to enter their names into the register of the Cærītes. Adj. Cærēs, es, es, gen. Itis, v. Itis, et, Cærētānus, a, um. Cærēs ager, the territory of the Cærītes. Cærītis (urbis) amnis, the Vacina, a small river which passes this town (Virg. Æn. viii. 597). Digni Cærīte cærā worthy of the wax of Cerveteri; i. e. deserving to be deprived of the right of voting (Hor. Epist. i. 6. 62). Cærētānus amnis (Plin. i. 320).

Cærēlla, æ, f. a ridiculous character, at which Mārtialis sneers (iv. 20).

Cæsar, āris, m. the name of a branch of the Julian Tribe (Gēns Jūlia), who are said to have received this appellation, either from one of them being born with a thick head of hair (cum casarīe), or from his being cut out of his mother's womb (ex caso matris utero), or, according to some, from one of them having kept an elephant, which in the Phœnician language bears the same name. See Jūlius.

C. Cæsar, C. Cæsāris, m. whose original name was C. Vipsānūs Agrippa, son of M. Vipsānūs Agrippa and Jūlia, daughter of Augūstus. His grandfather adopted him as his son, hence he received the name of Cæsar. On his return from Arminia, where he had been wounded, he died at the age of twenty-three, in the fourth year of the Christian era. Augustus had bestowed on him the title of prince of the Roman youth, and nominated him consul elect (Tac. Ann. i. 3).—2. A noble Roman, whom the soldiers in his father's camp called Cālgūla, from the cāliga, a coarse shoe worn by the common soldiers, on account of his having been kept by his father during his earlier years in the dress of a private, and by that name he is generally known in history. Cālgūla was the son of Gērmānicus and Agrippina, daughter of M. Agrippa and Jūlia, and was born during the consulship of his father, and Cn. Fōnteus, but the place of his birth has been much disputed, and is still undetermined. His education in the army endeared him to the soldiers, and he served in Syria. On returning from this country to Rome, after his father's death, he lived with his mother, and afterwards with Lāvīa Augūsta, in whose praise he delivered a funeral oration from the rostrum, when only a boy. At this early period of life, he discovered great circumspection, and thereby avoided the many insidious snares laid for his destruction. Injurious or insulting treatment did not provoke his resentment, and the obsequiousness of his behaviour gave rise to the just remark, that there never was a better slave, nor a worse master. He married Jūlia Claudilla, daughter of M. Jūnius Silānus, whom, in a short time, he forced to kill herself. Afterwards he obtained the office of augur, but, before his induction into that office, was advanced to the pontificate. We have no positive evidence that he accelerated the death of the Emperor Tiberius, although there seems little doubt that he was present, and that the Emperor expired by violence. The accession of Cālgūla gratified the wish of the whole empire, particularly of the soldiers, who retained the greatest affection and respect for him. This uncommon popularity continued for some time, as he contrived, in opposition to his natural inclination, to regulate his conduct by such appearances and measures as tended to deceive the people with respect to his real character. It requires greater sacrifices to the natural propensities than this Emperor possessed, to continue long the plan of dissimulation. He soon began to gratify the very worst desires and passions to which mankind are liable, in the most horrid cruelties, and most vicious indulgences. Of his numerous murders, and excessive lewdness, it would be improper to give any detail. It appears astonishing that the citizens of Rome submitted to his barbarities for a single week. All classes of the community were subjected not only to every species of insult, injustice, and extortion, but likewise to the violation of every principle or tie which connects society, and forms the endearments of friendship and affection. Cālgūla fell by the weapon of a conspirator, and the reader of his life almost regrets that such a monster of atrocity did not, in dying, feel that poignant torture which he had inflicted on thousands. He carried on no war, nor engaged in any important undertaking. His general conduct appeared rather that of a maniac, than a man in his right mind. Many of his actions bore a great resemblance to those of a buffoon; calculated to excite merriment or contempt, rather than to appear the result of reflection or judgment. His defects in this respect, to say nothing of his flagrant and numerous vices, must have sunk him in the public opinion to the very lowest degree of contempt. But to this must be added the detestation and abhorrence produced by almost every species of enormity, to which allusion only can be made, for description would incur merited reprehension.

L. Cæsar, L. Cæsaris, m. one of Cæsar's lieutenant-generals in the Gallic war.—2. Son of the former, who met Cæsar at Ariminum, Rimini, when that ambitious statesman raised the standard of rebellion against his country (Cæs. B. C. i. 8).—3. The younger brother of C. Cæsar, whom his grandfather Augustus likewise adopted, styled him prince of the Roman youth, and declared him consul elect. He died at Marseilles, on his way to join the army in Spain, in the nineteenth year of his age, and first of this era (Tac. Ann. i. 3).

Sextus Cæsar, Sæxti Cæsaris, m. an officer in Cæsar's army, whom that general sent to receive the legion commanded by Varrus, after the latter had been expelled from Gades, Cádiz, and the gates of Itālica, Sevilla la Vieja, had been shut against him. In the African war, Cæsar sent him from Egypt to Syrta, where he defeated Cæcilius Bāssus, and bribed his soldiers to put their commander to death. This nefarious measure did not succeed, and he himself afterwards fell by the hands of the very man whom he attempted to assassinate (Cæs. B. C. ii. 20 seq.).

Cæsārēa, æ, f. Kaisaria, the chief city of one of the three provinces into which Pālæstina was afterwards divided. Its ancient name was Panēas, which Philippus, son of Herōdes the elder, having enlarged, changed into Cæsārēa, in honour of the Roman Emperor Tiberius. Of its ancient grandeur nothing remains, only the vestiges of its walls point out its site. Tacitus makes it the capital of Jūdea (Hist. ii. 79). Plinius says its ancient name was Tūrris Stratōnis, that it was built by king Herōdes who, according to Ammianus Mārcellinus, called it Cæsārēa, in honour of Augustus (xiv. 8).—2. A town of Cāppādōcia. See Mazaca.

Cæsario, ōnis, m. a son of Clēōpātra, queen of Egypt, by C. Jūlius Cæsar, according to her avowal, put to death by Augustus (Suet. Aug. 17).

Cæsēnnius Pætus, Cæsēnnii Pæti, m. appointed governor of Armēnia by the Emperor Nēro, in the year 63. After some slight advantages, the Parthians defeated him, and in his distress he applied in very suppliant terms to Cōrbūlo, who at last set out for his relief. Before his arrival, Cæsēnnius concluded a disgraceful treaty with Vologēsē, king of the Parthians. The Emperor, instead of calling him to a severe account, on his return to Rome, for the disgrace which he had brought on the Roman arms, humourously said, "I instantly forgive you, lest a fit of illness should be induced from long anxiety, as you are so apt to take fright" (Tac. Ann. xv. 6—25).

Cæsētius Rūfus, Cæsētii Rūfi, m. a senator, whose head was brought to Antōnius the triumvir, during an entertainment. After inspecting it carefully, he only said, "I did not know him" (Val. Max. ix. 5).

L. Cæsētius Flāvus, L. Cæsētii Flāvi, m. a tribune of the people, whom, with Epidius Mārcellus, another tribune of the people, C. Jūlius Cæsar deprived of office for exciting ill-will against him, as if he had aspired to the crown, 46 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 116).

Cæsia silva, Cæsie silvæ, f. Heserwaldt, a wood in the North of Germany, in the duchy of Cleves (Tac. Ann. i. 50).

Cæsius, i, m. a bad poet (Catul. xiv. 18).

Cæsius Bāssus, Cæsii Bāssi, m. a poet, who, according to Quintiliānus, deserves to be mentioned after Hōrātius, if any man merited that honour. Persius addresses his sixth satire to him. Here we have followed the ancient scholiast, readily allowing that a considerable uncertainty prevails from there being at Rome several eminent men of the name of Bāssus.

Cæsius Cōrdus, Cæsii Cōrdi, m. proconsul of Crēta, Candia, accused of peculation and treasonable language, for which he was condemned. The Cyrenians charged him with extortion (Tac. Ann. iii. 38—40).

Cæsius Nāsica, Cæsi Nāsice, m. the commander of a legion in Britain (Tac. Ann. xii. 40).

Cæsius Sabinus, Cæsi Sābini, m. a friend of Mārtiālis, who praises him for his respectability (vii. 96: ix. 59).

Cæso, ōnis, m. a commander of the Sēdētāni, in the second Spanish war. Silius Itālicus describes him as an excellent horseman (iii. 377).

Cæsōnia, æ, f. wife of the Emperor Cāligūla, who was neither pretty nor young at the time he married her, besides she was the mother of three daughters, by another man. To the Emperor she seems to have recommended herself by excessive luxury and lasciviousness. She gave him a draught made of Hippōmānes, which produced madness, but not immediate death (Juv. Sat. vi. 616). Some have ascribed to this deleterious potion the cruelty of disposition which he afterwards showed. On the death of her husband, a centurion ran her through with a sword, and transfixed her daughter to the wall (Suet. Cal. 50, 59).—2. The wife of Rūfus, on whose birthday Mārtiālis writes an epigram. She appears to have been born on the same day with the Emperor Dōmītiānus (ix. 40).

Cæsōnius Māximus, Cæsōni Māximi, m. a friend of Q. Ovidius, who was banished by the Roman emperor Nēro from Italy. His sentence of condemnation was the first notice which he had that any crime had been charged against him (Tac. Ann. xv. 71). On his statue, or image, Mārtiālis writes two epigrams (vii. 43, 44).

C. Cæsōnius Pætus, C. Cæsōni Pæti, m. was consul with P. Pētrōnius Tūrpiliānus, in the year 61 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 29).

Cæus. See Cæus.

Calaves, ium, m. an African nation, neighbours to the Auastomātes (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Cāla p. Caia (2 syl.) Tārrātia, Caie Tārrātiae, f. a celebrated vestal virgin, on whom the Romans bestowed distinguished honours by lex Hōrātia. She gave Cāmpus Tiberinus, afterwards Mārtius, to the Roman people (Gel. vi. 7).

Cāicus, i, m. one of the Trojan commanders under Ænēas, who appears to have been a man of intrepidity (Virg. Æn. ix. 35).—2. A man whom Hannibal killed at the siege of Saguntum, Murciedro (Sil. Ital. i. 306).—3. A Colchian commander in the Argonautic expedition, lost his life by an arrow from the bow of Lēxānor, which had been aimed at the head of Iāson (Val. Flacc. vi. 688).

Cāicus, i, m. the Caicus, the Grimakli, or, the Castrī, a river of Mýsia, which falls into Mūrē Egēum, the Archipelago, to the south of Lēsbos. From Tēuthras being king of Mýsia, which bordered on Cāicus, it is called Tēuthrāntēus Cāicus (Ov. Met. ii. 243). Virgilius has Mysus Cāicus (G. iv. 370); and Herōdōtus seems to think that this river watered a fertile plain (vi. 28).

Calēta (3 syl.), æ, f. the nurse of Ænēas. She gave her name to a promontory where she was buried, and to a town, now Gaeta, in Lātium. Near this place, according to Plūtarchus and Valērius Māximus, M. Tūllius Cicēro was murdered by the assassins sent after him by M. Antōnius. Cluverius mentions a fort there of great strength, which was called the key of the kingdom, meaning Naples. Curvo littore Caiēta, on the winding shore of Gaeta (Juv. Sat. xiv. 87). Dārdānis Caiēta (Mart. x. 20). Adj. Caiētānus, a, um. Caiētāna villa (Val. Max. i. 4).

Caiētānus (4 syl.), i, m. a man to whom Pōlychārmus had lent money which he appears to have remitted, probably because the other was unable to pay. The wit of the epigram seems to turn on this idea (Mart. viii. 37).

Cālōli, orum, m. a kind of sweet cake sent in presents during the Sātūrnālia, on which was imprinted the likeness of a boy, Caius, and probably also the letters of his name (Stat. Syl. i. 6. 17). The readings here differ, some have Cāsēoli, little cheeses, because cheese formed one of the Saturnalian gifts.

Cālus r. Caius (2 syl.), i, m. a common prænomen among the Romans. Adj. Cālānus, a, um. Caiānārum expeditiōnum lūdibrium, the ridiculous expedition of Caius, i. e. of C. Cæsar Cāligūla, the Roman Emperor (Tac. Hist. iv. 15).—2. A man to whom Mārtiālis writes two epigrams. From the lines of the poet, it may be inferred that he was a money-hoarder, and readier to make promises than to fulfil them; Si donāre vocas promittēre, nec dāre Cāi (x. 16).—3. A man, whose condition Mārtiālis contrasts with that of his servant Cōndylus, and gives the preference to the latter (ix. 94).—4. A Roman knight (Mart. v. 14).—5. Et, Cāla, æ, f. fictitious names, used in nuptial contracts when nominal purchases took place, and the lowest sum given and received. Adj. Cālānus, a, um. Cālānus, æ r. assis, a very small sum (Stat. Syl. iv. 9. 22). Cālāna ner (Suet. Tit. 1).

Cālābria, æ, f. a district in the southeast part of Itālia, Italy, which Strābo says was anciently called Messāpia, Lapygia and Salentina. According to Diónýsius and Plinius, it was also called Peucētia, from Peucētius, brother of Enōtrus. Inh. Cālābri, orum (Sing. Cālāber, bri), m. Adj. Cālāber, bra, brum, et, Calabricus, a, um. Cālābrum vellus, Calabrian fleece. The Calabrian wool was the finest and best in Italy (Pers. ii. 63). Cālāber Sāson (Luc. Phar. ii. 627). Cālābra līra, lyric, or, Epic, poetry; the former from Hōrātius being a Venusian, and the latter from Ennius being a Calabrian by birth. Since Mārtiālis calls Hōrātius a Calabrian, it is most probable he had his poetry in view (v. 31: viii. 18).

Cālāctē, es, f. (i. e. the beautiful shore), a town in the north of Sicily, now in ruins. Piscōsa Cālāctē (Sil. Ital. xiv. 251).

Cālāgūrris, is, f. Loharre, a free town of the Vascōnes, on the south bank of Ibēras, the Ebro, above its junction with the Arāgon. To distinguish it from Cālāgūrris Fībūlārēnsis, Calahorra, a town of the Vēscitāni, it was called Nāsica. Inh. Cālāgūrritāni, orum (Sing. Cālāgūrritānus, i), m. who, during the terrible famine which their city underwent in the Sertorian war, ate their wives and children, rather than submit to Pōmpeius. To this, Jūvēnalis alludes (Sat. xv. 93—96).

Cālāis, is, m. a son of Bōrēas and Orīthya. Like his brother Zēthes, he is said to have had wings, to which Stātilius alludes (Th. v. 408). He was one of the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. i. 469).—2. Son of Ornätus (Hor. Od. iii. 9. 14).

Calamintus, arum, f. a town of Libya.—2. Another of Phœnicia (Steph.).

Calamis, idis, m. a statuary, who excelled in the representation of horses, to which Propercius alludes (iii. 9. 10). His merits were not confined to that alone, as he engraved in a style of great elegance (Plin. v. 107). This author likewise speaks in the highest terms of him as a statuary (ib. 121).

Calanus, i, m. an Indian gymnosophist, who was persuaded by his prince, Taxiles, to attend Alexander the Great (Val. Max. i. 8).

Calas, ar, m. a præfect under Alexander the Great, and governor of Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, &c. (Curt. iii. 1).

Calathana, arum, n. a village of Thessaly, which the Ætoli took by assault, and plundered, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Calatia, ar, f. Calazzo, a very ancient town of Campania, at which the Roman army was lying, when C. Pöntius q. v. sent false information respecting the march of the legions of the Sammites, and by that stratagem the Roman army was led into the Forks of Caudium, in 321 B. C. (Liv. ix. 2 seq.). Ita. Calatini, arum, m. Adj. Calatinus, a, um. Calatinus ager (Liv. xxii. 13).

Calatæ, arum, m. an Indian nation, who are their parents (Herod. iii. 38).

Calatis, is, f. Mangalia, a maritime town of Thracia, Romelia, to the south of Tömi, of which the ancient name was Acervetis (Plin. i. 441). M. Licinius Lucullus took it, with a number of other towns in this country, about 70 B. C. (Eutrop. vi. 10).

Calatissus, i, m. a cup-bearer, to whom Martialis addresses an epigram (ix. 95). Some copies read Calceissus.

Calavii, arum, m. Campanians, who, with five other young noblemen, set fire to Rome in different places (212 B. C.), in revenge for Q. Fabius Flaccus having put their parents to death, on the taking of Cápua, in the preceding year (Liv. xxvi. 27).

Calavius Sabinus, Calavi Sabini, m. the commander of the twelfth legion in the war against the Parthians, under Cæcilius Pictus, in the year 62 (Tac. Ann. xv. 7).

Calauria, ar, f. Sidra, or, Poros, an island in Sinus Saronicus, the Gulf of Egina, thirty stadia in circumference, and chiefly remarkable for the death of Demosthenes. It was near Hiera, formerly two, now one island, from the isthmus between them having risen above the sea by alluvial formation. Adj. Calauræus, a, um. Calauræa Lætöis, Calauria, sacred to Apöllo, son of Lätöna (Ov. Met. vii. 384).

Calæcarum, i, n. a donative given to the Roman soldiers, to be expended on the purchase of shoes; hence the name (Suet. Vesp. 8).

Calchas, antis, m. a Trojan, son of Thestor, sent by his countrymen to consult the oracle of Apöllo, at Délphi, Castri, about the beginning of the Trojan war. Apöllo ordered him to leave the Trojans, and attach himself to the Greeks. In obedience to the oracle, he joined the armament of the Greeks, and to his skill that nation owed great obligations in appeasing the wrath of Diana at Aulis, in forestalling the length of the siege of Troy, in stating the cause of the pestilence sent by Apöllo, for insulting his priest, and on many other occasions recorded by Hömërus. After the destruction of Troy, he went to Cölöphon, where he died of grief, because Möpus surpassed him in his own art, by foretelling the number of pigs which a pregnant sow, then before them, would bring forth. Many writers consider Calchas as a Greek, not a Trojan, by birth. Hömërus celebrates him for his extraordinary skill in the pretended art of augury, to which Ovidius alludes (Art. Am. ii. 737). From his father he is called Thestörides (Hom. Il. i. 69). Adj. Calchæus, a, um (Virg. Cir. 204).

Calcitana, v. Calliphena, ar, f. a priestess, skilled in the rites of Ceres, whom the Romans brought from Vëlla to preside over the religious observances of that goddess (Val. Max. i. 1).

Calë, es, f. a town of Italy, in Fläminia.—2. Another in Gallia, France (Sal. Frag.).

Calëdonia, ar, f. an ancient name of Scotland, although at first it appears to have been the name of a district, rather than of the whole country, and afterwards was more frequently applied to the northern than to the southern parts. Inh. Calëdonii, arum (Sing. Calëdonius, i), m. Adj. Calëdonius, a, um. Calëdonii Campi, the plains of Scotland (Stat. Syl. v. 2. 142). Calëdonii Britänni (Luc. Phar. vi. 68). Inde Calëdonio vëlata Britännia monstra, thence Britain clothed with the Scottish monster, i. e. the skin of the bear (Claud. xxii. 247). Some copies read Inde Calëdonio vallata Britännia ponto. This suggests a good idea, but not concordant with the sentiment of the poet. Calëdonius Ocëanus (Val. Flacc. i. 8).

Calënus, i, m. a man in the army of Hänibal, of great strength, who killed Veliternus and Märius, afterwards he lost his own life by the hand of Scipio. He was born on the mountain Tifata, and accustomed to actions of great daring (Sil. Ital. xiii. 219 seq.).—2. A man in the army of P. Cörnellius Scipio Africänus, who killed Sämilus in the battle at Zäma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 428).—3. An avaricious man (Mart. i. 100).—4. A man to whom Martialis writes an epigram, congratulating him on the happiness he had enjoyed with Sülpicia his wife (x. 35).

Calës, ium, v. Calë, es, f. Calvi, a city of Campania, which, when first mentioned by Livius, was possessed by the Ausönes (viii. 16). Silius Itälicus derives the name from Caläis, son of Börëas (viii. 513), hence Thracica Calë (xii. 525). Inh. Calëni, arum (Sing. Calënus, i), m. Adj. Calënus, a, um. Calënus ager, the territory of the Calëni, which produced excellent wine (Liv. x. 20. Hor. Od. i. 20. 9).

Calësius, i, m. servant of Axylus, who, like his master, fell by the hand of Diömëdes (Hom. Il. vi. 18).

Calëtës, ium, v. Calëti, arum, m. a people of Gallia, France, whose country lay a little to the north of the mouth of Séquäna, the Seine (Cæs. B. G. ii. 4).

Calëtor, öris, m. father of Aphäreus, killed by Ænëas. Calëtörides, ar, m. Aphäreus (Hom. Il. xiii. 541).—2. Son of Clÿtus, made a great effort to burn the Greek ships. Ajax Telämonius prevented him, and took the torch from him. Hector calls him his relation, and animates the Trojans to rescue him, which they did (Hom. Il. xv. 419).

Calëtra, ar, f. appears to be obsolete, but Cālētrānus ager, in Etrūria, occurs in Livius (xxxix. 55).

Cālgācus, i. m. a Caledonian chief, who, at the head of his countrymen, addressed the troops in a speech recorded by Tacitus, which, for pathetic language, love of liberty, undaunted bravery, noble enthusiasm, kindling patriotism, and indignant contempt of slavery, rivals the most finished oration in the writings both of Greeks and Romans. A deep sense of injury, and an ardent desire of revenge glow in every sentence. The noble warrior, impatient for the battle which was to redress the wrongs of his injured country, omits no sentiment which could inflame the wrath, or rouse the valour, of his countrymen. The reader regrets to find that the bravery of the soldiers did not equal either the speech or the courage of their commander; for, instead of cutting to pieces the Romans, whom they greatly surpassed in numbers, they rather presented themselves to the swords of the enemy, who gained an easy victory (Tac. Agric. 29 seq.).

M. Cāldius, M. Cāldius, m. a senator, who was of opinion that Pompey should be sent to his provinces, to prevent all discord between him and Caesar. But the consul Lēntulus refused to put the motion of Cāldius to the vote (Cæs. B. C. i. 2). He was a zealous friend of Cicero, for whose recall he exerted his utmost efforts. Of his oratory Cicero has given a minute description, without assigning him a very high rank in that art (Cic. Brut. 80 seq. Val. Max. viii. 10).

Q. Cāldius, Q. Cāldius, m. a Roman, who carried a law, when a tribune of the people, that the banishment of Q. Cæcilius Mætellus Numidicus should be recalled. In return for this good office, the son of that noble Roman, Q. Cæcilius Mætellus Pius, supplicated the people in behalf of Cāldius, when candidate for the prætorship (Val. Max. v. 2).

Cālgūla. See C. Caesar.

Calippus, i. m. an Athenian, suspected of a conspiracy against Dion, the Syracusan monarch (Val. Max. iii. 8).

Calis, is, m. a man to whom Philotas addressed himself, at the time he was put to death, and appears to have been guilty of the same crime (Curt. vi. 11).

Callicia. See Gallæcia.

Callatēbus, i. f. a city of Lŷdia, where honey is made from tamarisk and wheat (Herod. vii. 31).

Callē, es, f. Oporto, a town of Lūstānia, Portugal, situated on the declivity of a mountain near Dūrius, the Douro, which forms an excellent harbour. The celebrity of this place gave the modern name to the country Portugal. From Oporto the British import a large quantity of wine annually, and the red wine, made both in Spain and Portugal, is from this town called Port. Inh. Cālāici, orum (Sing. Cālāicus, i), m. Adj. Cālāicus, a, um. Cālāica tellus (Sil. Ital. ii. 397). Cālāicum metallum, gold (Mart. xiv. 95).

Cālāanax, ātis, m. the husband of Cālīpātira (Pin. Ol. vii. 171).

Cālānira, es, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. Il. xviii. 44).

Callias, es, m. an Athenian of great wealth, who promised to pay for Cimon, the sum in which Miltiades had been fined by the people, and for which he himself had been confined in prison after his father's death, on condition that he obtained his sister Elpinice in marriage. Miltiades had died in prison, because he was unable to raise a sum equal to the fine, and the Athenian laws subjected his son to confinement on the same account, until he paid the penalty. On allowing his sister Elpinice to marry Callias, the latter discharged the debt, and Cimon thus obtained his liberty (Cor. Nep. Cim. 1). His name is variously written.—2. A nobleman of Ægina (Pin. Nem. vi. 63).—3. Son of Phænippus, and father of Hippôniceus, an Athenian, who had an inveterate hatred at Pisistratus, and alone had the courage to bid for that tyrant's goods, on their being exposed to public sale after his expulsion (Herod. vi. 121). He had a grandson of the same name (Herod. vii. 151).

Cāllichōrus, i. m. a river of Pāphlāgōnia, in which Bæchus, returning from his conquests in India, washed his thyrsus, which had been stained with blood, and celebrated his orgies, commonly called Tricēterica q. v. (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). Cāllichōrus vulgatus, i. e. inclŷtus (Val. Flacc. v. 75).

Callicinus, i. m. a knoll or rising ground, round which Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, formed his troops, in the immediate vicinity of the Roman camp. This brought on an engagement, in which the Roman consul, P. Licinius Crāssus, was defeated, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 58, 59).

Callicles, is, m. a nobleman of Ægina (Pin. Nem. iv. 130 seq.).

Cāllicolōnē, es, f. a beautiful eminence near Troy, five stadia in circumference, washed by the river Simōis (Hom. Il. xx. 53).

Callicrates, is, m. an officer of Alexander the Great, to whom he gave the charge of the treasures (Curt. v. 3).—2. One of the Achæi, who thought that the safety of the state depended on keeping the treaty with the Romans, and delivered a speech to that effect, against the sentiments of Xenarchus and others, who were friendly to an alliance with Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 23).—3. An Athenian, a man of great acuteness and cunning, but destitute of honour and religion, who accomplished the death of Dion (Cor. Nep. Dion 8, 9).—4. A Lacedæmonian, the handsomest man of all the Greeks (Herod. ix. 72).

Callicritus, i. m. a Theban prince, who, when returning as ambassador from Rome, was murdered along with Eversa, in 174 B. C. The Roman ambassadors rather insinuated than charged this murder on Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, who maintained that they perished by shipwreck. Eumēnes, king of Asia, declared expressly that they were cut off by Pērsēus (Liv. xlii. 13 seq.).

Cāllicūla, æ, m. a mountain of Cāmpānia, which Q. Fabius Māximus, the dictator, occupied, after Hānnibal had gone into Fālērnus ager, with the view of harassing him, or preventing his return (Liv. xxii. 15). Cluverius makes it a ridge, commencing at Māssicus and extending towards the river Vulturinus.

Cālhidrōmos, v. us, i. m. the highest summit of Ceta, Banina. At the request of Antiochus, king of Syria, the Ætoli took possession of Cālhidrōmos, with the third part of two thousand men. M. Pōrcius Cato dislodged them, killing the greater part (Liv. xxxvi. 15, 16).

Callisa, arum, f. Carife, a town of the Samnites, or Hirpini, taken by the Roman consuls, in 323 B. C. (Liv. viii. 25).

Calligenes, is, m. the physician of Philippos, king of Macedonia, who was in the interest of Perseus, and by whose means the latter succeeded to the kingdom of Macedonia, in opposition to the will of Philippos, who intended to bestow the crown on Antigonus (Liv. xl. 55).

Callimachus, i, m. a native of Cyrene, was the son of Baitus and Mesatima. He taught a school in Egypt, in the reigns of Ptolemæus Philadelphus, and Evêrgètes. Of his voluminous writings only a few epigrams, some hymns to the gods, and an elegy have been preserved. Several of the Latin poets imitated this author, whose writings have been praised by various critics. He was the inventor of elegy, and, from Cicero, appears to have been a man of general literature (De Orat. iii. 33). Propertius held his elegies, and those of Philletas, in great esteem, beginning his first elegy of the third book with an invocation to these two poets. Ovidius considers his art superior to his genius (Am. l. 15. 14).—2. A relation of Alcimædon, who gained the prize for wrestling, when a boy, at the Olympic games (Pin. Ol. viii. 108).—3. A Grecian general, killed in the battle of Mæathon, in which he had displayed great bravery (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 6). He was polemarch (Herod. vi. 109 seq.).

Callimander, dri, m. a steady friend of Demetrius, king of Syria (Just. xxxviii. 9).

Callinicus, i, m. Rafikah, a town of Mesopotamia, Al-Jezirah, near the eastern bank of Euphrates, the El-Frat. Between this town and Carre, Seneus gained a victory over Galerius Maximianus, in the year 297 (Eutrop. ix. 24).

Callistodorus, i, m. a man whose fortune amounted to that of a Roman knight, which he divided with his brother, and, therefore, Martialis denies that he was a knight (v. 29).—2. A buffoon, whom Martialis ridicules (vi. 44). Perhaps he is the person described by the same poet as a glutton (x. 31).

Calliopë, es (e. Calliopëa, æ, Ov. Fast. v. 80), f. one of the muses, who was represented crowned with laurels, holding a book in her hands. But the ancient authors do not agree in their description of the muses more than in that of the gods and goddesses. She presided over eloquence and heroic poetry. By Æger she was the mother of Orpheus (Ov. Met. v. 339).

Callipencë, es, f. a forest, or pass, of Thessaly, through which the Roman army, under Q. Marcus Philippus, passed, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 5).

Calliphron, ônis, m. a Grecian, who taught Epaminondas to dance (Cor. Nep. Epam. 2).

Callipide, arum, m. a people of Scythia, according to Herodotus they were the same with the Grecian Scythians (iv. 17).

Callipolis, is, f. Caloudi, a town of Greece, between which and Naupactus stands the mountain Corax (Liv. xxxvi. 30).—2. Gallipoli, or, Galliboli, a town of Thracian Chersonesus, taken by Philippos, king of Macedonia, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 16).—3. A town of Sicily, the situation of which is doubtful, as no vestige remains. From Herodotus it appears to have stood on the east side of the island, and from Strabo, that its founders were from the island Naxos (Sil. Ital. xiv. 249). Ital. Callipolitani, orum (Sing. Callipolitani, i), m.—4. Gallipoli, a town of Calabria.

Callippus, i, m. joint-commander of the Macedonian fleet, in 170 B. C., with Antenor q. v. (Liv. xlv. 28).

Callirhœ, es, f. daughter of Achelœus, and wife of Alcæon, who supplicated Jupiter to change her sons, who were infants, into men, and Jupiter granted her request. From her father, Ovidius calls her Achelœia Callirhœ (Met. ix. 414).—2. A daughter of Scamander, and wife of Tros, king of Troy, to whom she bore Ilius, Gânymêdes, and Assaræus.—3. A daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and mother of Geryon, by Chrysæor (Hes. Th. 288).—4. A daughter of Piræthus (Hyg. 145).—5. An abandoned woman. Persius uses this name as synonymous with mœretrix (l. 134).

Callirhœ, es, f. a fountain in Attica, called Eunæcrunus, which had nine springs, hence Stätius, novies errantibus undis implicat (Th. xii. 629). It retains its ancient name.—2. A warm spring in Judæa, which possessed medicinal qualities (Plin. i. 570).—3. A spring in Arabia, which gave name to the town formerly called Antiochia, afterwards Edessa (Plin. i. 581).

Callistë, es, f. an ancient name of Thera q. v. (Pin. Pyth. iv. 459).

Callisthènes, is, m. a philosopher, born at Olynthus, who had been fellow-student with Alexander the Great, under Aristotèles, and went to Asia to record the actions of that conqueror. His advice had great influence with the monarch, notwithstanding his irascibility and vanity. At last he incurred his displeasure, because he, of all the Macedonians, opposed the adoration of Alexander with the greatest keenness, after that infatuated warrior, copying the Persians, had commanded the army to pay him divine honours. Under the pretence of treason, he mangled the body of Callisthènes, and put many of the princes to death for their disobedience to this impious order. Lysimachus gave poison to this philosopher, after he had for some time been exhibited in a cage with a dog, deformed by the cruelty of Alexander (Just. xii. 6—xv. 3). Seneeca considers the murder of Callisthènes a crime of such enormity that nothing can redeem (N. Q. vi. 23).

Callistô, ùs, f. daughter of Lycæon, who, by Jupiter, became the mother of Arcas, from whom the kingdom of his grandfather received the name of Arcadia. Juno hated Callistô, in consequence of that child, on which account she was changed into the constellation Sêptêmtrio, which, according to Hyginus, neither moves nor sets. Tethys, the nurse of Juno, would not allow her to touch the ocean. Hyginus adds, that the Greeks called this constellation Ελευθερα. In another place he says, that Jupiter assumed the form of a bear at the time of his intercourse with Callistô, but that Amphis, a comic poet, stated that Jupiter, in the form of Diana, deceived Callistô, who was one of her nymphs, and that the goddess, enraged at the violation of her innocence, turned her into a bear, which the Ætolians brought as a present to Lycæon. To preserve her life, Jupiter placed her among the stars, under the name of Aretos, and called her son Aretophylax (Hyg. 177 seq.). Near Teuthis, Dhimitzana, stands the tomb of Callistō, a high artificial hill of earth, with many trees upon it, both wild and fruitful; upon the summit stands a temple of Diana, hence surnamed Callistō.

Callistrātus, i. m. an Athenian, who excelled in oratory. In an assembly of the Arcadians, he endeavoured to prevail on that nation to form an alliance with the Athenians, rather than with the Thebans and Argives. From his arguments, as related by Cōrnēlius Nēpos, no very exalted opinion can be formed either of his acuteness or judgment, and the reply of Epamīnōndas proves the fallacy of his reasoning, as well as the futility of his conclusions. Cōrnēlius Nēpos calls him Atticus rhetor, the Athenian orator (Epam. 6). Demosthēnes preferred hearing Callistrātus, to attending the lectures of Plato (Gel. iii. 13).—2. A man to whom Mārtiālis addresses an epigram (v. 13).—3. A man censured by Mārtiālis for praising all indiscriminately. Perhaps under this name the epigrammatist had other characters in view, but from the nature of the verses in which Callistrātus occurs, they do not deserve to be described or noticed (xii. 82).

Callistus, i. m. a servant of the poet Mārtiālis (Mart. v. 65).—2. A freedman, whom the favours of the Roman Emperor Cālgūla had enriched. Of the part which he took in the fate of that Emperor, the writings of Tacitus give no account. Perfidy and ingratitude, associated with cruelty and cunning, constitute almost the whole of his character. Nārcissus and Pallas acceded to his proposal for the destruction of Mēssālina, and soon accomplished the object of their wish. At his instigation, Cālpurnia and Clēōpātra, concubines of Claudius, acted underparts in this plot. He afterwards endeavoured to persuade Claudius to marry Lōllia Paulina q. v., in which he failed, and the Emperor raised Agrippina, daughter of Gērmānicus and Agrippina, to the throne (Tac. Ann. xi. 29: xii. 2).

Callithēra, orum, n. a town of Thessaly, attacked by the Etōli, who drove the townsmen within the walls, and, satisfied with that victory, retired, without attempting to carry it by storm, of which they had little prospect, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Cālōr, ōris, m. the Calore, a river of Sām-nium, which falls into Sabātus, the Sabato, at Bēnēvēntum. On this river, Hānno, the Carthaginian, had his camp, about three miles from Bēnēvēntum, when he was defeated by Tib. Sēmprōnius Grāccus. Of his whole army, consisting of seventeen thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, only two thousand, chiefly horsemen, escaped (Liv. xxiv. 14–16).

Cālpē, es, e. a. f. (Apōllōnius Rhōdiūs makes it masculine) a mountain in the south of Spain, one of the pillars of Hērclēs. In ancient times the Mediterranean Sea, according to the notions of the Greeks and Romans, was entirely surrounded by land, and Hērclēs separated Spain from Africa, to open a communication between the Atlantic and Mediterranean (Plin. i. 287). Tēthys implevit Hēspērtian Cālpem majoribus undis (Luc. Phar. i. 555). Hērclēs Cālpē (Sil. Ital. x. 174).—2. Kirpē, or, Garpah, a port in Thynā. In many points it resembles Gibraltar, hence Cālpē probably was descriptive of the nature of the place in both instances. Adj. Cālpus, a, um. Cālpus vertex (Orph. 1112).

Q. Cālpēnus, Q. Cālpēni, m. a Roman, who had formerly been a senator and a pleader of causes, both which he disgraced by fighting as a gladiator at the shows exhibited by C. Jūlius Cēsar, on his overthrow of the commonwealth, and extinction of Roman liberty (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 39).

Cālpētianus, i. m. a poor man at whom Mārtiālis laughs (vi. 94).

Cālpētus, i. m. (Līvius writes Cūpētus, i. 3) the ninth king of Alba Longa, was son of Cāpys and father of Tiberinus (Ov. Fast. iv. 46).

Cālpurnia, e. f. daughter of L. Cālpurnius Piso Cēsōnius, and third wife of C. Jūlius Cēsar (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 21).—2. A daughter of Bēstia, and wife of P. Antistius, on whose death she plunged a sword into her own breast, and expired (Vel. Pat. ii. 26).—3. A woman of high rank, whom the Emperor Claudius accidentally praised in the hearing of Agrippina, whose jealousy was thereby excited, but, instead of death, she restricted the punishment to banishment. After the death of Agrippina, Nēro recalled her (Tac. Ann. xii. 22: xiv. 12).—4. A concubine of the Emperor Claudius, who informed him of the marriage of Mēssālina and C. Silius (Tac. Ann. xi. 30). See Callistus.

Cālpurnius, a, um. Cālpurnia gens, the clan of the Cālpurni, which included the Bēstie, Bibūli, Cēsennini, and Pisōnes (Cic. in Pis.). Cālpurnium gēnus, has the same signification (Tac. Ann. xv. 48). Cālpurnia scita, Calpurnian regulations, which compelled persons convicted of extortion to make restitution (Tac. Ann. xv. 20). See L. Cālpurnius Piso.

Cālpurnius, i. m. a standard-bearer whose bravery saved the life of Mūnātius Plāncus, a Roman senator (Tac. Ann. i. 39).

Cālpurnius Asprēnas, Cālpurni Asprēnātis, m. appointed governor of Gālātia and Pāmphylia by the Emperor Gālba, and on his way thither put to death the pretended Nēro, who bore a strong resemblance to the emperor of that name in the ferocity of his countenance, and in the colour both of his eyes and hair (Tac. Hist. ii. 9).

Cālpurnius Fābātus, Cālpurni Fābāti, m. a Roman knight, prosecuted under the Emperor Nēro, and, having appealed to the imperial tribunal, was saved by his want of importance (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8).

Cālpurnius Gālērīanus, Cālpurni Gālērīāni, m. son of C. Cālpurnius Piso q. v. The youth, popularity, and elegant person of Cālpurnius were his only crimes. Having been taken forty miles from Rome, his veins were opened, and he bled to death, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. iv. 11).

Cālpurnius Rēpēntinus, Cālpurni Rēpēntini, m. a centurion of the eighteenth legion, whom the soldiers attacked and loaded with fetters, because he had attempted, with others, to defend the images of Gālba, and Vitellius ordered to execution (Tac. Hist. i. 56, 59).

Cālpurnius Sālvīnus, Cālpurni Sālvīāni, m. accused Sextus Mārius on a Latin festival day, and, for this irregularity, the Emperor Tiberius banished him, in the year 25 (Tac. Ann. iv. 36).

C. Călpurnius, C. Călpurni, m. one of three deputies sent by Hannibal to the senate, on purpose to know whether they would ransom, or not, the prisoners taken at Cunnæ. On the refusal of the senate, these three returned, according to promise, to Hannibal; but the ten who had been previously deputed on the same business remained. With such infamy did the censors brand them, that some laid violent hands on themselves, and none of the rest ever appeared in public (Liv. xxii. 61).

C. Călpurnius Piso, C. Călpurni Pisōnis, m. was city prætor, and had the command in the capitol when Hannibal advanced his army within eight miles of Rome, in 213 B. C. Continued in command a year after the expiry of his prætorship, he was sent to Etruria; afterwards he went to Căpua to direct the operations of the army. The senate again ordered him to Etruria, then meditating a revolt, of which he informed the senate by letter (Liv. xxv. 41 seq.).—2. Obtained the prætorship at Rome, in 188 B. C., when the south of Spain became his province, where he displayed great personal bravery and a knowledge of warfare, by which he conquered the Lusitani and Celtiberi, over whom he had the honour of a triumph. He afterwards obtained the consulship, and died in office, in 182 B. C. Strong suspicions respecting his death fell on his wife Quarta Hostilia q. v. (Liv. xxxix. 6 seq.).—3. Held the consulship with Mănius Acilius Glăbrio, 69 B. C., and afterwards obtained Gallia for his province; on returning from which a prosecution had been raised against him for corruption, in the unjust punishment of a native of the country to the north of the Po. In this prosecution C. Jūlius Căsar, probably acting as counsel for the inhabitants, took a warm part against him, and Cicero undertook his defence and procured his acquittal. The speech of the orator is lost, so that the particulars of the case are unknown. In pleading for Flăccus, he mentions that Călpurnius, in his consulship, had displayed both steadiness and courage; leaving it to be inferred, that his previous character, rather than the merits of the question, had induced the judges to acquit him. Săllustius attempts to sully his reputation by stating, that he used his utmost influence with Cicero, unjustly to name C. Jūlius Căsar among the conspirators with Cătellina, and he gives this prosecution as a cause for the resentment of Călpurnius against him (Sal. Cat. 49).—4. The husband of Livia Orestilla, whom the Emperor Călgula took from him on the night of their marriage (Suet. Cal. 23).—5. Was consul in the year 56. The nobility of his father connected him with many distinguished families; and, by his virtues, real or apparent, says Tacitus, he stood high in the favour of the populace. He employed his eloquence in protecting his fellow-citizens, and his wealth in the service of his friends. Even to strangers he showed the utmost politeness, affability, and easiness of access. He possessed also personal advantages, had a majestic appearance, an elegant form, and a fine face; but indulged in levity of manners, in the gratification of vicious passions, in extravagance, and sometimes in luxury, which rendered him more a favourite with the community, who, in that vicious age, hated strictness and severity in enforcing the regulations of the state; and, therefore, wished him to succeed to the empire. He did not plan, but readily entered into, a conspiracy against Néro, which the Romans anxiously wished should be successful, not only from hatred to the tyrant, but from love to Călpurnius. On the discovery of that plot, his friends could not prevail on him to adopt prompt and resolute measures, by which he might have saved his life. He shut himself up in his house, opened his veins, and expired before the soldiers sent to take his life had reached him. After having resolved on death, he wrote a Will, full of shameful flatteries of Néro, in order to induce him to save his wife, Arria Gălla q. v., whom he had taken from her former husband, Dômitius Silus. Tacitus writes C. Piso (Ann. xv. 48, 59). To him Juvénalis is supposed to allude (Sat. v. 109). Adj. Călpurnius, et, Pisōnianus, a, um. Pisōniāna conjuratio (Suet. Ner. 36).

Cn. Călpurnius Piso, Cn. Călpurni Pisōnis, m. a noble Roman youth, bold and enterprising, but profligate and needy. The urgency of his wants, uniting with the depravity of his dispositions, instigated him to any measure which had for its object the convulsion of the state, as the only remedy which could relieve him from embarrassments. He readily entered into the conspiracy of Cătellina, and authors rank him amongst the most dangerous and resolute of his accomplices. In the execution of that plot, Călpurnius was at the head of an army to hold the Spaniards in subjection. The design transpired, and the discovery, of consequence, prevented its execution. Suetonius seems to consider C. Jūlius Căsar, and M. Licinius Crăssus, at the head of the conspiracy, and that they admitted Călpurnius as an accomplice, who was to attempt an insurrection against the government abroad, whilst they excited sedition against the administration at home (Suet. Jul. Căsar. 9). Soon after, this turbulent youth, although only quæstor, obtained the government of the south of Spain, with the authority of prætor, by the interest of M. Licinius Crăssus, who, detesting Cn. Pômpéius Măgnus, supported Călpurnius in opposition to him, and the senate readily assented, in order to have such a dangerous citizen at a distance from the seat of government. The Spanish cavalry, which formed part of his train, assassinated him soon after his arrival in that country. Some ascribe his death to his arrogant temper, and the severity with which he treated the natives; others, to the instigation of Cn. Pômpéius Măgnus, towards whom he avowed inveterate hatred.—2. Son of Cn. Călpurnius Piso, a man of great resolution, who made a bold speech to Tiberius, and yet that emperor made him joint-governor of Syria with Gêrmănicus. In this appointment, the emperor acted rather from hostility to Gêrmănicus than from kindness to Călpurnius. Naturally haughty, violent, and imperious, Călpurnius assumed additional consequence by his marriage with Plăncina, a woman of noble birth and great riches. What orders or hints he received, with respect to Gêrmănicus, no Roman historian has related; but, as the emperor could not endure the popularity of Gērmānīcus, Cāl-pūrnius must have understood the reason of his appointment; and the insolence with which he treated the excellent Gērmānīcus leaves no room to doubt, that the mortification and death of that prince would be glad tidings to the emperor. Cāl-pūrnius made every effort to misrepresent, annoy, and thwart Gērmānīcus, and his wife Plāncina seconded him with a zeal and impropriety disgraceful to her sex. Unable to bear the insolence of Cāl-pūrnius longer, Gērmānīcus ordered him to quit Sýria, which he did but slowly, and went back on the death of Gērmānīcus, with the view of resuming the government of that country. Sēntius Sātūrnīnus prevented him, and compelled him to return to Rome, where he was brought to trial for his behaviour towards the soldiery, the death of Gērmānīcus, and his treatment of that prince. The emperor took no decided part in his trial, either for or against him, from which Cāl-pūrnius inferred that he would be condemned to die. In that conviction, before the senate passed sentence, he cut his own throat during the night, so that his servants found him dead in the morning (Tac. Ann. i. 13—iii. 17). Suetōnius makes P. Vitēllius, the uncle of the emperor, prosecute and procure sentence against Piso (Vit. 2).—3. The elder son of the former, to whom the senate adjudged one-half of his father's fortune on his condemnation, on condition that he changed his name. The emperor interceded, and the young man probably retained his original name (Tac. Ann. iii. 17, 18).

L. Cāl-pūrnius, L. Cāl-pūrni, m. sent as ambassador by L. Quīntius Flāminīus to an assembly of the Achei, to persuade them, along with the ambassadors of Attālus, king of Asia, the Athenians and Rhōdii, to renounce the alliance of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, and to join the Romans, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 19).

L. Cāl-pūrnius Bēstia, L. Cāl-pūrni Bēstia, m. called likewise L. Cāl-pūrnius Piso Bēstia, a noble Roman, who held the consulship with P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Nāsica, 113 B. C. It fell to his lot to carry on the war in Africa against Jūgūrtha, king of Nūmīdia, and the senate voted the necessary supplies of money and troops. He possessed many excellent qualities both of body and mind, which avarice rendered useless. He was patient of fatigue, of an active spirit, of great caution, skilled in military affairs, and guarded against stratagem and danger. Scarcely had he entered Nūmīdia, when Jūgūrtha discovered his ruling passion, and easily corrupted him by bribery, so that he at once lost sight of character, truth, and honour. M. Æmilius Scaurus, his lieutenant-general, readily entered into the scandalous measures of the consul, and consequently received part of the bribe. On a few elephants, some horses, and a small sum of money, being delivered to the quæstor by Jūgūrtha, a treaty of peace was concluded with him, and Cāl-pūrnius set out for Rome to preside at the election of the consuls. The influence of Æmilius, added to his own, protected him for some time against the measures of C. Mēnīus, instituted on his returning home. At a future period he was condemned on the Mamillian law (Cic. Brut. 34), and died in exile. Besides the charges brought against him by the historian, Plīnius, the naturalist, mentions that M. Cecilius brought him to trial for poisoning at least two of his wives by wolfsbane administered in sleep, which the Romans believed, when applied in a particular manner, produced immediate death (Plin. iv. 503). Adj. Cāl-pūrnius, et, Cāl-pūrniānus, a, um. Cāl-pūrniāni discipuli (Sal. Frag.).

L. Cāl-pūrnius Piso, L. Cāl-pūrni Pisōnis, m. (Surnamed Frūgi) held the office of consul at Rome with P. Mūcius Scævōla in 135 B. C., the year in which Tib. Semprōnius Grācchus promised the freedom of the city to all Italy, by which, and his agrarian laws, he excited a commotion over the whole country (Vel. Pat. ii. 2).—2. A man of great parsimony which procured him the surname of Frūgi. Cātūllus mentions him, and alludes to his avarice (xxviii. 1).—3. Held the office of consul with M. Līvius Drūsus Libo, in 17 B. C. He was prefect of Rome for twenty years, and, although addicted to indolence, transacted business with great facility. Sēnēca writes, that "he was always drunk, lay in bed till mid-day, and yet executed the duties of his office with uncommon attention and diligence." When Velleius Pātērcūlus wrote, L. Cāl-pūrnius Piso enjoyed the office of prefect of the city, and that historian records his character in the following terms: "Respecting L. Cāl-pūrnius Piso, all declare it to be their opinion, that his conduct is a compound of activity and mildness, that it would be difficult to find any one who is fonder of ease, or more adapted to business, or who despatches it more effectually with less ostentatious appearance of exertion" (ii. 98). Cāl-pūrnius stood high in the confidence of the Roman Emperor Augustus, and also of his successor, Tiberius. In the space of three years, he conquered the Thracians, killing vast numbers of them both in sieges and in pitched battles, restored security to Asia, and gave peace to Mācēdōnia. For the signal victories which he gained during the war in Thracia, he obtained triumphal ornaments, which the splendour of his unsullied character surpassed, acting with wisdom, and tempering the rigours of an odious office by judicious lenity, and unbiassed judgment (Tac. Ann. vi. 10). He died, through mere decay, at the advanced age of eighty, in the year 32.—4. Praetor in Spain, and guilty of great extortion among the Tērmēstīni, was killed when travelling unguarded in the country, by a Spaniard who laid him dead with a single blow in the year 25. The murderer having been apprehended suffered the punishment of the rack with perfect indifference, refusing to make the slightest discovery. Next day, he burst from the executioner dragging him again to torture, and dashed his head upon a stone, which procured instant death (Tac. Ann. iv. 45).—5. Was consul with the emperor Nēro in the year 70, and to him and other two Nēro committed the care of the public imposts five years after. He held the office of proconsul in Africa, where he was murdered in the year 70 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 31—Hist. iv. 50).

L. Cāl-pūrnius Piso Cēsōnīus, L. Cāl-pūrni Pisōnis Cēsōnīni, m. held the office of consul with A. Gābinus in 60 B. C., and, eight years after, that of censor with Appius Claudius Pülcher. Under an outward appearance of austerity, he assumed the character of a philosopher, reviving the manners of the old republic in the severity of his countenance, meanness of his dress, and asperity of his conduct. To induce a high notion of his literary attainments, he always kept around him a number of Greeks, who neither contributed to his knowledge, nor improved his virtue; but, on the contrary, administered to the worst of vices. Outwardly he exhibited the stern and virtuous cynic, secretly he displayed the grovelling loathsome epicurean. From his public demeanour the citizens foolishly considered him a man of great information, which, added to the dignity of his family, raised him to the highest offices of the state, although the orator Cicero says he resembled the smoky images of his ancestors in nothing but their colour. C. Julius Caesar married his daughter Cälpurnia, and Cälpurnius, confiding in the talents and influence of his son-in-law, attacked M. Tullius Cicero when he returned to Rome from the government of Macedonia. The latter, in one of the severest and most sarcastic invectives which he ever delivered before the senate, has held him up to the contempt and abhorrence of mankind in every succeeding age. Yet this man and his colleague Appius Claudius Pülcher, when censors, acted with a severity almost unknown in the annals of Rome, most probably with the view of impressing on the minds of the citizens an exalted idea of the sternness of their own virtue, and the purity of their own conduct, which they both knew had no foundation in truth (Sal. Frag.).

M. Cälpurnius Bibulus, M. Cälpurnii Bibuli, m. Caesar's colleague in the consulship. At first he opposed the arts of Caesar, but finding himself overpowered, he afterwards remained inactive, which gave occasion to the following distich, recorded by Suetonius in his life of Caesar:

Non Bibulo quidquam nuper, sed Casare factum est,

Nunc Bibulo fieri consule nil memini.

In the civil war he commanded a powerful naval armament under Cn. Pompeius, with which he protected the western coast of Greece with great bravery, intercepted some of Caesar's supplies, and captured thirty of his transports. He died during the war. Caesar charges him, when on that service, with an act of great cruelty; but it ought to be remembered, that considerable enmity existed between them, long before Caesar imbrued his hands in the blood of his fellow-citizens. He carried on war in Syria, which Cicero frequently mentions in different parts of his writings, as well as various particulars respecting this distinguished Roman (Att. l. 16, &c. Liv. Ep. 108). In Syria, A. Gabinius, proconsul, killed two sons of Bibulus, young men of excellent dispositions (Val. Max. iv. 1). Sallustius, in his second speech to Caesar on the government of the republic, speaks of Bibulus with great contempt, describing him as rude in speech, and wicked rather than cunning in mind; besides mentioning ironically his fortitude and strength of intellect, which he displayed in the consulship. It should be recollected that the historian was the friend of Caesar, and the enemy of all who opposed his measures. He published Edicta, which Cicero calls Archilochia, meaning that they were sarcastic and severe, like the verses of the poet Archilochus.

M. Cälpurnius Flamma, M. Cälpurnii Flammæ, m. a tribune of the soldiers, who, by his bravery and skill, rescued the Roman consul A. Atilius Calatinus, who had rashly marched his army into a place surrounded by the Carthaginians. He collected three hundred men, and engaged the whole attention of the enemy until the consul had effected his escape. Florus compares this action to that of Leonidas at Thermopylae, Therma, and adds, that his fame was more illustrious, because he survived the engagement, although he wrote nothing in blood (ii. 2).

M. Cälpurnius Piso, M. Cälpurnii Pisonis, m. a Roman of great respectability, related to Cicero, the orator, who mentions that he had refused a province given him by M. Antonius (Philip. iii. 10). In the declamation ascribed to Sallustius against M. Tullius Cicero, there is an allusion to the orator and this relation, which, if true, would tarnish the reputations of both; but, coming from the pen of Sallustius, it can leave no stain (Sal. Frag.).—2. Younger son of Cn. Cälpurnius Piso and Plancia. The senate adjudged this youth to lose all civil honours, and to live in exile for the space of ten years; the severity of that sentence was mitigated by Tiberius, who allowed him to retain both his civil dignities and his father's fortune (Tac. Ann. iii. 18).

Calvia Crispinilla, Calvia Crispinillæ, f. a woman of the most infamous character, who avowedly contributed to the lascivious pleasures of the emperor Nero. She afterwards crossed into Africa, and instigated Clodius Mæcer to revolt. That design having failed, she married a man of consular rank; this connexion added to the interest already obtained by her riches and want of children. The public demanded her execution, in the year 69, when Otho protected her, and she continued to flourish in high credit during the two subsequent reigns (Tac. Hist. i. 73).

Calvinus, i. m. a friend of Juvénalis, to whom he addressed his thirteenth satire, with the view of comforting him on the loss of money lent to a friend, which could not be recovered.—2. An author, whose writings Martialis condemns, because they were equal. In his opinion no book was wholly good, therefore, if it was equal, it was bad (vii. 89).

Calvisius, i. m. a creature of Jünia Silana, whom she induced, along with Iturius, to bring an accusation against Agrippina, for which both Calvisius and Iturius were banished. The Emperor Nero afterwards granted a free pardon to both in the year 59 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19—22; xiv. 12).

C. Calvisius, C. Calvisii, m. held the consulship with C. Lentulus Gætulicus in the year 26 (Tac. Ann. iv. 46).

C. Calvisius Sabinus, C. Calvisii Sabini, m. an officer in Caesar's army, whom he sent into Ætolia, with five cohorts and a few men (Cæs. B. C. iii. 34). Adj. Calvisianus, a. um.

Calusidius, i. m. a soldier who offered his sword to Germæneus, when he threatened to kill himself in an insurrection of the troops, and added "It is sharper than yours" (Tac. Ann. i. 35).

Cālŷbe, es, f. an old priestess of Jūno, whose form and appearance the fury Alecto assumed (Virg. Æn. vii. 419).

Cālŷcādnu, i, m. a promontory of Isauria (Liv. xxxviii. 38).—2. The Ghiouk-Sou, a navigable river near the middle of Isauria, near the mouth of which stood Sēlēucia Trachēa, Seletheh (Amm. Mar. xiv. 2).

Cālŷdnē, es, f. an island in the Archipelago. Inh. Cālŷdnī, orum, m. fought in the army of Nērxēs, under queen Artēmisia, daughter of Lŷgdānis (Herod. vii. 99).

Cālŷdon, ōnis, f. the capital of Ætōlia (Ætōlia Cālŷdon, Mart. ix. 49), now part of Licadia, a country of Greece. This city stood on the banks of Evēnus, the Phidari, and had its name from Cālŷdon, the son of Ætōlus (Ecēnus mūcūlātus sūgnūne Nessi sēcat Mēlēgrēam Cālŷdōna, Luc. Phar. vi. 366). In offering the first fruits to the gods, Eneūs, king of Cālŷdon, neglected Diāna, on which account the enraged goddess (torvæ Cālŷdon inētra Diāna, Ov. Met. vi. 415) sent a huge boar to ravage the country, which Mēlēger, the son of that prince, slew. The skin of it was kept at Tēgēa when Pausānias wrote, but it was become rotten from length of time, and the bristles had fallen off. Augustus, on defeating Antony at Actium, carried the teeth of this animal to Rome (viii. 47). Sātus Cālŷdnē, Mēlēger (Val. Flacc. iii. 646). Cālŷdōnis, īdis, f. of Cālŷdon, with relation to a female or to a noun feminine; Dēlāntra (Ov. Met. ix. 112). Adj. Cālŷdōnīus, et, Cālŷdōnīacus, a, um, of Cālŷdon, or Ætōlia. Cālŷdōna hasta Tŷdida, the Calydonian spear of Diōmēdes, son of Tŷdēus, who was king of Ætōlia (Ov. Met. xv. 769). Cālŷdōnīus amnis, Evēnus, the Phidari (Ov. Met. viii. 727). Cālŷdōnīdea rūpes (Manil. v. 180).

Cālŷmnē, es, et, Cālŷmna, v. Cālŷmnīa, æ, f. Calmine, one of the Spōrādes, islands in the southern part of Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, distant from the island Carpāthus, Scarpanto, about twenty-five Roman miles. It abounded with honey, which both Ovidius and Strābo have mentioned. The latter states that the honey of this island was better than that of any of the neighbouring islands, although excellent in all, and even equalled the Hymettian. See Hŷmētus. Adj. Cālŷmīus, a, um. Cālŷmīum mel (Strab. 715).

Cālŷpō, ūs, f. daughter of Ocēānus and Tēthys, according to some, and of Atlas (Hom. Od. vii. 245), according to others, who inhabited Ogŷgia q. v., an island on the western coast of Italy, now unknown. She entertained Ulysses with great kindness and hospitality, when he had been wrecked on her coast, induced him to continue with her during seven years, and promised him immortality, provided he remained with her as her husband. By her Ulysses had two sons, Nausithōus and Nausinōus, and his departure for his native island caused her excessive grief, to which Prōpērtius alludes (i. 15. 9).

Cāmārīna, v. Cāmērīna, æ, f. a town in the south of Sicily, near which was a lake of the same name, now Lago di Camarana. It was built by the Sŷracūsāni about a hundred and thirty-five years after Sŷracūsa. Sērŷus mentions, that the inhabitants drained the lake in opposition to a response of the oracle of Apōllo, and a pestilence was the consequence. Others say, that the bottom of the lake is lower than the surface of the sea, for which reason to drain it was impossible, hence Mōvērē Cāmārīnam became a proverbial expression, denoting a dangerous or unsuccessful attempt. As the lake, when agitated, emitted a very unpleasant smell, which excited nausea, the proverb may also mean to occasion mischief (Virg. Æn. iii. 701). Pigra Cāmārīna (Claud. xxxv. 59). Inh. Cāmārīnēnses, ium, m. (Flor. ii. 2). Adj. Cāmārīnus, a, um.

Cāmārīte, arum, m. a people in Asia Minor, near the Black Sea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Cām būnī, orum, m. Volatza, mountains of Mācēdōnia, on the confines of Thessaly, over which A. Hōstilius Māncinus, the Roman consul, marched in 173 B. C. The summit of these mountains was by the natives called Volustāna (Liv. xlii. 53 seq.).

Cāmbyēs, is, m. king of Pērsia, and husband of Māndānē, daughter of Astŷāges, king of the Medes (Just. i. 4).—2. Son of Cŷrus, king of Pērsia, surnamed the Great. His success in war secured him great celebrity, and Vālērīus Māxīmus has recorded an instance of his love of justice, which does greater credit to the purity of his principles than to the delicacy of his feelings. He ordered the skin of an iniquitous judge to be taken from his person, nailed to a chair on which he had sat, and his son to fill his place, who, by this barbarous act, was almost daily reminded of his father's crime. By this horrible and unprecedented punishment, says the historian, the king provided against the future corruption of judges (vi. 3). He overran Egypt, plundered the temples, and took Pēlūsium by stratagem. The Egyptians holding sacred, cats, dogs, sheep, &c., he drove a number of these animals before the army, and thus, without opposition, entered the town, because the inhabitants refused to destroy these quadrupeds, which were the objects of their adoration. After he had obtained possession of this country, he determined to make war on the Carthaginians by sea, on the Ethiopians and inhabitants of Oasis of Siwah by land. The failure of his attack on the Carthaginians proceeded from the Phœnicians refusing their assistance against a colony originally planted by their countrymen. He sent an army of fifty thousand men to destroy the temple of Jūpter Ammon, and to pillage the country around. The whole of that armament was buried in the sands, not an individual escaping to convey the dismal intelligence to the Persian monarch. To reconnoitre the country of the Ethiopians, he sent spies under the name of ambassadors, but the answer returned showed not only that his intention was detected, but that the inhabitants were prepared for his attack. Enraged at the reply of the Ethiopian monarch, he hastened the movement of his troops up the Nile, with an inconsiderate rashness which indicated mental derangement, rather than military knowledge. After losing the greater part of his army by want of provisions and other calamities, without approaching the frontiers of Æthiōpia, necessity compelled him to return to Egypt, where his mortified pride exercised itself in cruelty by butchering many of the unhappy natives. He had put his own brother to death on suspicion, of which Patizithes, to whom he had entrusted the sole administration of affairs, took advantage, and placed on the throne his own brother, who bore a striking resemblance to the brother of the king whom he had killed, under pretence that he was Smērdiā, son of Cērus. When intelligence of this event reached Cāmbyēs, he prepared instantly to march his army against the usurper; but a mortal wound in the groin, by his own sword dropping from the scabbard as he mounted his horse, put an end to his military achievements and his life. Cāmbyēs reigned upwards of seven years, and died childless, on which Dārius ascended the throne of Persia. Vāsius Cāmbyēs, from the frantic manner in which he attempted to march against Aethiopia, and from his cruel and irrational conduct after his return (Luc. Phar. x. 280).

Cāmbyēs, a, m. the Jora, a river, which has its source at the foot of mount Coraxius, according to Pōmponius Mela, near to the springs from which Cērus, the Kur, issues, and these rivers, after separating to a great extent, traverse the territories of the Ibēres and Hērēni, flow into a lake at no great distance from the sea, afterwards pour their waters into Sīus Hērēnus, the Caspian Sea, by one mouth. The course of this river has been much disputed, and, although probably undetermined, is generally placed to the north of Cērus, the Kur (Prop. ii. 26. 23).

Cāmilius, i, m. a Roman of noble birth, of whom nothing further is known than that Dēcius Jūntus Brūtus was murdered in his house by assassins, whom M. Antōnius had sent for that purpose (Vel. Pat. ii. 64).

Cāmēns, m, f. a town at which Lātīnus Sīlētus planted a colony (Aur. Vic. Or. 17). The reading is probably corrupt, as the word does not occur in any other author.

Cāmērē, es, f. a plain without trees, on the river Crāthis, the Crati (Ov. Fast. iii. 582).

Cāmēria, m, f. et, Cāmērium, i, m. Camerino, a town of the ancient Latins (Liv. i. 38. Tac. Ann. xi. 24). Inh. Cāmērii, orum, m.

Cāmērinum, i, n. Camerino, a city of Umbria, a district of Italy, on the confines of Picenum, the Marquisate of Ancona. Inh. Cāmērii, orum, v. Cāmērtes, ium (Sing. Cāmērtis, i, v. Cāmērtis, ertis), m. Both these appellations were employed to denote the Umbrians in general; and, from the number of eminent characters who flourished in that city, their name came to signify illustrious men. Adj. Cāmērtinus, a, um, et, Cāmērtis, ertis, ertis; ertis, Cāmērtis ager (Cic. pro. Sal. 19).

Cāmērtinus, i, m. a surname of Sulpicia gens (Juv. Sat. viii. 38).

Cāmērtius, i, m. a friend of the poet Cātullus (Catal. iv. 29).

Cāmērtis, ertis, m. son of Valsēus, was one of the Anaxones. Virgilius calls him fulvus, tawny, and says he was the richest of all the Anaxones in land, and king of Amēcia (Virg. Aen. x. 562 seq.).

Cāmērtis, i, f. a town of Sicily, inhabited by the Agrigantini in the time of Hērōdōtus (vil. 170).

Cāmērtis, i, f. a town of Dōris (Herod. i. 144).—2. Cāmērtis, a town of Rhōdus, Rhodes.

Cāmērtis, is, m. a Carian of great bravery, entrusted by the king with the government of Cilicia. On falling in war, his son Dātāmes succeeded him in command (Cor. Nep. Dat. 1).

Cāmīsus, i, m. a town of Pārthia. Adj. Cāmīsānus, a, um. Cāmīsāna regio (Sal. Frag.).

Cāmēna, v. Cāmēna, v. f. a muse, or one of the muses. Insigni Cāmēnā, in an exalted strain, a poem which will render remarkable those whom I sing (Hor. Od. i. 12. 39).

Cāmōnus, i, m. an infant, on whose image or likeness Mārtiālis writes an epigram (ix. 76).

Cāmpānia, v. f. a district of Itālia, Italy, bounded on the S. by Silārus, the Sale, which separated it from Lūcānia; on the E. by Sānnium; on the N. by Lātīum; and on the W. by Mārē Tyrrhēnum, v. Tuscum, quod et Infērum, the Tuscan Sea, i. e. that part of the Mediterranean which washes the western coast of Italy. From Jūstinus it appears to have been peopled by Greeks (xx. 1). The greater part of this once fine tract of land is now become marshy, and rendered almost uninhabitable by the unwholesomeness of the air. Inh. Cāmpāni, orum (Sing. Cāmpānus, i), m. Adj. Cāmpānus, a, um, of Cāmpānia, or its inhabitants; arrogant. Cāmpānius, et, Cāmpānicus, a, um, twisted, interwoven, &c., after the manner of the Cāmpāni.

Cāmpānus, i, m. a chieftain of the Tungri (Tac. Hist. iv. 66).

Cāmpēsus, i, m. a native of Cōlchis, killed in battle (Val. Flacc. vi. 243).

Cāmpus Mārtius, lands on the bank of Tiber, the Tevere, which belonged to the Tāquīnii. On their expulsion from Rome, these grounds were consecrated to Mars, and afterwards formed the place for military exercise, hence the name. To the superstitious Romans it appeared unlawful to use the crop then on the ground, and, therefore, on its being cut down, they threw it into the Tevere, where it stuck on the shallows near Rome. The sand and earth brought down by the stream gradually accumulated, until an island of considerable extent was formed, generally called Insūla, or Insūla Tibēris, S. Bartolomeo (Liv. i. 44 seq.). Appianus states that kings only were buried in this plain until Sūlla was interred there (Bel. Civ. 418).

Cāmpus Scēlērātus, Cāmpi Scēlērātī, m. a plain near Cōllina porta, in which Minīcia, a vestal virgin, was buried alive, in 336 B. C., for violation of her vow, hence the name (Liv. viii. 15). Others, guilty of the same crime, were punished there in the same manner, and their paramours were scourged to death.

Cāmūlōdūnum, i, n. Maldon, a town anciently of the Trinōbāntes, in the county of Essex, South Britain.—2. Almondbury, a town in the county of York, anciently possessed by the Brigāntes (Tac. Ann. xii. 92).

Cāmūlōgēnus, i, m. an Aulercian (Aulercus), who, in consequence of his splendid military talents, was requested, although of a great age, to take the command of the troops in Lūtētia, Paris, on the approach of the Roman army (Caes. B. G. vii. 57).

Cāmūrius, i, m. a private soldier of the fifteenth legion, who, according to some, killed the Roman Emperor Galba (Tac. Hist. i. 41).

Cănăcē, es, f. daughter of Æolus, god of the winds, and sister of Micræus, between whom there subsisted an unlawful intimacy. The cries of her infant, whom she had conveyed away from the palace by a nurse, made known her crime to her father, who sent a sword, which she was to employ according to her deserts. Micræus fled to the temple of Apollō for the preservation of his life, to whom Ovidius makes her write an epistle, in which she describes her situation and feelings with great tenderness and pathos. She afterwards obeyed the mandate of her father in employing the sword against her own life, and her brother, on hearing of her fate, also killed himself. From her father she is called Æolis, Idis (Ov. Ep. Her. xi. 5).—2. A girl who died in her seventh year. Martialis writes a beautiful epitaph on her premature dissolution (xi. 92). In the opinion of some he refers to Cănăcē, the daughter of Æolus, mentioned by Ovidius.

Cănăcē, es, f. (Yelper), one of the dogs of Acteon q. v. (Ov. Met. iii. 217).

Căne, arum, v. Căna, æ, f. a town and promontory of Æolis, which appears to have been a seaport. Here C. Livius Sălnător drew his ships ashore when the winter was approaching, and surrounded them with a rampart and ditch, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 45).

Canastrum, i, n. Pillouri, and Canouistro, a promontory of Păllēnē, in Măcēdōniā (Liv. xxxi. 45).

Căncer, crī, m. the Crab, the fourth sign of the Zodiac. Ovidius says the Crab bends his claws differently (aliter) from the Scorpion. Now, since these two signs are in the same direction with regard to position, he must mean by aliter, to a less extent, or within smaller bounds (Ov. Met. ii. 83). The Tropic of Cancer, the boundary of the Sun's declination northward, is 23° 28' or 1,631 miles nearly, from the Equator.

Căncălē. See Arăbia.

Căndăvīa, æ, f. (found also written Cau-dăvīa, Găndăvīa, Gaudēvīa, et, Scăndēvīa), is supposed, by some, to have been a tract of Măcēdōniā, by others, a chain of mountains which bounded that country on the west, and by several, a mountain in Epīrus. The second seems to have been the opinion of Plinius. According to Lūcānus, it had extensive forests, and bordered on Emăthīa, a name often used by the poets to denote Thessaly (Phar. vi. 331 seq.).

Candaules, i, v. Candaules, is, m. a king of Lydia, distinguished only by his gross indelicacy, which cost him his life (Just. i. 7).

Căndēla, æ, f. a candle. The căndēlae of the Romans appear, at first, to have been small cords surrounded with wax, or some resinous substance, which readily caught fire. Livius writes, that the books of Nūma Pōmpilius, second king of Rome, were found rolled up căndēlis, and in entire preservation, although they had been under ground nearly five hundred years (xl. 29).

Căndidus, i, m. a man whom Mărtiālis accuses of selfishness and ingratitude (ii. 24).

Căngi, orum, m. a British nation, whose territory was adjoining to that of the Iceŋi (Tac. Ann. xii. 32).

Căncēlla, æ, f. the dog-star, called also

Sīrius q. v., properly a star in the constellation, Cănis Măior. From the excessive heat at the season when this star rises in Italy, the poets added such epithets as rubra, flagrans, &c., and use Cănis and Căncēlla as synonymous, hence Virgilius has astifer cănis (G. ii. 353). Mæra, the dog of Iceārus, was changed into this constellation (Hyg. 130).

Cănidia, æ, f. a woman, whom Hōrătiū has depicted as a dealer in poisons (Epod. 8).

P. Cănidius Crăssus, P. Cănidii Crăssi, m. an officer under M. Antōniū, whose land forces he commanded at the battle of Actium, and under whom he had been a lieutenant-general in the Parthian war (Vel. Pat. ii. 85).

Caninēfătes, um (Sing. Caninēfas, ātis), m. a people of Bătvīa, Holland, who inhabited Utrecht. In their origin, manners, language, and military virtue, they equalled the Batavians, who surpassed them in numbers. To their name may be referred the modern village Kenneburg (Tac. Hist. iv. 15). Adj. Caninēfas, as, as; ātis. Caninēfas āla (Tac. Ann. iv. 73). Caninēfas tumultus (Tac. Hist. iv. 16).

Canini Campi, a tract in Rhetia (Amm. Mar. xv. 4).

Căninus Găllus, Căninii Gălli, m. a quindecemvir, skilled in the science of law and religious ceremonies, who proposed that a book of the Sibyl should be admitted into the proper archives, from his believing that it was the undoubted composition of the Cumæan prophetess. The Emperor Tibērius blamed his conduct in a letter to the senate, who decreed that the book should be referred to the quindecemviri (Tac. Ann. vi. 12).

C. Căninus Rēbilus, C. Căninii Rēbilli, m. held the office of prætor, and the government of Sicily, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 31).

—2. One of Cæsar's lieutenant-generals, who, with C. Antistius Rēginus, commanded two legions which guarded a particular place near Alēsia, Alise, when that city was stormed. He was a steady friend of Cæsar, who made him consul for one day. Hence Plūtarchus says of him, with some pleasantry: "He was a very wakeful consul, not having slept during the time he held the consulship." Cicero, too, has sneeringly remarked of Rēbilus, "that no man had dined, that no mischief had been done, when he was consul, and that he was a consul of great vigilance, not having slept during the whole time he held the office" (Ep. Fam. vii. 30).

L. Căninus Găllus, L. Căninii Gălli, m. a Roman, distinguished for his love of reconciliation, and consequent dislike of enmity (Val. Max. iv. 2).

M. Căninus Rēbilus, M. Căninii Rēbilli, m. a Roman deputed by the senate to go to Măcēdōniā with M. Fulvius Flăcus, on purpose to procure correct information of all transactions in that country, in 172 B. C. About three years after, by appointment of the senate, T. Quinctius Flăminius, C. Licinius Nēra, and he conducted back the hostages to Thraciā (Liv. xliii. 11 seq.).

Cănius, i, m. a poet of Gădes, Cadiz, whom Mărtiālis ridicules (l. 62; l. 70). From what that poet says, it may be inferred, that his verses were both ridiculous and indelicate (iii. 64).

Cănna, æ, m. a river of Apūllia (Liv. xxv. 12), supposed by Cluverius to be Aufidus, and by others a less stream.

Cannæ, arum, f. (except Pölýbius, both Greek and Roman authors use the plural number). Cannæ, a mean village of Apulia, now in ruins. Hughes states, that no vestige of it remains, its site is under the plough, and the plain now called Pezzo di Sangue. It has still a naked appearance as in ancient times. This place is remarkable for the defeat of the Romans by Hannibal, commander of the Carthaginian army, in 218 B. C. The Roman forces amounted to eighty-seven thousand two hundred men. L. Æmilius Paulus, consul, commanded on the right, his colleague, C. Terentius Varro, on the left, and Cn. Servilius Geminus the centre. Of the Carthaginian army, Häsdrübal led on the left, Mähärbäl the right, and Hannibal, with his brother Mägo, the centre. C. Terentius Varro, with about seventy men, escaped, and the killed were computed at forty thousand foot, and two thousand seven hundred horse. In that number were the questors of both consuls, twenty-one military tribunes, several of whom had borne the highest offices in the state, and eighty senators, or who had filled offices which rendered them eligible as senators, who had voluntarily joined the legions as soldiers. The prisoners were supposed to be about three thousand foot, and three hundred horse. The senate restricted the mourning, in consequence of the defeat at Cannæ, to thirty days. The soldiers who survived this disastrous battle, were transported, by a decree of the senate, to Sicily, to remain there as long as the war continued in Italy. They were treated with great harshness and indignity. No personal bravery, or military service, seems to have, in the opinion of their countrymen, atoned for their conduct that day, and the senate, on their petitioning that they might be put on the same footing with the other troops in the same army, passed against them a severe decree, which rendered them ignominious (Liv. xxii. 43 seq.). Adj. Cannënsis, is, e. Cannënsis sinistra pugna, the unfortunate battle at Cannæ (Prop. iii. 3. 40). Cannënses animæ, the souls or shades of the Romans killed at Cannæ (Stat. Syl. i. 4. 87). Cannënsia damna (Claud. xv. 79). Cannënsis dies (Flor. iv. 12).

Cänöpus, i. m. according to some Maadië, and according to others Aboukir. When first mentioned in Grecian history, Cänöpus denoted a small island, near the mouth of the westernmost branch of the Nile (hence called Pölýsiöeus Cänöpus, Luc. Phar. viii. 543), on which Mënäläus, returning from Troy to Greece, had been driven by a tempest. Here his pilot, Cänöpus, died, and a tomb was erected to his memory; hence the name. According to Täritus, the Spartans built Cänöpus in memory of the pilot, on the very spot which contained his ashes (Ann. ii. 60). In consequence of its vicinity to the land, a town afterwards built on the adjacent coast, at one period of considerable note, assumed the same name, and the island ceased to be noticed in history. The island, small and rocky, had no town on it in the time of Scylax, but the tomb of Cänöpus, the pilot of Mënäläus, was shown there. It is now joined to the continent. Pellæus Cänöpus, from being next to Alexandria, built by Alexander the Great, who was a native of Pella, and from having been taken by Alexander, and for some time subject to his successors (Virg. G. iv. 287). Inh.

Cänöpi, orum, m. were exceedingly addicted to luxury, and almost every species of immorality, by the time they became known to the Romans, hence imbellis Cänöpus (Luc. Phar. x. 64). Adj. Cänöpeus, et, Cänöpius, a, um, Canopian, Egyptian; profligate, vicious. Cänöpæ littöra, the shores of Cänöpus (Catul. lvi. 58). Canöpicum ostium, the mouth of the Nile, next to Cänöpus. It was also called Herculeum ostium, from a famous temple of Hercules which stood there. Herödotus writes, that contrary winds drove Pärís into this mouth of the Nile, and that his servants gave notice at the temple of Hercules, that Hëlëna was on board, when the inhabitants of Cänöpus seized him and his effects, and detained her till the end of the Trojan war, when they restored her to Mënäläus, her husband (ii. 113 seq.).

Cänöpus, i. m. a star of the first magnitude in the constellation Argö (Manil. i. 216).

Cäntäbría, æ, f. a district of Spain, bounded on the north by Märë Cäntäbricum, the Bay of Biscay (Eutrop. vii. 9). Florus writes Contrëbä (ii. 17). Inh. Cäntäbri, orum (Sing. Cäntäber, ri, Hor. Od. ii. 11. 1), m. a very brave and warlike people, who inhabited the northern part of Spain. They seem to have extended from the mouths of Ibërus, the Ebro, to the shores of the Bay of Biscay, which was, from them, called Océanus Cäntäbricus. The term is often employed to denote the Spaniards in general. They used short arms, hence Cäntäber exigüis armis (Luc. Phar. vi. 259). Adj. Cäntäbricus, a, um. Cäntäbrica bellä, Cantabrian or Spanish wars (Hor. Epist. i. 18. 55).

Cäntauriäni, orum, m. a people of Africa (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Cänthärus, i. m. a parasite and glutton, mentioned by Märtiläis (ix. 11).

Cänthus, i. m. one of the Argonauts, a son of Abas, hence called Abantiädes (Orph. 141). He was killed fighting against the Scythians in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. i. 451 seq.).—2. A man in the army of Hännibal, who killed Rütülus. He appears to have been a native of that part of Africa on which stood Aræ Philënorum (Sil. Ital. xv. 700).

Cäntichus, i. m. a bay of the sea, on the coast of Armënia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). Here the reading is undoubtedly corrupt.

L. Cäntillus, L. Cäntilli, m. clerk, or secretary, to one of the less pontiffs, was, by order of the pontifex maximus, scourged in the forum with such severity that he died under the punishment, because he had violated Flöröna, one of the vestal virgins, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 57).

Cäntium, i. n. Kent, a district of England, which, in modern times, is bounded by the Strait of Dover (Frëtum Gallicum, v. Britännicum), on the E.; by Sussex on the S.; on the W. by Surry; and on the N. by Tämesis, the Thames, which separates it from Essex. But the ancient boundaries of Kent are not precisely ascertained.

M. Cäntius, M. Cäntii, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who commenced a prosecution against L. Pöstömüs, who evaded it by receiving from Sp. Cärvilius, the consul, a commission of a lieutenant-general, in 295 B. C. (Liv. x. 46).

C. Cänülëus, C. Cänülëi, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who proposed a law, permitting the intermarriages of patricians and plebeians, which, although keenly opposed by the consuls and patricians, passed in 444 B. C. (Liv. iv. 1-6. Flor. i. 25).

L. Cănușleus, L. Cănușleii, m. one of the five Roman ambassadors sent to the Aetolians, in 176 B. C., when that nation, divided into parties, took up arms against each other (Liv. xli. 25).—2. A lieutenant-general in Pompey's army during the Civil war (Caes. B. C. iii. 42).

L. Cănușleus Dives, L. Cănușleii Divitis, m. elected praetor at Rome, in 173 B. C., and the lots gave him Spain for his province. The senate ordered him to appoint judges to try the persons whom the Spaniards accused of extortion, and to allow them to choose such patrons as they should think proper. By the same authority, he settled at Cărtăia a colony of native Spaniards, sprung from the illicit connexion of the Roman soldiers with women of that country (Liv. xlii. 28 seq.).

M. Cănușleus, M. Cănușleii, m. a tribune of the people, in 419 B. C., who, under pretence of public duty, gratified his personal hatred against A. Sămpronius Atratinus, in which he was aided by Pompilius and Antistius q. v. (Liv. iv. 44).

Cănuș, i. m. a piper, with whose music the Emperor Gălba was so pleased, that he gave him, out of his own hand, five denarii (Suet. Gal. 12).

Cănușium, i. n. Canosa, a town of some note in Apulia, Capitanata, on the banks of Aufidus, the Ofanto, whither the Romans fled, in 218 B. C., after the battle of Cannae, which stood between that town and the coast of Măre Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice. Diomedes, with the Greeks who accompanied him to Italy after the Trojan war, built this city. From its inhabitants, Cănușini, orum (Sing. Cănușinus, i.), continuing the use of the Greek language along with the Latin, they were called Bilingues. It is probable that most of the descendants of the Grecian colonies, who settled in the south of Italy, would long retain the practice of speaking Greek. The wools of Cănușium were very fine, and the cloths manufactured in that city were held in very high estimation. Cănușina, a. f. (vestis), part of dress made of cloth fabricated at Cănușium, and the person who wore it was called Cănușinatus. Adj. Cănușinus, a. um. Cănușina ovīs, a Canusian sheep. The sheep of that district yielded remarkably fine wool (Juv. Sat. vi. 149). Cănușina manā (Sil. Ital. x. 388).

Thērīus Canutius, Tibērīi Canutii, m. a tribune of the people, who hated M. Antōnīus, against whom he did not cease continually to rail with the greatest violence. His imprudence cost him his life (Vel. Pat. ii. 64).

Căpānēus, ēos, v. ei. m. son of Hippōnōus and Astynōmē, daughter of Tālāus, was a native of Argos, and one of the seven princes who fought against Thēbes, Theba. He was a man of prodigious stature, unbounded ambition, but prone to vengeance and resentment. Stātinus describes him as a despoiser of the gods, on which account Jūpiter struck him dead by lightning. His bravery as a soldier claims high approbation, but his impiety excites only horror. Ovidius says he could not have been overcome but by Jūpiter. Evādūc despised the advances of Apōllo, and married Căpānēus, to whom she had the strongest attachment, which she proved by throwing herself on the funeral pile when his body was consuming, that their ashes might mix together. Adj. Căpānēus, et. Căpānēus, a. um. Căpānēa pīnus, the spear of Căpānēus (Stat. Th. viii. 661). Căpānēia conjux, Evādūc (Stat. Th. xii. 545).—2. Father of Sthēnēlus, hence called Căpānēlūdes (Hom. Il. v. 109).

Căpēlātium, i. n. Ziegenhayn, called also Palas, a district between the Alāmāni and Burgundii (Amm. Mar. xviii. 2).

Căpēna, a. v. Căpēna, arum. f. Civitucula, a town of Etrūria, Tuscany, from which Căpēna pōrta of Rome had its name. At this gate Hōrātius, after the defeat of the Cūriatii, killed his sister Hōrātia (Liv. i. 26). Mădida Căpēna, from the number of springs in its vicinity (Juv. Sat. iii. 11), whence it was also called Fōntinālis. Inh. Căpēnātes, ium (Sing. Căpēnas, ātis), m. Adj. Căpēnas, as, as; ātis, et. Căpēnus, a. um. Căpēnas ager, the territory of the Căpēnātes.

Căpēnas, a. m. a river of Etrūria, now unknown. Săcer Căpēnas (Sil. Ital. xiii. 85).

Căpēnus, i. m. a Sequan, who killed Dēci-mus Brūtus, by order of M. Antōnīus (Liv. Ep. 120). Văllēus Pătercūlus calls him Cămēlus (ii. 64), and Applānus, Cămīllus (Bel. Civ. 588). These historians differ, likewise, in their account of this transaction.

Căper, pri. m. the friend of Mārius. Both were natives of Prenēstē, Pilastrina, and both were killed by Sŷmāctus, in the battle at Cannae, after they had supported, with great bravery, their friend Nēlces (Sil. Ital. ix. 401).

Capersāna, orum. n. a town of Sŷria, supposed by some to be the same with Capessāna (Amm. Mar. xviii. 8).

Capētus. See Calpētus.

Căphārēus, v. Căphērēus, ēos, m. v. Căphārēum, i. n. Doro, a promontory of Euboea, Negropont. The sea adjoining to it was dangerous on account of hidden rocks and whirlpools, to which Virgilius alludes (Æn. xi. 260). Altus Căphārēus (Stat. Th. vii. 371). Adj. Căphārēus, a. um. Căphārēa aqua (Ov. Trist. v. 7. 36).

Căpito Fōntēus, Căpitōnis Fōntēi, m. a very accomplished man, and friend of M. Antōnīus, who was consul in 34 B. C. (Hor. Sat. i. 5. 32-38).

Căpitōlinus, i. m. a surname of A. Mānlius q. v.

Căpitōlium, i. n. Campidoglio, a celebrated citadel and temple at Rome, on the Tarpeian rock. In digging the foundation, the Romans found the head of one Tōlus quite entire, although it had been a long time buried, from which they drew a presage of the future greatness of Rome, and to which the name must be referred. See Tărpēus. Adj. Căpitōlinus, a. um. Căpitōlinus mons, Monte Capitolino, is one hundred and fifty feet above the valley, and is the only one of the seven hills on which Rome stood that is now inhabited. The rest are garden ground. Of this hill the ancient name was Sătūrnīus, so called from Sătūrnus, who built a town on it called Sătūrnia (Virg. Æn. viii. 358. Dion. Hal. i. 34 seq.). Căpitōlīna arces (Sil. Ital. xii. 839). Căpitōlīna dāpes, sumptuous entertainments (Mart. xii. 48). Căpitōlīna foris, treasures or vaults used in the capitol for the preservation of ancient religious things (Gel. ii. 10). Capitolina Jūno (Val. Max. vi. 1).

Cappadōcia, æ, f. a country of Asia Minor, Natalia, said to have received that name from the river Cappadox, which divides it from Galatia. From this river, too, Plinius informs us, that the natives were called Cappadoces, anciently Leucōsyrī, i. e. White Syrians. It was bounded on the N. by Pontus and Galatia; on the W. by Phrygia, on the S. by Cilicia, and on the E. by Armenia Minor. It was conquered by the Egyptians, under Rhamses (Tac. Ann. ii. 60). Inh. Cappadoces, um, seldom, Cappadocē, arum (Sing. Cappadox, ōcis), m. the Cappadocians, were represented by the ancients as exceedingly addicted to every species of vice. The Scholiast on Persius says they had a natural propensity to bear false evidence, and he describes the methods adopted for inuring themselves to the suffering of punishment, and to the practice of that vice. Perhaps this was one of the means by which they rose to the rank of knights, as mentioned by Juvēnalis (Sat. vii. 15). The Greeks frequently called them Syrī (Sing. Syrus, i), a word often used as synonymous with slaves, from Cappadōcia supplying a great part of the ancient world with slaves. Onus sex Cappadocum, the burden of six Cappadocians, i. e. the burden of six slaves (Mart. vi. 77). Adj. Cappadocus, et, Cappadoculus, a, um.

Capri, v. Cāprēa, æ, f. a marsh in Cāmpus Martius, on the borders of which Rōmulus was reviewing his army at the time a thunder storm began, during which he disappeared, and was never more seen (Liv. i. 16. Flor. i. 1).

Caprāia, æ, f. Cabrera, an island to the south of Minorca (Plin. i. 338).—2. Gomera, one of the Canary islands.

Caprariēnses, ium, m. a people of Africa. Adj. Caprariēnsis, is, e. Caprariēnses montes (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Cāprēs, arum, f. Capri, an island off the southwest coast of Italy, forty miles in circumference, surrounded by steep rocks, except one small beach. It was in ancient times inhabited by the Telēbōa, a people from Acēnānā, hence Virgilius calls it their kingdom. On this island the Roman Emperor, Tiberius, spent the last seven years of his life.

Capricornus, i, m. the tenth sign of the Zodiac. Of this constellation we have different accounts. It has been affirmed that Jupiter, having been suckled by a goat, wished the kid, to which the goat gave milk at the same time, to be placed among the stars, and it has since been known by the name of Capricornus. Hyginus seems rather to consider the Ægipan as Capricornus, or at least having the same appearance (Poet. Ast. 28).

Caprius, i, m. a noted informer whom Horatius mentions. The poet describes him and Sūctus as violent in their accusation, hoarse with their pleadings, and the terror of robbers (Sat. i. 4. 66—70).

Caprus, i, m. the little Zab, an eastern branch of the Tigris.

Cāpua, æ, f. Cassia, a town of Africa, at which Jūgūrtha deposited his treasures, judging it a place of security, from being situated in the midst of extensive deserts. The Libyan Hērclēs was believed to have been its founder; and, when Sallustius wrote, it was a great and opulent city, strongly fortified, containing a numerous garrison, and a vast store of arms. C. Mārius, commander-in-chief of the Roman army in Numidia, q. v., conceiving that the taking of this place would add greatly to his military reputation, as its difficulty of access rendered it almost impregnable, by judicious measures reached it without losing a man, after a march of eight or nine days; took it by surprise, set it immediately on fire, put to the sword all capable of bearing arms, sold the rest for slaves, and gave the plunder to the soldiers. This cruel conduct Sallustius attempts to justify on the score of expediency, an unsustainable apology for the destruction of a large town, the massacre of its inhabitants who had never lifted arms against the Romans, and seizure of their property, contrary to the laws of civilized warfare (Sal. Jug. 89—91). Inh. Cāpsēnses, ium, m. (Sal. Jug. 92).

Cāplāni, orum, m. a people, of whom nothing is known (Cor. Nep. Dat. 8). The probable reading is Cāpiāni.

Cāpua, æ, f. the capital of Cāmpānā, a maritime district between Lātium and Lūcānia in the west of Italy, of which Cāpys, a Trojan, who came into Italy with Æneas, was said to be the founder (Virg. Æn. x. 145). Yet Plinius traces the name not from Cāpys, but from its situation in a plain, Cāpua a campo dicta, which seems also to have been the opinion of Livius, a campestri agro appellata, although he mentions the other as the received derivation (iv. 37), which Lūcānus has adopted, Cāmpāna mēnia Dardāni cōloni (Phar. ii. 393). Strābo derives the name from caput, as it was the chief or capital of the twelve cities built by the Etrūsci (348). Others say that Cāpys, in the language of the Etrūsci, signified a culture, as it was built by an augury of that bird; of this term Vulturium is a translation. After the battle of Cānne, the veterans of Hānnibal were quartered in Cāpua, and the luxury of that city proved fatal to the bravery of the troops. Florus says elegantly, "Cāpua was Cānne to Hānnibal" (ii. 6). At one time it was not greatly inferior, in beauty and splendour, to Rome or Carthage, which, along with Cāpua, Florus calls the three greatest cities (i. 16). Soon after the retreat of the Carthaginian general, Cāpua surrendered at discretion to the Roman consuls, Appius Claudius and Q. Fūlvius Flūcius, who butchered the senators, condemned the nobles to perpetual imprisonment, and sold the citizens for slaves. Although colonies were afterwards sent to inhabit this city, it never regained its ancient magnificence. A Vandal, Genseric, put the inhabitants to the sword, and burned the houses to the ground. Narses, the favourite of the Emperor Justinian, perceiving the advantage of its situation, rebuilt Cāpua about the middle of the sixth century, which the ferocity of the Saracens totally destroyed in the year 841. Modern Cāpua is of much less extent than the ancient city of that name, and stands on the site, not of Cāpua, but of Cāslinum. The inhabitants of Cāpua, in classic authors, are always called Cāpiāni. Cāmpāna urbs, i. e. Cāpua (Virg. Æn. x. 145).

Cāpūsa, m., the elder son of Œsalces, king of Nūmīdia, who succeeded his father in the throne; but was opposed by Mezētūlus, of the royal family, and Cāpūsa fell in battle, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 29, 30).

Cāpys, ſis, m. a Trojan, who came with Œnēus to Italy, and, according to Virgilius, was the founder of Cāpūa. Silius Itālicus makes him a relation of Iūlus, in which, perhaps, he confounds him with the son of Assāricus (xi. 179).—2. Son of Assārācus, and father of Anchīsēs (Hom. Il. xx. 239).—3. The eighth Alban king, son of Aty, according to Livius, and of Epitos, according to Ovidius. Ille (Epitos) dedit Capji recidiva vocabula Troje, in reference to the Trojan of that name (Ov. Fast. iv. 45).—4. A Roman, killed by Eumāchus in the engagement between the Roman consul, Scipio, and Hannibal, at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 385).

Cārābis, is, f. a town of Spain, in alliance with Rome, which the Celtiberians besieged (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 278).

Cārācālla. See M. Aurēlius Antōnius Bāssianus.

Cārācātes, ium, m. the Caracatians, a nation whose territories bordered on those of the Vanglōnes (Tac. Hist. iv. 70). The readings vary.

Cārāctācus, i, m. a British king of great bravery, whose heroic achievements spread his fame over the whole island. The innate love of freedom, peculiar to Britons, excited his hatred at Roman slavery, and called forth his most active exertions to deliver his countrymen from foreign domination. His knowledge of the country, and his skill in the stratagems of war, gave him many advantages, but he had an inferior force to oppose to the enemy. In his last battle, he chose his station with great judgment, and he fortified with large stones places of easy ascent. The other chieftains encouraged their men, rousing the timid and confirming the brave, whilst Cārāctācus darted along the lines, exclaiming, "This day, my fellow-warriors, decides the fate of Britain." The era of liberty or endless slavery commences this hour. Remember your ancestors, and revenge the violation of your wives and daughters." The Britons surpassed the Romans whilst they fought at a distance, but fled after a short resistance in close fight. The wife and daughter of Cārāctācus were made prisoners, his brothers surrendered, and Cārtismāndūa, queen of the Brigāntes, whilst he sought her protection, gave him up in chains to the Romans, in the ninth year of the war. The fame of Cārāctācus had filled all Italy, and the Emperor Claudius, willing to magnify the greatness of the conquest, extolled the valour of the fallen monarch. In the triumphal procession, the accoutrements gained in war by Cārāctācus were exhibited with great pomp, after which his wife, his daughter, and brothers followed, and he himself closed the melancholy train. The other prisoners had recourse to humble supplications, walked with downcast countenances; but no fear, no sorrow appeared in the face of Cārāctācus, whose dignity commanded the admiration of the beholders. His speech to the emperor corresponded with his character, and Claudius granted a free pardon to him, his wife, his daughter, and his brothers (Tac. Ann. xii. 33—37).

Cārāles, is, v. Cārāles, ium, f. (Cārālis; Strabo, Ptolemy, and Mela), Cagliari; the capital of Sārdīnia, situated on a cognominal bay, Sinus Cārālītānus, the Gulf of Cagliari, on the S. E. of the island. It is a town of considerable magnitude and population, has a safe harbour, a castle, and other strong fortifications. Claudianus describes it as founded by the Carthaginians (xv. 521). Here many editions improperly read Cāliris. Inh. Cārālītāni, orum, m. Adj. Cārālītānus, a, um. Cārālītānus ager (Liv. xxvii. 6).

Cārālis, is, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, whom Scævola killed at the battle of Cannæ (Sil. Ital. ix. 380 seq.).

Cārālītis, is, f. a marsh in Lycāōnia (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Cārāmbis, idis, f. Cape Kurempi, the most northern promontory of Pāphlāgōnia. Nūbifera Cārāmbis (Val. Flacc. viii. 214). Adj. Cārāmbiūcus, a, um (Orph. 727).

Cārānus, i, m. the first king of Mācēdōnia, sixteenth in descent from Hērēclēs, and from whom Pērcēs was the twentieth, according to Līvius (xlv. 9). Ordered by an oracle to seek settlements in Mācēdōnia, he quitted his native city, Argos, with a great number of Greeks, and took possession of the city Edessa, unobserved by the townsmen, on account of a heavy rain and thick mist. He followed a flock of goats seeking shelter from the rains, which brought to his recollection the words of the oracle, "Seek an empire, the goats being your guides." In memory of this event, he called the city Edessa, Ægia, and the inhabitants Ægēādæ. Having expelled Mīdas, who possessed part of Mācēdōnia, and having defeated other kings, he continued to hold their dominions, and, by uniting the various nations, laid the foundation of the Macedonian empire, about 814 B. C. (Just. vii. 1).

—2. A son of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, by his queen Clēōpātra, whom his brother Alexander the Great caused to be put to death, in 335 B. C. (Just. xi. 2).—3. A præfect of Alexander the Great in Asia (Curt. vii. 3).

Cārāvāntis, is, f. a town of the Cavii in Illýricum (Liv. xlv. 30).

Cārāvāntius, i, m. the maternal brother of Gēntius, king of the Illýrii, whom that monarch entrusted with the command of troops against the Cavii, in 170 B. C. Like Gēntius, he was afterwards sent prisoner to Rome, and graced the triumph of L. Anicius Gāllus, by whom the Illyrian monarch had been conquered (Liv. xlv. 30 seq.).

Cārausius (4 syl.), i, m. a native of Gāllia Bēlgica, belonged to the tribe of the Mēnāpīi. From his infancy, he had experience in the working and management of ships; in this way, it is said, he earned his subsistence, and became afterwards an excellent sea-officer. Māximīanus, colleague of Diocletianus in the empire, employed Cārausius to subdue the Franks and Saxons, who, as pirates, infested the adjoining sea. His knowledge of nautical affairs qualified him for conducting an enterprise of that kind, had he possessed those moral virtues without which no duty is well performed. Instead of giving into the treasury the valuable prizes which he took, he perverted the greater part of their cargoes to his own personal purposes. When the knowledge of this fact reached the ears of Māclmānus, he ordered him to be put to death without trial. Intelligence of the emperor's mandate reached Cārausius in time to effect his escape into Britain, where, either by bribery or intimidation, he prevailed on the Roman troops then in that island to declare him emperor, and he immediately made large additions to his fleet, by building new ships, and by inviting to join him the Saxons and Franks, against whom he had been appointed to carry on war. The emperor could not for some time quit Germany, and before his armament sailed against Cārausius, the latter had greatly the superiority both in the number of his ships and in the skill of their crews. Conscious of his inferiority to the usurper at sea, the emperor made peace with him, and allowed him to remain in the undisturbed possession of Britain, and of the title of Augustus. Established in the sovereignty, Cārausius set all rivalry at defiance, continued in the government of Britain for six years, until at last he fell by domestic treachery. His administration was tyrannical and oppressive, corresponding to the means by which he had obtained it. Allēctus, in whom Cārausius put the greatest confidence, dreading the punishment of his crimes, conspired against his benefactor, killed him, and retained possession of Britain for three years after the death of Cārausius (Eutrop. ix. 21).

Cārbo, ōnis, m. a Roman mentioned by Sāllūstius, of whom nothing particular can be said, as it is uncertain to which one of the family or clan, known by this name, the historian refers.

Cārcāso, ōnis, f. Carcasone, a town of that part of Prōvincia, now called Languedoc, on Atax, the Aude, which divides it into the old and new town. Here are preserved some records of the place, written upon the bark of trees, and the population is estimated at 15,000 (Ces. B. G. iii. 20).

Cārchēdon, ōnis, f. the Greek name of Carthage (Ap. Bel. Pun. l. seq.). Adj. Cārchēdonius, a. um.

Cārcinū, es, f. Carcina, a town in the territory of the Roxolāni, which stood on a bay called, from the town, Cārcinētes sinus (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Cārcinos, i. m. a constellation, generally called by Roman authors Cāncer q. v. (Luc. Phar. ix. 536).

Cārdāces, um. m. a class of Persians, who lived by theft. Their name is derived from Carda, which, in the Persian language, signified manly, warlike (Strab. 1041). Auto-phradātes had a hundred thousand infantry of this description in the engagement with Dātānes, who defeated him with great slaughter (Cor. Nep. Dat. 8).

Cārdāmylē, es, f. Skardamūla, one of the cities belonging to Agāmēmnōn, which, with other gifts, he promised to Achilles, if he returned to the war. It was on the seacoast (Hom. Il. ix. 150 seq.).

Cārdia, m. f. Hexamili, a town in Chērsōnēsus Thrācia, Gallipoli, of which Eumēnes was a native. Of this name ancient authors give two accounts; one, that a crow carried off the heart of the victim which the founder of the town had sacrificed, the other, that it took its name from its situation resembling a heart (Steph. Plin. l. 444). Inh. Cārdiāni, orum (Sing. Cārdiānus, i.), m. (Cor. Nep. Eum. l.).

Cārdō, ōnis, f. a town of Spain, probably not far from Bardo q. v. (Liv. xxxiii. 21).

Cārdūchī, orum. m. See Gordia.

Cārēo, ōnis, f. a town of Spain, at which the Carthaginians assembled on purpose to give battle to Scipio Africānus, who defeated them (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 268).

Cārēsus, i. m. a native of Cōlehis, who fell by the spear of Crēmēdon, after he had killed Dypsas and Strymon (Val. Flacc. vi. 192).

Cārēsus, i. m. a river descending from mount Ida (Hom. Il. xii. 20).

Cārfinia, a. f. a woman of infamous character, who appears to have been married, as Jūvenālis mentions, that on being convicted she would not put on the proper dress (talem togam). Matrons found guilty of whoredom were obliged to lay aside stola, instita, vitta, and assume toga meretricia (Sat. ii. 69).

Cārfulēnus, i. m. an officer of Caesar, who was despatched to attack the highest part of the camp of the Alexandrians, which he carried. He was afterwards killed in an engagement at Mūtina, Modēna, fighting against Antony (Hirt. Bel. Al. 31).

Cāria, a. f. a district of Asia Minor, Natolia, bounded on the south by the Mediterranean Sea, on the west by Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, on the north by Lydia, and on the east by Phrygia and Lycia. Celebratūque Cāria fāmā (Manil. iv. 766). Inh. Cāres, um (Sing. Car, aris), m. anciently called Lēlēges, joined the Trojans against the Greeks. According to Sāllūstius and Thūcydides, they practised piracy, had some name, and were conquered by Mīnos, king of Crēta, Candia. There were Cāres in Egypt at Ostium Pēlūsium (Herod. ii. 61). Adj. Cāricus, a. um. Cārica creta (Plin. iii. 533).

Cāria Hydrēla. See Hydrēla.

Cārinae, arum. f. a place in the fourth ward of Rome, in which were a number of elegant houses, hence laute Cārina (Virg. Aen. viii. 361).

Cārinās, ātis, m. a Roman commander in the interest of C. Mārius. Lāmpōnūs, and he fought a bloody battle with L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla at Cōllina pōrta, and were completely defeated (Eutrop. v. 8).—2. A lieutenant-general of C. Jūlius Cēsar, whom Q. Cācilius Mētellus made his only heir (Val. Max. vii. 8).

Cārinās Cēler, Cārinātis Cēleris, m. a man of senatorian rank, accused by his own slave of attachment to Britānnicus in the year 54. The emperor Nēro suppressed that prosecution (Tac. Ann. xiii. 10).

Cārinus, i. m. eldest son of the Roman emperor Cārus, was a man of so detestable a character, that his very name excites horror and disgust. His father had taken the greatest care of his education in order to render him fit for succeeding to the crown. The mind of Cārinus refused cultivation, and could receive no impression of moral duty. His high station in very early life enabled him to gratify, without restraint, his vicious inclinations, and he became a monster of lewdness, corruption, and tyranny. To such excess did he carry his crimes, that his father declared "he is not my son," and, grieved at his conduct in the administration of Italy and France, with which a war in Syria rendered it necessary to entrust him, he even deliberated whether his duty to the state did not require putting him to death. Perhaps had he lived he might have judged it necessary, but the treachery of Arrius Aper deprived the empire of this excellent prince, before he had matured and executed his patriotic measures for the good of the state. On the death of his father, Cārinus assumed the purple, for both he and his brother Nūmēriānus had received from their father the title of Augustus, and the latter began to march his army towards Rome as soon as treachery had deprived Cārus of life. On his way home Nūmēriānus fell by the same hand which had murdered his father, although he was the son-in-law of the ambitious and unprincipled Arrius Aper. Diocletianus, having been elected emperor by the army in preference to Arrius Aper, no sooner received the title than he killed that wretch with his own hand. Cārinus, not destitute of martial talents, conquered and killed Sabinus Jūlianus, governor of Vēnētia, he marched against his rival, whom he would have conquered had not his officers detested him for violation of their wives, commanded their soldiers to abandon him in the moment of victory, and a tribune, who had been injured by Cārinus, killed him with his own hand, in the year 285.—2. A man who envied the residence of Mārtiālis in the vicinity of Rome, and his being drawn by his own, not by hired, mules (Mart. viii. 61).

Cārīvālda, æ, m. a commander of the Batavians, who fell in an engagement with the Germans on the banks of Visūrgis, the Wezer, in the year 16 (Tac. Ann. ii. 11).

Cārisiānus, v. Chārisiānus, i, m. a poor lascivious man, mentioned by Mārtiālis (vi. 24). He is probably the person noticed by the same poet (xi. 89).

Cārisius, i, m. a Roman commander in Spain in the reign of Augustus (Flor. iv. 12).

Cārmānia, æ, f. a country to the southeast of Sinus Persicus, the Persian Gulf, of which the capital was Cārmāna, now Kerman. Inh. Cārmāni, orum (Sing. Cārmānus, i), m. the Carmanians, called also Ichthiophagi, had no clothes or grain, cattle or settlements, but wrapped themselves with the skins of fishes, lived on their flesh, and had their bodies covered with hair, except their head (Pom. Mel. iii. 145). Adj. Cārmānus, a, um. Cārmāni dūces (Luc. Phar. iii. 250).

Cārmē, es, f. the daughter of Phœnix, a Theban, was the nurse of Scylla and mother of Britōmārtis by Jūpiter (Virg. Cir. 220). Pausanias mentions that the Cretans believed Cārmē to be the daughter of Eubulus (ii. 30).

Cārmēus, i, m. a nobleman of Cōlchis, whose name is mentioned by Vālērius Flācū, although it would be difficult to assign a reason for the poet naming him at all, as he does nothing, and only utters a few words (v. 583).

Cārmēlis, is, f. a town in Portugal (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 287).

Cārmēlus, i, m. a native of Sōrāctē, St. Oreste, who killed Bāgrāda, a Carthaginian, in the battle between Hannibal and M. Minūcius Rūfus, the Roman dictator (Sil. Ital. vii. 662 seq.).

Cārmēlus, i, m. Carmel, a mountain in Jūdea, in appearance resembling a flattened cone, very rocky, and about two thousand feet high. Tacitus informs us, that a god of the same name was worshipped on its summit, and, according to ancient usage, without a temple or even a statue. Here Vēspāsiānus offered sacrifice, and the officiating priest, Bāsiliides, uttered a prediction which foretold the imperial throne of Rome to that commander (Tac. Hist. ii. 78).

Cārmēlon, ōnis, m. a man of great effeminacy, who boasted of being a citizen of Corinth. With this contemptible creature Mārtiālis contrasts himself (x. 65).

Cārmēnta, æ, v. Cārmēntis, is, f. the mother of Evānder, a woman endowed with prophecy. Both Līvius and Ovidius state, that she was by birth more noble than her husband. The latter derives her name a carmine (Fast. i. 467). She was a native of Arcādia, hence the same poet calls her Arcadia dea, Pūrrhasia dea, Mamantis nymphe, &c. Adj. Carmentālis, is, e. Cārmēntālis porta, one of the gates of Rome, which had its name from Cārmēnta. The street leading to this gate was called unfortunate (infelix via) from the Fabii having gone along it as they marched against the Vēntēs, by whom they were all cut off, in 478 B. C. (Līv. ii. 49, 50).

Cārmōna, æ, f. Carmona, a town of Seville, in the south of Spain, on the Carbones, near its junction with Bætis, the Guadalquivir. In the time of Cæsar it must have been a place of considerable importance (Hirt. Bel. Al. 57). Inh. Cārmōnēnses, ium, m.

Cārna, æ, f. the goddess who, in Roman mythology, presided over hinges. She appears to have been known only to the Romans, and of very great antiquity. According to Ovidius, she obtained this office from Jānus, in return for the loss of her innocence. The ancients called her Grānē (Ov. Fast. vi. 101—107).

Cārncēdes, æ, m. a native of Cŷrēnē, was the founder of the third or new academy. He wrote against Zēno the Stoic, and Gellius informs us, that he first purified his stomach by hellebore, on purpose to strengthen the powers of his mind. The Romans having imposed a heavy fine on the Athenians, because they had plundered the city Orōpus, the latter sent Cārncēdes, Diōgēnes the Stoic, and Critōlāus the Peripatetic, to Rome, in 157 B. C., on purpose to procure a mitigation of the sentence, and their eloquence had such a powerful effect, that the fine was reduced from five hundred talents to one hundred. Of the powers of his mind, and the extent of his information, much has been written, as well as of his eloquence, which he seldom exerted without carrying the point he had in view. His fondness for argument had probably a bad effect upon his own mind, for he readily adopted either side of the question, and this want of fixed principle naturally led to the suspension of assent. Most of his particular opinions, as well as many of his sayings, are recorded by Cicero. He lived to the age of ninety. Adj. Cārncēdēs, v. Cārncēdius, a, um. Cārncēdēa sentētia, i, e. percipi nihil posse (Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 48).

Cārni, orum (Sing. Cārnis, i), m. an Alpine nation, whose country is now called Carniola, although the whole extent of their territory is not included under the modern name. Adj. Cārnicus, a, um. Cārnicæ Alpes (Plin. i. 385).

Cārēlides, ae, m. a nobleman of Cŷrēnē, and father of Tēlēscritēs (Pin. Pyth. ix. 127).

Cārēnūllus, i, m. a man who, on being arraigned, put himself to death. On hearing of this act, the Emperor Tiberius said, "Cārēnūllus has escaped me" (Suet. Tib. 61).

Cārēnūntum, i, n. v. Cārēnūs, ūntis, m. Hainburg, St. Petronella, or, Altenbourg, a fortified town of Pannōnia, on the southern bank of Dānūbius, the Danube (Eutrop. viii. 13). The Romans were unable to take this town in 172 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 1).

Cārēnūtes, um, v. Cārēnūti, orum (Sing. Cārēnūtes, i), m. a powerful nation of Gāllia, France, between the rivers Sēquāna, the Seine, and Līgēris, the Loire, south of Lūtētia. The country of the Cārēnūtes was reckoned the centre of Gāllia, France, on which account the Druids held, in that district, courts annually for the administration of justice. Flāvus Cārēnūtes, a yellow or red haired Cārēnūtes (Tib. i. 7. 12).

Cārēnūtum, i, n. melius Carnuntum q. v.

M. Cārēnūtes, M. Cārēnūti, m. a Roman praetor, in 45 B. C. By order of the senate he conducted the funeral rites of the consuls Hirtius and Pansa, who had fallen at Mūtina, Modena. To the disgrace of the state, the ceremony was performed in a very mean and contemptible manner (Val. Max. v. 2).

Cārēpāthos, i, f. Scarpanto, an island between Crēta, Candia, and Rhōdus, Rhodes, about twenty-two miles in length, and eight in breadth. The circumference, according to Strābo, is two hundred stadia. Adj. Cārēpāthius, a, um. Cārēpāthium mārē, the sea adjoining to the island, which was remarkable for storms (Virg. G. iv. 387).

Cārēpētānia, ae, f. an inland district of Spain, near the sources of Tāgus, the Tajo. Inh. Cārēpētāni, orum, m. occur first in Roman history, when Hānñibal commanded a Carthaginian army in their country (Liv. xxi. 3 seq.).

Cārēpi, orum, m. a Scythian nation, who were neighbours to the Bastarnae (Eutrop. ix. 25). Diōlēmaus places them to the north of Dācia. Ammīānus Mārcellinus writes, that Diōclētiānus transferred them to Pannōnia (xxviii. 1).

Cārēpis, is, m. a river, which forms one of the southern branches of the Danube (Herod. iv. 49).

Cārēpophōrus, i, m. a Greek comedian, distinguished for his soft manner of uttering impure speeches on the stage (Juv. Sat. vi. 199).—2. A celebrated hunter, commended by Mārtiālis (Spect. 15: 23).

Cārēna, v. Charrē, arum, f. Kara, a town of Mēsōpōtāmia, Al-jezrah, supposed to be called in Scripture, Charan, or Haran, in which Abraham dwelt, and where his father Terah died. It had its name from the river on which it stood (Val. Max. i. 11). Near it the Parthians cut off the Roman army under Crassus, who likewise fell by their hands. Lūcānus gives a short but forcible description of the unhappy fate of this Roman commander (Phar. i. 105). Inh. Cārērhēi, v. Cārēhēni, orum, m. worshipped Lūnus, and believed that the nations who paid religious veneration to that luminary as a female were under the influence of women, and that those who considered this object of heathen adoration a male, ruled over women, and were superior to their influence (Steph.).

Cārthēnes, is, m. a commander of the Parthians (Tac. Ann. xli. 12).

Cārrotas, i, m. the brother of the wife of Arcēsiānus, who appointed him to settle a colony (Pin. Pyth. v. 34—59).

Cārseōli, orum, m. Carsoli, a town of the Aequi, to which the Romans sent a colony of four thousand men, but the Mārsi kept possession of it by force of arms, till M. Valērius Māximus defeated them in 303 B. C. Cārseōli stood on the territory of the Aequicōli. Noble hostages were sometimes sent into custody at this town, of which number was the son of Cōtys, king of Thrācia, Romunia (Liv. x. 3—xlv. 42). Inh. Cārseōliāni, orum (Sing. Cārseōliānus, i), m. (Plin. i. 358). Adj. Cārseōliānus, a, um. Cārseōliāna lex, enjoined the destruction of foxes whenever they were taken (Ov. Fast. iv. 710).

Cārēdītus Sācerdos, Cārēdīt Sācerdōtis, m. accused of supplying Tāctārinas with corn, which not having been proved, he was acquitted. The senate, on account of his guilt with Albicilla, banished him to an island in the year 37 (Tac. Ann. vi. 48).

Cārēstula, arum, f. a town of Umbria, near Spōlētum, Spoleto (Tac. Hist. iii. 60).

Cārēstilius, i, m. held a command in the Roman army, after the death of Cēsar, and appears to have been on the side of Octāvius (Ap. Bel. Civ. 569).

Cārēstis, is, m. the brother of a Scythian king, despatched with a considerable force of cavalry to destroy the city Alexandria, near Iaxartes, the Sir, in 329 B. C. (Curt. vii. 7).

Cartax, ācis, f. a town of Spain, not far from Carthāgo Nōva, taken by Scipio Africānus. Inh. Cartācei, orum, m. (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 272).

Cartēia, ae, f. a town of Spain, at the bottom of a gulf, which had Calpē, one of the pillars of Hērēcles, on the east. In this town Cn. Pōmpēius, son of Pōmpēius Magnus, took refuge after the battle of Munda, Monda, which put C. Jūlius Cēsar in possession of the Roman empire (Sil. Ital. iii. 396). In ancient authors Cartēia, Gādes, and Tartessus are often confounded. Inh. Cartēii, orum, m. were partly dispossessed, in 173 B. C., by a colony, whose fathers were Roman soldiers, and their mothers Spanish women. Such of the Cartēii as chose to remain were to have land allowed them; but it is probable few of them would continue to dwell amongst these spurious colonists (Liv. xxviii. 30 seq.).

—2. The capital of the Olcādes, in Hispania Tarrācōnensis, which Hānñibal took and plundered, before he attacked Sāguntum (Liv. xxi. 5). Here some suppose the reading should be Althēa.

Cārthāa, ae, f. a town in the island Cēa, Zango, which had its name, according to Stēphānus, from Cārthius, who died there. Inh. Cārthāei, orum (Sing. Cārthāeus, i), m. Adj. Cārthāeus, et Cārthēlius, a, um. Cārthāea arca (Ov. Met. x. 109). Cārthētia mānia (Ov. Met. vii. 368). Some editions read Cāthēia.

Cārthāgo, inis, f. El-Meosa near Saka-hah, called by the Greeks, Cārthēdon, the chief city of Africa, and long the rival of Rome. Few cities of antiquity possessed greater power or more eminent distinction than this. It was built by a colony of Phœnicians under Dido q. v., and the name is said to denote a new city. Stēphānus says it was called Cādmēa, Cēnūssa, and Cāccābē, which signifies the head of a horse, in the language of the Carthaginians, i. e. the natives of that part of Africa, to which perhaps Virgilius alludes (Æn. i. 444). It stood upon a peninsula, which jutted out from nearly the inmost part of a deep bay. The circumference of the site of this city was nearly three hundred and sixty stadia, exclusive of the neck of land which connected it with the continent, which, according to Appian (Bel. Pun. 56) and Pölybius, was twenty-five stadia, but Strābo makes it sixty stadia. This part had a triple wall thirty cubits high, as had the city also on the south. Cor. Nepos says, it presented the appearance of a double town, as if the one surrounded the other; the interior was called Býrsa (i. e. a fort), and the exterior Māgālia. The date of its foundation is uncertain; according to some only a few years before Rome, and, according to others, before the Trojan war. It was destroyed by P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Emīliānus (147 B. C.), after a war of 120 years (Vel. Pat. i. 12), and after it had stood seven hundred years (Liv. Ep. 51); Velleius Pātercūlus says 672 (i. 12). If this statement of Livius be correct, it must have been founded ninety-four years before Rome. In 125 B. C., the senate agreed to the rebuilding of Carthage, on the motion of C. Sēmprōnius Grāechus, who was one of the three commissioners appointed to settle the colony, which, according to Appiānus, consisted at first only of six thousand, and remained in an imperfect state until completed by Augustus (Bel. Civ. 364. Liv. Ep. 60). Velleius Pātercūlus states, that it was the first Roman colony out of Italy (ii. 15). Inh. Cārhāgīnīēnsēs, um, v. Peni, orum, m. the Carthaginians, like the other Phœnicians, in the early ages of that state were chiefly employed in trade. The erection of other cities and acquisition of territory, by whatever means at first obtained, would naturally lead to the raising of armies, and to contests with the adjoining nations. Both in commerce and war they displayed great knowledge. The bravery of the Carthaginian soldiers, and skill of their generals, the Roman historians readily admit; and it must be acknowledged, from the states being rivals, that they are more inclined to lessen, than to overrate, their merits. Faction proved the ruin of Carthage, and the cruelty of the Romans to the unhappy natives was severely atoned for by the civil war and massacre which followed soon after, when no country remained unsubdued, and Roman ambition had nothing further to aspire at. Silius Itālicus describes them as light made, low in stature, and fighting barefooted, using an elegant shield, and a short sword. Their clothes were red to conceal the effect of their wounds (iii. 231 seq.). Justinus states, that they offered men in sacrifice, and ate the flesh of dogs (xviii. 6: xix. 1). Adj. Cārhāgīnīēnsīs, is, e, et, Penicus, Pūnicānus, Pūnicus, v. Pūnicus, a, um. Pūnica fides, faithlessness, or treachery, a common expression of the Roman historians; had the writings of the Carthaginians been transmitted to us, we would most probably have had Rōmāna fides in the same sense. Adv. Penicē, et, Pūnicē, after the Carthaginian manner, in the Punic tongue.

Carthāgo Nōva, Carthāgīnis Nōvæ (called Hispāna Carthāgo, by Florus, ii. 6), f. Carthāgena, a town of Spain, about the middle of the eastern coast, on a bay, stretching inland five hundred paces, and in breadth somewhat more, exposed only to the southwest wind, being protected from all the rest by a small island in the mouth of the bay. The town stands on a peninsula, which juts out from the inmost recess, and a morass bounds it where not encompassed by the sea, which renders it a place of considerable strength, possessing the advantage of a large and secure harbour (Liv. xxvi. 42 seq.). Carthāgine captā, Carthāgena being taken (Flor. ii. 17).

Cārthālo, v. Cārtālo, ōnis, m. son of Mālēus, sent by the Carthaginians with the tenths to Hērēclēs. His father, provoked by the insolence and gorgeous apparel in which he appeared before him, an exile, affixed him on a very high cross in the view of Carthage, which at that time he was assaulting (Just. xviii. 7).—2. The commander-in-chief of the cavalry in Hānnibal's army in Italy, who cut off L. Hōstilius Māncinus, and the bravest men in the party, who, instead of reconnoitring, according to the dictator's orders, had attacked some straggling Numidians, and pursued them almost to the enemy's camp. After the battle of Cānna, Hānnibal sent him to Rome, with ten of the prisoners whom he had allowed to ransom themselves, and he gave him a discretionary power to propose conditions of peace, if he found the senate inclined to terminate the war. The dictator no sooner had information of the coming of Cārthālo, than a lictor was sent to meet him, with orders, that he should quit the Roman territories before night (Liv. xxii. 15 seq.).—3. The præfect who commanded the Carthaginian garrison at Tārēntum, Taranto, and was killed on the Romans recovering possession of that city, in 211 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 16). To him Eutrōpius refers (iii. 16). Livius mentions a Carthaginian of this name, whom Hānnibal sent with the head of Grāechus to the Roman camp, in 214 B. C. Of Grāechus' funeral and other circumstances respecting him, different accounts are given (xxv. 17).—4. A man in the Carthaginian army, killed in Spain by Nāsīdīus (Sil. Ital. xv. 450).

Cārtismāndūa, v. f. queen of the Brīgāntes, and wife of Vēnūsius, a British chieftain, whom she afterwards expelled from her kingdom. The betraying of Cārtāciūs to the Romans, has consigned her memory to undying infamy. That noble warrior fled to her for protection, on which she first loaded him with chains, and then gave him up to his enemies (Tac. Ann. xii. 36—40).

Cārvēntus, i, f. v. Cārvēntum, i, n. a town of Lātium. Adj. Cārvēntānus, a, um. Cārvēntāna arx (Liv. iv. 53).

Cārவில், i, m. one of the four kings of Cāntium, Kent, who, at the command of Cāssivēlaunus, made an attack on Cæsar's naval camp, in which they were repulsed, and lost a great number of men (Cæs. B. G. v. 22).

C. Cārவில் Spōlēctīnus, C. Cārவில் Spōlēctīni, m. sent with C. Afrānīus q. v., by the Roman garrison in Uscūna, to treat with Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōniā, about surrendering, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 18, 19).

L. Cārவில், L. Cārவில், m. a tribune of the people, who exerted himself, in conjunction with L. Cărvilius, in order that M. Postūmīus might be fined for fraud, in 214 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 3).

Sp. Cărvilius, Sp. Cărvili, m. a plebeian tribune (Liv. xxv. 3). See L. Cărvilius.—2. An officer in the Roman army under Cn. Scipio, by whom he was sent from Greece to Rome, to inform the senate of the conduct of Perseus, king of Măcedonia, in 173 B. C. The facts which he stated in presence of the Măcedonian ambassadors, and which they were unable to controvert, induced the senate to order them out of Italy, and Cărvilius guarded them until they embarked (Liv. xlii. 36).

Sp. Cărvilius Măximus, Sp. Cărvili Măximi, m. was elected curule edile, in 301 B. C., and, six years after, he obtained the consulship. During that year, he took a number of towns and enriched the treasury with the spoils, out of which he contracted for the building of a temple to Fors Fortūna. His success secured him the honour of a triumph (Liv. x. 9—46).—2. Held the consulship at Rome, first in 236 B. C., and afterwards in 230 B. C. The only remarkable occurrence in his life mentioned by Roman historians is, that he was the first who divorced his wife at Rome, and that too not for incontinence, but barrenness, an act which brought down on him the deserved censure of the community (Val. Max. ii. 1).—3. Advised the senate, in consequence of the smallness of their number, to admit Latins into the senate, in 218 B. C. He died augur five years after (Liv. xxiii. 22 seq.).

Cărus, f. m. the husband of Nōrbăna. Martialis writes an epigram on their marriage day, addressed to Mărcūrius (vii. 73).—2. A native of Nărbō, Narbonne, a town of Gallia, France. Under Prōbus he passed through all the gradations civil and military, and at last obtained the rank of praetorian praefect. This office rendered his advancement to the throne easy, and may have been the sole cause why he was supposed to have had a hand in the death of the emperor, an imputation which has blackened his memory, and that merely on suspicion, as direct evidence of the crime has neither been produced nor alleged. His election having proceeded from the soldiery, he did not consider it necessary to write the senate in very respectful terms, and, therefore, sent them a bare notification of what had taken place, not a request to confirm his title. Fond of war, he carried his arms against the Sarmatians, over whom he gained a decisive victory, killing sixteen thousand, and making twenty thousand prisoners. His success did not desert him in hostilities with the Parthians, whose forces he defeated, reduced Măsōpōtămia, Al-jezirah, to submission, and took Sēlēucia and Ctēsiphon in one campaign. For these victories he obtained the surname of Părsicus, or, Părthicus. Had not death prevented, he intended to carry his victories still farther into the east. The account generally believed is, that he fell by the hand of Arrius Aper, his praetorian praefect, in the year 283, after a reign of sixteen or seventeen months. On attaining the purple he gave his two sons, Cărinus and Nūmērianus q. v. the title of Caesar, and afterwards that of Augustus, with the view of securing to them the accession to the empire (Eutrop. ix. 18).

Căryae, arum, f. Găiza, a village of Arcă-dia, situated on the extremity of a plain, at the distance of five stadia from the mountains Orēxis and Selāthis. At this town, T. Quinctius Flăminius waited the arrival of the auxiliary troops, before he entered the territory of Nabis, tyrant of the Lăcedemonians, against whom he was marching, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 26). Căryātis, idis, f. of Cărye, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Căryātis Diāna, from her being worshipped at Căryae. Căryātides virgīnes.

Cărystus, v. Cărystos, i. f. Caristo, a town of Euboea, Negropont, under the mountain Ocha, which had its name from Cărystus, son of Chiron. Străbo mentions that there was a kind of stone here, which the natives wove into cloth, of which they made towels, and cleaned by throwing into the fire, which completely removed every stain, as washing does in linen (650). This is the amiantes of the Latins, and the asbestos of the Greeks. L. Apūstius sent the Issaei to plunder the land around this town, whilst he and Attălus, king of Asia, remained in the harbour Gēraestus, Jastura, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 45). Săxōsa Cărystos (Luc. Phar. v. 232). Inh. Cărystii, orum, m. (Sing. Cărystius, i.), m. displayed some bravery in the war with Philippus, king of Măcedonia. After having submitted to the Roman commander, or rather having solicited his protection, they remained firm, and their state was declared free at the conclusion of the war, in 197 B. C. Orēus and Erētria received the same privilege at the same time (Liv. xxxiii. 34). Adj. Cărystius, a, um. Cărystium marmor, marble of Caristo, which was green, and in high esteem among the Romans (Plin. v. 288).—2. A town of the Ligures, in the territory of the Stătiellii or Stătiellates, near which a battle was fought with that tribe of the Ligures, by M. Pōpillus Lănas, consul, who killed ten thousand of them, took seven hundred prisoners and eighty-two military standards, in 175 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 7).—3. A place in Lăcōnia, near Arcădia, which produced wine, called from it Cărystium vinum (Strab. 651).

Căsănder, dri, m. a partisan of Philippus, king of Măcedonia, who had long resided at Mărōnēa, and, by an order of the king to Onōmăstus, praefect of the seacoast, admitted a body of Thracians into the city by night, who put the Mărōnēae to the sword, as if the town had been taken by storm. For this he was sent off by order of the Roman embassy, at the head of which was Appius Claudius Pūlcher, to be examined by the Roman senate, but he was put to death by poison in Epirus, lest he should make any discovery prejudicial to Philippus (Liv. xxxix. 34).

Căsăves, ium, m. a people of Mauritania (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Căsca, a, m. the armour-bearer of Brūtus, whom Clăudas killed in the battle between Hannibal and M. Minūcius Rūfus, the Roman dictator, by an arrow which he had thrown at his master (Sil. Ital. vii. 649).

A. Căscēlli Vindex, A. Căscēlli Vindicis, m. a Roman knight, one of the profoundest lawyers of the age in which he lived. He was a man of extensive reading and great information, to which Hōrătius alludes (Art. Poet. 371).

Căsilinum, i, n. Casilino, a considerable town of Cămpănia, on the river Văltūrnus, the Volturno, on, or near, the site of which the modern city called Capua stands. It was besieged, in 218 B. C., and at last taken, by Hannibal, but not before the inhabitants had endured all the severities of a long and terrible famine. A mouse was sold, during the siege, for 200 dēnarii, about 6*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* (Liv. xxii. 19). Inh. Cāsīlinēnses, v. Cāsīlinātes, ium, m.

Cāsīlinus, i, m. a river of Cāmpānia in Italy, on the bank of which stood the town Cāsīlinum.

Cāsīnum, i, n. a town of the Völsei, which gives name, in modern times, to the adjacent mountain, Monte Casino. It stood on the confines of Cāmpānia, and the Romans sent a colony to it in 312 B. C. To the territory of this town Hannibal wished an Italian guide to conduct him, but the Carthaginian pronunciation deceived the guide, who thought he said Cāsīlinum. On his reaching that place, Hannibal, supposing he had been intentionally misled, first scourged and then crucified the guide, as a terror to others (Liv. xxii. 13). Inh. Cāsīnātes, ium (Sing. Cāsīnas, ātis, m. Adj. Cāsīnas, as, as; ātis, et, Cāsīnus, a, um. Cāsīnus ager, the territory of Cāsīnum (Liv. xxii. 13). Cāsīna nymphæ (Sil. Ital. xii. 527).

Cāsūm, i, n. Katich, a town in Egypt, near which Cn. Pōmpēius was buried (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Cāsūs, a, um. Cāsūs mons, El-Kas, or the chissel, a mountain in Ægyptus, Egypt, near Pelūsium, Tineh, rendered eminent from Pōmpēius having been murdered near it, and a small tomb having been erected there to his memory. Here also was a temple of Jūpiter, hence called Jūpiter Cāsūs (Solin. xxxiv. 1. Luc. Phar. viii. 858). This mountain forms a promontory, on which account Lūcānus calls it Cāsia rupes (Phar. x. 494). Cāsia hārēna (Luc. Phar. viii. 539).—2. A mountain in Sŷria, the foot of which is washed by Orōntes, the El-Aasi (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8 seq.).

Cāsmēna, æ, f. a town of Sicily (Herod. vii. 155).

Cāsmilla, æ, f. the wife of Mētābus, a native of Prīvernum, and mother of Cāmilla. Cāmilla is the same name as Casmilla, suppressing the s for convenience of pronunciation (Virg. Æn. xi. 543).

Cāspēria, æ, f. Aspra, a town of the Sabines, near which Hīmēlla, the Aia, has its source (Virg. Æn. vii. 714.) Silius Itālicus derives the name from Cāspira, a town of Bactria, perhaps now Cashmir (viii. 414). This poet abounds in fanciful etymology.

Cāspērius, i, m. a Roman centurion in the garrison of Gōrnēæ, in the year 51 (Tac. Ann. xii. 45).

Cāspērius Nīger, Cāspērii Nīgrī, m. a man killed in the Roman capitol, when the soldiers of Vitēllius forced their way into that ancient edifice, and it was burned to the ground, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. iii. 73).

Cāspius, et, Cāspīacus, a, um. Cāspium mārē, the Caspian Sea, or rather a lake of salt water in Asia, bounded on the N. by Astracan, on the E. and S. by Persia; according to some three hundred and thirty-four feet below the level of the Black Sea, and according to others only sixty. Its length, which is from north to south, extends to four hundred miles, and its greatest breadth to three hundred. According to Kīnneir, it extends to six hundred and forty miles, and its breadth varies from one hundred to two hundred miles. The depth of this sea is unequal, in some places four hundred and fifty fathoms, in others so shallow, that vessels which draw more than ten feet of water cannot navigate it safely. The Caspian Sea has no tides, but the wind blowing from north to south, raises the water, which is brackish rather than salt, to the height of three or four feet; but, on a calm ensuing, it returns to its former level with a prodigious current and heavy swell. It has seven ports, of which Badku alone is reckoned safe in a storm. The Volga, and eighty-four other rivers, fall into this sea, which has good anchorage only in the northeast side, which is low, swampy, and covered with reeds. The ancients considered the lake or sea of Aral as forming part of Mārē Cāspium, on which account it has no proper name in the writings of the Greeks or Romans. Cāspīi līcus (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 5). Cāspīādæ, arum, et, Cāspīi, orum, m. people living on Mārē Cāspium, the Caspian Sea, from whom the name is derived (Plin. i. 674. Flor. iii. 5. Val. Flacc. vi. 107). Cāspia tellus, and Cāspia regna, country round the Caspian Sea, which, within one hundred and eighty-nine miles of its shores, is depressed to the level of the ocean. Cāspīus mons, part of mount Taurus, which anciently separated between Armēnia and Mēdia, called by Lūcānus Cāspia claustra (Phar. viii. 222), because it served as a barrier, or protection, against foreign invasion. This range, like most other mountainous tracts, had some defiles by which it could be crossed, one of which had the name of Cāspia or Cāspīāca porta, Demir-Capi (i. e. the iron gate) (Stat. Syl. iv. 4. 64), which the Persians call Derbent (i. e. the pass). Lūcānus, by Cāspia claustra, could not mean Cāspīæ pylæ, but Sārmātīcæ, from his immediately adding the Alāni, whose country was far north of Cāspīæ pylæ. Cāspia vīa (Tac. Ann. vi. 33). Claustra Cāspīarum, Peftio (Tac. Hist. i. 6).

Cāssāndānē, es, f. wife of Cŷrus, and mother of Cāmbyēs (Herod. ii. 1).

Cāssānder, dri, m. son of Antīpāter, distinguished himself by his bravery and success in arms. After several conquests in different parts of Greece, he put an end to the democratical government of Athens, and placed Dēmētrius at the head of the state. Olym-pias, mother of Alexander the Great, incurred his resentment, by putting to death Arīdeus, his wife Eurŷdicē, and others, who were in the interest of Cāssānder. On that account he besieged Pŷdna, in which she had taken refuge, made himself master of it by stratagem, and deprived her of life, together with Rōxāna, her son Alexander, and Bārsīnē, with her son Hērēcles, the wives and sons of Alexander the Great, at whose death he obtained Cāria, and was appointed commander of his attendants and lifeguards. According to Jūstinus he poisoned that conqueror at the instigation of his father (xii. 14). He married Thēssālōnica, daughter of Phīlīppus, and sister of Alexander Magnus, and called Thērma by her name, after he had greatly enlarged it. Having formed an alliance with Sēlēucus and Lŷsimāchus, he gained, with their assistance, a complete victory over Antionous at Ipsus in Phrygia, in 295 B. C., three years after which he died. On the death of Alexander, he had declared himself king of Macedonia and Græcia, and his son Alexander (Justinus says Philipppus), succeeded him in the throne, in 298 B. C.

Cassandra, s. f. a daughter of Priāmus, king of Trōja, who was said, when wearied with sport, to have fallen asleep in the temple of Apōllo, and to have obtained from him the gift of prophecy, on condition that she complied with his request. Apōllo rendered her prophecies, though true, useless, by their being disbelieved, because, after he had fulfilled his promise, she refused compliance. Hence she is called Cassandra vates (Virg. Aen. ii. 246: iii. 187). In form she was the most elegant of all the daughters of Priāmus, and promised by her father to Othryōneüs (Hom. Il. xiii. 366).

Cässändrea, v. Cässändria, a, f. Pinaca, a city of Macedonia, in the peninsula Pallene, of which the ancient name was Ptoidea. On being rebuilt, and new colonies settled there by Cäsander, it received this name. Here Philippos laid down at once the keels of one hundred ships, in 209 B. C., to enable him to cope with Attalus, king of Asia, the Aetoli, and the Romans. It was a place of great strength (Liv. xxviii. 8 seq.). Inh. Cässändrines, ium, m. (Liv. xlv. 10).

Cassandreus, εἶος, m. supposed to denote Apollodorus, tyrant of Cassandria (Ov. Ep. Pont. ii. 9. 43). The reading various, and the meaning doubtful.

Cassellus, i. m. a Roman, who did not apply himself to the acquisition of knowledge until advanced in life, and wished to appear learned in the sixtieth year of his age, at which Märtälis sneers, and asks when he will become eloquent (vii. 8).

Cassī, orum, m. the hundred of Caishow, a British nation, supposed to be subject to Cassivelaunus, at the time Caesar invaded Britain, who submitted to that conqueror (Cæs. B. G. v. 21).

Cāslānus, i. m. a friend of the poet Mārtlālis, to whom he addresses an epigram on the merits of Cānus, a poet of Gādes. Cádiz (iii. 64).

Cassignatus, i. m. a general of the Gauls, who fell in battle with Persëus, king of Mæcedonia, in 173 B. C. He was among the auxiliaries of Eumënes, king of Asia (Liv. xlii. 57).

Cassiopea, es, Cassiopea, et, Cassiopea, v.
f. the wife of Cephæus, king of Æthiopia.
 Having had the vanity to boast that she and her daughters were more beautiful than Juno and the Nereides, she had to allow her favourite child, Andromeda, to be chained to a rock, and exposed to the fury of that terrible monster which Neptune, at the solicitation of Juno, had sent to ravage the country. Per-seus having observed her as he returned from the slaughter of the Gorgons, and, pitying her dreadful situation, promised to her parents, on condition that she became his wife, to rescue her, which he did at the time she was about to be devoured, and prevailed on Jupiter, at a future period, to change Cas-siope into a constellation, which still bears her name (Manil. i. 354).

Cassiope, es. f. Gastrizza, a town of Chalcidica, distant seventeen hundred stadia from Brundisium.—2. A town of Coreira. Inh. Cassiopei, orum, m. (Plin. i. 346).

Cassiterides, um, f. the Scilly islands, off the southwest coast of England. From them the ancients had tin. In the opinion of Plinius, they had this name from yielding abundance of lead, and Strabo asserts they were known only to the Phœnicians (Herod. iii. 115).

Cāssius, v. Cāssianus, a, um. Cāssia gens, the Cassian clan. Cāssia viā, the Cassian road, which went through Etrūria, Tuscany, and had its name from one of the Cāssii, but the individual is not certainly known.

Cissius, 1, m. surnamed Hēriscus, from being a native of Tuscany, a man of wonderful powers of composition, who, according to report, lost his life from his numerous writings taking fire, by which he was reduced to ashes. He is often, but improperly, confounded with the subject of the following article (Hor. Sat. i. 10. 62).—2. Surnamed Pārmensis, from being a native of Pārma, was a man of considerable poetic talent, which is evident from Hōrātius (Epist. i. 4. 3). Acron informs us, that he wrote epigrams and elegies. He joined Brūtus and Cissius against C. Jūlius Cēsār, and they afterwards entrusted him with a fleet and an army, to collect money in Asia. After their defeat he joined, with his ships, Stātius Mūr-cus, and both attached themselves to Sextus Pōmpeius. Fortune declared, too, against that brave commander, and Cissius, maintaining his enmity to Augūstus, espoused the interest of M. Antonīus. Immediately after the battle at Actium, Cissius retired to Athens, where he was killed by order of Augūstus. He was the last of the conspirators against Cēsār, who was put to death, as Trēbōnius had been the first (Vel. Pat. ii. 87).—3. A soldier of great strength, who seized and bound Fēnius Rūfus (Tac. Ann. v. 66).—4. A comedian (Tac. Ann. i. 73).

Cassius Asclepiodotus, Cassii Asclepiodoti, m. a Bithynian of great wealth and high rank, whose fidelity to Bārēas Sōranus displays one of the finest examples of truth and honour in adversity, which the constancy of friendship ever exhibited. His fidelity subjected him to confiscation of property and banishment, in the year 67 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 83).

Cassius Chereas, Cassii Chereae, m. held the office of centurion in the N. of Germany, when the army under Germanicus revolted, in the year 14. His bravery on that occasion preserved his life, and he afterwards immortalized his name by being the chief conspirator against Caligula (Tac. Ann. i. 32). According to Suetonius, he demanded the honour of striking the first blow, probably enraged at the insulting treatment received from the emperor at the time he was a tribune of the praetorian cohort, and waited on him for the pass word (Suet. Calig. 56).

Cássius Longinus, Cássil Longini, m. sometimes called simply Cássius, or Longinus, a propraetor of the south of Spain. His cruel and oppressive conduct in that country gave birth to a conspiracy against his life, which it was resolved to carry into execution at Córdoba, Cordova. After he was severely but not mortally wounded, his guards came up to his assistance, and surrounded the conspirators as they advanced to complete the murder. Some of the assassins he put to death, and compounded with others for money. He was afterwards drowned at the mouth of Ibērus, the Ebro, the largest river of Spain.—2. A blind lawyer, whom the emperor Nēro put to death, because among the busts of his ancestors he kept that of C. Cāsius, one of the conspirators against Caesar (Suet. Ner. 37). The emperor probably ordered him to be murdered, not so much on account of his having that bust as on account of his great wealth, which appears to have been the opinion of Jūvénālis (Sat. x. 16), and Tācītus (Ann. xvi. 7).

Cāsius Lōngus, Cāssī Lōngi, m. a præfect of the Camp, whom the mutineers appointed joint commander-in-chief with Fābīus Fābūllus at the time Alēnus Cācina induced the troops to revolt from Vitēllius on purpose to join Vēspāsīanus (Tac. Hist. iii. 14).

Cāsius Pātāvinus, Cāssī Pātāvīni, m. a plebeian, whom Augustus held it sufficient to punish with a slight banishment, although he had declared in a large company that he neither wanted courage nor inclination to stab him (Suet. Aug. 51).

Cāsius Sēvērus, Cāssī Sēvēri, m. an orator of some eminence, who possessed a considerable talent for keen satirical writing. The Roman emperor Tiberius suffered severely from his sarcastic and cutting remarks, and his defamatory libels had ridiculed the eminent of both sexes. Tācītus says he was a man of mean extraction, void of principle, and of profligate manners. His writings and vices banished him to Crēta, Candia, where, persisting in his licentious practices, he provoked new enemies and enraged the senators, who confiscated his property, and caused him to be removed to Sēriphus, Serpho, where in old age he languished on the rocks (Tac. Ann. i. 72: iv. 21). As an orator, he was the first who deviated from the plain and simple style of his predecessors, not from want of learning or genius, but to adapt his orations to the public taste. Quīntīllīanus allows that he had great abilities, and, if read with caution, may serve as a model worthy of imitation. His temper regulated his conduct more than his judgment, and he mingled too much acrimony with his wit. Even in his exile he set no bounds to his satirical rage, and the malevolence which appeared in his lampoons and defamatory writings excited the indignation of Hōrātius, who writes against him his sixth epode.

C. Cāsius, C. Cāssī, m. a military tribune, who commanded a legion at Arimīnum, Rimini, in 180 B. C. (Liv. xli. 5). To a military tribune of this name, L. Anicius Gallus, prætor, committed the custody of Gentius, in 170 B. C. It seems doubtful whether this be the Cāsius above-mentioned or a different person (Liv. xlv. 31).—2. A proconsul, was defeated at Mūtina, Modena, by Spārtacus, commander of the gladiators (Liv. Ep. 96. Flor. iii. 20).

C. Cāsius Lōngīnus, C. Cāssī Lōngīni, m. a Roman, who, after being a decemvir for settling colonies in Gāllia and Līgūria, obtained the consulship with P. Licīnius Crāsus, in 173 B. C. During his continuance in that office, he did nothing worth mentioning, unless it be the foolish attempt which he made to march his army through Illyricum into Mācēdōnia. The senate, enraged at his thus opening a passage into Italy for so many barbarous nations, sent a messenger commanding him to desist, and, after having advanced about half-way, he turned, and seems to have acted with horrible cruelty and injustice, of which the Cārui, Istri, and Iāpýdes complained to the senate. Cincibīlus, king of the Gauls, charged him with desolating the country of the Alpine Gauls, and carrying off many thousands of the inhabitants into slavery (Liv. xlii. 4—xliii. 5).—2. A Roman consul, who, with his colleague, C. Sēxtius Cālvīnus (called by Eutrōpius, Dōmītiūs Cālvīnus), carried on war against the Transalpine Gauls, chiefly the Arvernī. Of that people they slew a great number near Rhōdānus, the Rhone, obtained great spoil, and triumphed with uncommon splendour (Eutrop. iv. 22). See Bituitus.—3. A noble Roman, born at Parma, who married Jūnia, sister of M. Jūnius Brūtus. He first distinguished himself as a soldier in the army of M. Licīnius Crāsus, and, in the unfortunate expedition against Pārthīa, he was first quæstor under that commander, a situation which he filled with great ability. After the death of Crāsus he collected the scattered forces of the army, with which he kept the enemy in check, and saved the province of Sýria. According to Eutrōpius, he crossed Euphrātes, the El-Frat, and defeated the Parthians in many engagements. At the commencement of the civil war, Cāsius was a tribune of the people, and joined Pōmpeius, under whom he commanded a powerful fleet, with which he destroyed many of Cæsar's ships at Mēssāna, Messina, and would have carried the town, had he not received certain information of the defeat of Pōmpeius at Phārsālia. He afterwards joined M. Pōrcius Cāto in Greece, and went with him into Africa; but, on the news of Pompey's death, he deserted the party of the republic and joined Cæsar. His brother-in-law, M. Jūnius Brūtus, had prevailed on that successful warrior to pardon him, and he was immediately admitted into the favour of the conqueror, who appointed him one of his lieutenant-generals. Various causes have been assigned for his forming, or at least taking an active part in, the conspiracy against Cæsar. An ardent love of freedom and of their country, impelled him and Brūtus to attempt the restoration of liberty by the death of the usurper. To refer their conduct to resentment from their not having obtained the offices of the state which they expected, or at which they aspired, would be an injurious degradation of the character of these two virtuous citizens. Their efforts to support the independence of Rome by force of arms, after the assassination of Cæsar, merit greater praise for the purity of their motives than for the promptitude of their measures. Antōnius and other friends of Cæsar, brought them to a decisive engagement at Philippi, in which Cāsius, who commanded the left wing, was defeated by Antōnius, to whom he had been opposed, and his camp taken. Prevented by the dust from seeing the success of his colleague Brūtus, who led on the right against Augustus, he concluded all was lost; and in despair killed himself with the very weapon which he had employed against the life of Cæsar. Appiānus says that his armour-bearer, Pindārus, put him to death at his own request (Bel.

Civ. 635). Some of the errors into which Brutus fell have been ascribed to the impetuosity of temper, which Cæsius unfortunately possessed. His learning and military knowledge were highly respectable, although there is little doubt that he was greatly inferior to his brother-in-law, both as a scholar and as a soldier. Brutus honoured his body with a very magnificent funeral, and exclaimed over it, that "Cæsius ought to be considered the last of the Romans." Caesar calls him C. Cæsius Adj. Cæssianus, a, um. Cæssiana sententia (Ann. Mar. xxvi. 10).—4. A governor of Syria, who resolved by every method in his power to maintain the strictness of ancient discipline. This severity, in his opinion, became a man, who kept before his eyes the example of his ancestors. Tacitus says he was the most eminent character of the age for his knowledge of the law, and the historian has recorded a speech of his against slaves. From his ancestors he inherited a splendid fortune, which, added to the austerity of his manners, formed under the emperor Nero a sufficient cause for his banishment. His wife Lepida fell a sacrifice to the cruelty of the same prince (Tac. Ann. xii. 11—xvi. 9).

L. Cæsius, L. Cæsi, m. a Roman consul, killed by the Helvetii, who defeated his army, and obliged it to submit to the ignominy of passing under the yoke (Cæs. B. G. i. 7).

L. Cæsius Longinus, L. Cæsi Longini, m. a Roman consul, killed by the Tigurini Galli a people of Helvetia, and his army almost wholly cut off in 109 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 65).

—2. A Roman of senatorian rank who entered into the conspiracy of Cætilina, and engaged to set the city on fire, which the activity of the consul, M. Tullius Cicero, prevented, and he fled before the discovery of the plot (Sal. Cat. 17, 44).

In 68 B. C., he stood candidate for the consulship together with Cætilina, and the canvass of both having failed, he embraced the treasonable designs of his associate, perhaps partly from his disappointment, and suggested most of the horrible atrocities which the traitors intended to perpetrate.

From his extraordinary corpulence, the fatness of Cæsius became a proverbial expression.—3. One of Caesar's officers.—4. A native of Rome, of plebeian extraction, to whom the emperor Tiberius gave Drusilla, a daughter of Germanicus, in marriage. From being married to a grand-daughter of the emperor, Tacitus calls him his progenitor (Ann. vi. 15, 45).

Q. Cæsius, Q. Cæsi, m. an officer in Caesar's army, to whom he gave the command of the south of Spain.

Q. Cæsius Longinus, Q. Cæsi Longini, m. filled the office of city prætor in 169 B. C. (Liv. xiv. 16).—2. A tribune of the people, driven out of Rome with M. Antonius, in 51 B. C., for protesting against a decree of the senate, by which a successor was to be sent to C. Julius Caesar.

By his avarice and cruelty, when prætor, he induced the inhabitants of Corduba and two legions which had been under the command of M. Tereñius Varro, to desert from Caesar's party (Liv. Ep. 109 seq.).

Sp. Cæsius, Sp. Cæsi, m. surnamed Viscellinus in the consular calendar, was thrice elected consul, first with Opter Virgilius Tricostus, in 502 B. C., a second time with Postumus Cominius Auruncus, in 493 B. C., and afterwards with Præcilius Virgilius Tricostus, in 486 B. C.

In his last consulship, two-thirds of their lands having been taken from the Hernici, Cæsius proposed to give the one-half to the Latini, and to distribute the other half among the commons.

To this gift he intended to add some land, which, although the property of the public, was possessed by individuals.

Thus originated the first idea of an agrarian law. His colleague and the patricians opposed these donations, and even declared, that, by this popular measure, he meant to pave the way for arbitrary power.

To recover the esteem of his countrymen, Cæsius next suggested, that the money paid by the people for Sicilian corn should be returned, an offer which they rejected with disdain.

Being condemned on a trial before the people, he suffered death as a traitor, and his house, which stood on what is now, says Livius, the area before the temple of Tellus, was levelled with the ground, in 486 B. C.

Others relate that his father, on enquiry into his conduct, having found him guilty of aspiring at the crown, first scourged him, and then put him to death.

The property of Cæsius, he consecrated to Ceres (Liv. ii. 17—41. Flor. i. 26). Adj. Cæsius, a, um.

Cæsiellanus, i, m. one of the British kings, whose territories lay on the north bank of Tamesis, the Thames, towards the mouth of that river.

On the arrival of the Roman forces in Britain under Caesar, he was, by common consent, appointed commander-in-chief.

After making some attempts to check the progress of the enemy, he was obliged to submit, and accept of such terms as Caesar chose to offer (Cæs. B. G. v. 11 seq.).

Cæstibulum, i, n. a town of Cilicia, of which the site is unknown (Curt. iii. 7). The reading is doubtful. Probably this town is the same with Castabula in Cilicia, which is now called Karabulat.

Cæstalia, æ, f. the daughter of Achelous, who was turned into a fountain of the same name, on Mount Parnassus, Liakura, in Phœcis, now part of Leadiu, a country of Greece.

Near this stream, Pausanias calls it a river, stood Delphi, where was the famous Oracle of Apollo.

Cæstalis, idm, f. of Cæstalia, applied to females or nouns feminine. Hæc (unda) erit Cæstalis (Mart. ix. 19).

From Cæstalia, the muses were called Cæstalides, dum, f. Cæstalides sœurs, the muses (Mart. iv. 14).

Adj. Cæstalius, a, um. Cæstallum antrum, the Castalian, i. e. Delphic, cave (Ov. Met. iii. 14). Cæstalla tellus (Luc. Phar. v. 188).

Cæstallus, i, m. a man born on Parnassus, Liakura, who quitted his native country, settled in Spain, and built a town on Bætis, the Guadalquivir, to which he gave his mother's name Cæstulo, now Cazlena (Sil. Ital. iii. 98).

This is probably a poetical fiction to give celebrity to the birthplace of Imilce, wife of Hannibal.

Cæstianira, æ, f. a beautiful woman of Æsima, who bore Görgythion to Priamus. In form she resembled the goddesses (Hom. Il. viii. 305).

Cæsticus, i, m. one of the Sequani, the son of Catamantaledes, whom Orgetorix persuaded to seize on the sovereignty of the state, which his father had formerly held (Cæs. B. G. i. 3).

Cæstor, Æris, m. a son of Jüpiter and Læda, the wife of Týndarus, and twin brother of Pöllux. According to Hýginus, Cæstor and Clýtēmnēstra were the children of Týndarus, and Pöllux and Hēlēna of Jüpiter. The fiction is, that Jüpiter, under the form of a swan, became the father of these children, and that from one egg sprung Pöllux and Hēlēna, from another Cæstor and Clýtēmnēstra. Cæstor was killed by Idas, on its being known to Pöllux he attacked Idas, whom he defeated, and then buried his brother. Pöllux received a star from Jüpiter, and one was not given to Cæstor, because he was the son of Týndarus. From affection to his brother, Pöllux requested that he might be allowed to share that honour with him, which was granted; and, therefore, he is said to ransom him by alternate death. The Romans preserved the remembrance of this in their exhibitions of horsemanship, each having two horses, and leaping from the one to the other, so that he appeared to discharge a double duty. They formed a part of the crew of the Argo, and were related to Iāson. A. Pōstūmus, dictator, vowed a temple to Cæstor, in 499 B. C., which his son dedicated fifteen years after (Liv. ii. 20, 42). Among the Romans men did not swear by Cæstor; Mecastor was the oath only of women (Gel. xi. 6). Ducat bractēclām de Cæstōre, may draw off the gold plating from Cæstor, i. e. from the statue of Cæstor (Juv. Sat. xiii. 152).—2. A Trojan, one of the soldiers of Ænēas (Virg. Æn. x. 124).

Cæstōrum, C. Didone, a village about twelve miles from Crēmōna, on Sagra, the Sagrian (Tac. Hist. ii. 24). From Suetōnius and Strabo it appears, that it took its name from a temple of Cæstor, ad Cæstōris (ædem v. templum) quod loco nomen est (Suet. Oth. 9). Or perhaps it is the genitive plural of Cæstor applied to both brothers, and templum v. ædes understood.

Cæstra Cōrnēliāna, orum, n. an eminence of considerable height, about a mile distant from Utica, measuring in a straight line. But part of this intervening space was marshy. To avoid the swampy ground, a large circuit was necessary, which lengthened the road to six miles. This rising ground jutted out into the sea, was of difficult access on both sides, and had its name from Pūblius Cōrnēlius Scīpio having at a former period encamped on it.

Cæstra Hērcūlis, a town of Germany, the exact situation of which is unknown. It appears to have been about thirteen miles from Carvo (Amm. Mar. xviii. 2).

Cæstra Pōstūmīāna, orum, n. This place, as the term imports, had its name, most probably, from Pōstūmus having encamped there. It does not appear to have been a town, as it is generally understood, but a small eminence (grunus) on which Cæsar built a fortress. Early in the Spanish war, young Pōmpēus pitched his camp between Ategūa and Ucūbis, in the province of Bætica, within view of both these towns, and Cæsar found means to possess himself of this rising ground, only four miles distant from the camp of Pōmpēus, on which he erected a fortification.

Cæstra Pýrrhi, a peninsula formed by the Surandaporos and Voionaa, in Trīphýlia, in the country of Melōtis. Philippos, king of Mæcēdōnia, reached this place the day after he had been defeated by T. Quinctius Flāminius, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Cæstricius, i. m. a man whom Augustus protected from a prosecution, because he had informed him of the conspiracy of Mūrēna. According to Suetōnius, this is the only pannel whose trial the emperor prevented (Aug. 56).

M. Cæstricius, M. Cæstrici, m. a magistrate of Plācēntia, advanced in years but vigorous in mind. He refused to obey the orders of Cn. Pāpius Cārbo, then consul, who said to him, threateningly, "I have many swords;" to which Cæstricius calmly replied, "And I have many years" (Val. Max. vi. 2).

Cæstricius, i. m. a friend of Mārtialis, to whom he sent an epigram, whilst residing at Baïæ (2 syl.) (vi. 43).

Cæstrum Altum, a place in the province of New Castile, in Spain, remarkable for the death of the great Hāmilcar, about 230 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 41). Perhaps the reading here ought to be Album, which is that of Diōdōrus Sicūlus (xxv. 2).

Cæstrum Inūli, a town in the territory of the Rūtūli, in which Inūus, or Pau, had a temple (Ov. Met. xv. 727).

Cæstrum Mūtulum, Medoli (Liv. xxxi. 2). See Mūtulum.

Cæstrum Nōvum, St. Marinello, a town in Etrūria, Tuscany, to which the Romans sent a colony, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 3).

Cæstrum Sālernum, v. Sālēni, Salerni, Salerno (Cluv.), a town in the territory of the Picēntini, to which the Romans sent a colony in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 29).

Cæstulo, ōnis, f. Cazlona, a town in the south of Hīspānia, Spain, on the right bank of Bætis, the Guadalquivir. Silius Itālicus, probably out of compliment to Imilcē, the wife of Hānnibal, who was a native of this town, derives the name from the grandmother of that princess, and makes Cæstūlius, a native of Pārnaesus, a founder of the town (iii. 99). Cazlona is only a small town, but has the remains of an aqueduct, and some other antiquities of no great importance. Pārnaesia Cæstulo (Sil. Ital. iii. 391). Inh. Cæstulōnēnses, ium, m. Adj. Cæstulōnēnsis, is, e. Cæstulōnēnsis saltus (Liv. xxii. 20).

Cæsus, i. f. an island not far from Scārpāthus (Hom. Il. ii. 676).

Cātābāthmos, i. m. Akabet-Ossolour, a sloping tract of land to the east of Cýrēnāica, commonly called Cātābāthmos Māgnus, to distinguish it from a similar declivity of less extent nearer Egypt. Both are on the coast of the Mediterranean. Sālūstius makes the former the boundary between Egypt and Africa (Jug. 19), and Plinius of Cýrēnāica. From the latter, there appears to have been also a town of this name (i. 545); which the natives, perhaps, never recognized, as the word is evidently Greek, and expressive of the appearance of the country.

Cātādūpi, orum, m. a people living at the cataracts of the Nile (Amm. Mar. xxii. 15).

Cātālauni, orum, m. a people of Gāllia, France, on Mātrōna, the Marne, whose capital was of the same name, now Châlons (Eutrop. ix. 13).

Cātāmāntālēdes, is, m. a nobleman of the nation of the Sēquāni, who, for many years, enjoyed the supreme authority over that people (Caes. B. G. i. 3).

Catāna, æ, v. Cātānē, es, f. Catana, a town of Sicily, near mount Ætna, by the eruptions of which it has been several times destroyed. It was built by a colony from Chalcis, and the ancients reckoned it one of the three most celebrated cities in that island, Panormus and Messāna being the other two. From Catāna Marcellus carried the first sundial to Rome. Modern Catana contains about thirteen thousand inhabitants; and Amēnānus, the Guidicello, which has its source in Ætna, runs through the town. Inh. Cātānēnses, v. Cātīnēnses, ium, m. (Just. iv. 3). Adj. Cātāneus, a, um, et, Cātīnēnsis, is, e. Cātāneus ager (Strab. 388). Cātīnēnsi pumice, from the very finest pumice-stones being found at Catana (Juv. Sat. viii. 16).

Cātānōla, æ, f. part of Cāppādōcia, lying to the north of mount Taurus. Cōrnēlius Nēpos seems to have considered it a separate district, between Cilicia and Cāppādōcia (Dat. 4). This appears likewise to have been the idea of Strābo, although he mentions it as one of the ten parts of Cāppādōcia. According to this geographer, it is an extensive low lying plain, surrounded by mountains, and bearing all sorts of trees except evergreens. Amānus, Al-Lucan, is one of its southern boundaries, and it is watered by Pyrāmus, the Geihoun. He adds that it had no town in the plain, but some fortified places. Inh. Cātānēs, um, m. (Strab. 775).

Cātāpūla, æ, f. a military engine, constructed chiefly for the purpose of throwing javelins. But some have supposed that stones, &c., were discharged from the Cātāpūla, as well as from the Bālīsta, and Josephus' account of the former justifies that opinion. It is certain the force with which missile weapons were thrown from the Cātāpūla, was not much less, if antiquity can be believed, than the tremendous effects of the largest cannon. But this surely does not merit full credit.

Cataractes, æ, m. the Duden-sou, a rapid river of Pamphylia, which falls into the Mediterranean; but Hērōdōtus makes it a branch of Meander, the Meinder, and says it is as large (vii. 26).

Cātēia, æ, f. a spear which Virgilius considers of Teutonic, but others, of Celtic, origin, as the term in that language signifies a fiery dart. From Caesar, it cannot be doubted that such weapons were in use among the Belgians at the time he invaded their country (Virg. Æn. vii. 741. Sil. Ital. iii. 277, &c.).

Cātēnes, is, m. a nobleman of whom Bēssus had a very high opinion, and therefore admitted him an ally in his revolt against Alexander the Great. To that plot he endeavoured to gain over the Bactriāni, and at last fell in battle (Curt. vii. 5).

Cātīa, æ, f. a Roman matron, who appears to have been of dissolute morals (Hor. Sat. i. 2. 95).

Cātīānus, i, m. a Roman, whose name Martialis has transmitted by inscribing an epigram to him (vi. 46).

Cātīāna, æ, f. a woman of abandoned character (Juv. Sat. iii. 133).

Cātīēnus, i, m. a comedian at Rome, who, in the play of Ilionē, by Pacūvius, acted the part of Polydorus, when Fusius performed that of Ilionē. The latter, overpowered by drink, fell so fast asleep that Hōrātius says twelve hundred Cātīēni could not waken him (Sat. ii. 3. 61). This expression may be explained two ways, by supposing Cātīēnus to have very often repeated, "Mater, te appello;" or, what is more probable, by supposing the audience to have joined him, when they observed the other actor drunk and asleep. Cicēro has noticed this part of the play (Tusc. Dis. i. 44).

Cātīlina. See Scrgius.

Cātīlīna, æ, m. a soldier in the army of Scipio Africānus, in Spain, where he killed Nēalces (Sil. Ital. xv. 448).

Cātīllus, v. Cātīlus, i, m. according to Cāto, was an Arcadian, who commanded the fleet of Evānder; according to Sēxtius, he was a native of Argos, which is the opinion of Hōrātius and Virgilius. He was the son of Amphīārāus, who was swallowed up by the earth at the siege of Thēbe. By order of his grandfather, Ecclēus, he held a ver sacrum, settled in Italy, where he had three sons, Tībūrtus, Cōras, and Cātīllus, who, by their united exertion, built the city Tibur, Tivoli, and named it after their eldest brother. Others make him the brother of Tībūrtus and Cōras, and this seems to be the more general opinion, at any rate, this is the Cātīllus mentioned by Virgilius, who killed Iōlus and Hērminius (Æn. xi. 640). Mōnia Cātīli, the walls of Cātīlus, i. e. Tivoli (Hor. Od. i. 18. 2).

Catīvōleus, i, m. king of one half of the Ebūrōnes. He and Ambiōrix, who reigned over the other half of that nation, at the instigation of Indūciōmārus, excited the people to take up arms against the Romans. Having made an unsuccessful attack upon the Roman camp, under the lieutenant-generals Tūtūrus Sābinus and L. Aurūncūleus Cōtta, they demanded a conference, in which Ambiōrix stated, that, from gratitude to Cæsar, he considered himself bound to inform his officers, that all the estates of Gāllia, France, had agreed to attack the Roman camps in one day, that a great body of Germans had crossed the Rhine, and that no time was to be lost in joining Cicēro or Lābiēnus, who were only about 50 miles distant. At the same time, he gave his solemn promise, that they should have a secure retreat through his territories. This artifice, through the folly or cowardice of Sābinus, succeeded. They left their camp, were attacked by a powerful army under Ambiōrix and Catīvōleus, and were almost to a man cut in pieces. Cæsar afterwards completely routed them; and Catīvōleus, from his great age, being unable to bear the fatigues of war, after execrating Ambiōrix, the author of the war, poisoned himself by drinking the juice of the yew-tree (Caes. B. G. v. 24 seq.).

Cātūs Insūber, Cātī Insūbrī, m. an Epicurean, whose death and opinions Cicēro mentions (Epist. ad Fam. xv. 16, 19).

C. Cātūs Vēstīnus, C. Cātī Vēstīni, m. a tribune of the soldiers in the army of M. Antōnius (Cic. Epist. ad Fam. x. 23).

M. Cātūs, M. Cātī, m. an Epicurean philosopher, to whom Hōrātius addresses one of his satires (ii. 4). Much discussion respecting this Cātūs may be seen in the commentaries on Hōrātius. Perhaps the poet invented the character, which he has marked by many discriminating touches, and has, under this name, exposed with great eloquence and humour the follies of the Epicureans. Adj. Cātianus, a, um.

Q. Cātius, Q. Cātī, m. was first a plebeian edile, afterwards a lieutenant-general under C. Claudius Nēro, sent with M. Pōmpōnius Mattho to Dēlphi, carrying a present of immense value from the spoils of Hāsdrūbal, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 6 seq.).

Cātmēlus, i, m. a chieftain of the Gauls, in 180 B. C. (Liv. xli. 1).

Cāto. See Pōrcius.

Cātī, orum, m. the Cattians, a German nation of great bravery, of whom Tacitus has given a detailed account in his treatise on the manners of the Germans (30, 31), and later writers, from the Romans carrying on war in that country. Drusus conquered them in 113 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 138). They lived towards the sources of Visūrgis, the Weser (Claud. xxvi. 420).

Cātūālda, æ, m. a German of high rank, whom Mārōbōdūus unjustly compelled to fly from his country, and by whom Mārōbōdūus was forced to solicit the protection of the Emperor Tiberius. The Hermandurians in turn expelled Cātūālda from the throne, on which he placed himself under the Roman emperor, who fixed his residence at Forum Jūlium, Frejus, in Gallia Nārbonēnsis (Tac. Ann. ii. 62, 63).

Catualci, orum, m. supposed to be written corruptedly in place of Adūātūci q. v.

Cātūlus. See Lūtātius.

Cātūlla, æ, f. an infamous female (Juv. Sat. ii. 49).—2. A woman of great beauty, but of immoral conduct (Mart. viii. 53).

Cātūllus. See Vālērīus.

Cātūllus, i, m. the husband of Bassa (Mart. vi. 69).—2. A man who said that Mārīālis was to be his heir (Mart. xii. 74).—3. A writer of epigrams. Whatever merit his verses may have had in point of language or wit, it appears manifest they were not recommended by purity of sentiment (Mart. ii. 71).

Cātūllus Mēssālīnus, Cātūlli Mēssālīni, m. a man of enormous cruelty, devoid of pity and remorse, a stranger to shame or fear. His loss of sight rendered his savage disposition more horrible, and his person more disgusting. Considering his helpless condition, how revolting to think of his enormous wickedness, which rendered him a fit instrument, in the hand of the Emperor Dōmītiānus, for the extirpation of virtue! An excruciating disease, which admitted neither of cure nor alleviation, brought him gradually down to the grave, and his corporeal pangs bore no proportion to his mental anguish, proceeding from the horrors inseparable from the numerous murders committed through his agency (Juv. Sat. iv. 113. Tac. Agric. 45).—2. A friend of Jūvēnālīs, whom he congratulates on his escape from shipwreck (Sat. xii. 29).

Cātūmāndus, i, m. a Gallic chieftain, who commanded the combined forces which had been raised on purpose to destroy Māssīlia, and to cut off the whole Grecian colony. Terrified in his sleep by a dream, he raised the siege, and made peace with the Massilians, begged permission to worship their gods, and, on seeing the statue of Minērvā, declared it was that goddess who had alarmed him during the night, and by whom he had been ordered to discontinue the blockade (Just. xliii. 5).

Cātūmērus, i, m. a king of the Cattians. He was the maternal grandfather of Itālicus (Tac. Ann. xi. 16).

Cātūrīges, gum, m. a Gallic nation, whom some have placed on Alpes Cōtīa, and others on Alpes Graīa. There is also a difference of opinion respecting their principal city, some supposing it to have been Cātūrīges, Charges, or, Chorges, others Ebrodūnum, Embrun (Cæs. B. G. i. 10).

Cātus, i, m. a man in the Roman army, killed by Bōgus, the Carthaginian augur. Cātus was the first who fell after Hānnībal crossed the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 139).

Cātus Dēciānus, Cātī Dēciāni, m. a Roman governor in south Britain, in the year 61, whose oppression drove the natives to despair. An insurrection ensued, when the Britons put the ninth legion to the rout, on which he betook himself to flight, and passed over into Gallia, France (Tac. Ann. xiv. 32).

Cavarillus, i, m. one of the three noblemen of the first distinction among the Ædūi, who were taken prisoners in that battle, in which Vercingetōrix was totally routed, and brought before Cæsar. After the revolt of Litavicus, Cavarillus commanded the infantry (Cæs. B. G. vii. 67).

Cavarinus, i, m. a nobleman, whom Cæsar, in prejudice of his brother Moritāsus, the reigning sovereign, appointed king over his countrymen, the Sēnōnes, an honour which his ancestors had long enjoyed. The Sēnōnes formed the design of publicly assassinating him, but, having received intelligence of the plot, he saved his life by flying to the camp of Cæsar (Cæs. B. G. v. 54 seq.).

Cauca, æ, f. a town in Spain, to the south of Dūrius, the Douro. Inh. Caucei, orum, m. (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 283).

Caucalanda, æ, f. a town of Sarmātia. Adj. Caucalandensis, is, e. Caucalandensis locus (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 4).

Caucāsus, i, m. a native of Cōlchis, and father of Tēdrus. He had his name from the mountain (Val. Flacc. vi. 641).

Caucāsus, i, m. the horse of Atlas, which ran in the chariot race, for the prize given by Scīpiō Africānus, in Spain, on his conquest of that country (Sil. Ital. xvi. 367).

Caucāsus, i, m. Cocas, a chain of mountains of considerable height, extending between Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, and Māre Cāspium, the Caspian Sea, to which Prōmēthēus was chained, for stealing fire from the chariot of the sun, and a vulture, or eagle, made to prey perpetually on his liver. From his blood, aconitum q. v. was said by some to grow. That poisonous plant being found on Mount Caucasus, probably gave rise to the fiction. Mārīālis reckoned Caucasus in Scythia (xi. 83). Adj. Caucāsus, v. Caucāsus, a, um. Caucāsus triumphus, Amazonian triumph (Stat. Th. xii. 612), from being inhabited by the Amazons, to which the same poet alludes (Th. iv. 394). Caucāsia vālēs, vultures (Virg. B. vi. 42). Pylæ Caucasīa, a strong pass in Iberia.

Cāuci, v. Cāyci, et, Chauci, orum, m. the Chaucians, a German nation, mentioned by Lūcānus. D'Anville places them on Visūrgis, the Weser. Some editors think that the Cāfei are the same with the Cauchi, who lived between Heliom, the Leck, and Flevo, the Yasal, which opinion seems supported by the Cāfei occurring only once in Lucanus; Crispigeri Cāfei (Phar. i. 463). They were conquered by Honōrius (Claud. xviii. 379). Non indignante Cāuco (Claud. xxi. 225).

Caucōnes, um, m. a people of Pāphlāgōnia, who joined the Trojans against the Greeks (Hom. II. x. 429 seq.). Their chief city was Teion. When Strābo wrote, they ceased to exist as a nation.—2. A people of Arcādia, in Pēlōponnēsus, the Mora (Hom. Od. iii. 366).

Caudinus, i, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, killed by Virgilius in the battle at Zāma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 441).

Caudium, i, n. a town of the Sāmnites, a people of Lātium (Liv. ix. 2). Iah. Caudini Sāmnites (Liv. xxii. 41). Adj. Caudinus, a, um. Caudina furecula, Forchic, two deep glens, narrow and woody, joined by continued mountains. Among them lies a plain of considerable extent, inclosed all around, abounding with grass and water, through the middle of which is a road, but before coming at it the traveller must pass through the first defile, and either return along the same way by which he wended into it, or, if he proceed forward, he might effect his escape by the other glen, still more narrow and more difficult. Here the Sāmnites surrounded the Roman army, under the consuls T. Vētrius Cālvinus and Sp. Pōstūmulus, who, to save their lives, were obliged, unarmed and half naked, to pass under the yoke, in 321 B. C. (Liv. ix. 2–6). Caudina eludes, the disaster at Caudium (Tac. Ann. xv. 13). Caudina furca (Luc. Phar. ii. 138). Caudinum fadus (Flor. ii. 18).

Caullianus, a, um (Flor. iii. 10). Here the readings differ greatly; but it is probable the word should either be Caledonianis, or Cassioellani, or Cassioellunum.

Cauii, orum, m. a people of Illyricum (Liv. xlv. 50).

Caulis, is, m. a river of Cāria (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Caulon, ōnis, v. Cañlōnia, v. f. Castel Feteve, a town of the Brūtii, built, according to Strābo, by Achai. Pausanias says, that it was taken and destroyed by the Cāmpāni, in the war with Pyrrius. It must have been rebuilt since it was attacked by the banditti troops which M. Valērius Lævinus had carried against the Brūtii. They surrendered to Hānnibal in 210 B. C. It appears to have been in ruins at the time Plinius wrote.

Caunus, i, m. son of Milētus and Cyānēē, for whom his sister Býblis entertained an unlawful passion, which he rejected with abhorrence, and, on that account, quitted his native country. He settled in Cāria, where he built a city, and called it by his own name (Ov. Met. ix. 452). Adj. Caunius, a, um. Caunus amor, a proverb, expressive of an unlawful desire (Steph.).—2. A Carthaginian, killed by Scipio, the Roman consul, in an engagement between him and Hānnibal at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 233).

Caunus, i, f. Kaignez, a city of Cāria, built by Caunus, son of Milētus and Cyānēē. It stood on the seacoast, had a dockyard and a good harbour; but unhealthy from bad air. Iah. Caunōi, v. Caunūi, orum (Sing. Caunius, i), m. preserved their liberty through the Rhōdi, in 199 B. C., from whom they revolted thirty years after, but were reduced to submission, although they called to their assistance the Cibyrātæ (Liv. xxxiii. 20: xlv. 25). Adj. Caunus, a, um. Cauna (ficus) (Stat. Syl. i. 6. 15).

Caunus, i, m. a mountain in Hispania Tarrāconēnsis (Liv. xl. 50).

Cāyster, et, Cāystros, v. trus, i, m. the Kutchuk-Meinder, i. e. the Little Meinder, a river of Asia Minor, Natolia, which falls into Mære Egæum, the Archipelago, near Ephēsus, opposite to Sāmos. The overflowings of this river form what Virgilius calls Asia pūlus (Æn. vii. 701), and Asia prūta (G. i. 384).

Cēa, v. f. Lango, called also Cos Mērōpē, v. Mērōpis, from Mērops, a king of that island, and Nymphæa, from his wife. It was called Co, v. Cos, from the daughter of that monarch. Plinius says it is a hundred miles in circumference, and fifteen miles distant from Halicarnāssus. See Co, Adj. Cēus, a, um. Cēa naniā, the Cean funeral song, i. e. the mournful strains of Simōnides, who was a native of Cēa (Hor. Od. ii. 1. 38), and hence called Cēus rates (Claud. xlii. 9).

Cebalinus, i, m. brother of Nicōmachus, who discovered to him the plot of Dymnus against the life of Alexander the Great, and requested him to communicate the intelligence to that monarch; by his agency the conspirators were apprehended, and the safety of Alexander secured (Curt. vi. 7).

Cēbēnnæ, v. Gēbēnnæ, arum, et, Gēbēnnæ, v. f. Cevennes, mountains which separated the Hēlyii from the Arvēni, in that part of Provincia now called Languedoc.

Cēbrēnis, is, v. Cēbren, ōnis, m. a river of the Troad, whose daughter Astērōpē (Apol. iii. 12; Hēspēriē, Ov. Met. xi. 769) Æasius married, and bewailed her death in excessive sorrow, on which account he was changed into a water bird. Cēbrēnis, idis, f. of that river, with respect to females or nouns feminine (Stat. Syl. i. 5. 21). See Hēspēriē.

Cēbriones, v. m. a brave warrior in the Trojan army, who succeeded Archēptōlēmus as charioteer of Hector. He was a reputed son of Prīamus, and killed by Pātrōclus (Hom. II. xi. 521 seq.).—2. A giant mentioned by Aristophānes (Av. 554).

Cēcrōpius, i, m. a mountain of Attica (Sil. Ital. ii. 217).

Cēcrops, ōpis, m. was either an Egyptian or of Egyptian descent. He settled in Greece, hence Ovidius calls him Gēminus (Met. ii. 555). According to Iustinus he lived before the time of Dēucālion, and was the first who instituted marriage, hence the ancients represented him double formed (ii. 6). Of the Greeks he was the first who called Jupiter the Supreme, and, in his opinion, it was improper to sacrifice to him any thing that had life (Paus. viii. 2). He founded Athens, from whom that city was called Cēcrōpia, v. f. and the inhabitants Cēcrōpidae, arum (Sing. Cēcrōpides, v. Ov. Met. viii. 559). m. Cēcrōpis, idis, f. Athenian, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Cēcrōpides rates (Ov. Art. Am. i. 172). Mēra Cēcrōpis, a pure Athenian woman, i. e. a woman who spoke pure Greek (Juv. Sat. vi. 186). Adj. Cēcrōpius, a, um, of Cēcrops, Athenian. Cēcrōpia dōmus, the Athenian people Hörätius refers to the family of Pándion, king of Athens (Od. iv. 12. 6). Cecrōpius cōthurius, Athenian buskin; from its having been invented by Æschylus, an Athenian, or from tragedy having been the invention of the Athenians (Hor. Od. ii. 1. 12). Cecrōpia pūella, Minerva (Mart. v. 2). Cecrōpius senez, Socrātes (Mart. x. 33). Cecrōpius mons, Hymētus (Mart. vi. 34). Cecrōpia quērēla, the plaintive notes of the nightingale (Mart. i. 54).

Ceditānus, i, m. a man, to whom Mārtiālis addresses one of his epigrams, of whose life and character nothing is known (viii. 52).

Cedrēl, orum, m. See Arābia.

Cēlādon, ōntis, m. a native of Mēdes, a city of Egypt, hence called Mēdēsēlus, killed by Pērseus (Ov. Met. v. 144).

Cēlādon, ōntis, m. a rapid river of Pēlōponnēsus, the Morea (Hom. Il. vii. 133). Hōmērus frequently uses this word as an adjective.

Cēlena, v. Cēlēna, æ, et, Cēlenæ, arum, f. Sandukli, a town of Phrygia (Plin. i. 625), of which it was once the metropolis. The river Marsya ran through it (Curt. iii. 1). At this town are the sources of the Meander and also of the Catarractes, of the latter the springs are in the square of Cēlenæ (Herod. vii. 26). The inhabitants having removed to a spot not far distant from Cēlenæ, built a new city, which they called Apāmēa, from Apāmēa, the sister of king Sēlēucus (Liv. xxxviii. 13). Alta Cēlena, from its elevated situation (Ov. Fast. iv. 363). Adj. Cēlēneus, a, um. Cēlēnea buxus, from the pipe made of box-wood being the invention of Mārsyas q. v., a native of Cēlenæ (Stat. Th. ii. 666). Cēlēnai fūrōres, the festivals of Cybēlē (Claud. xviii. 278).

Cēleno, ūs, f. one of the Harpies, who, according to Hýginus, were three in number, the daughters of Thaumas and Ozomēnē. Hēsiodus and Apollōdorus mention only two, and make them the children of Thaumas and Electra. Their names are different in different authors. Cēleno possessed the gift of prophecy, of which Virgilius has recorded an instance (Æn. iii. 211 seq.). See Harpia.—2. A rapacious and avaricious person (Juv. Sat. viii. 130).

Cēlētēs, ium, m. a people of Ligūria, who surrendered themselves to the Roman consul, Q. Minūcius Rūfus, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 29).

Cēlēndris, e. Cēlēndēris, is, f. Kelnar, a strong fort in Cilicia (Tac. Ann. ii. 80).

Cēlēneus, eos, m. a judge of the infernal regions, before Æacus, Minos, and Rhādāmanthus, according to some; but others, with more probability, suppose the name to be fictitious, in which Valērius Flaccus seems to have followed, but not copied, a poet of greater antiquity (iii. 406).

Cēlēna, æ, f. a city of Cāmpānia, the site of which is uncertain (Virg. Æn. vii. 739).

Cēler, ēris, m. an architect, who, with Sēvērus, a man of the same profession, formed some magnificent plans to gratify the capricious and changeable taste of the Emperor Nēro. Among other bold projects, the result of a powerful imagination, they promised to form a navigable canal from Avērnus, Lago di Averno, to the mouths of Tiber, the Tevere, over a tract of barren land, and through opposing mountains without water, except one spot, the Pontine marshes. The Emperor began this great undertaking by attempting a tunnel through the mountains near the lake, of which some traces remained visible when Tacitus wrote. The design failed, and even had it been executed, could have been attended with no considerable advantage (Tac. Ann. xv. 42).

P. Cēler, P. Cēlēris, m. a Roman knight, who, with Hēlius, a freedman, collected the revenues of the Emperor Nēro in Asia, and, at the instigation of his mother Agrippina, poisoned M. Jūnius Silānus, the proconsul of that country, with so little caution, that they seemed to disregard secrecy. That province afterwards prosecuted him, and Nēro, unable to oppose the weight of evidence against the criminal, protracted the prosecution until Cēler died of old age. He was a man of enormous wickedness (Tac. Ann. xiii. 1—33).—2. A teacher of philosophy at Rome, who took up the infamous, but gainful, trade of an informer, and betrayed his own pupil Bārēas Sōrānus, whom both the laws of friendship which he affected to explain, and the duty which he owed to his own scholar, bound him to protect. Mūsōnius Rūfus charged him with taking away the life of Bārēas Sōrānus by false evidence, and the ignominious death of Cēler atoned for his violation of one of the most tender ties of society (Tac. Hist. iv. 10—40).

Cēlēres, um, m. the body guard of Rōmulus, first king of Rome, to whom he gave this name, either from Fābius Cēler, who killed Rēmus, or, a celeritate ministerii, from the rapidity with which they performed their duty. Their number amounted to three hundred. Some have supposed that they were afterwards called Flexumines, then Trossuli, and at last Equites. Their commander, tribūnus cēlērum, was next in dignity to the king. Plūtarchus says, that the Cēlēres were dismissed, not after the expulsion of the kings, but by Nūma, an assertion disproved by the fact of Brūtus being tribūnus cēlērum, when the Tāquinii were expelled from the city (Liv. i. 15).

Cēlērina, æ, f. the wife of Pāllādus. Her father was a native of Tōine or Gēta, but her mother appears to have been of noble descent. Stilicho adopted her, hence Claudianus calls him the father-in-law of Pāllādus (xxx. 23).

Cēlētrum, i, n. a town of Mācēdōnia, situated on a peninsula; a lake surrounds the walls, and a very narrow isthmus connects it with the continent (Liv. xxxi. 40). Under the Greek emperors it appears to have been called Cēlēthrum, Castoria (D'Anv.).

Cēlēus, i, m. king of Eleūsis, and father of Triptōlēmus, who entertained Cēres with hospitality and kindness. His name appears also to have been Eleūsis, or Eleūsin. Hýginus accounts for the kindness of Cēres to Triptōlēmus in a different way (147). See Triptōlēmus.

Cēlmis, is, m. an attendant of Jūpiter in his infancy, whom the king of the gods afterwards changed into adamant, because he announced to the world that Jūpiter was mortal (Ov. Met. iv. 282).

Cēlsē, es, f. a town of Phenicia (Amm. Mar. xiv. 7).

Cēlsus Albīnōvānus, Cēlsi Albīnōvāni, m.

was secretary to the Emperor Tiberius. Höratius derides him for his plagiarisms, and addresses to him an epistle, in which he intimates, that he is proud of his elevated situation. From the insinuations of Höratius, Celsus cannot be considered either a very honourable or respectable character (Epist. i. 3. 15: i. 8. 1 seq.).

Celtae, arum, m. the Celts, the most powerful and numerous of all the nations of Gállia, France, who occupied nearly one half of the country, and from whom that division was called Celtica. Ammianus Marcellinus says they were so called from a beloved king, Celtaus q. v., and Gállatae from his mother's name (xv. 9). Under this name Herodotus comprehends all the inhabitants of the western extremity of Europe (iv. 49). Their territories were bounded on the S. by Gárrumna, the Garonne; on the N. by Séquána, the Seine, and Mátróna, the Marne; on the E. by mount Júra; and on the W. by Mære Atlánticum, the Atlantic Ocean. Herodotus considers them the most westerly nation of Europe except the Cynæte (iv. 49). Adj. Celtaeus, a, um. Celtica rura, the lands of the Gauls, i. e. the north of Italy (Sil. Ital. i. 46).

Celtiberia, æ, f. an inland district of Hispania Tarracōnensis, on the south of Ibærus, the Ebro (Liv. xxviii. 1); it anciently included a great part of the north of Hispania, Spain. After the conquest of that country by the Romans, its limits seem to have been much reduced. Inh. Celtiberi, orum (Sing. Celtiber, Æri), m. the Celtiberians, crossed the Pyrenees from Gállia, France, and settled at first on Ibærus, the Ebro; hence their name. They were the most powerful and warlike of all the nations of Spain, called by Florus the strength of that country (ii. 17). Adj. Celtiber, a, um, et, Celtiberus, v. Celtibericus, a, um. In Celtibero exercitu (Liv. xxviii. 2). Celtiber Salo (Mart. x. 20). Celtibera terra (Mart. xii. 18). Celtiberica viras (Plin. v. 22). Celtiberica fides (Val. Max. ii. 6).

Celtici, orum, m. a people of Spain, who lived to the south of Tago, the Tago, and west of Avas, the Guadiana, conquered by D. Júnus Brútus, in 138 B. C. (Flor. ii. 17).

Celtillus, i, m. the father of Vercingetorix, and chief of the Arverni q. v. (Caes. B. G. vii. 4).

Celtus, i, m. son of Hércules and Celtañe, daughter of Brétannus. To Celtus the name of his subjects, Celtae, has been referred (Amm. Mar. xv. 9).

Celýdus, i, m. the Salnich (D'Anv.), or, the Susitza (Hughes), a large river of Epirus, which joins the Voýssa, and falls into the Ionian Sea.

Cenæum, i, n. Lithada, a promontory of Eubœa, Negropont, on which Hércules, after the defeat of Eurýtus, and the taking of his city Echállia, built a temple to Júpiter, hence called Cenæus Júpiter (Ov. Met. ix. 136).

Cenchræa, arum, v. Cenchræa, æ, f. Kechriai (Leake), the port and emporium of Córinthus, Corinth, situated on Sinus Sárōnicus, the Gulf of Egina, forming the eastern boundary of Isthmus, Hexamilæ, as Lechaum did the other on Sinus Córinthiacus, the Gulf of Lepanto. It received the merchandise brought from Asia, and is distant seventy stadia from Corinth (Stat.

Th. iv. 66).—2. A town of the Troad.—3. Of Italy.

Cenchræis, ïdis, f. wife of Cinýras, king of Assýria, by whom she had a daughter, named Smýrna, whose beauty she had the boldness to prefer to that of Vénus, on that account the goddess inspired Smýrna with a detestable passion, which, through the agency of her nurse, she gratified, to the infamy of herself and her father. Ovídius alludes to this history, but, in place of Smýrna, calls the daughter of Cinýras and Cenchræis, Mýrrha q. v. (Met. x. 435 seq.).

Cenchrius, i, m. a river of Iónia, which ran through the Ortygian grove. The Ephesians maintained that Látōna bore Apóllo and Diāna on the banks of this stream (Tac. Ann. iii. 61).

Cenimagni, orum, m. an ancient people of Britain, who, with the Ségontiaci, Ancálites, Bibrœci, and Cassi, followed the example of the Trinobantes, and submitted to Caesar. These nations are supposed to have inhabited the counties of Essex, Middlesex, Norfolk, Hertford, Buckingham, Oxford, and Berkshire (Caes. B. G. v. 21).

Ceno, v. Cēnon, ōnis, f. Nettuno, a town of the Antiates, near Antium, which had a harbour, a dockyard, and a market-place (Liv. ii. 63).

Cenōmāni, orum, m. one of the tribes of the Aulerci, whose country was watered by Lédus, the Lez, and Sárta, the Sarte, two of the northern branches of Lígēris, the Loire. Their chief town was Suindinum, afterwards Cenōmāni, now Mans, at the junction of the rivers Huinc and Sarte. A colony of the Cenōmāni emigrated into Italy, under Eliotivius, and settled in that part of the country possessed by the Libúli, where the cities Brixia and Vērōna afterwards stood. These Gauls were the faithful allies of the Romans, except in two instances, which Livius has recorded. They joined the standard of Hāmīcar, a Carthaginian, in 202 B. C.; but five years after, the consul, C. Cōrnēlius Cēthēgus, triumphed over them (Liv. v. 35 seq.).

Censennia, æ, f. a town of Sāmnium, which the Romans recovered from the Sāmniites, in 306 B. C. (Liv. ix. 44).

Censōres, um (Sing. Cēnsor, ōris), m. Censors, Roman magistrates, whose number, from their first election to the final suppression of the office, was uniformly two. To ascertain, with precision, the value of the fortune which each citizen possessed, and to inspect the morals of their fellow-citizens, formed the principal duty of the censors. Their power, even at first, was very considerable, and their jurisdiction afterwards greatly enlarged. The different departments of this office originally belonged to the consuls: but the increase of the number of citizens, added to foreign wars and domestic contentions, rendered it necessary to relieve the chief magistrates of a part of their duty. Accordingly, in the year 440 B. C., two censors were created at the Cōmítia Cēntūrlata, and at first they held their office during a lustrum, i. e. a period of five years. Like the other higher offices of state, the patricians restricted the election to their own order; and, for many years, the choice fell on the most respectable characters in the commonwealth, chiefly on those of consular dignity. In 350 B. C., C. Mārcius Rūtīlus, a plebeian, obtained the censorship, which was opened to that class of citizens from this date (Liv. vii. 22). In 338 B. C., Q. Pūblius Philo carried a law, that one of the censors must necessarily be elected from the commons (Liv. viii. 12). The censorship, in a few instances, fell on those who had been neither praetor nor consul, and once, at least, two plebeians were elected at the same time. Subsequently to the second Punic war, none enjoyed the honour of being censor who had not previously held the offices both of praetor and consul. Their principal business, as already stated, consisted in registering the property of the citizens, on purpose to ascertain its real value, and to impose a proportionate tax. Each citizen was obliged to give in, on oath, an exact inventory of his effects. A false return subjected the individual to degradation from citizenship, to confiscation of his whole property, and himself to be sold for a slave. In consequence of the Romans being divided into two classes, in proportion to their wealth, it is manifest that the rank of the citizens of Rome would rise and fall, with the increase and diminution of their property. Hence, at each enrolment, some would be raised to higher, and others put down to lower, tribes. This power of the censors enabled them to gratify their friends by elevation, and to mortify their enemies by depression. To let out the public lands and taxes to farmers, to contract for building and repairing public edifices, for paving the streets, making roads, bridges, and aqueducts, also formed part of their duty, although, in latter times, these belonged to the ediles. It has been erroneously supposed, that they possessed the power of imposing new taxes. No supreme court of the state, like the senate, would delegate such a power to any class of magistrates. The censors could not even propose a law, much less enact it, nor expend any part of the public money, without a decree of the senate, ratified by the approbation of the people. As guardians of public morals, their powers were very great; for which reason the censorship was considered as the summit of preferments. They could degrade a senator for improper conduct, which they did, by passing his name in reading over the roll; and a knight, by taking away his horse. The authority of the censors extending only to trivial offences or private misconduct, their punishment did not affect the person of the culprit, but it rendered his character, in some degree, infamous. One censor had the power of annulling the sentence of the other; on which account, if one of them only pronounced the judgment, the disgrace might be removed by his colleague. If both were of the same mind, the effect might be prevented by the decision of a court of law, by the verdict of a jury, by an order of the people, or by an act of the next censors. Unless their sentence proceeded from private enmity, or some other unjustifiable principle, a great degree of scandal still adhered; and the disgraced never regained either private esteem or public approbation. The tribunes of the people could bring the censors to trial even during office, and condemn to imprisonment or death. But no instance of such sentence being carried into effect occurs in Roman history. The censors were elected by the Cōmītia Cēntūrīata, and having immediately taken an oath that they would act according to justice, entered on the functions of their office. At first, they continued in power five years, but afterwards, in consequence of a law passed by Māmercus Aemīlius, when dictator, in 434 B. C., their authority was restricted to eighteen months. If one died in office, another could not be elected in his place, and his colleague was obliged to resign, because it was unlawful to substitute a colleague to a censor (Liv. vi. 27), from Rome being taken by the Gauls during the lustrum, in which M. Cōrnēlius Maluginēnsis was substituted in room of C. Jūlius Iūlus (Liv. v. 31). The office then remained vacant until next election, and the laws did not permit the same person to be twice censor. Towards the end of the commonwealth this office sunk in dignity; and, from the days of Augustus, may be considered as forming part of imperial authority. Adj. Cēnsōrēus, a, um. Cēnsōrēum opus, included punishing of farmers for having their lands in bad order, not ploughed or clean, their vines and trees undressed; the expression was erariūm faciebant, i. e. deprived of the right of voting and citizenship, and paid taxes as a tribute. They branded a knight with impōlītia, i. e. incuria, for having his horse lean, or any way neglected (Gel. iv. 12).

Cēnsōrīnus, i, m. an officer and intimate friend of Crassus. Both he and Mēgābāchus fell in battle with the Parthians (Ap. Bel. Par. 145).

Cēnsus, ūs, m. was a general review of the people, estimating their estates, and proportioning their share of the public taxes. Every man was obliged to give in to the censors his own name, residence, and occupation, his wife's name, and the names of his children, with their ages, the number of his slaves, and a minute and accurate account of his property. The goods of the person who made a false return were confiscated, and he himself, after being scourged, was sold for a slave. By that act he had, in the opinion of the state, deemed himself unworthy of the privileges and honours of a Roman citizen. Sērvius Tūllius, the sixth king of Rome, appointed the Cēnsus, in order to ascertain the number of men able to bear arms, and the amount of the whole property possessed by the citizens, and consequently what sums could be levied from them. It was held in the Cāmpus Mārtius, where the censors, seated in curule chairs, attended by their clerks and public officers, commanded the citizens to be called before them, each in his own tribe. If nothing immoral or improper could be charged against a senator or knight, they passed without remark; but if otherwise, the senators were expelled the senate, and the public horse taken from the knight. The other citizens were raised to a higher tribe, if their wealth had increased, or sunk to a lower tribe, if diminished; improper conduct deprived them of their right of voting, or subjected them to be taxed like strangers. A minute register of the whole was kept, and must have been of great advantage to the whole community, as determining with precision, not only their number, but also their wealth. It ought to have been held at the end of every five years; but it is manifest from Roman history, that this period was not pointedly observed. At the end of this survey of the people, they were ordered to attend a lustration, or purification, called, from sacrificing a cow, a sheep, and a bull, Suocentaurilia. The precedence at this sacrifice was decided by lot, and he on whom the lot fell, was at the conclusion said, lustrum condere, seldom, perficere. See Classis.

Centauri, orum (Sing. Centaurus, i), m. according to Hyginus, were the sons of Ixion by a cloud, which he supposed to be Juno. Others say, that they were the children of Centaurus, son of Apollo, by Stilba, daughter of Peneus, the Salampria, and others of Pindarus by Mares. Of the origin of these imaginary beings, there are various other accounts, consequently all equally fabulous. Their name has been attempted to be explained by stating, that Ixion was the first in Greece who aspired at the honour of a kingdom, that he had a hundred horsemen, who were called Centauri, quasi centum armati. Hence the idea of their uniting the body of a man with that of a horse. From the fiction of their origin and form, they are called nubigena and bimembres (Virg. Æn. viii. 283). Adj. Centauræus, et, Centauricus, a, um. Centauræi enses, the swords of the Centaurs (Virg. Cu. 28). Centauræa risa cum Lapithis, the combat of the Centaurs with the Lapithæ (Hor. Od. i. 18. 8). Centauræa lustra (Stat. Ach. i. 266).

Centēnus, i, m. a man who raised a number of peasants, and attacked Hannibal on his march after he had left Capua. His life atoned for this rash and inconsiderate measure (Sil. Ital. xii. 463).

C. Centēnus, C. Centēnū, m. a prætor sent by the consul Cn. Servilius, with four thousand horse, to aid the consul C. Flaminius. On hearing of the battle at Trasimēnus, the Lake of Perugia, he marched into Umbria, on purpose to avoid Hannibal, who put him and his troops to the sword, in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 8). Cornēllus Nepos mentions, that he had picked men under his command, and that he had taken possession of a forest. This circumstance, added to what Livius has recorded, suggests the idea of extreme timidity, rather than of Roman valour (Cor. Nep. Han. 4).

M. Centēnus, M. Centēnū, m. surnamed Pentula, a centurion of the first rank, and distinguished among that class of officers, was remarkable both for the size of his person, and the greatness of his courage. The period of his service being completed, he was introduced by P. Cornēllus Silla into the senate, in 214 B. C., where he proposed to employ the stratagems of the Carthaginians against themselves, and only requested four thousand men. To this foolish proposal the senate, with equal folly, agreed, doubling the number of troops which he required. In the first engagement with Hannibal, scarcely one thousand escaped, and Centēnus was left among the slain (Liv. xxv. 19).

Centōbrica, æ, f. See Contrōbia. Inh. Centōbricenses, ium, m. (Val. Max. v. 1).

Centōres, um, m. a Scythian nation mentioned by Valērius Flaccus (vi. 151), whom some have supposed to be the same with the Candæ of Ptolemy (i. 662). Although the latter seem to have lived nearly in the country of the former, it would require clear evidence, not mere conjecture, to justify the assertion, that they were the same people.

Cēntrites, is, m. the Bedlis, or, Bedlis, an eastern branch of Tigris, the Dejlah.

Cēntrōnes, um, m. a nation of Gallia, France, in Alpes Graie, who, along with the Graiocelli and Catūriges, were defeated by Cæsar in several engagements. Their chief city was called Fōrum Claudii Cēntrōnum, Centron (Cæs. B. G. i. 10 seq.). Adj. Cēntrōnius, a, um.

Cēntrōnius, melius Cētrōnius, i, m. a builder, or rather an architect, who spent his whole fortune in constructing splendid palaces, of which his poverty did not at last allow him to inhabit one (Juv. Sat. xiv. 86).

Centūrie. See Classis.

Centūrio, ōnis, m. a centurion or commander of a hundred men, from which the word is derived. This office, in some measure, corresponded to that of captain in the British army. In one respect, however, there was a remarkable difference. The only distinction among our captains, is that of seniority; they have no authority over each other. But the constitution of the Roman legion admitted of a gradation from the lowest centurion of the Hastati, up to the first of the Triarii, who was called Prīmipilus q. v., or princeps, primus centurio, i. e. princeps primæ centuriæ. To the first captaincy the meanest common soldier might aspire. Promotion in the Roman army could only be obtained by merit; appointments by purchase were unknown. This wise regulation produced the happiest effects. Besides, each cohort having six centurions, and consequently each legion sixty, opened a wide field for promotion, and afforded numerous excitements to valour and heroism. A vine rod (vitis) was the badge of a centurion, with which he punished the soldiers for lighter offences, to which Juvēnalis alludes (Sat. viii. 247), and Silius Italicus (vi. 43). Centūriōnātus, ūs, m. the office of a centurion (Val. Max. iii. 2). Subcentūrio, ōnis, m. the deputy of the captain; a lieutenant (Liv. viii. 8).

Centūrio Crispinus, Centūriōnis Crispini, m. the man who killed with his own hand Fōntēus Cāpito, and expiated with his own blood that atrocious action, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 58).

Centūrīpæ, arum, f. Centorpe, or, Centorbe, a town of Sicilia, Sicily, at the foot of mount Ætna (Sil. Ital. xiv. 204). Inh. Centūrīpini, orum, m. (Plin. i. 345).

Cēos. See Classis.

Cēphallēnia, æ, f. Cefalognia, or, Cefalonia, an island in the Ionian Sea, anciently called Sami and Epīrus Nigra or Melena, about one hundred and twenty miles in circumference. It had a cognominal town, now called Borgo. The climate is warm, the soil is fertile, and its modern population about sixty thousand. It surrendered without resistance to M. Fulvius Nobilior, the Roman consul, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 28).

Cēphālōdis, is, f. v. Cēphālōdium, i, n. Cefalu, a town on the northern seacoast of Sicilia, Sicily, which had this name from being built on the top of a steep rock, having the appearance of a promontory, on which the fort or castle still remains, strongly secured by nature. The situation of the town, nearly a mile in circumference, is not so elevated. Cēphālōdīas, ādis, f. of Cēphā- lōdīas ora (Sil. Ital. xiv. 252). Inh. Cē- phālōdītāni, orum, m. (Cic. Ver. Act. ii. lib.

✓ See head "Hippodamiae"

ii. 52).

Cēphālōnēsus, i. f. a town which stood on the wooded banks of Bōrysthēnes, the Dnieper, according to Ptolēmaeus, and Ammianus
Mārcellinus (xxii. 8).

Cēphālus, i. m. the son of Dēlōnēs, king of Thessaly, and Diōmēdē, was the husband of Prōcris, daughter of Erechthēus king of Athens. Aurōra, wife of Tithōnus, attempted to violate his conjugal fidelity, and, finding him inflexible, insinuated that his wife's behaviour was of a laxer kind. See Prōcris. After a reconciliation had taken place, Prōcris, suspicious of Aurōra, followed Cēphālus to the hunting, who one day hearing, in the woods, a rustling in a bush, in which Prōcris had concealed herself, supposing it to proceed from a wild beast, drew an arrow and shot her through the heart. She died in his arms, declaring that she had fallen a victim to groundless jealousy (Hyg. 189). Ovidius has also narrated her fate (Met. vii. 842 seq.).

Cēphālus, i. m. a prince of the Mōlōssi, who suddenly revolted from the Romans at the commencement of the war with Persēs, king of Mācēdōnia, in 171 B. C., and was of great advantage to that prince. He was killed at Tecmon two years after (Liv. xliii.
18 seq.).

Cēphēnes, um, m. the name once given to the Persians by the Greeks (Herod. vii.
61).

Cēphēus, ēos, v. ei. m. son of Alēus, was, according to Apollōdōrus, a descendant of Pelāgius. He was by birth an Arcadian, and there appears to have been another Arcadian of the same name, son of Iāsīus, who was hence called Iāsīdes. The former assisted Hērclēs in killing the Erymanthian boar, and was one of the Argonauts (Val.
Flacc. i. 375).—2. The son of Phœnix, and king of Æthiōpiā. He married Cāsiōpē,
v. Cāsiōpēa, who had the boldness to assert, that she and her daughters were more beautiful than Jūno and the Nereids. Nēptūnus, to avenge this insult, sent a horrible monster to desolate the country. To appease the fury of that god, Cēphēus and Cāsiōpē were compelled to allow their daughter Andrōmēda to be bound to a rock, and exposed to the monster, which Persēs killed. After their death, Cēphēus, Cāsiōpē, and Andrōmēda, were changed into adjoining constellations of the same names, in the northern hemisphere. Some have rashly asserted that he was one of the Argonauts, which is impossible, since he was contemporary with Persēs, great-grandfather of Hērclēs, who sailed in that celebrated expedition. There was an Argonaut of this name, son of Alēus.
Cēphēis, īdis, f. a patronymic of Andrōmēda (Manil. i. 426). From him the Ethiopians were anciently called Cēphēnes, um, v. Cēphēni, orum. Adj. Cēphēus, et.
Cēphēnus, a. um. Cēphēia arva, the country of the Ethiopians (Ov. Met. iv. 668). Cē- phēni procēres, the nobles who frequented the court of Cēphēus.

Cēphisos, v. us, i. m. the Maeroneri, a river of Greece, which takes its rise at Līlāa in Phocis, and, passing considerably to the north of Dēlphī, enters Bōtōtia, where, being augmented by several tributary streams which come from the mountains, after a winding course of many miles, it falls into Cōpāis, the Lake of Topolias. Lūcānus says its waters were prophetic, probably from its sources being at no great distance from Dēlphī,

Castri, or from its flowing near that town (Phar. iii. 175). Its course is more rapid through the territory of Elēusis than in any other place. A tradition prevailed among the Bōotians, that this river ran under the mountains into the sea, and that Hērclēs turned it into the plain of the Orchōmēnī (Paus. i.
38 seq.). Cēphēsius, ādis, et. Cēphēsis, īdos, f.
of Cēphēsius, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Cēphēsius ora, the coast of Attica (Ov. Met. vii. 438). Cēphēsidēs undae, the waters of the Maeroneri (Ov. Met. i.
369). Cēphēssis, īdis, f. another name of Cōpāis lūcus (Paus. ix. 24. Hom. Il. v. 709), which Dodwell says is now called Agion, by way of eminence. Adj. Cēphēsius, a. um.
Cēphēsius, Nārcissus, the son of Cēphēsius
(Ov. Met. iii. 351).

Cērāmbus, i. m. a man changed into a winged beetle before the flood, by which means he escaped destruction from that calamity (Ov. Met. vii. 333).

Cērāmnus, i. m. a Scythian commander, who fought against the Argonauts, and was killed by Argus (Val. Flacc. vi. 550).

Cērānus, i. f. a city on the western coast of Asia Minor. Adj. Cērānicus, a. um.
Cērānicus Sinus (Herod. i. 174).

Cēras, v. f. a promontory on Prōpōntis, upon which was erected a lighthouse. Cērātas,
v. m. a cold wind which blew from this promontory (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Cērāsta, arum, m. a people of Cyp̄rus, who sacrificed their guests to Jūpter, for which Vēnus transformed them into horned bulls, whence their name is derived. Cērāstis, īdis,
f. a name of Cyp̄rus, probably from the number of its promontories, and these bearing some resemblance to horns, in which this fiction may have originated (Ov. Met. x. 223.
Plin. i. 613).

Cērāsus, i. f. Keresoun, a town of Pōntus, on the coast, from which Lūcūllus brought cherries first into Italy, which the Latins called by the name of the town (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Cēraunī (sc. Mōntes), orum, m. et. Cē- raunīa, orum, n. also Acrocēraunīa, orum, v.
Acrocēraunium, i. n. Kimarra, mountains in Epirus, Lower Albania, so called from being often struck with lightning. From them rocks stretched far out into the sea, which often proved fatal to ships; on which account Hōrātius has Acrocēraunīa infāmes scopūlos, which rise into fine pointed forms, apparently at least four thousand feet high, bare and barren except towards the bases, which are feathered with wood, chiefly fir. They extend along the coast for several miles, from nearly opposite Corcēra, Corfu, to Dyrrāchium, Durazzo. They are called at present τὰ χρυμακὰ τὰ βόνα, a name probably derived from Chimera, which Plinius says was a castle on the Acroceraunian mountains, above the fountain of Aqua Rēgia. Pliny calls mount Taurus, Cēraunus; and Pom. Mela mentions mountains in Asia, opposite Mārē Cāspium, v. Hērcaenum, the Caspian Sea, which were known by the name of Cēraunī. He must certainly have meant mount Caucasus, Hindoo Khoo.

Cēraunus, i, m. (i. e. the Thunderer), son of the tyrant Clearchus, who gave him this name in contempt of the gods (Just. xvi. 5).

Cērbērus, i, m. a dog which Plūto set to watch the gate of the Infernal Regions, to prevent the living from entering, and the dead from escaping, hence Virgilius calls him Tartāreus custos (Æn. vi. 395). He had three heads, hence, tria Cērbērus extulit ora (Ov. Met. iv. 449); and the foam of his mouth was poisonous (Ov. Met. iv. 500). Hōmērus gives him no proper name, says Pausanias; but the moderns call him Cērbērus (iii. 25). Adj. Cērbēreus, a, um. Cērbēreum os (Ov. Met. iv. 500). Cērbērea fauces (Lucr. iv. 137).

Cērcāphus, i, m. a son of Sol and Rhōdo, who built Rhodus.

Cērcāsōrum, i, n. El Aksas, a town of Egypt, at which the Nile divides into two branches (Herod. ii. 15).

Cērcēte, arum, m. a people who lived on the northern coast of the Black Sea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Cērcētius, i, m. a mountain of Thessaly, on which the Roman consul T. Quinctius Flāminius encamped, and to which he ordered Amyñāder to come into Thessaly with his auxiliaries, whom the consul wanted as guides rather than as soldiers, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 14).

Cērcīna, æ, f. Kerheni, a small island in the Mediterranean Sea, near the African coast, to the north of Sýrtis Minor, the Gulf of Kades. In ancient times the inhabitants must have been in the possession of considerable wealth, since they paid to C. Sērvilius Gēminus, the Roman consul, ten talents of silver, to prevent his desolating the island, in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 31).

Cērcīnium, i, n. a city of Thēssālīa, Thessaly, taken, in 202 B. C., by Amyñāder and the Etōli, who burned it, slew a great number of the inhabitants, and carried off both freemen and slaves along with the rest of the booty (Liv. xxxi. 41).

Cērcius, i, m. the charioteer of Pollux (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). See Amphitus.

Cērcōpes, um, m. a very fraudulent nation of Ljēdia, distinguished for malicious cunning. From their artful impostors had the name of Cērcōpes. They promised assistance to the king of the gods against his father, but, having received the money, they refused their help, for which, and for their other crimes, he transformed them into apes (Ov. Met. xiv. 92).

Cercopithēcus Panerōtes, Cercopithēci Panerōtis, m. a usurer, whom the Emperor Nēro enriched with estates both in town and country, and to whom he gave a funeral in pomp and splendour little inferior to that of princes (Suet. Ner. 30).

Cērcūrus, i, m. an Asiatic ship, very long, swift, and tailed, whence the name. Others think the reading should be Coregræus, and suppose it to be a kind of flyboat invented by the Cyprians, but built by the Corcyreans (Liv. xxiii. 34).

Cērcūsum, i, n. Alchabur, a fort in Mēsōpōtāmia, at the junction of the Abōra with the Euphrātes, built by Diōclētianus (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 5).

Cērcyon, ōnis, m. a son of Nēptūnus and Alōpē, who excelled in wrestling. He compelled strangers to engage with him in that exercise, and killed all whom he overcame. Theseūs surpassed this wrestler, whom he deprived of life, to the great joy of the country. Hyginus makes him a son of Vūlcānus (38). Adj. Cērcyōnēus, a, um. Cērcyōnēa corpōra (Ov. Ib. 412).

Cērciātes, um, m. a people of the Ligures, who surrendered themselves to the Roman consul, Q. Minūcius Rūfus, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 29).

Cērdūbēllus, i, m. a Spaniard, who advised the inhabitants of Cāstūlo to surrender to the Romans, in consequence of a quarrel between them and the Carthaginians under Hīnūlco, in 208 B. C. The town was at that time besieged under L. Mārcius, after the conquest of the Carthaginians in Spain (Liv. xxviii. 19, 20).

Cērcālis Anicius, Cērcālis Anicii, m. a consul elect, who moved in the senate, that a temple should be erected at the public expense to deify Nēro. His name does not appear in the consular calendar, although mentioned by Tacitus as elected to that office, in the year 65. The same historian states, that he was sentenced to die in the following year, that he despatched himself, and that he fell unlamented, because he had discovered a conspiracy to Cālgūla (Tac. Ann. xv. 74: xvi. 17).

Cēres, ēris, f. (the Isis of the Egyptians), the goddess of grain and husbandry, was the daughter of Sātūrnus and Vēsta. By Jūpiter she had a very beautiful daughter, Prōsērpina, whom Plūto carried away, as she was gathering flowers at Enna, in Sicīlia, Sicily, where Cēres is said first to have discovered grain. Grieved for the loss of her daughter, Cēres, having lighted, according to some, two pines (Ov. Fast. iv. 493), two cypresses (Claud. xxxvi. 376), or, according to others, two torches (hence called tadifera Dea, Ov. Fast. iii. 786) at Mount Ætina, sought her over the whole world, and was at last informed of her fate, in one place, Ovid says, by the Sun, and, in another, by the river Arēthūsa, which had, when gliding under ground below the sea, observed Prōsērpina in the Infernal Regions. The goddess instantly flew to heaven in her chariot drawn by two dragons, and requested Jūpiter would cause her to be restored. With this request Jūpiter complied, on condition that Prōsērpina had eaten nothing in the Infernal Regions. But, some say, Mercury, and others, Ascālāphus, informed Plūto that she had tasted some pomegranates, by which, according to the laws of fate, her constant residence on earth was rendered impracticable. Jūpiter, commiserating Cēres' excessive grief, ordered Prōsērpina to remain six months annually with her mother, and the rest of the year with her husband in the Infernal Regions. To Cēres the ancients offered a pregnant sow, because that animal is most injurious to corn-fields. The poppy was sacred to her, which she held in one of her hands, and a lighted torch in the other. On her head she wore a garland of ears of corn. Sometimes she is seen riding on the back of an ox, holding a hoe, with a basket of flowers in her left arm; and sometimes she rides in a chariot drawn by dragons. Cēres is often put for corn. Cērcālis, is, e, of Cēres. Adj. Cērcālis, is, e, of Cēres. See mina Cērēālia, the seeds of Cēres, i. e. grain (Ov. Met. i. 123).

Cērīālis Pēñlius, Cērīālis Pētīlī, m. an officer of distinguished merit, who commanded the ninth legion in Britain, and afterwards joined Vēspsāsiānus, to whom he was allied, during the contest between the latter and Vītēllius. At the head of a thousand horse, he had orders, at Otrīcūlum, Otricoli, to enter Rome, by rapid marches through the country of the Sabines; but neither he nor the troops displayed great ardour or bravery on that occasion, and met with a considerable defeat. Appointed, with Annīus Gallus, to command the German armies, he had no sooner reached Māgōntiācum, Mentz, than he harangued the troops, and his manly eloquence having inspired them with new ardour, he ordered that they should hold themselves in readiness for action, being impatient to strike a sudden blow. His activity, judgment, and bravery gained a complete victory over the Trēviri. The same promptitude did not mark his conduct, when Cīvīlis and Clāssicus wrote him, intimating that Vēspsāsiānus was dead, and making proposals to which he made no answer, but sent the letters to Dōmītiānus. This inaction allowed the barbarians to assemble in great numbers; still his military knowledge redeemed his character, for he both defeated the enemy and took their camp. Soon after, Dōmītiānus tampered with Cērīālis, and proposed certain conditions, which the latter had the wisdom to decline. The genius of Cērīālis prompted him to battle, and by rapid marches he followed Cīvīlis, who had recruited his army in Germany, and, although the hostile army made their charge with almost resistless fury, Roman bravery at last prevailed. Fortune in every instance repaired the errors into which he fell by his excessive rapidity, over anxiety, or neglect of discipline. These defects in the character of a commander-in-chief brought his army frequently to the very verge of destruction, and exposed his own life or liberty to imminent danger. Still success crowned his enterprises, and after this victory he overran the whole of Bātāvīa. Agricōla served under Cērīālis in Britain, when he succeeded Vētīus Bolānus, as governor of that island. At that time, Tācītus describes him as of consular rank. His victory over the Brigāntes raised his fame to a very high degree of military celebrity, and, considering the battles which he had fought, and the conquests which he had made, justice must allow him a distinguished place among Roman commanders (Tac. Ann. xiv. 32—Agric. 17).

Cērillē, arum, f. Cērillī, orum, m. Cērillō, a maritime town of Itālia, Italy, in the territory of the Brūtīi on their western coast (Sil. Ital. viii. 579).

Cērīnthus, i, m. a youth of great elegance of form and personal accomplishments, at whom Hōrātīus sneers, because he only paid attention to ladies of great wealth, or of high rank (Sat. i. 2. 81). Sūlpīcia, daughter of Sērvīus, had a strong attachment to him, although he had for his rival the celebrated Mēssala. His name occurs often in the elegies of Tibullus.

Cērīnthus, i, f. Zero, a town of Eubœa (Ap. Bel. Mith. 199).

Cērīus Sēvērus, Cērīi Sēvēri, m. a military tribune, who, during the commotion excited by Otho in order to raise himself to the empire, attempted with two others to produce tranquillity, but without success (Tac. Hist. i. 31).

Cērñē, es, f. an island off the coast of Ethiopia, of which neither its extent nor its distance from the continent is known. Ancient authors differ greatly respecting its situation. Some modern geographers suppose it to have been the island now called Madagascar; others, perhaps with greater probability, consider it the ancient name of Suana off the coast of Morocco (Plin. i. 745). The former does not appear to have been the idea of Cōrnēlius Nēpos (Frag. viii. 5).

Cērētāni, orum, m. a people of Hispānia, Spain, whose country was watered by Sicōris, the Segre, a northern branch of Ibērus, the Ebro (Sil. Ital. iii. 357). Athēneus reckons them the greatest nation in Spain, and adds that they contended with the Cantabrians for the supremacy. Adj. Cērētānus, a, um. Cērētāna massa (Mart. xiii. 54).

Cērīnus Jubēllius, Cērīni Jubēllī, m. surnamed Taurēa, a native of Campānia, who surpassed all his countrymen in horsemanship. He joined Hānnībal, and challenged Claudius Asēllus to single combat, which, with the permission of the consul, the latter accepted. After the first onset, Cērīnus Jubēllius Taurēa, finding himself inferior to his opponent, evaded by a stratagem the combat, and escaped. He is the person mentioned by Līvius under the name of Jubēllius Taurēa (xxiii. 8). When Q. Fūlvīus Flāccus, the proconsul, was rising from his seat at Cīles, Calvi, after he had put to death twenty-five senators of Cāpūa, who had been sent thither, Jubēllius, having made his way through the city and the crowd, called upon the proconsul by name, and requested that he would also put him to death, "that you may" says he "boast of having killed a braver man than yourself." Fūlvīus having read the letter from the senate, which he had kept unopened till he had glutted his vengeance on the senate of Cāpūa, told him that he had not power to comply with his request, on which Jubēllius told him that he had put to death his wife and children with his own hand, and that since death like the rest of his countrymen was denied him, that he must seek it from his own resolution, on which he stabbed himself and fell lifeless at the feet of the proconsul (Liv. xxiii. 46 seq.). Silius Itālicus relates the combat between Cērīnus Jubēllius Taurēa and Claudius Asēllus in a manner somewhat different (xlii. 143—371).

Cērīmā, æ, f. a very strong town of Cēltiberīa, which surrendered to the Roman proprætor, Tib. Sēmprōnius Grāciūus, in 181 B. C. The deputies from this town, who came out to the proprætor, showed the most pristine simplicity of manners and sentiment, which, however, did not exempt them from an exaction of two million four hundred thousand sesterces, and forty horsemen of the highest rank to serve in the army in name of hostages, but, in reality, as a pledge of their fidelity (Liv. xl. 47). Inh. Cērīmēnses, ium, m.

Cērīs, is, acc. im, m. the name given to Bætis, the Guadalquivir, by the natives (Liv. xxviii. 22).

Cervarius Proculus, Cervarii Proculi, m. a Roman knight, who entered into the conspiracy against the Roman emperor, Nero, and he owed his preservation solely to the treachery which he employed against his friends and associates (Tac. Ann. xv. 50—71).

Cerulus, i. m. a freedman of the Emperor Vespasianus. Having acquired great wealth, in order to evade the exchequer he wished to be considered freeborn, assuming the name Laches (Suet. Vesp. 23).

Cerynæa, æ, f. a town and mountain of Arcadia. From the latter issues the river Cerynites, æ, m. (Paus. vii. 25).

Cesellus Bassus, Cesellii Bassi, m. a Carthaginian, of a crazed imagination, who believed in the reality of whatever had occurred to him in a dream. This man arrived at Rome, and by means of his wealth, gained admission to the emperor, Nero, to whom he had an important secret to communicate, and whom he persuaded that a cavern of astonishing depth in his own estate, contained immense stores of gold, not coined but in ingots, which lay in prodigious heaps in one part, and, in others, columns of gold rose to an astonishing height. To render the story more probable, he pretended that Dido deposited her whole riches in the earth, that it might neither prove the bane of her new colony, nor excite the avarice of the Numidian princes. Nero, thinking himself certain of an immense treasure, reserved, during so many ages, for adorning his reign, drained the public treasury in confidence of obtaining this inexhaustible supply; and being at last disappointed he seized on the effects of the poor visionary, who, after fruitless attempts to discover the opening of the cavern, recovered his senses and put himself to death, in order to avoid the displeasure of the emperor (Tac. Ann. xvi. 1—3).

Cesennia, æ, f. a woman who brought her husband a large dowry (Juv. Sat. vi. 136).

Cessei, orum (Sing. Cesseus, i. m. a Scythian nation, who fought against the Argonauts. Adj. Cesseus, a, um. Cesseca mænus (Val. Flacc. vi. 130).

Cestius Gallus, Cestii Galli, m. a governor of Syria, who, in several unsuccessful battles, attempted to crush the spirit of revolt in that country (Tac. Hist. v. 10).

Cestius Proculus, Cestii Proculi, m. a man prosecuted for extortion, and acquitted, in the year 56 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 30).

Cestius Severus, Cestii Severi, m. a notorious informer in the reign of the emperor Nero (Tac. Hist. iv. 41).

C. Cestius Gallus, C. Cestii Galli, m. a Roman, who, in the senate, delivered some excellent sentiments on the spirit of defamation then prevalent in Rome. Under the emperor Tiberius he obtained the office of consul with M. Servilius Rufus in the year 35 (Tac. Ann. iii. 36—vi. 31).

Cestrinæ, es, f. Cestrini, a district in the west of Greece, near the sources of Achæron.

Cestrōsphēndōna, æ, v. ē, es, f. (Cestrōsphēndōnē, Greek), a dart, two palms in length, fixed to a shaft half a cubit long, and of the thickness of a man's finger, round which, for balancing it, were fastened three feathers, like an arrow. In the middle of the sling, from which it was thrown, were two beads, unequal in size, and in the length of the strings. The weapon balanced in these, the slinger whirled round with the longer sling; when thrown, it flew with the rapidity of a bullet. The Macedonians invented it, in 173 B. C., at the commencement of their war with the Romans, under king Persæus (Liv. xlii. 65).

Cethægus, i. m. a vallant Rutulian, killed by Æneas (Virg. Æn. xii. 513).—2. A surname of an ancient branch of the clan Cornelli. See Cornelius.

Cethægus Labeo, Cethēgi Labeōnis, m. an officer in the Roman army in the year 23 (Tac. Ann. iv. 73).

Ceto, ūs, f. daughter of Pōntus and Terra, who married Phōrcys, by whom she became the mother of the Gorgons (Apol. i. 2. Val. Flacc. ii. 317). In Vālērīus Flaccus, the good copies read Tēthys, which the sense requires.

Cetra, æ, f. a shield or target made of leather, very light, and of a circular form. Salmon and Ainsworth make it a short square shield; but Nōnnius, who is a much higher authority than either, maintains it was round. The Spaniards in the southern part of Spain, and afterwards the Moors, used it. According to Tācītus it also formed a part of the defensive armour of the ancient Britons (Vit. Ag.). To these nations, and a few others, that kind of shield seems to have been peculiar. Adj. Cetrātus, a, um, armed with a target. Cetrāti, orum, m. Spanish soldiers; natives of Spain. Cetrāta cōhōrtes, Spanish native cohorts.

Cetrius Sēverus, Cetrii Sēveri, m. a military tribune in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 31).

Cetrōnius, i. m. (Juv. Sat. xiv. 86). See Centrōnius.

Cetrōnius Pisānus, Cetrōnii Pisāni, m. a prefect of the camp, whom Vālērīus Festus loaded with chains, because he had been the friend of L. Piso (Tac. Hist. iv. 50).

C. Cetrōnius, C. Cetrōnii, m. the commander of the first legion in Lower Germany at the time the troops under Gērmanicus revolted in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 44).

Cēvenna, æ, v. Cēvennae, et, Gēbēnnæ, arum, f. Cevennes, a chain of mountains in Gallia, France, which separated the Helvii from the Arvērni, in that part of Prōvincia now called Languedoc (Cæs. B. G. vii. 8).

Cētrōnēs, um, m. a people of Gallia Belgica, subject to the Nērvii. It is probable their country lay between Scāldis, the Scheld, and the shore of Frētum Britānnicū, the British Channel (Cæs. B. G. v. 39).

Cēyx, Cēycis, m. the son of Lūcifer (hence called Sidēreus, Ov. Met. xi. 445) and Philōis (Hyc.), brother of Dædālion, and husband of Alcēyonē, or Halcēyonē. He was king of Trāchin, v. Trāchis, a town of Thessaly, and was drowned in crossing the Archipelago to Clāros, to consult the Oracle, in consequence of his brother's transformation into a hawk, and the calamities which followed that event. His wife, after his departure, incessantly entreated the gods for his safe return. She was at last, however, informed in a dream of his death, and, on running to the beach, found his body floating lifeless to the shore. They were both changed into birds, and Apollōdōrus ascribes their transformation to their haughtiness; Cēyx maintaining that Jūno was his wife, and Halcēyonē that Jū- pitier was her husband (i. 7). See Halcj-onē.

Chabōras, m., the Hermas; Alholarci, or, Khabour, called by Amm. Mar. Abōras, v. Abōra, a river of Mēsōpōtāmia, which joins its waters with Hermas, the Huali, and their united stream falls into the Euphrātes a little above Cīrcēsium, Kerkisia. In Xēnōphōn this stream is designated Araxes (Amm. Mar. xiv. 3).

Chābrīas, m., an Athenian, reckoned one of the greatest generals whom that state ever produced. His biographer considers his invention at the battle of Thēbae, Thebae, the most remarkable proof of his military talents. He ordered his troops to receive the enemy's charge with their knee leaning upon their shields and their spears projecting before them, a position which obliged Agēsīlāus, who commanded against him, to sound a retreat. In the summary of his life, by Cōrnēlius Nēpos, many instances of his bravery and knowledge of war are recorded. Envy followed his fame, and the inconstancy of a republican government is strikingly exemplified in the life of this great man, who fell fighting bravely as a private soldier on board a ship, exposed to the greatest danger by his own intrepidity and the cowardice or treachery of his countrymen, who allowed the whole force of the enemy to attack that single vessel, and he preferred dying in arms to swimming to the Athenian fleet, by which his life would have been saved (Cōr. Nep. Vit. Chab.).

Chērēas, m., a man, in pursuit of whom Apēlles was sent at the time Xychus discovered the plot by which Dēmētrius had lost his life, in 181 B. C. (Liv. xl. 55).

Chērēcla, m., an inland town of Cūrēnāica (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Chērēstrātus, i., m., a character in the Eunuch of Menander, whom Tērētius, in his play of the same name, calls Phēdrīa (Pers. Sat. v. 162).—2. A Roman knight degraded from his rank on account of poverty (Mart. v. 26).

Chērīppus, i., m., a Cilician, whom Jūvēnālīs advises to sell the few rags which he had remaining, before a successor to the present governor who had plundered him should arrive (Sat. viii. 96).

Chērōnēa, m., f., Caprena (Walpole) Capranā (Clark), a town of Bēōtīa, stands at the foot of a range of mountains which form the western limit of the plain watered by Cēphīsus, the Marroneri. The remains of a tower on the height to the north of the town, probably those of the Acrōpōlis, are still visible. Its ancient name was Arnē (Hom. Il. ii. 507), from Arnē, daughter of Æōlus, and afterwards changed into Cheron, from a son of Apōllo by Thērō daughter of Phylas (Paus. ix. 40). In Grecian history Chērōnēa stands forth as a place of some note, being the birthplace of Plūtārchus, and, in its vicinity, Phīlīppus, king of Mācēdōnīa, destroyed the liberties of Greece by a decisive victory over the Bēōtians, Athenians, and Corinthians, in 338 B. C. Here Antīochus, king of Sūrīa, met the Ætolian chiefs as he went to attack Chalcis, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 46).

Chālbus, i., m., a Spanish nobleman, who commanded the Carpēsī, and had great reputation as a general, in 218 B. C. (Liv.

xxiii. 26). Here the common copies have Gālbus.

Chālcedōn, v. Cālchēdon, ōnis, f. Kadi-keui, i., e. the burgh of the Kadi (D'An.), a town of Bithynia, situated on Bōspōrus Thracius, the Strait of Constantinople. Archias, the chief of a Megarensian colony, founded it, and Iāson the temple which it contained sacred to Jūpiter. Here Mithridātes conquered M. Aurēlius Cōtta, the Roman consul, 76 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 93). The Greeks still call it Chalcedoine, and the Turks Kadi-keui, which Chevalier writes Cadi-Kisi (Pom. Mel. i. 158). Bosphorus (Thracius) adversam patitur Chalcedōna cerni (Claud. viii. 176). Inh. Chālcedōnī, orum, m. the Chalcedonians, settled in that country before the building of Byzantium, Constantinople, and had an opportunity of choosing the best situation, but, for want of discernment, chose the worst, on which account Pythian Apōllo directed the founders of that city to build it opposite to the territory of the blind (Tac. Ann. xii. 63). Adj. Chālcedōnīus, a., um. Chālcedōnīa arēnae (Claud. v. 55).

Chālciēcos, i., m., v. Chālciēcon, i., n. a brazen temple of Minērva at Lācēdāmōn, Misitra, around which the Ætōli, who had come to take possession of that city by fraud and violence, were cut in pieces, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 36). To it Pausānias fled for refuge after he had convicted himself of treason (Cōr. Nep. Paus. 5).

Chālciōpē, es, f. daughter of Æētes, king of Cōlchis, and the only child of his first marriage. Her mother's name is unknown. Apōllōnīus Rhōdīus makes her the elder daughter of Æētes and Idyja; according to that poet she appears to have been much older than her sister Mēdēa, since she assisted in nursing her (iii. 248, 735). She did not attain the distinction of Mēdēa, probably from being without the talents and vices which marked the character of that celebrated princess. She married Phrēxus, whom her father murdered in order to obtain the golden fleece. By Phrēxus she had four sons, Phrōntis, Argus, Mēlas, and Cytisōrus, who, from the island of Mars, joined the Argonauts (Hyg. 14).

Chālciis, idis, f. Egripo, the capital of Eubēa, Negropont (Chalcidos Eubēica regnum, Luc. Phar. v. 227). The sea, from being pretty wide is contracted at Chālciis into a strait so very narrow, that the whole, at first sight, appears like two harbours facing the two entrances of Eurīpus, the Strait of Negropont, which seems to have abounded with pirates (Liv. xxviii. 6: xxxi. 22). Strābo says it was built by the Athenians before the Trojan war. It had this name from Cōmbēa, a daughter of Asōpus, who was also called Chālciis. It was the birthplace of Lycophrōn, a tragic poet, who was one of the seven who flourished under Ptolēmæus Philādēlphus, and were, from their number, called Ptolēades. According to some Aristotle died at this city. It was destroyed by order of the Roman senate, because the Chālciēnses had assisted the Achæi in their revolt in 149 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 52). Inh. Chālciēnsēs, i., m. Adj. Chālciēdicus, a., um, et, Chālciēdēnsis, is, e. Chālciēdēns versus, the verse adopted by Euphōrion, a Greek poet, born at Chālciis, whose works Cn. v. P. Cōrnēlius Gāllus, the friend of Virgīlius, translated into Latin verse. Chalcidica arx, the tower of Cūma, so called because Cūma was built by a colony from Chalcis. Hence the poets frequently use the adjective Chalcidicus in place of Cūmaeus, or Cūmānus (Virg. Æn. vi. 17). Chalcidensis colonia (Gel. x. 16).—2. A town of Ætolia on the east bank of Achelōus (Liv. xxxvi. 11).—3. A town of Arābia, which Plinius calls a Greek town (i. 729).—4. Kannasin, another of Sýria (Plin. i. 578).—5. An island off Ætolia (Plin. i. 447).—6. A mountain of Ætolia (Plin. i. 408).—7. An ancient name of Euboea, because brass was found there first (Plin. i. 455).

Chalcōdon, ōtis, m. the father of Elēphēnor. Chalcōdōntiādes, m. a patronymic of Elēphēnor (Hom. Il. ii. 541). Chalcōdōntiāde, arum, m. the Euboeans.

Chalcōn, ōtis, m. the father of Bāthēcles (Hom. Il. xvi. 595).

Chaldæa, æ, f. a country of Asia, which some consider the same with Bābūlōnia or Assyria. It is more probable that Assyria at one time included both Bābūlōnia and Chaldæa, the latter being derived from the inhabitants Chaldæi, and the former from the chief city of that empire, Bābūlon. The Chaldæi were addicted to astrology and fortunetelling, hence Chaldæus frequently signifies an astrologer (Juv. Sat. vi. 553). Astronomy seems to have been first cultivated by the Chaldæi, and of this noble and sublime study, astrology may be considered the perversion or corruption. Adj. Chaldæus, et, Chaldæicus, a, um. Cum Chaldæo grege, with a Chaldæan herd, i. e. a band of astrologers (Juv. Sat. x. 94). Chaldæica ratiōnes, astrological calculations (Cic. Divin. ii. 47).

Chālētus, i, m. a man in the Theban war, who lost his life in Ismēnus, the Ismeno (Stat. Th. ix. 276).

Chālites, is, f. a bay on the coast of Armēnia, of which nothing is known (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Chālūs, i, m. the Koik, or river of Aleppo. Chālūbes, um, m. a people of Asia, an ancient name of the Chaldæi, according to Strābo, which he derives from their being employed in making iron and steel. He places Chālūbes on the confines of Armēnia Minor (768), and in the inland part of Asia Minor, Natolia (966). Rennel thinks they inhabited the plains now called Chalderan. Hence it is probable that there were tribes or nations of this name in different parts of Asia, and that Strābo's derivation is accurate, since Justinus says, that the people who lived in the vicinity of the river Chālūbes in Spain were called Chālūbes, and excelled in the manufacturing of steel. It is more probable that the river had its name from them, or the metal (Just. xlv. 3). Nūdi Chālūbes, from the great heat of the forges obliging them to work almost naked (Virg. G. i. 58). Apollōnius Rhōdius calls them the most wretched of men; probably from their employment, and the ruggedness of their country (ii. 375). Adj. Chālūbēus, a, um, of the Chālūbes; of steel. Chālūbēia massa, iron turned into steel (Ov. Fast. iv. 405).

Chamāvi, orum, m. the Chamavians, a people of Germany, who originally possessed that part of the country inhabited afterwards by the Tubantians, and finally by the Usipians. They invaded the country of the Bructerians, whom they persecuted with exterminating fury, and fixed their residence on Amisia, the Emis, not far from the mouth of that river (Tac. Ann. xiii. 55: Mor. Ger. l. 33).

Chaoi, v. Chaoniti, orum, m. a people of Armēnia, whose country is now called Khan, noos, or, Kanis.

Chāon, ōnis, m. a son of Priāmus, king of Trōja, whose brother, Hēlēnus, settled in Epirus after the Trojan war, and called a district of it from his brother's name Chāōnia, q. v.

Chāon, ōnis, m. a mass of rocky precipices overhanging the sources of the Kephalaria in Argōlis. In the time of Pausanias, the lower parts of it were covered with planted wood (ii. 24).

Chāōnia, æ, f. a part of Epirus, Lower Albania, a district of Greece. Inh. Chāōnes, um, m. Chāōnis, idos, f. of Chāōnia, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Chāōnis arbor, the Chaonian tree, i. e. the oak, from large forests of that kind of wood growing in Chāōnia (Ov. Met. x. 90). Adj. Chāōnius, a, um. Chāōnius pater, Jupiter, from the oak being sacred to him (Virg. G. ii. 67).

Chāōnia cōlumba, pigeons in the grove of Dōdōna, which was in Epirus. These pigeons had the gift of prophecy (Virg. B. ix. 13). Chāōnius truncus, the ship Argo (Val. Flacc. viii. 461). Chāōnia glans (Virg. G. i. 8). Chāōnius victus, the Chaonian food, i. e. the acorn (Claud. xxxvi. 47), which Lūcānus calls prima fruges, from its being considered the first food of man (Phar. vi. 426).

Chārācēnē, es, f. a country of Arābia Pētræa, afterwards Sārācēnē q. v. Inh. Chārācēni, orum, m. (Plin. i. 719). There were also a people of this name in Taurica (Plin. i. 469).

Chārādra, æ, f. Mariolatis, a town of Phōcis (Herod. viii. 33).—2. Rogus, a town on Chārādrus, Keynurios potamos.

Chārādrus, i, m. Keynurios potamos (i. e. the new river), originates in the fountain of Macaria at the foot of the hill of Pan. Its water issues from the rock clear and copious, forming a rapid stream which, in winter, sometimes overflows its banks, to the great injury of the adjoining lands.—2. An inconsiderable stream in Achāia, which, a late traveller says, may be the Sakōna (Dod. l. 120); but in another place he says it has no distinctive name (ii. 307).—3. The Rema, a river, or torrent of Argōlis, which joins the Banitzā (Paus. ii. 25).—4. The Kephalaria, a river of Phōcis, which flows into Cēphissus, the Maeroneri. On this stream stood the town Chārādra, which took its name from the river (Paus. x. 33).—5. A river of Mēssaēnia. The cattle which drank of this stream in spring generally produced males (Paus. iv. 33 seq.).—6. The Luro, or, Rogus, a beautiful river of Epirus, which falls into Sinus Ambrācius, the Gulf of Arta.

Chārādrus, i, f. Calandro, a town of Sýria (Plin. i. 576). Stēphānus considers this town as belonging to Cilicia. It stood near the boundary between these countries.

Chārax, ācis, m. a place about the middle of Tēmpē, where it is narrowest, at which Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia, had a garrison, 171 B. C. From its position, this fort was so strong that ten men could easily have defended it (Liv. xlv. 6).—2. A city of Pärthia, near the Caspian Sea (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Chäraxus, i, m. a man killed at the nuptials of Pirithöus, by Rhetus (Ov. Met. xii. 272 seq.).—2. A native of Lēsbos, Mityleni, and brother of Sappho, the poetess (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 117).

Chärcha, æ, f. a town on the Tigris (Amm. Mar. xviii. 10—xxv. 6).

Chärdi, rect. Echardi q. v.

Chäres, ētis, m. an Athenian commander, whom the envy of his fellow-citizens obliged to quit his native country, and he afterwards resided chiefly at Sigæum, Yeiny-Chëir, a town of the Troad. Cörnēlius Nēpos mentions, that both in manners and actions he was unlike Cōnon and other eminent Athenians, who had suffered a similar fate (Cor. Nep. Chab. 3).—2. The famous Rhodian artist, who planned and executed the celebrated Cōlossus q. v.—3. An Athenian, appointed governor of Mitylënē, by Därius; but was driven from that city by the Macedonians, in 332 B. C. (Curt. iv. 5).

Chärläde, arum, m. a tribe or clan in the island Egina (Pin. Nem. viii. 79).

Chärlädes, rather, Chäroädes, æ, m. an Athenian commander, sent with Laches to Sicily, in 426 B. C., under pretence of assisting the Cätinēnses, but in reality to attempt the subjugation of the island. This faithless alliance met with the success which such treachery deserved (Just. iv. 3).

Chäricles, is, m. a physician, eminent in his profession, employed by the Emperor Tiberius, not to prescribe as his medical attendant, but to assist by his friendly counsel (Tac. Ann. vi. 50).

Chäricleitus, i, m. a commander in the fleet of the Rhödi, who brought up the rear in the engagement off Sida, with the fleet of Antiochus, king of Syria, under Hannibal, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 23, 24).

Chäricleo, ñs, f. a nymph, who, to the centaur Chiron, bore Ocyrhöë (Ov. Met. ii. 636).—2. The mother of Tirēsias, by Evēris. She was a particular favourite with Minerva, from whom she obtained a knowledge of augury and future events for her son, since the goddess could not restore his sight, of which she had deprived him (Apol. iii. 6, 7). See Tirēsias.

Chärlidēmus, i, m. an Athenian, whom his countrymen banished, at the command of Alexander the Great. His military talents, in which he was not surpassed by any citizen, rendered him an object of suspicion to the Macedonian monarch, of which this was the result (Curt. iii. 2).—2. A man who was torn in pieces by a wild boar, to which he was exposed by order of the Emperor Dömētianus (Mart. i. 44).—3. A vicious man, whose infamy Märtälis describes in several epigrams (vi. 31 seq.).

Chärläus, i, m. one of the principal men of Päleppolis, who united with Nymphilus in devising a plan for expelling their obtrusive allies, the Sannites and Nölani, in 325 B. C. The judgment and address with which they concerted the measure, ensured its success, the Romans obtained possession of the town, and forced the Sannites and Nölani to fly (Liv. viii. 25, 26).—2. Son of Pölydectes, king of Spärta, born after the death of his father. His uncle, Lēcürgus, governed the state during his minority, and instituted the laws which have transmitted his name, with celebrity, to modern times (Just. iii. 2).

Charinda, æ, m. a river of Mēdia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Chärinus, i, m. a man of great effeminacy, ridiculed by Märtälis, who insinuates that he was guilty of gross immorality (i. 78). In other epigrams the poet speaks with more freedom of the vices of this infamous character.

Chäris, itos, f. a wife of Vülcänus, described by Hömērus as beautiful, shining with elegant fillets (Hom. Il. xviii. 382).

Chäristänus, i, m. an infamous character, branded by Märtälis (xi. 89).

Chäristia, orum, n. festivals established by the Romans, to which relations only were admitted, whence the name (secundum hæc) (Val. Max. ii. 1). Ovidius has given a short, but interesting, description of these meetings (Fast. ii. 617 seq.).

Chärites. See Grätia.

Chäron, önis, m. a Theban, who entered into the scheme formed by Pelopidas and his associates for the overthrow of the Lacedæmonian tyranny, and the restoration of liberty at Thēbe, Theba. He received into his house the exiles during the night, and their vigorous measures rescued their fellow-citizens from foreign domination, and conferred on them the blessings of security and freedom (Cor. Nep. Pelop. 2).

Chäron, öntis, m. the ferryman of the river Styx, said to have been the son of Erēbus and Nox, of whom Virgilius has given an admirable description (Æn. vi. 299 seq.), and Sēneca (Her. Fur. iii. 764 seq.).

Chärondas, æ, m. a native of Cätäna, who gave laws to the Thuriens. If a man entered an assembly armed, Chärondas made it a capital offence, and having inadvertently violated his own law, it was no sooner pointed out to him, than he drew his sword and fell upon it (Val. Max. vi. 5).

Chäropinus, i, m. a guzzler whom Märtälis ridicules (v. 51).

Chärops, öpis, m. a Trojan whom Ulysses slew. He was, according to Hömērus, the son of Hippäus, and the brother of Söcus, who wounded Ulysses, but was afterwards killed by him (Il. xi. 426).—2. The first of the decennial archons at Athens (Vel. Pat. i. 2).

Chäropus, i, v. Chäropa, æ, m. a chief of the Epirötes, to whom the Roman consul, T. Quinctius Flämīnius, was indebted for information that Philippos, king of Mäcēdōnia, had posted himself on Aöus, the Pollonia, and for sending a herdsman who conducted the Roman army to a place directly over the head of the Macedonian forces. Philippos owed his defeat, and consequent retreat back to his own country, to the accuracy of the statement, and the fidelity of the guide (Liv. xxxii. 6 seq.).—2. The grandson of the former, sent to Rome by his grandfather to acquire a knowledge of the Roman language and literature. Here he accused the nobles of his own nation, and thus obliged them to solicit the friendship of Persēus, king of Mäcēdōnia (Liv. xxxii. 6).

Chärtē, es, f. a town of Bactria (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Chärus, i, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, who, with another officer, named Alexander, commanded the troops which attacked the rock Aornos; both fell in the assault (Curt. viii. 11).

Charybdis, is. acc. in f. Gara Calo, a remarkable whirlpool in Frëtum Siculum, the Strait of Messina, opposite to the famous rock Scylla. Its current is very rapid, and it changes its direction every six hours. Charybdis is on the coast of Sicily, and Scylla on that of Italy. According to Hómërus, it engulfed and disgorged the sea thrice every day (Od. xii. 105). The moderns are agreed with respect to the situation of Scylla, but greatly divided in opinion with respect to the precise place which the ancients called Charybdis. Cicëro compares Verres to Charybdis and Scylla (Ver. v. 56). See Sicilia.

Chasûari, orum, m. the Chasuarians, a German nation on Visûrgis, the Weser (Tac. Mor. Ger. 34).

Châtra, æ, f. a town of Bactria (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Châtî, et, Châssi, orum, m. See Catti.

Chauus, i, m. Mocajo, a mountain of Celtiberia, near which a battle was said to have been fought between the Romans under Tib. Sempënius Gracchus and the Celtiberi, in which the former gained a complete victory (Liv. xl. 50).

Chauriama, æ, f. a town of Scythia. Inh. Chaurani, e. Chaurani, orum, m. (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Chaus, i, m. a river of Caria (Liv. xxxviii. 14).

Chelidonium, i, n. Cape Kelidoni, a promontory of Lycia, opposite to the three islands Chelidonia, whence probably the name (Liv. xxxiii. 41).

Chemmla, is, f. a town of Thebais, in Egypt (Herod. ii. 91). Inh. Chemmitæ, arum, m. Adj. Chemmitanus, a, um.

Chæmon, ouis, m. a Stoic, who praised death, not from fortitude of mind, but from his poverty (Mart. xi. 57).

Chersidamas, antis, m. a Trojan, killed by Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 260).

Chersônësus Aurëa, Malacca, an extensive peninsula in the southeast of Asia.—2. Chersônësus Cimbrica, Denmark, a peninsula at the entrance into the Baltic Sea.—3. Chersônësus Magna, Rasadin, a promontory of Bœrea.—4. Chersônësus Taurica, the Crimea. See Taurica.—5. Chersônësus Thracia (generally written Chersônësus, as it was the only one known to the Greeks), Gallipoli, a peninsula of Thracia, Romania, bounded on the east by Hellespontus, the Dardanelles, and on the west by Melanes Sinus, the Gulf of Saros, about sixty miles in length, and about thirty miles at its greatest breadth. It now forms part of European Turkey. Inh. Chersônënes, ium, m. (Just. ix. 1).

Chërûci, orum (Sing. Chërûsus, i), m. the Cheruscians, a nation of Germany, between the rivers Albis, the Elbe, and Visûrgis, the Weser, mentioned by Claudianus, as men of uncommon size (viii. 451).

Chilarchus, i, m. the highest officer at the Persian court. By him only strangers had access to the king (Cor. Nep. Con. 3). The duty of the præfectus prætorius among the Romans resembled that of the Chilarchus among the Persians, as does that of the Lord in waiting at the British court.

Chiliscœmum, i, n. a fertile district of Media (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 3).

Chimæra, æ, f. a monster produced by Typhon and Echidna, which was said to have vomited fire, hence ignifera, ignea, ignivoma, &c. Ovidius says, it had fire in its middle parts, the breast and face of a lioness, and the tail of a serpent (Met. ix. 646). Apollodorus relates, it was, in the forepart, a lion, in the middle a she-goat, and in the back parts a dragon, vomited fire, and destroyed whatever was near it. It had the strength of three animals, and was killed by Bellerophon, mounted on Pegasus. This description of Apollodorus nearly coincides with that of Hésiodus, who writes, it had three heads (Th. 319 seq.). Hyginus gives the same description, only he calls the middle part Chimæra, in place of a goat (151). There is no doubt that the meteoric appearance of the mountains of Lycia, where it was said to reside, gave rise to that fiction, since there was a mountain in Phæselis, a part of Lycia, of this name, which emitted fire unceasingly both night and day. Plinius says, that the fires in the burning mountains of Lycia were kindled by water, and extinguished by earth (i. 256). Adj. Chimæreus, et, Chimærifërus, a, um. Chimærifera Lycia, from the residence of the Chimæra in Lycia (Ov. Met. vi. 339).

Chimæra, æ, f. the name of a ship (Sil. Ital. xiv. 497).

Chimærus, i, m. a Cretan in the army of Persæus (Liv. xlv. 24).

Chiomæra, æ, f. the wife of Ortiagon, a chieftain of the Gallogreci, a woman of great beauty, who had fallen into the hands of the Romans. The centurion, to whose custody she had been committed, finding an invincible aversion to his impure desire, had recourse to violence, and afterwards proposed to allow her to return to her friends, on condition that she gave him an Attic talent of gold. To this proposal she agreed, and the money was brought by two of her friends, to the place fixed upon, whither the centurion repaired with his prisoner alone, and, while he was weighing the money, she, in her own language, commanded the bearers of the money to kill him, and sever his head from his body. Her orders being quickly complied with, she carried home the head, and, after presenting it to her husband, accounted for the ferocious deed by relating the criminality of the centurion. For this act of revenge, Livius commends Chiomæra, and adds, that to the end of life she maintained, by her purity and propriety of conduct, the fame of this achievement so honourable to her sex (Liv. xxxviii. 24).

Chion, ouis, m. a noble youth of Hæraclea, Erehtli, in Põntus, a scholar of Plato, who, with the assistance of Lëonides, put the tyrant Clëarchus to death (Just. xvi. 5).

Chionë, es, f. a woman of infamous character, whom Juvénalis describes as sitting on a lofty seat, which appears to have been usual with women of that description, in order that their persons, which were covered, Cois vestibis, might be seen (Sat. iii. 136).—2. Another, of the same character. Her name occurs frequently in the writings of Martialis, otherwise he has used it as a common appellation of abandoned women (Mart. i. 35).—3. A daughter of Dædalion, who, at one birth, bore Philammon to Apollo, and Autolykus to Mercurius. Elated by this intercourse with the inhabitants of Olympus, she preferred her beauty to that of Diana, for which the enraged goddess shot her through the tongue, and deprived her of life (Ov. Met. xi. 301—325).—4. A daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, who, by Neptuneus, became the mother of Eumolpus. To conceal the birth of that child from her father, she threw him into the sea, when Neptuneus received him, preserved his life, and conveyed him to Æthiopia (Apol. iii. 15 seq.). See Eumolpus. Chionides, æ, m. a patronymic of Eumolpus (Ov. Ep. Pont. iii. 3. 41).

Chionite, arum, m. a people bordering on Persia, whose king was Grumbates.

Chios, i, f. Scio, an island in the Archipelago, off the coast of Lydia, which the Turks call Sackee, from its producing mastic in great abundance. It is about a hundred miles in circumference, fruitful, and celebrated for the excellence of its wines. The capital, which gives name to the island, stands on the east coast, is well built, and the port is the rendezvous of ships sailing to and from Constantinople. The partridges of this island are tame, sent to the fields for food through the day, and called home at night by a whistle. Ich. Chii, orum (Sing. Chius, i), m. Adj. Chius, a, um. Chius cædus, a cask of Chian wine (Tibul. ii. 1. 28). Chia tellus, Scio. Flæva Chia (ficus) (Mart. vii. 30).

Chiron, ðnis, m. was the son of Saturnus and Philyra, the most distinguished of the centaurs. He was celebrated for his skill in herbs, whence one is called from his name Chironion, useful in curing the bite of serpents. Juvénalis uses Chiron to signify the leg or foot of a table, probably from being in the figure of that centaur, which was partly that of a man, and partly that of a horse, from Saturnus having assumed the form of the latter, at his intercourse with Philyra, on purpose to escape detection. His daughter Endëis was the mother of Pëleus, and grandmother of Achilles. Chirônia appears to be an adjective, since it is applied to different things (Plin. iv. 249. 349. 383. 409). Philirides, æ, m. a patronymic of Chiron, from his mother. Chiron geninus, bifornis (Ov. Met. ii. 630 seq.); semivir, referring to his figure, as already described, and that of the centaurs (Ov. Fast. v. 380).

Chirônômon, ðntis, m. an actor of pantomimes, a person who moved his hands with great nimbleness or regularity, and used, by Juvénalis, to signify a carver at table (Sat. v. 121).

Chlôe, es, f. the name of a young woman, to whom Horatius addresses an ode (i. 23). Her name occurs in other parts of his writings.—2. An immoral character, described by Martial in several epigrams (iii. 53 &c.).

Chlôreus, eos, m. a Phrygian, the priest of Cybèle, slain by Turnus. The splendour of his armour attracted the notice of Camilla, and, when she steadily followed him through the battle, Aruns, who had closely traced her steps, by a well-directed spear deprived her of life (Virg. Æn. xi. 768: xii. 563).

Chloris, idis, f. daughter of Niobë and Amphion, was wife of Neleus, son of Hippocoon, to whom she bore twelve sons. Hercules carried by storm Pylus, and killed ten of them; Periclymënus escaped death by his grandfather Neptuneus changing him into an eagle, and Nestor, so famed for prudence and wisdom, was then at Troy (Hyg. 10).—

2. A woman mentioned by Horatius (Od. ii. 5. 18), to whom he addresses Od. iii. 15.—3. The goddess of flowers among the Greeks, whose name the Latins, according to Ovidius, corrupted into Flora (Ov. Fast. v. 195).

Chôani, orum, m. a people of Arabia (Plin. i. 729). Adj. Chôanius, a, um, of the Chôani, Arabian. Chôanius Môleus (Ov. Met. v. 163).

Chôaspa, æ, f. a town in Arachôsia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Chôaspes, is, m. a noble Colchian, whom Valérius Flaccus makes son of Chôaspes, the Karoon, by which he probably meant, born near that stream (v. 585).—2. A man who held a command in the army of Hannibal, and had the merit of being a distinguished soldier. His name seems derived from the river in Asia, now called the Karoon (Sil. Ital. iii. 317).

Chôaspes, is, m. v. Euleus, i, m. the Ab-Zal, or, Karoon, a noble river of Sûsiâna, in some places three hundred paces broad, rises about eighty-two miles southwest of Ispahan, receives a number of tributary branches, and, at Sabla, now in ruins, divides into two streams, one falls into a considerable river at Goban, the other, called Hafar, after running fourteen miles, again divides, one part flows, in an artificial canal three miles long, into Shat-ul Arab, and the other, Bamishire, falls into the sea. Kinnear says, it is doubtful whether the Karoon, the Ab-Zal, or the Kerah, is the Chôaspes of Herodotus, who states that it runs by Sûsa. Tibullus calls Chôaspes, régia lympa, because the Parthian kings only drank from this river, and carried that water along with them to whatever distance they travelled. They first boiled it, then put it into silver vessels, which they placed upon four-wheeled carriages drawn by mules (Herod. i. 188).—2. A river of India, which Arrianus seems to call Chôes (Curt. viii. 10).

Chôâtras, arum, m. a Scythian nation (Val. Flacc. vi. 151).

Chôâtres, is, m. a river of Parthia, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, but mentioned by no other author. There is a mountain of that name in Parthia, which Sallust calls Chôâtras; Ptolémæus, Pârâchôâtras; and Strabo, Pârâchôâtras.

Cherææ, arum, f. a town of Eubœa, belonging to the Eretrians (Herod. vi. 101).

Chærilus, i, m. a poet, of whose writings Horatius speaks with contempt, although he had been a favourite with Alexander the Great, who paid him a high price for his silly inelegant verses (Hor. Epist. ii. 1. 233 seq.). He is probably the person mentioned by Cûrtius (viii. 5).—2. A man whom Martial derides (i. 68).

Chonodomarius, i, m. a king of the Gauls, made prisoner by Cōstantius (Aur. Vic. Ep. 42).

Chôra, v. Cōra, æ, f. a stream in France, between Aballo, Avalon, and Autosiddorum, Auxerre, on which stood a village of the same name, now Arey (Amm. Mar. xvi. 2).

Chôrâsmi, orum, m. a people who lived on Oxus, the Gihon. They submitted to Alexander the Great, in 328 B. C. Their memory is preserved in the modern name Kharazm, or Khwarezm (Just. xii. 6).

Chorebus, melius, Cōrebus, i, m. a native of Argolis, who killed Peneë, a horrible monster, which the vengeance of Apōllo had sent to distress the Argives, to which Stāstius frequently alludes, speciesque horrenda Chōrebi (Th. ii. 221: vi. 286). Ovidius has likewise mentioned the deliverance from that pest, which the Argives received from the bravery of Chōrebus (Ibis 575). The destruction of this animal was followed by a pestilence, on which he went to Dēlphi, Castris, to give satisfaction to Apōllo, whose priestess forbade him to return to his native country, ordered him to take a tripod from the temple, and to build a temple to that god on the place where the tripod should first fall from his hand. It happened that he dropped it on mount Gerania, where he obeyed the oracle by building a village, which, from the circumstance, he called Tripōdis-cus, or Tripōdisci. A splendid monument was erected to his memory, representing him in the act of killing Peneë, which Pausanias considers the most ancient figure cut in stone in Greece. The Mēgārēnses also claimed the honour of his being their fellow-citizen.

—2. A conqueror at the Olympic games, to whom no statue was erected, but his tomb existed in the territories of the Elēi, when Pausanias wrote, and formed a landmark or boundary.—3. A man of Tānāgra (Tānāgræus Chōrebus), a town of Bēōtia, killed in the Theban war by Pārthēnōpæus (Stat. Th. ix. 745).—4. A man in the army of Etēocles, killed by Tydeus, in the Theban war. He was a poet, but Stāstius says nothing of his merits as a votary of the Muses, unless by inference, from his adding, that they lamented his death. He mentions that Urānula had forewarned him of his state, by which he probably intended to inform his readers, that he had some knowledge of astronomy, at least of astrology (Stat. Th. viii. 548—553).

Chōrsēnē, es, f. Kara, a tract of land to the north of Araxes, the Arash.

Chōtēnē, es, f. a district of Armēnia. Inh. Chōtēni, orum, m. (Ap. Bel. Mith. 240).

Chrēmīs, ōtis, m. an old man, of great avarice, mentioned by Hōrātius (Epod. i. 33: Sat. i. 10. 40). Perhaps the character, which Tērentius introduced into Andria, was imaginary, and to it Hōrātius probably alludes.

—2. A man in the army of Hānūbal, killed at Sāgūntum by Murrus. Silius Itālicus describes him as almost terrific in appearance, from the extraordinary quantity and growth of his hair (i. 403).

Chrēstillus, i, m. an admirer of the ancient poets, whose judgment Mārtiālis despises, declaring him a stranger to the power of numbers, and to the meaning of words (xi. 90).

Chrētus, i, m. a king of Bithynia, killed by Mithridates, at the suggestion of the Roman senate (Just. xxxviii. 5).

Christilla, v. Chrestilla, æ, f. a widow, who had buried a number of husbands. Mārtiālis proposes that she should be married to Fāllus, who had buried a number of wives, and that the two should employ their art against one another (viii. 43).

Christus, i, m. the son of God and Saviour of mankind. This sacred name occurs in the poems of Claudianus. Tacitus mentions his being put to death in the reign of the emperor Tiberius (Ann. xv. 44).

Chrōmīs, is, m. a man, who, at the nuptials of Pērseus, slew the venerable Emāthion whilst he grasped the altar with his aged hands (Ov. Met. v. 103).—2. A centaur killed by Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 333).—3. The commander of the Mysians (Hom. Il. ii. 858).—4. The twin-brother of Gēas whom Hānūbal killed at Sāgūntum (Sil. Ital. i. 459).

Chrōmīus, v. os, i, m. a Lycian, one of the companions of Sārpēdon, slain by Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 257).—2. A son of Priāmus, killed in the same chariot with Echēmon, by Diōmēdes (Hom. Il. v. 160).—3. One of the five Pylian chiefs who fought under Nestor at Troy (Hom. Il. iv. 295).—4. A man in the Trojan army killed by Tēucer (Hom. Il. viii. 275).—5. A son of Nēlēus and Chlōris, and brother of Nestor (Hom. Od. xi. 285).

Chronus, melius, Chronus, i, m. the Pregel, a river which passed through the territory of the Arimphæi (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Chrýsas, æ, m. the Dattaino, a river of Sicily, one of the branches of Sýmæthus, the Jaretta. Vāge Chrýsa (Sil. Ital. xiv. 229).

Chrýsē, es, v. a, v, f. the name of a Trojan city, sacred to Apōllo, taken by Achilles (Ov. Met. xiii. 174).

Chrýses, æ, m. the priest of Apōllo, at Lyrnēssus, whose daughter, Astýnōmē q. v., Agāmēmnon refused to return for ransom. Enraged at the insolence of the conqueror, he prayed Apōllo to avenge him on the Greeks, and the god granted his request by sending a deadly pestilence among the combined army. On consulting the oracle, Agāmēmnon became convinced of his error in treating the aged priest with unfeeling insolence, and therefore restored Astýnōmē without ransom, in order to preserve the lives of the troops under his command. This forms one of the most important occurrences in the Iliad. On parting with Astýnōmē, he seized on Briseis, the captive of Achilles, and that hero, after expressing his contempt for Agāmēmnon in no very courtly terms, withdrew from the war, and retired in sullen resentment to his ships. See Achilles. Chrýsēis, Idis, f. a patronymic of Astýnōmē (Ov. Rem. Am. 469).

Chrýsippus, i, m. a Stoic philosopher, who was born at Soli, v. Sōla, Mezethu, in Cilicia, and studied under Clēanthus, the successor of Zēno. He acquired great celebrity and distinction among that sect, and his ardour in propagating their principal tenets, gave rise to the common saying "that had it not been for Chrýsippus the porch had never existed." A celebrated apophthegm of his has been transmitted. When informed that some persons had aspersed his character, he replied "It is no matter, I shall live so that they shall not be believed." He maintained that every word was naturally ambiguous, and Diōdorus Chrōnus maintained the opposite (See Gel. xi. 12). His writings are all lost, but many of his opinions will be found in the different treatises of Cicero (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 44). Plēna gypso Chrýsippi, full of the plaster of Chrýsippus, i. e. of plaster or stucco busts of Chrýsippus (Juv. Sat. ii. 5).—2. A natural son of Pēlōps, remarkable for his beauty, whom Lālus carried off at the Nemean games, and whom his father recovered by force of arms. Atreus and Thyestes, at the suggestion of their mother, Hippodamia, killed him (Hyg. 85).—3. A freedman of M. Tullius Cicero, who appears to have been well educated (Cic. Att. vii. 2).

Chrýsis, Idis, f. a character in the Eumenichus of Menander, whom Terentius, in his play of the same name, calls Thais (Pers. v. 165).

Chrýsogónus, i, m. a player or singer mentioned by Juvénalis (Sat. vi. 74: vii. 176).

Chrýsoláus, i, m. a tyrant of the Méthymnai, who was put to death by torture (Curt. iv. 8).

Chrýsopólis, is, f. Scutari, a town on the east side of Thrácius Bosphorus, the Strait of Constantinople, near Chalcédon (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Chrýsorrhóas, æ, m. (i. e. flowing with gold), a river near Tróezen, reported to have flowed during a drought which continued for nine years, when all the other rivers were dry (Paus. ii. 31). There were other streams of this name in different countries.

Chrýsôthémis, Idis, f. one of the three daughters of Agamémnon, of whom their father allowed Achilles to make a choice, if he returned to the Trojan war (Hom. Il. ix. 145).

Chtrónius, i, m. a centaur, killed by Néstor at the nuptials of Pirithóus (Ov. Met. xii. 441).—2. A man of great strength and bravery, who had the command of the party sent by Etéocles to murder Týdeus as he returned from Thébæ to Argos, and fell by the hand of that hero (Stat. Th. ii. 538).—3. A man in the army of Etéocles, whom Týdeus slew in the Theban war. Some editions of Státius read Clónius (Th. viii. 697).

Chtrónius, i, m. one of the commanders in the Theban army against the confederate forces under Adrastus (Stat. Th. vii. 369).

Chūni, orum (Sing. Chūnus, i), m. a Scythian nation, commonly called the Huns. When Claudianus wrote, the Chūni were a wild and wandering race, hence, Vāga fēritas Chūnōrum, i. e. fēritas vāgōrum Chūnōrum (Claud. xxi. 110). Si Chūnus fēritat (Claud. xx. 338).

Cia, æ, v. Cēos, i, f. Zia, one of the Cýclades, twelve miles from Prómōntōrion Sūnion, Cape Colonna. To it the Rhodians sailed, in 202 B. C., on purpose to rouse the inhabitants of that and of the other islands of the Archipelago against Philippus, king of Macédonia (Liv. xxxi. 15). Inh. Cil, v. Cēi, orum, m.

Cibálæ, arum, f. Palanha, a town of Pannonia (Amm. Mar. xxx. 7). Adj. Cibálensis, is, e. Cibálensis campus (Amm. Mar. excr.).

Cibýra, æ, f. a town of Cilicia, said to have been built by the Phenicians, and the name in their language to signify great (Plin. i. 585). Stephānus calls it Tābæ.—2. A town of Phrygia, of which Mōagétēs was king in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 14). Inh. Cibýratæ, arum, m. joined the Caunli when they revolted from the Rhōdi, who, notwithstanding, conquered them both in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 25). Adj. Cibýratæus, a, um. Cibýratæa fūrtidictio, was one of the largest in Asia Minor (Plin. i. 594). Cibýratæa negōtia, the trade or commerce of Cibýra (Hor. Epis. i. 6. 33). Cibýratæa ciuitas (Tac. Ann. iv. 13).

C. Cicērius, C. Cicērii, m. a Roman, son of a writer, who was elected prætor in 175 B. C. For his victory over the Cōrsi he demanded a triumph, which was refused, but he gratified his ambition by exhibiting a pompous procession on the Alban mount. The practice of triumphing without public authority had now become common, and in such cases this mount was always selected. On it he dedicated to Jūpiter Mōnēta a temple, which he had vowed during the battle with the Cōrsi (Liv. xlii. 7 seq.).

Cicēro. See Tullius.

Cicōnia, æ, f. a district of Thrācia, Romania, near Hébrus, the Maritæa. Inh. Cicōnes, um, m. Ulysses, returning from the Trojan war, pillaged their country, because they had sent assistance to Priam. They at last overpowered him and killed a number of his men. That prince describes them as a numerous, well-disciplined, and warlike people (Hom. Od. ix. 39 seq.). Orphēus was torn to pieces by the matrons of Cicōnia, and his head thrown into the Maritæa. For this act of barbarity different reasons are assigned by ancient writers.

Cicūta, æ, m. supposed by some to have been a skilful usurer, but more probably he was a lawyer, and eminent for his knowledge in writing bonds of security. At least this appears to be the character which Hōrātius had in view, and called by him nodosus, full of quirks (Sat. ii. 3. 69).

Cida, æ, m. a man supposed by some to have been a painter or statuary, and by others the father or master of Hālmýrōtē (Mart. x. 83). The readings here vary. If the same with the person named by Stātius (Syl. v. 3. 94), it should be written Cýda.

Cidāris, is, f. the badge of royalty among the Persians. It appears to have been of a conical form, and perhaps another name for tiāra (Curt. iii. 3).

Cilicia, æ, f. a country on the S. E. coast of Asia Minor, Natolia, nearly opposite to the island Cýprus, which is said to have received that name from Cilix, a son of Agēnor. It was bounded on the E. by Sýria; on the N. by Cāppadócia and Isauria; on the W. by Pisidia; and on the S. by the Mediterranean. Portæ, v. pýla Cilicia, a narrow defile in mount Taurus, forming a communication between Asia Minor, Natolia, and Sýria (Cor. Nep. Dat. 7). Ammianus Marcellinus makes it the boundary between Cāppadócia and Cilicia (xxii. 9). Lūcānus uses Cilix in the sense of Cilicia (Phar. iii. 228). Inh. Cilices, um (Sing. Cilix, icis), m. the Cilicians, as a nation were infamous for piracy. They were anciently called Hypachæi (Herod. vii. 91). Adj. Cilix, ix, ix; icis, Cilicēnsis, is, e. Cilicius, et, Cilissus, a, um. Cilix fur, a Cilician thief (Mart. vi. 72). According to this poet the Cilicians were much addicted to theft. Cilissa terra (Ov. Ib. 200). Cilicēnsis peregrinatio (Suet. Cal. 51). Cilicium mārē (Curt. iii. 1). Cilicismus, i, m. the Cilician manner of speaking. Cilicium, i, n. haircloth, perhaps from being first made in that country, in consequence of the Cilician goats having very long thick hair. Cilix, icis, m. a son of Agēnor, from whom Cilicia has its name (Herod. vii. 91).

Cilulius, a, um. Cilulium gēnus, a very wealthy and powerful family of the Arrēti, whom the latter, from spite at their riches, endeavoured to expel (Liv. x. 3). A recon-ellation was effected between them and the commons by M. Valerius Maximus (Liv. x. 5).

Cilnius, i. m. an Italian youth, born at Arretium, who relates to Hannibal the character of Q. Fabius Maximus, surnamed Cunctator. He had been taken prisoner at the battle on Ticinus, the Tessino (Sil. Ital. vii. 29).

C. Cilnius Macenas, C. Cilni Macenatis, m. a Roman knight, who was said to be descended from the ancient kings of Etruria, Tuscany. He immortalized his name, by patronizing men of letters, and by the mild and prudent counsel which he gave to Augustus, with whom he was a very particular favourite. The emperor knew the value of Macenas, upon whom he bestowed distinguished marks both of his favour and confidence, called him the emerald of the Cilni, and would have added greatly both to his wealth and dignity; but love of retirement and the conversation of learned men made him forsake the paths of ambition, and withdraw from the pomp and splendour of the court, to enjoy the tranquillity of the country, the charms of elegant literature, and the pleasures of refined society. He procured to Virgilus the restitution of his lands, and to Horatius the emperor's pardon, for having joined the army of Brutus. Virgilus dedicates to him his Georgics, and Horatius his Odes. None of the writings of Macenas have been transmitted to modern times. Tacitus mentions a trait of his character, from which it appears, that he had no claim to the praise of personal purity (Ann. i. 54). Quis tibi Macenas? Who is your patron? (Juv. Sat. vii. 94). Martialis calls him Casarius eques (x. 73). Adj. Macenatianus, a. um. Macenatiani horti (Suet. Tib. 15).

Cilo, onis, m. a man enriched by the Emperor Septimius Severus (Aur. Vic. Ep. 20).

Cimbriensis, is, f. a town near Lacus Averna, the Lake of Averno (Aur. Vic. Or. 10). Here the reading should be Cimmerium (Plin. i. 327).

Cimber Annus, Cimbrī Annii, m. a writer mentioned by Augustus. His style differed much from that of Veranius Flaccus q. v. (Suet. Aug. 86).

Cimbrius, i. m. the brother of Nasū, who headed the 100 cantons of the Sūvi, who had left their native country, and encamped on the banks of Rhēnus, the Rhine, with the view of crossing that river, and settling in Gallia, France (Ces. B. G. i. 37).

Cimbris, is, f. a place of Hispania Bastica, not far from Gades, Cádiz, to which Mago went with his fleet, in 208 B. C., when Cadiz was shut against him, and to which he enticed the magistrates to come, with the treasure of Cadiz. On their arrival, he put them to death by crucifixion, after he had lacerated their bodies with rods, in 208 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 37).

Cimbri, orum (Sing. Cimber, bri), m. the Cimbrians, a German nation, supposed to be descended from the Asiatic Cimmerians, whose country was, from them, called Chersonesus Cimbrica, Jutland, which now forms part of the kingdom of Denmark. This word, according to Plutarchus and Festus, signifies, in the language of the Germans and Gauls, robbers, banditti. This agrees with Strabo's description of their habits (424 seq.). About 113 B. C., the Cimbri, leaving their territories, which were both narrow and barren, and being joined by the Teutones, a neighbouring people, defeated several German nations, and a Roman consul with his army, who had been sent against them. They invaded, and seem to have overrun, a great part of Gallia, France; and, being strengthened by the accession of many of the tribes who inhabited that country, marched against Rome. After slaughtering the whole army of Q. Servilius Cæpio and Cn. Manlius Maximus, except ten men and two generals, C. Marius (q. v.) marched against them, slew a hundred and twenty thousand, and took sixty thousand prisoners. Those who escaped the sword of Marius settled in that part of the Alps called Sette Commune, where their descendants still remain, retaining the Teutonic language, and the traditional account of their origin. They keep themselves quite separate from the surrounding states, by which means they have preserved the language of their ancestors uncorrupted. The late king of Denmark visited these Alpine Cimbrians, and conversed readily with them, when both parties speaking their native languages, understood each other. Though the northern nations were inconsiderable in the days of Tacitus, it is manifest that the sagacity of that profound historian was apprehensive of the final destruction of the Roman state by the hordes of Germany, which actually happened about three hundred years after his death. Juvénalis represents them of uncommon size (Sat. viii. 252). Adj. Cimber, et, Cimbricus, a. um. Cimber triumphus (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 3. 45). Cimbricum (bellum) (Plin. v. 341). Cimbrica Tethys, the Cimbrian Sea, i. e. part of the German Sea (Claud. xxvi. 333). Cimbrica Chersonesus, Jutland.

Cimētra, æ, f. a town in Sāmniūm, taken by Q. Fabius Maximus, where the enemy's loss was two thousand four hundred prisoners, and four hundred and thirty killed, in 299 B. C. (Liv. x. 15).

Ciminius, a. um. Ciminius Lacus, Lago di Vico, and Lago di Ronciglione, in Tuscany. Ciminius mons, Monte di Viterbo. Ciminita silva, v. Ciminitus saltus, a forest which the Romans deemed impassable (310 B. C.), and as frightful as those of Germany were at a later time. Before the war with the Etrusci, not even a merchant had attempted to go through it, and Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus was almost the only person, who had boldness to enter it (Liv. ix. 36).

Cimmerium, i. n. a town of Chersonesus Taurica, the Crimea, of which the ancient name, according to Ptolemy, was Cērbēriōn (i. 660). Inh. Cimmerii, et, Cimmerici, orum, m. Adj. Cimmerius, a. um. Cimmeria regio, a district on the west of the Strait of Caffa (Herod. iv. 12). Cimmerius Bosphorus, the Strait of Caffa, about three miles broad. Herodotus states that it was frozen over in winter. Ptolemy mentions a people called Cimmerii, who appear to have been situated near Mārē Cāspium, the Caspian Sea. Plutarchus states, that the Scythians drove them from Pālūs Mæotis, the Sea of Azoph, that they took possession of the most distant coast of Asia and the ocean, and that the Cimbri were their descendants. Hence it is probable that Cimmériam was their original residence.—2. A town of Italy, near Lācus Avērnus, Lago di Averno (Plin. i. 327). From this, perhaps, the Sibyl Cimmēria, mentioned by Lāctāntius, had her name (i. 6). Inh. Cimmērii, orum, m. a people on the western coast of Italia, Italy, not far from Baiae (2 syl.), who, according to Homer, lived in perpetual darkness, an expression probably intended to denote that the inhabitants, in place of houses, had caves from which they issued only during the night, to rob, and commit other acts of atrocity. A low gloomy place, near Baiae (2 syl.), which, overhanging mountains deprived of the solar rays, seems to have suggested to the ancient poets, all the horrid images which are found in their descriptions of the Infernal Regions. It is certain, that Homer makes it the entrance to the abodes of the dead; a fiction which has been adopted by Virgil, and other poets of antiquity. Adj. Cimmērius, a, um. Cimmēria tēnebra; perpetual darkness.

Cimōlus, i, m. Kimolo, an island in Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, one of the Cyclādes, which was also called Echinūssa (Plin. i. 459). The Venetians gave to this island the name of Argentiera, from its silver mines. It is about eighteen miles in circumference, barren, mountainous, and has but one village. Adj. Cimōlius, a, um. Cimōlia tērra, fullers' earth. To this species of clay Plinius ascribes a number of virtues (v. 258—260).

Cimon, ōnis, m. an Athenian, father of Miltiādes (Herod. vi. 39. Cor. Nep. Milt. 1).—2. Half-brother of Miltiādes. They were the children of the same mother (Herod. vi. 38).—3. Son of Miltiādes. His father having died in prison, in consequence of his being unable to pay a fine of fifty talents, imposed on him by the people, the Athenian laws doomed him to the same confinement, in which he likewise would most probably have ended his days, had not one Cāllias liquidated the debt, on condition that he received in marriage Elpinicē, the sister and wife of Cimon. On his liberation from prison, he distinguished himself by his eloquence, generosity, and knowledge both of law and war. Over the combined fleet of the Phenicians and Cyprians, consisting of two hundred sail, he gained a complete victory, at Mýcālē, and, on the same day, enjoyed the like good fortune on land. This, which is the account of Cōrnēlius Nēpos, appears inaccurate, since Diodōrus states, that the naval engagement was fought on the coast of Cýprus, and the land battle at Eurymēdon. He conquered Scýrus, Shiro, and Thāsus, Thaso, with their spoils adorned the south front of the Athenian citadel. The eminence which he had attained by his talents, excited against him the envy of the people, who sentenced this great man to ten years' banishment. In the fifth year after his expulsion from his native country, the Lacedæmonians declared war against the Athenians, and the populace, who had unjustly condemned him, believing their safety depended on his talents, revoked their sentence. Cimon reconciled these powerful states without having recourse to arms, and soon after died at Citium, Larnaca, or, Chittā, a town of Cýprus (Cor. Nep. vit. Cim.).

Cināra, v. Cynāra, æ, f. a young woman who appears to have been a favourite of Hērātius, and of virtuous (bonæ) dispositions (Hor. Od. iv. 1. 4).—2. Another, mentioned by Prōpērtius (iv. 1. 99).

Cināria, æ, f. Zenara, an island in Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, according to some, one of the Cyclādes, and, to others, of the Spōrādes (Suet. Tib. 56).

Cincibīlus, i, m. a king of the Gauls, who accused of cruelty C. Cāsius Lōnginus q. r. consul during the preceding year (173 B. C.), and then a military tribune in Mācēdōnia. On account of his absence, the senate delayed the trial, but promised, on his return, to arraign him, if Cincibīlus should prefer a charge against him (Liv. xliii. 5).

Cincius, i, m. a man to whom the civil authority in Sýria was assigned in the year 63, and the military to Cōrbūlo (Tac. Ann. xv. 25). Here the readings vary.

L. Cincius Alimēntus, L. Cincii Alimēnti, m. a Roman, taken prisoner by Hānnibal, who, after his liberation, stated that the troops of the Carthaginian general, including Gauls and Ligurians, amounted to eighty thousand foot and ten thousand horse. In the opinion of Līvius, and other authors, these Gallic nations joined Hānnibal at a later period. In the hearing of Cincius, the Carthaginian general declared, that he had lost thirty-six thousand men, with a vast number of horses and beasts of burden, after he had crossed the Rhone, before he quitted the country of the Taurini. On his election to the prætorship, Cincius obtained the command of the fleet, and his merits as a commander must have been very considerable, since he was continued in important stations for several years (Liv. xxi. 38 seq.). He wrote, in Greek, a history of the second Punic war, according to some; but others think, that the prætor was the son of the historian, whom Hānnibal had made prisoner, in which case, the lives of father and son are blended in the above account. The matter is doubtful, and of little importance.

M. Cincius, M. Cincii, m. commanded at Pise, whence he wrote the senate, informing them of a conspiracy of the Ligures, in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 56).

M. Cincius Alimēntus, M. Cincii Alimēnti, m. a tribune of the people, who proposed and carried a law de donis et muneribus, in 204 B. C. Some have maintained that it was useless, because it contained no penalty, if broken. Dio informs us, that Augustus, after this law had gone into disuse, not only revived it, but made the penalty four times the amount of the sum received. The senate, to check a practice then very prevalent, revived this law, which applied to advocates; but the emperor Claudius adopted a middle course, and fixed the fee at ten thousand sesterces, equal to 83*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* If in any instance an advocate exceeded that sum, he was held guilty of extortion (Tac. Ann. xi. 5—7). Adj. Cincius, a, um. Cincia lex (ib.).

Cinēas, æ, m. ambassador from Pýrrhus to the Roman senate, who proposed, on purpose to conclude a peace, that the king should be admitted into the city (Liv. Ep. 13). On returning, Pýrrhus asked him respecting the appearance of Rome, and he answered, "It appeared to be a city of kings" (Just. xviii. 2). He attempted to bribe the women, but they despised his presents (Liv. xxxiv. 4).—

2. A king of Thessaly (Herod. v. 63).

Cinca, v. f. the Cinca, one of the northern branches of Iberus, the Ebro, which rises in mount Biesca, among the Pyrenees, runs rapidly through the province of Aragon, and joins Sicoris, the Segre, below llerda, Lerida, and afterwards falls into Ebro. Caesar pitched his camp between these rivers, near their junction, previously to his defeating Afranius and Petrenius, Pompey's lieutenant-generals, who commanded his troops in Spain (Cæs. B. C. i. 48).

Cingetorix, igis, m. a nobleman who headed that party in the state of the Tréviri, which was formerly attached to Caesar. In consequence of his fidelity to the Romans, he was, by means of his father-in-law, Indutiomarus, declared a public enemy, and his estate confiscated (Cæs. B. G. v. 3 seq.).—
2. One of the four kings of Cantium, Kent, who, by order of Cassivelaunus, made an attack upon Caesar's naval camp (Cæs. B. G. v. 22).

Cingilia, v. f. Celeria, a town of the Vesitini, taken by the Romans, in 324 B. C. (Liv. viii. 29).

Cingonius Varrus, Cingonius Varronis, m. put to death by Gaius, when he was consul elect. Tacitus has recorded an unjust and cruel motion made by him in the senate, which Nero opposed, and prevented from passing into a law (Ann. xiv. 45 seq.).

Cingulum, i. n. Cingoli, a town of Picenum, to the west of Ancōna, Ancona, built by T. Labienus (Cæs. B. C. i. 15). Inh. Cingulani, orum (Sing. Cingulanus, i), m. Adj. Cingulus, et, Cingulanus, a, um. Cingula sava (Sil. Ital. x. 34). Cingulanus ager, the territory of Cingoli. Plinius mentions Cingulani in Campania, of whose town and territory nothing is known.

Cinithii, orum, v. Cinthæ, arum, m. the Cinithians, a people of Africa, on the river Triton, the Kabes, near Syrtis Minor, the Gulf of Kabes (Tac. Ann. ii. 52).

Cinna, v. m. a Roman, who deserted to Hannibal, after the battle of Cannæ (Sil. Ital. x. 476).—2. (Hælvius Cinna), a tribune, who, at the order of C. Julius Caesar, had drawn up a bill to allow him to marry any woman, or any number of women, he chose, with the view of having children. He was killed by the mob, through mistake, at Caesar's funeral (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 52).—3. A poet mentioned by Virgilius (B. ix. 35), who was generally supposed to be C. Hælvius Cinna, who spent nine years in composing and correcting a poem which he called Myrma, to which Horatius has been thought to allude (Art. Poet. 388). Against this, it has been objected, that Hælvius Cinna having been mistaken for Cornélius Cinna, who inveighed with bitterness against C. Julius Caesar after his assassination, was torn in pieces by the enraged multitude, three years before this pastoral was written. With what certainty, and on what evidence, is the date of the pastoral fixed? or may not the poet have altered the names after it was written? It evidently could not be L. Cinna, the grandson of Pompeius, since there is no proof that he was a poet. We have the authority of both Ovidius and Martialis, that the poetry of Hælvius was not distinguished either by perspicuity of language, or purity of sentiment.—4. The husband of Martulla, whom Martialis holds up to disgrace for the infidelity of his wife (vi. 39).

Cinna. See Cornélius.

Cinnamus, i. m. a Roman, who sunk the last syllable of his name, probably that he might appear a descendant of the ancient family of Cinna. For this silly vanity Martialis ridicules him, adding, that if his name had originally been Furius, and he had, in the same manner, taken away the last three letters of his name, he would be called Fur, i. e. a thief (vi. 17).

Cinnia, v. f. Sitania, a town of Portugal (Val. Max. vi. 4).

Cinobellinus, i. m. a British king, father of Admnius q. v. (Suet. Cal. 44).

Cinyphus, i. m. v. Cinyps, yphis, m. the Wadiquaham, or the Macres, a river of Libya, between Syrtis Major, the Gulf of Zadiæ, and Syrtis Minor, the Gulf of Kabes. Hærodôtus informs us that it took its rise in the Hill of the Graces (iv. 175). Cinyphes, um (Sing. Cinyps, yphis, m. a people who dwelt on the banks of this river. Plinius makes Cinyps also a district watered by the river above-mentioned, and inhabited by the Cinyphes, in which he has followed Hærodôtus. Pomponius Mela states, that the ground on each side of this river was very fertile. Adj. Cinyphus, a, um, of Cinyphus; Libyan, African. Cinyphus chelydrius (Ov. Met. vii. 272). Cinyphus maritus, i. e. Cinyphus hircus (Mart. vii. 94).

Cinyps, yphis, m. a Carthaginian youth of great beauty, who stood high in the favour of Hannibal. He fell by the hand of Q. Asconius Pedianus (Sil. Ital. xii. 226 seq.).

Cinyras, v. m. a very brave leader of the Ligures (Virg. Æn. x. 186).—2. A king of Cyprus, according to Homerus, but Hæginus makes him a king of Assyria, a statement which agrees with Apollodorus, who says, that he was a son of Sandæus, that he afterwards went into Cyprus, where he built Paphos, Baffu, and married Metharmæ, daughter of Pygmalion, king of Cyprus, by whom he had two sons, Oxyphorus and Adonis, and three daughters, Orsedicæ, Læogoræ, and Bresia. His daughters having offended Venus, preferred death to life. Ovidius seems to consider the king of Assyria and the father of Adonis, different persons. The daughters of the former, for having considered themselves superior to Juno, were changed into the steps of her temple (Ov. Met. vi. 98). To him Tacitus ascribes the temple of Paphian Venus, which he built on the spot first touched by the goddess, when she emerged from the sea (Hist. ii. 3). This Cinyras, king of Assyria, was the son of Paphos, according to some mythologists; but there is the greatest uncertainty respecting his character and pedigree (Hom. Il. xi. 20).

Cinyrades, v. m. a descendant of Cinyras; or one who held the office of priest of the temple of Venus in Cyprus (Tac. Hist. ii. 3). Adj. Cinyreus, Cinareus, et, Cinyraus, a, um. Cinyreus juvenis, Adonis (Ov. Met. x. 712). Cinyreus heros (ib. 730). Cinyreia virgo, Myrrha q. v., whom Apollodorus does not make a daughter of Cinyras, but of Thôas, king of Assyria. Cinyreia germina, Myrrha (Stat. Syl. v. l. 214). Cinyrea Cyprus (Luc. Phar. viii. 716).

Cipērus, i. m. a Roman, originally a baker, afterwards a lawyer, whom Mārtiālis has honoured with an epigram of considerable severity! (viii. 16).

Circē, es, f. was the daughter of Sol and Pērcēs, and sister of Pērcēs and Āetes. She married a prince of Cōlchis, whom she murdered by poisonous herbs, in order to obtain his kingdom. Detested by her subjects, she fled to the island Circēii, off the coast of Italy, which was visited by Ulysses on his return from the Trojan war. She transformed all his companions into swine, which Ulysses escaped by means of an herb, moly, and afterwards compelled her to restore his companions. Here she fell in love with Glaucus, a sea-god, and, on observing that he preferred Sylla to her, she turned her rival into a sea-monster. She next formed an attachment to Picus, king of Italy, who despised her love, for which she transformed him into a bird of the same name (Ov. Met. xiv. 320 seq.). Vālērius Flāccus makes her the wife of that monarch (vii. 120 seq.).

Vērber Circēs, the whip of Circē, i. e. her magic wand, by the touch of it men were transformed into swine (Juv. Sat. xv. 21). Adj. Circēus, v. Circēius, et, Circēus, a, um. Circēa tellus, the island of Circē (Ov. Met. xv. 718). Circēum littus, the shore of the island in which Circē lived (Ov. Met. xiv. 248). Circēa mānia, the walls of Tuscūlum, from being built by Tēlēgōnus, son of Circē and Ulysses (Hor. Epod. i. 30). Circēum prōmōntōrium, Monte Circello. Circēa hērbē, magical herbs (Claud. xxii. 134). Circēus cāmpus, a plain in Cōlchis (Val. Flacc. v. 328).

Circēii, orum, m. v. Circēium, i. n. Circello, a town of Cāmpānia, belonging to the Vōlsci. It stood on Circēum prōmōntōrium, Monte Circello, and had an excellent harbour. Plinius says that it was formed by the retiring of the sea (i. 236), and that it was once an island, according to Hōmērus, surrounded by a large sea; but in his time a plain. Hōrātius commends the oysters of Circēii (Sat. ii. 4. 33), and Plinius says they were the very best (iv. 850). Thither Tāquīnius Sūpērbus sent colonies, which Cōriōlānus, with the Volscean army, expelled, and the town fell under its ancient possessors, in 491 B. C. The Vōlsci, however, did not retain it long, since the town, together with the whole nation, became, in a few years, subject to the dominion of Rome. Claverius states, that some vestiges remain on a mountain now called La Citta Vecchia. Inh. Circēienses, ium, m. Adj. Circēus, a, um, et, Circēiēnsis, is, e, of Circē, or, Circēii. Circēum jūgum, the promontory of Circello (Virg. Ēn. vii. 799). Circēiēnsia ostrēa (Plin. iv. 850).

Circēsum, v. Circēssum, i. n. Kerkisia, a town situated on the angle formed by Chābōras, the Al-Khabour, at its junction with Euphrātes, the El-Frat. The Roman emperor Diocletianus strengthened, by fortifications, this town, of which the position was naturally advantageous, and made it a barrier of the empire (Eutrop. ix. 2).

Circius, i. m. a violent northerly wind, which prevented ships from entering the harbour of Mōnēcus, Monaco. This name seems to have been confined to the coast of the Mediterranean at Genoa and westward (Luc. Phar. i. 408). To Circius, Silius Itālicus alludes (i. 585 seq.).—2. A mountain, part of Imāus (Plin. i. 590).

Circus, i. m. a place where games were celebrated at Rome, first marked out by Tāquīnius Priscus, after he had taken Apōlē. It was in the valley called Mūrcia, between the Aventine and Palatine hills, three stadia and a half in length, and one in breadth, containing, according to some, a hundred and fifty thousand, and, according to others, four hundred and eighty-five thousand, spectators. It seems doubtful if, in the early ages of the Roman state, the senators and knights enjoyed the comfort and distinction of having separate places assigned them, but it cannot be questioned that, at a future time, they had a particular space allotted them, where they erected for themselves seats, called Fōri. During the exhibition, they sat on benches fourteen feet above the ground, supported by forked sticks. Each Cūrla had a particular place, and, during the republic, if Diōnysius may be credited, the senators and knights sat not in any appropriated space, but as accident directed. Claudius set apart a division for the accommodation of the senators, and Nēro conferred a similar distinction on the knights. This place of amusement had afterwards the name of Circus Māximus. If plays were acted in this Circus, it must have been within flood-mark of Tiber, the Tevere, since they were interrupted, in 363 B. C., by the swelling of that river, which the superstition of the Romans considered a certain proof of the displeasure of the gods at their exhibition (Liv. i. 35: vii. 3). Adj. Circēnsis, is, e. Circēnsē tomentum, the stuffed seats in the Circus (Mart. xiv. 160).

Cirinius, i. m. a poet, who appears from Mārtiālis to have had a talent for writing excellent epigrams; besides, he was an affectionate friend (viii. 18).

Cirrhā, v. Cyrrhā, et, Crissa (Hom. Il. ii. 520), ae, f. Xeropégano, a town of Phōcis, which was the port of Dēlphī, Castri, and distant from it about sixty stadia. In going from Cirrhā to the temple of Apōllo at Dēlphī, Eumēnes, king of Asia, was nearly killed by assassins, whom Pērcēs, king of Mācedōnia, had employed for that purpose, in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 15). Domīnis Cirrhæ Nisæque, by the lords of Cirrhā and Nisæ, i. e. by Apōllo and Bacchus (Juv. Sat. vii. 64). Adj. Cirrhæus, a, um, of Cirrhā, Delphian. Cirrhæus ager, the territory of Cirrhā, which, in ancient times, was sacred to Apōllo, who is hence called Cirrhæus vātes (Juv. Sat. xlii. 79). In modern times, the plain produces a small quantity of wheat and barley; but is chiefly planted with olives. Cirrhæi cāmpi (Just. xxiv. 1. Plin. i. 409). Cirrhæa vātes, the Delphian priestesses (Luc. Phar. v. 115).

Cirta, a, m. a man in the Carthaginian army in Spain, whom Lātinus killed (Sil. Ital. xv. 447).

Cirta, ae, f. Constantina, a town of Nūmīdīa, on Ampsāga, the Sulgemar, at a considerable distance from the coast, once the royal residence, and a place of great wealth under Syphax. When Plinius wrote, it was a colony of veterans who had fought under C. Julius Caesar, and had been commanded by P. Sittius, hence called Sittānōrum Cōlōnia (Plin. i. 532. Pom. Mel. i. 46). It contains many beautiful remains of Roman works.

Cissus, ἴσος, m. a king of Thrācia, and father of Hecuba q. v., from whom she is called Cissis (Virg. Æn. v. 537). Cissis, ἰδία, f. Thēano (Hom. Il. vi. 299).—2. A son of Mēlampus, and brother of Gyas, killed by Ænēas (Virg. Æn. x. 317).

Cissia, α, f. a country of Pērsia. Inh. Cissii, orum, m. Adj. Cissius, a, um (Herod. v. 49 seq.).

Cita. See Fisius.

Cithæron, ὄνις, m. Elateā, a mountain of Bēotia, sacred to Bāchus (Ov. Met. ii. 223), on which Actæon was torn to pieces by his own dogs. It has two tops towards the north, and then throws out a regular outline until it joins mount Parnes. Has nothing grand or picturesque, is shrouded by deep gloom, and dreary desolation. Its height is much inferior to that of Hēlicon; it is barren, and incapable of cultivation, except towards the base, the rest is generally bare rock, covered with stunted shrubs; but the summit is crowned with silver fir (αἰσῆς), hence its modern name. Bochartus derives the name from צִיָּתָר, (cethare), a Chaldean word, signifying rocks, and quotes a passage from Aristophānes which supports that derivation. Nocturnus Cithæron, from the orgies of Bāchus being celebrated there during the night (Virg. Æn. iv. 303). Adj. Cithæronius, a, um. See Parnāsus.

Cithnos, i, f. See Cythus.

Citium, i, n. Larneca, Larnec, or, Chitti, a town of Cyp̄rus, at which Zēno, author of the Stoic philosophy, was born. The ancient name seems formed from the Cethim of Holy Writ, and the modern name denotes a place of burial. Here Cimon, the Athenian general, died, and the inhabitants paid him something resembling divine honours (Cor. Nep. Cim. 3). The town stood at the distance of a mile from the bay, to which it gives name. Adj. Citius, a, um. Citius Sinus, Salines Bay.—2. Chiti, a town of Mācedōnia, at which Pērcūs collected his whole forces, when he was going to make war against the Romans, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51). Citius, i, m. Capo di Chiti, a mountain on the confines of Mācedōnia (Liv. xlii. 21).

Civica Cērēālis, Civica Cērēālis, m. a man of consular rank, and governor of Asia, whom the emperor Dōmītiānus put to death, under pretext of his having formed a conspiracy against the state. From the expression used by Tacitus, there can be no doubt that he considered his life unjustly taken away (Agric. 42), and Suetonius seems to have been of the same opinion (Dom. 10).

Civismārus, i, m. a Gallic chieftain, killed in the battle at Aurinx (Liv. xxiv. 42).

Cius, i, f. Ghio; Kemlik (Turks), a city of Bithynia, afterwards called Prusa. Inh. Ciani, orum, m. (Theoc. xlii. 30. Liv. xxxi. 31).

Cius, i, m. a river which takes its rise near mount Rhodōpē, and falls into the Danube (Herod. iv. 49).

Clāmpētia, α, f. Amantea, a town in Brūtius ager, taken by P. Sēmprōnius Tūditānus, the Roman consul, in 206 B. C. It revolted from the Carthaginians to the Romans in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 38: xxx. 19).

Clānis, is, acc. in, m. a man at the battle of the Centaurs killed by Dēmōlēon (Ov. Met. xii. 379). The account of Valērius Flācens is somewhat different.—2. The brother of Clýtius, whom Pērcūs killed, transfixing both his thighs with an ashen spear (Ov. Met. v. 140).

Clānis, is, m. the Chiana, a river of Tuscan, one of the branches of Tiber, the Tevere (Tac. Ann. i. 79).

Clānius, i, m. a Roman, whose name is derived from the Italian river, now the L'Agno, and who fell in the first engagement with Hānnibal, after that general had crossed the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 188).

Clānius, i, m. the L'Agno, called also Lītērnus, a river of Cāmpānia, which runs past Acērrē, the most ancient town of Cāmpānia, to which the inundations of the L'Agno did great injury, hence Virgilius, Clānius non aquas Acērris (G. ii. 225).

Clārius, i, m. a surname of Apōllo, from Clāros, a city of Iōnia, where he had a famous Oracle. See Clāros.

Clāros, i, f. an island in Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago.—2. A town of Iōnia, near the north bank of Cāystros, the Kutchuk-Metender, built by Mānto, daughter of the prophet Tīrēslas, who, after the destruction of her native city, Thēbe, had fled to that country. The tears which she shed in consequence of her misfortunes, are said to have formed a lake, or rather a fountain, the waters of which inspired with poetic rapture whoever drank of them. She also established there the famous oracle of Apōllo, who is hence called Clārius. Adj. Clārius, a, um. Clārius Dēus, the Clarian god, i. e. Apōllo (Ov. Met. xi. 413). Clāria fīres, the doors of the temple of Apōllo at Clāros (Stat. Th. viii. 199).

Clārus, i, m. a brother of Sārpēdon, who fought in the army of Ænēas (Virg. Æn. x. 126).

Clāssis, is, f. a class. Sērvius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome, was the first who divided the Roman citizens into classes, according to the value of their properties. Prima clāssis, contained all who had property to the amount of a hundred thousand asses or upwards. Of this class he formed eighty centuries (centuriæ), forty of Sēniōres, i. e. men upwards of forty-five years of age, and forty centuries of Juniores, i. e. men from seventeen to forty-five; the elder to guard the city, and the younger to carry on war. Their defensive armour was a helmet, greaves, and a coat of mail, all of brass; their offensive arms were a spear and a sword. To this class he added two centuries of artists, who had the charge of the engines of war, and who served without arms. The citizens of the first class were called Clāssici, and all the rest infra classem. Sēcūnda clāssis, included all whose fortune amounted to seventy-five thousand asses, and did not rise to a hundred thousand asses. Their arms were the same as those of the first class, except a coat of mail, and an oblong shield (scutum), which covered the whole body, in place of a round shield (clypeus), which covered only the breast. This class consisted of twenty centuries. Tērtia clāssis had property valued at from fifty to seventy-five thousand asses. Of this class were formed likewise twenty centuries, and their arms were the same with those of the second class, only they had no greaves. The fortune of Clāssis quārta was from twenty-five thousand to fifty thousand asses. Their centuries were the same in number with the former, their arms were different, for they had only a spear (hasta), and a short javelin or dart (verutum), pointed with iron, like a spit, hence the name. Quinta classis, included all who had property from the value of eleven thousand to twenty-five thousand asses. It was divided into thirty centuries, and armed with slings and stones. The extraordinaries, hornblowers, and fifers, divided into three centuries, were distributed among the fourth class. A valuation below eleven thousand asses comprehended the rest of the people, who were formed into one century, and exempted from military service. After the infantry were armed and arranged, Servius raised twelve centuries of cavalry, of the first men of the state. Of the three centuries, Rhæmnenses, Luceres, and Tatienses, instituted by Romulus, and consisting of one hundred each, Servius formed six centuries, in each of which were three hundred, but he retained the three original names. To purchase horses they received ten thousand asses from the public funds, and, to maintain them, certain widows were appointed each to pay them annually two thousand asses. For the burden which was thus taken from the poor, and imposed on the rich, he in some measure compensated, by giving influence in the state, and honour to men of property. By the regulation of Romulus, which was in force to this period, the vote of every man was equal, but the division into centuries, while it allowed each to retain his own suffrage, conferred the whole power on the wealthiest men of the state. A considerable change had taken place before the period in which Livius lived (i. 42 seq.).

Clastidium, i. n. Chiastezza, or, Chiasleggio, a town of Gallia Cispadana, betrayed to Hannibal by Dastus, a native of Brundisium, in 220 B. C. It served as a granary to the Carthaginians. In 198 B. C., Clastidium surrendered to the Roman consul, Q. Minicius Rufus, and the troops under his command burned it to the ground (Liv. xxi. 48—xxxii. 31).

Clavarium, i. m. a donative given to the Roman soldiers, to enable them to purchase nails for their shoes, whence the name (Tac. Hist. iii. 50).

Claudia, æ, f. a vestal virgin, who rushed between her father and a tribune of the people, who attempted to drag him from his triumphal car, and, by her resolution and celerity, secured to her parent the honours which his merits had obtained for him, about 265 B. C. (Val. Max. v. 4).—2. Sister of P. Claudius Pulcher q. v. Pressed by the crowd as she returned from the games, in 248 B. C., she cried out, "I wish my brother were alive, and had again the command of the fleet," for which she was fined (Liv. Ep. 19).—3. The daughter of P. Claudius and Fulvia, who was afterwards married to M. Antonius, and first wife of Augustus. To a quarrel with his mother-in-law must be referred his divorcing Claudia, a virgin (Suet. Aug. 62).—4. Daughter of the Roman Emperor Claudius and Plautia Urgulanilla, whom he ordered to be thrown naked at her mother's door. Biter, a freedman of the Emperor, was in reality her father (Suet. Claud. 27).

Claudia Perpetua, Claudie Perpetuæ, f. wife of Pudens, on whose marriage Martialis writes an epigram (iv. 13). Perhaps she is the same with Claudia Rufina q. v.

Claudia Pulchra, Claudie Pulchræ, f. accused by Domitius Afer of adultery with Furnius, of intention to poison the Emperor Tiberius, and of practising magical incantations. Agrippina, her near relation, who knew that this trial was a prelude to her own destruction, made a powerful and animated appeal in her favour, which had not the effect of preserving her life (Tac. Ann. iv. 52).

Claudia Quinta, Claudie Quintæ, f. a priestess of Cybele, or, Cybebê, who, having been falsely accused of impurity, produced evidence of her innocence, by supplicating the goddess to grant or refuse her request according to her desert. The ship, in which that goddess was conveyed to Rome, ran ashore on the Tevere, and no force could remove her from the bank, when Cybebê, to whom Claudia appealed to disprove the false accusation, followed the rope as soon as she took it into her hand (Ov. Fast. iv. 305 seq.). Livius only mentions, that Claudia was amongst the most distinguished of the matrons, and that her chastity had been doubted, but says nothing of her being a priestess of Cybebê, or any other deity (xxix. 14). To her Statius alludes (Syl. i. 2. 245).

Claudia Rufina, Claudie Rufinæ, m. a native of Britain, whose beauty and merits Martialis celebrates (xi. 54).

Claudia Sacrata, Claudie Sacratæ, f. an Ubian, to whom Cerialis Petilius had formed an attachment (Tac. Hist. v. 22).

Claudia Silana, Claudie Silanæ, f. daughter of M. Silanius, was married to the Roman emperor Caligula, in the year 33. She died in childbed (Tac. Ann. vi. 20, 45). Suetonius calls her Junia Claudilla (Callig. 12).

Claudiopolis, is, f. formerly Olbasa, now Mout, a town of Isauria, on the river Calycadnus, so called from the Emperor Claudius (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8).—2. Claudia, a town near the junction of Arsanias, the Armenian, with Euphrates, the El-Prot.

Claudius, a, um, et, Claudialis, is, e. Claudia gens, v. tribus, a very ancient and distinguished clan of the Romans, which Varro derives from Clausus q. v. (Liv. vi. 20). Flaminium Claudiale (Tac. Ann. xiii. 2).

Claudius, i, m. a Roman historian, mentioned by Livius (ix. 5). He wrote annals, translated those of Acilius from Greek into Latin, continued the narrative from the period at which that author stopped, to his own times. According to A. Gellius, his integrity, and the simplicity of his style, claimed higher praise than his elegance (ix. 13).

Claudius, i, m. Reha, or, Billa, a mountain in Pannonia, of which, says Plinius, the Scordisci were in front, and the Taurisci on the back (i. 35).

Claudius Esopus, Claudii Esopi, m. an eminent tragedian, under whom, Plutarchus writes, Cicero studied elocution. He acquired enormous wealth, although he appears to have been exceedingly profuse and extravagant (Plin. ii. 443).—2. The son of the former, to whom his father bequeathed the prodigious riches which he had obtained. The folly, profusion, and unmeaning luxury of this man seem to have been carried to the utmost degree of wasteful prodigality, of which Hörätius gives one remarkable instance (Sat. ii. 3. 239), and more will be found in Plinius (ii. 337). The dissolving of valuable pearls, and then swallowing them, appears to have been common at Rome about the time Hörätius wrote.

Claudius Apollināris, Claudii Apollināris, m. prefect of a Roman fleet, whose vices rendered him more like a gladiator than a superior officer (Tac. Hist. iii. 76).

Claudius Asellus, Claudii Aselli, m. a Roman, distinguished for his horsemanship, whom, at the time Q. Fabius Maximus, the consul, was encamped in Campānia, Cerrius Jübēllus Taurēa challenged to single combat. With the permission of the consul, Claudius Asellus accepted the challenge, and the two combatants displayed great bravery by parrying each other's strokes; so that the battle continued for some time without a wound on either side. Taurēa then proposed that they should go down from the plain into a hollow road where there would be no opportunity for wheeling. Claudius Asellus instantly leapt down his horse, when Taurēa thought it prudent to give his opponent the slip, and to quit the field, so that the honour of the victory belonged to Claudius Asellus (Liv. xxiii. 46, 47).

Claudius Civilis, Claudii Civilis, m. called Julius Civilis (Tac. Hist. i. 59), a commander of the Batavians, who fought, for a considerable time, against the Romans, displaying the skill of an eminent general, and the resolute bravery of a determined enemy. Continued adversity sunk the vigour of his mind, and his love of life induced him at last to surrender to the Romans. From the loss of an eye, he called himself a Sertōrius or a Hannibal. He was of royal descent, and the brother of Jūlius Paullus (Tac. Hist. iv. 13—v. 26).

Claudius Claudianus, Claudii Claudiani, m. a Latin poet of great celebrity, was born at Alexāndria, in Ægyptus, Ægypt, about the year 365. Of his parents, education, and employment, in his early years, no certain information has been transmitted to modern times. Respecting the place of his birth different opinions have prevailed, which seems wonderful, since he has marked it so distinctly in different parts of his writings. It is doubtful what language his parents spoke, although it is unquestionable, that, if Greek was not his native tongue, he soon acquired a thorough knowledge of it. He informs us, that he wrote poems in that language before he attempted composition in Latin verse. Rome became the place of his residence, when he was about thirty years of age. Here he obtained the friendship and patronage of Stilicho, in whose praise he has written three poems of considerable length, and several sarcastic and bitter invectives against his enemies. Through his patrons he obtained both wealth and honours. He stood high in the favour of the emperor Hōnōrius, who, in conjunction with his brother Arcadius, by order of the senate, erected a statue of brass in honour of the poet. To this flattering testimony of public approbation he alludes (xxv. 7), and the pedestal, discovered at Rome near the end of the fifteenth century, bears an inscription reflecting the highest credit both on the character of the poet, and the munificence of the persons by whom it was erected. The princess Sērēna, who had a particular regard for Claudianus, married him to a native of Libya, of high rank and great wealth. This act of kindness he gratefully records (xl. 37 seq.). He served as a tribune, and had the charge of Notary, but he does not appear to have ever obtained the consulship. On the condemnation of Stilicho, he suffered severely from the persecuting and unforgiving temper of Adrianus, an Egyptian, who succeeded that minister. From this period, we know nothing certain of his residence, future life, or even the place where he died. As a poet, his writings rank him high among the bards of Italy. His verse has not the majesty of Virgilius, nor the purity of style which distinguishes the poetry of Hörätius; but in ease and harmony perhaps no Latin poet surpasses him. The elegant flow of his lines merits high commendation, and his style, though not vigorous, is spirited and perspicuous. He excels in description, and his invectives against Eutrōpius and Rūfinus scarcely fall short of the pointed and sarcastic censure of Jūvenālis. In a few passages his indelicacy offends the pure-minded reader. Few of the Latin poets, however, whose subjects are of the same kind, have not oftener incurred censure in this respect than Claudianus. Some critics place him next to Hōmērus and Virgilius, an elevation to which he certainly has no just claim. His only work of any length is "The carrying off of Prōserpina," which he either left unfinished, or that poem has not been transmitted entire. Although the merit of the author is very considerable, yet this composition cannot be ranked among Epic poems, which the partiality of several modern writers has attempted, having nothing either in design or structure in common with that highest species of poetical composition. Supposing that he had thrown it into that form, it could not bear to be set in opposition to the Pharsalia of Lucan, much less to the Thebaid of Statius. The sacred poems must be referred to some other author, since Claudianus did not embrace Christianity, but remained in heathenism, which his own writings sufficiently evince, without the testimony of contemporary authors.

Claudius Cōssus, Claudii Cōssi, m. a Helvetian, possessed of great eloquence, sent by his countrymen as an ambassador to the Emperor Vitellius, on which occasion his powerful influence over the passions of his audience soothed the irritated minds of the soldiers, who bawled out for the destruction of the Helvetian race, besides threatening the deputies, saved the lives of the ambassadors, and preserved the state (Tac. Hist. i. 69).

Claudius Dēmianus, Claudii Dēmiani, m. a man of abandoned character, whom L. Antistius Vetus, proconsul of Asia, had charged with different crimes, and sent in chains to Rome. The Emperor Nero set him at liberty, on purpose that his agency might assist in cutting off Antistius and his whole family (Tac. Ann. xvi. 10).

Claudius Drusus, Claudii Drusi, m. a Roman, who erected a statue of himself with a crown at Appli Forum, and endeavoured, through his dependants, to make himself master of Italy (Suet. Tib. 2).

Claudius Fävētīnus, Claudii Fävētīni, m. a centurion under Gālba, who cashiered him with ignominy. At a future period, he prevailed on the fleet at Misēnum, Capo di Miseno, to revolt from Vitēllius to Vēspāsianus. By forging letters from Vēspāsianus, promising great rewards to all who joined his party, he accomplished that important object solely by fraud and deception without assistance from any one (Tac. Hist. iii. 57).

Claudius Glīcia, Claudii Glīcie, m. a man of the lowest rank, whom Claudius Pūlcher, the Roman consul, named dictator, after he had been defeated in a naval engagement by the Carthaginians. Although Claudius Glīcia was compelled to abdicate the office, yet he attended the games in his dictatorial robes (Liv. Ep. 19).

Claudius Jūliānus, Claudii Jūliāni, m. an officer under Vitēllius, whom that emperor sent to Misēnum, Capo di Miseno, to bring back to their allegiance the marines on board the fleet which Claudius Fävētīnus had gained over to the interest of Vēspāsianus. As soon as he arrived at the rebel camp, instead of performing with fidelity the duty to which he had been appointed, he acted the part of a traitor, by joining the revolted, who had declared for Vēspāsianus. Here he commanded the gladiators; but from neglect of duty fell into the hands of L. Vitēllius, who first scourged and then put him to death (Tac. Hist. iii. 57—77).

Claudius Lābēo, Claudii Lābēonis, m. commander of the Batavian cavalry, and rival of Claudius Civilis (Tac. Hist. iv. 18—66).

Claudius Phīrricus, Claudii Phīrrici, m. commanded the ships at Corsica in the year 69, and Dēcimus Pācārius put him to instant death, because he objected to the design of seducing the inhabitants to the interest of Vitēllius (Tac. Hist. ii. 16).

Claudius Pōllio, Claudii Pōlliōnis, m. a man of prætorian rank, but of vicious morals, against whom Nēro wrote a poem entitled "Luscio" (Suet. Dom. 1).

Claudius Sāgitta, Claudii Sāgittæ, m. commanded the body of cavalry called Pētrīna, and arrived in Africa in time to put L. Piso, the consul, on his guard against a person sent to murder him (Tac. Hist. iv. 49).

Claudius Sāctus, Claudii Sācti, m. a man of ferocious countenance, remarkable stupidity, and deformed by the want of an eye, who acted as a guide to the thirteenth legion, ordered to march into the region of the Trēviri in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. iv. 62).

Claudius Sēnēcio, Claudii Sēnēciōnis, m. the son of a freedman, recommended to the emperor Nēro by his luxury and clandestine vices (Tac. Ann. xiii. 12).

Claudius Sēvērus, Claudii Sēvēri, m. the commander of the Helvetians at the time they revolted from the Romans, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 68).

Claudius Timārchus, Claudii Timārchī, m. a native of Crēta, Candia, whom Pætus Thrāsēa attempted to banish from that island by a sentence of the senate, in the year 69. The consuls objected, and the decree did not pass (Tac. Ann. xv. 20).

Claudius Victor, Claudii Victōris, m. a sister's son of Claudius Civilis, who placed him and Jūlius Māximus over his veteran troops, and the bravest of the Germans (Tac. Hist. iv. 33).

Appius Claudius, Appii Claudii, m. See Attus Clausus.—2. Surnamed Sābinus Rēgillēnsis, son of Attus Clausus, was elected consul, in 471 B.C., with T. Quinctius Bār-bātus Cāpitōlinus, although he both hated the commons and was hated by them in consequence of his father's contentions with the plebeian tribunes. The violence of his temper brought the commons to the verge of a rebellion; but the mildness of his colleague soothed their rage, and prevented commotion. The troops which he marched against the Vōlsci fled, on purpose to show their aversion to Claudius, on which he summoned an assembly, reproached with just severity the conduct of the army, and proceeded to punishment. The soldiers who had thrown down their arms were beaten and beheaded, likewise the standardbearers who had lost their standards, and all the centurions and privates who were entitled to double allowance and had quitted their ranks. Of the rest, every tenth man was selected by lot and punished. A day was fixed for his trial, when he appeared with the same haughtiness and contempt of the people as he had shown on former occasions; he inveighed with the same vehemence in his speeches, employed the same harshness of language, and displayed the same fierceness of countenance which he had ever done; no entreaties of the senate could prevail on him to act otherwise, and his intrepidity had the effect of astonishing the tribunes and commons, who adjourned his trial to another day; but, before it arrived, he was seized with a distemper and died. The tribunes wished to deprive him of a funeral panegyric, which the people opposed, and they not only listened with favourable attention to his praises, but in great numbers attended his funeral (Liv. ii. 56—61).—3. Surnamed, by Suetōnius, Rēgillānus (from Rēgillum, the birthplace of the first of the Claudii), was, in consequence of his being consul elect, appointed one of the first decemviri, and appears to have been at the head of that magistracy. He was a man of a violent and cruel disposition, of great ambition, and unrestrained passions. Most of the atrocities and acts of flagrant injustice which the decemviri committed, may probably be referred to him. With the first decemviri, who were men of dignity and weight in the state, and acted with great justice, moderation, and clemency, his influence must have been very limited. The second decemviri were creatures of his appointment, low in rank, and vicious in conduct. They lent their aid to all his plans, however iniquitous, cruel, or oppressive. By the murder of many of the plebeians, and confiscation of their property, he bribed a number of the young patricians who stood round the tribunal and contributed to the gratification of every wish of this monster of lust. His conduct towards Virgīnia q. v., excited, at last, an insurrection in the state which put an end to the decemviral power. The father of this virgin succeeded in procuring a day to be fixed for the trial of Appius Claudius, and in committing him to prison, where he, anticipating his sentence, died by his own hand, on which his property was confiscated (Liv. iii. 33—58).—4. Son of the former, elected a tribune of the soldiers, with military authority, in 423 B.C. He was a young man of activity, but had a violent hatred at the commons, and their tribunes, probably on his father's account. His colleagues left him præfect of Rome, when they went into the country of the Hernici to ascertain whether the Volsi were plundering their country. Before their departure, they had suggested to the senate the propriety of electing consuls, in which Appius concurred (Liv. iv. 35, 36).—5. Surnamed Crassus, a grandson of the decemvir, who adopted the opinions and supported the arguments of his ancestors with respect to the tribunical power. In 402 B.C., he was elected a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority. From his long experience and powerful mind he was listened to with attention; and, when his colleagues set out for Veii, they left him at Rome for the purpose of thwarting the turbulent schemes of the tribunes. Livius has recorded his speech against these restless and seditious magistrates, and in favour of a winter camp against Veii, in which he succeeded, and the town fell into the hands of the Romans. His proposal with respect to the plunder of Veii was not adopted, although certainly more judicious than that of P. Licinius which was carried (Liv. iv. 48 seq.).—6. Another grandson of the decemvir, who, in character, bore a strong resemblance to his cousin. Against the tribunes of the people, and the conduct of the commons, as well as against the laws proposed by C. Licinius Stolo and L. Sextius, he made a long and able speech, which had the effect of causing these laws to be deferred to a future period. On the defeat and death of L. Genucius, the plebeian consul, in 361 B.C., he was appointed dictator, to command in the war against the Hernici, who had suffered a defeat before his arrival, and a second after he had taken the command of the army. In 348 B.C., he was elected consul, and died in the midst of preparation for war against the Gauls, when the whole administration of affairs fell on his colleague, L. Furius Camillus (Liv. vi. 40 seq.).—7. (Surnamed Cæcus, in the consular calendar, from his loss of sight), was censor with C. Plautius, in 312 B.C. In consequence of the hatred excited against them from their choice of senators, Plautius abdicated his office, but Claudius, despising the clamours of the people, retained the censorship, and rendered the year memorable by making a road, Appia Via, which has transmitted his name to modern times, and by bringing water into the city from two springs, the one called Cæcilæus, the other Curtius and Albadinus (Suet. Claud. 20). By his advice the gens Pottia q. v. taught the public servants to perform the rites of Hæcules; in one year the whole family became extinct. Some years after, he became blind, and the superstitious Romans ascribed this calamity to the wrath of the gods for his recommending the Pottii to delegate their duties as priests of Hæcules. To the disgust of all ranks, he retained the censorship after the legal period had expired, nor did he resign it until the tribunes prohibited his standing candidate for the consulship, because he was censor. He succeeded in his election, was afterwards interrex, and a second time consul. In Tuscany, which fell by lot as his province, he neither displayed the talents of a general nor the integrity of a virtuous man. Yet, with the assistance of his colleague, he gained a victory over the enemy. On the expiry of his consulship, he was elected prætor, when he gained another victory over the Samnites. Like others of his family he was unfriendly to the advancement of the plebeians, exerting his whole influence against the law rendering them eligible to the offices of Pœntifex and Augur (Liv. ix. 29 seq.). The Emperor Tiberius was, by his father's side, descended from Tiberius Claudius Nêro, son of Cæcus, and by his mother's descent from Appius Claudius Pûlcher, another son of the same man (Suet. Tib. 3). To him Tacitus alludes, under the name of Appius Cæcus (Orat. 18). Adj. Appius, a, um, Appia via. Claudia aqua.—8. The father-in-law of Tib. Sêmprônus Græchus, with whom and his brother, C. Sêmprônus Græchus, he was joined in a commission to carry into effect the Agrarian law (Liv. Ep. 58).—9. Surnamed Crassus, was consul at Rome, with P. Sêmprônus Sôphus, in 270 B.C., and during that year they triumphed over the Picentes (Eutrop. ii. 16).—10. Son of Appius Claudius Pûlcher, consul in 40 B.C., and one of the lewd intimates of Jûlia, daughter of Augustus (Vel. Pat. ii. 100).

Appius Claudius Caudex. See Appius Claudius Pûlcher Caudex.

Appius Claudius Cêntho, Appii Claudii Cênthônis, m. was appointed curule edile, in 180 B.C., and, four years after, prætor, when he defeated the Cæltibæri in Spain, for which he had the honour of an ovation. After having been sent ambassador to Thessaly, where he settled the differences between the two contending parties of that country, and afterwards to demand restitution from the Macedonian king, the consul A. Hestilius Mâncinus gave him the command of four thousand men to protect the Illyrii. To these he added eight thousand men and overran part of their country, but was defeated by the inhabitants of Uscâna (Liv. xl. 59 seq.).

Appius Claudius Nêro, Appii Claudii Nêronis, m. had the command in the south of Spain, as prætor, in 197 B.C. Six years after, he was one of ten ambassadors sent to examine and adjust the affairs of Asia (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).

Appius Claudius Pûlcher, Appii Claudii Pûlchri, m. a distinguished Roman, who, after being edile, was raised to the prætorship, in 217 B.C., when Sardinia fell to his lot, where he performed nothing memorable. In 214 B.C., he enjoyed the consulship, carried on war against Hannibal, took the Carthaginian camp near Bénéventum, not however without great loss of men, and put to the sword the Campanians who had come hither, with two thousand carts, for grain. On the arrival of his colleague, they sold the spoil of the camp, and divided it. Hannibal came up, and offered them battle, which terminated without advantage on either side, in consequence of the questor, Cn. Cornélius, appearing in sight, and each party supposing him to belong to the other. The consuls afterwards renewed with great vigour the siege of Clâpua, around which they had at one time three prætorian pavilions. Here Claudius received a mortal wound, and died before the surrender of the town (Liv. xxii. 53 seq.).—2. A tribune of the soldiers in Greece, under T. Quinctius Flâminius, in 199 B.C. The long continuance of his command, and peror, was suspected of having been the cause of shortening his days, because it was the intention of Augustus that Claudius should succeed him in the throne in preference to either of her sons. He was buried in the mausoleum of Augustus, who paid every degree of respect to his memory. Virgil has immortalized the virtues of this prince in one of the most beautiful and splendid passages of the whole Æneid (vi. 860—887). To him Hörätius alludes, fama Mæcælli crescit velut arbor occulto ævo, the fame of Mæcællus grows imperceptibly like a tree (Od. i. 12. 45, 46). Theatrum Mæcælli, a theatre which the Emperor Augustus built and called by the name of his son-in-law, M. Claudius Mæcællus (Tac. Ann. iii. 64). To this, Mæcællus alludes (x. 51). Adj. Mæcællinus, et, Mæcællianus, a. m.

M. Claudius (v. Clodius) Püpienus Mæximus, M. Claudii Püpieni Mæximi, m. whom some call M. Claudius Mæximus Püpienus, was a man of low extraction, his father having been either a locksmith or a wheelwright, but his merits as a soldier raised him to distinction in the Roman army, on which account, after obtaining several degrees of promotion, he was appointed consul, and this office was followed by the proconsulship of Bithynia, Græcia, and Gællia Nærbônensis. In every office he not only maintained, but increased, his reputation, by his prudence and steadiness. His morals were irreproachable, but his love of justice and integrity rendered him austere, for which reason, the people, on raising him to the emperorship, thought it necessary to temper the austerity of Püpienus with the mildness of Bælbînus q. v. The senate elected them on the death of the Gordîani, and regulated their choice, not by personal consideration, but by a just estimate of the excellence of these two men. The reign of Püpienus was short, not exceeding one year. He laid siege to Aquilæa, because the people refused to admit him within their gates. The bravery of their resistance baffled his military skill, and this want of success excited his indignation against the army, which he reproached by calling them cowards, and putting some of the officers to death. This conduct excited the displeasure of the troops, which was gratified by the prætorians killing him and his son, who was of the same name, in the year 238. In some histories he is called Mæximus, or Mæximinus, and in others, Püpienus. Eutropius gives him the latter name (ix. 2).

M. Claudius Tæcitus, M. Claudii Tæciti, m. was elected emperor by the Roman senate after the murder of Aurélianus, in the year 275. A mutual respect between the senate and the armies distinguished the six months which elapsed between the death of Aurélianus and appointment of his successor. The army referred the choice to the senate, and the senate imitated the example of the army by referring it back to them. This unusual compliment was thrice repeated, and during the whole time universal tranquillity prevailed, no enemy invaded the Roman territories, no usurper started up to disturb the public peace. At last the barbarians made an inroad into France, and matters admitting of no longer delay, the senate, at the suggestion of the consul, Vélius Cœrnificius Gordîanus, proceeded to take the votes, when Tæcitus, then a venerable old man, upwards of seventy years of age, was unanimously elected. In early life he had cultivated learning with success, and his strong attachment to literary pursuits rendered him averse to pomp and ambition. His character ranked him rather among philosophers than politicians, whilst his gentleness, gravity, and moderation commanded the esteem, not only of his acquaintances, but of the public. Amongst his ancestors he reckoned the historian of this name, an honour which history furnishes no means of determining whether well or ill founded. He refused the empire, and of his sincerity no doubt can be entertained, since he recommended Prôbus, a much younger man, of greater bodily strength, and, consequently, of greater fitness for the fatigues of imperial authority, whilst he equalled him in virtue, and, perhaps, excelled him in mental ability. After the usual formalities, he assumed the reins of government, under him the ancient dignity and authority of the senate revived, and the senators rejoiced at the recovery of their ancient privileges and influence. Many wise regulations adorn the short reign of Tæcitus. He loved simplicity, frugality, decency, and cleanliness. He had a taste for architecture, and took pleasure in hunting. In whatever related to the state, he showed a liberality and magnificence becoming an emperor. To the writings of Tæcitus he paid great attention, causing so many copies to be annually transcribed, and sent to the different libraries. Posterity must regret, that this extraordinary care has not preserved the one-half of the valuable writings of that historian. Justice to the memory of his predecessor, and a regard for his own security, demanded the punishment of that emperor's murderers, and his tenderness in sparing, or inactivity in finding out, several who had been concerned in that crime, contributed neither to his happiness nor security. Although chiefly devoted to literature, yet his success against the Goths in Asia, when he placed himself at the head of the troops, proved his skill in military affairs. After his victory, he proposed returning to Europe, when his relation, Mæximinus, whom he had appointed governor of Syria, fell by the hand of his enemies, who, having joined the surviving conspirators, next murdered the emperor, after a reign of two hundred days, either at Tyâna in Cæppadôcia, or, Tarsus, Tersous, in Cilicia (Eutrop. ix. 16). Nêro Claudius Drûsi, Nêronis Claudii Drûsi, m. son of Tiberius Claudius Nêro and Livia, who bore him three months after she became the wife of Augustus. In early life he discovered uncommon abilities, which secured to him the highest offices in the state, when under the age prescribed by law. Hörätius has sung his victories over the Rheti and Vindélici, Alpine nations, and he afterwards was equally successful against the Germans, on which account he received the surname of Gêrmânicus. In the latter expedition he formed a communication between Rhênus, the Rhine, and Sâla, the Iselle, a distance of four thousand paces, stormed several cities on both sides of the Rhine, and suppressed an insurrection in France, raised on account of the taxes which the Romans had levied in that country, in 13 B. C. He subdued the Cherûsci, Tenchtêri, Cætti, and other German nations on the east of the Rhine. Next year he carried on war in the same country, in which Sennectius and Anectius, tribunes from the nation of the Nervii, were his most distinguished opponents. In the following campaign, his horse fell upon his leg, by which accident it was broken, and he died on the thirtieth day after the fracture. His brother, Tib. Claudius Nero, on hearing of the misfortune, hastened to him with most uncommon speed, but he only arrived in time to see him breathe his last. He brought the body to Rome, where it was buried in the tomb of C. Julius Caesar. Augustus pronounced the funeral oration, and the highest honours were paid to the remains of this noble and gallant youth, whose death was a severe calamity to the Roman state. He married Antonia the younger, by whom he had Germanicus Caesar q. v. (Liv. Ep. 136 seq. Flor. iv. 12). Adj. Drusianus, a. um. Drusiana fossa, the canal above-mentioned.

P. Claudius, P. Claudii, m. a Roman, who was prefect of the allies, in 209 B. C., and sent by the consul, with Tib. Claudius Asellus at the head of the troops which were to lie in ambush, and next day attacked Hannibal in the rear, whilst the consul engaged him in front (Liv. xxvii. 41).—2. An officer in the Roman army, under T. Quinctius Flamininus, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 29).—3. A tribune of the soldiers in the second legion, who fell in an engagement with the Boii, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 36).

P. Claudius, v. Clodius Pulcher, P. Claudii Pulchri, m. son of Appius Claudius Cæcus, held the consulship in 251 B. C., and, in opposition to the auspices, engaged the Carthaginians at sea, when a signal loss was the consequence of his rashness (Liv. Ep. 19: id. xxii. 42).

Valerius Maximus has recorded that the sacred chickens refused to eat, on which he ordered them to be thrown into the sea, saying, "since they are unwilling to eat, let them drink" (l. 4). For the loss of the fleet he was condemned (Cic. Div. i. 16. Nat. Deor. ii. 3).—2. Was elected a curule ædile in 191 B. C., with Ser. Sulpicius Galba. From the fines on corn-merchants for raising the markets by hoarding the grain, they dedicated twelve gilded shields. After he had held the jurisdiction of the city for a year, the extraordinary exertions of his brother Appius, consul, procured him the consulship, in 187 B. C., in opposition to some tribunes of the people, several powerful candidates, and the greater part of the senate. Liguria was decreed the province both of him and his colleague. He was one of the three commissioners for establishing the colony at Graviscæ, in 183 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 35 seq.).—3. A Roman of noble birth and great talents, but of the most licentious life, and most depraved morals. He was accused of crimes which cannot even be named. His quarrel with Lucullus, who was married to one of his sisters, and the mutiny which he excited among his troops, occasioned the recall of that general from the Mithridatic war. The senate then appointed Pompeius commander of the forces in Asia Minor, who soon obliged the king of Pontus to accept such terms as he chose to offer. Compelled to quit the camp of Lucullus, Clodius obtained from Mærcus Rex, the governor of Cilicia, who was married to another of his sisters, the command of his fleet. Being taken prisoner by the pirates, he applied to Ptolemæus, king of Egypt, to purchase his ransom, who sent him only two talents, which the pirates despised, and released him without remuneration. This insult of Ptolemæus he resented, by appointing, when tribune, Cato to reduce Cyprus to a Roman province. On returning to Rome, he was detected, disguised in a female dress, in the house of Cæsar, when his wife Pompeia, with other matrons, was celebrating the worship of Bona Dea. On being discovered, he fled; but he was brought to trial for profaning the solemn rites of that goddess. Clodius had then recourse to the most profuse and open bribery, by means of which he was acquitted. Cicero appeared in the prosecution as a witness against him. Hence, the hatred of Clodius against Cicero, whose banishment, under pretence of his having put the accomplices of Cætilina to death contrary to law, he, by the most iniquitous and violent means, at last effected. He obtained the office of tribune, in consequence of his being adopted by C. Herennius, a plebeian younger than he, afterwards that of edile, and was killed by Milo, when a candidate for the prætorship. Cicero, who had been recalled through the united interest of Milo and Pompeius, to mortify Clodius, pleaded the cause of Milo, who was, notwithstanding, condemned, and banished to Massilia, Marseilles. See T. Annius Milo. Juvénalis, in allusion to his wicked life, has, Si Clodius accuset machos, Cætilina Cethegum (Sat. ii. 27). Adj. Clodius, et, Clodianus, a. um. Clodia lex, the law by which Cyprus was taken from Ptolemæus, in 59 B. C. (Suet. Dom. 9).

Q. Claudius, Q. Claudii, m. a tribune of the people, who introduced a law, that no senator, or son of a senator, should have a sea-ship of more than three hundred amphoræ, a size sufficient for carrying the produce of their farms, and that all traffic was becoming a senator. C. Flamininus supported this law, while all the rest of the senators violently opposed it (Liv. xxi. 63).—2. A flamen, who obtained Tarentum, Taranto, as his province, when prætor, in 211 B. C. For several years after, he was continued proprietor (Liv. xxvii. 21 seq.).

Q. Claudius Quadrigrælus, Q. Claudii Quadrigræli, m. a Roman historian, whose name occurs several times in Livy's history. He translated the annals of C. Cælius from Greek into Latin, and continued the history to his own times (Liv. vi. 42 seq.). His name is often written Claudius. A. Gellius frequently quotes from this historian (i. 25 seq.).

Tib. Claudius Asellus, Tib. Claudii Aselli, m. a tribune of the soldiers, and afterwards a prætor, in 208 B. C., when Sardinia fell to his lot (Liv. xxvii. 41 seq.). In the former office he was joined in command with P. Claudius q. v., prefect of the allies.—2. A plebeian edile, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 11).

Tib. Claudius Drusus Cæsar, Tib. Claudii Drusi Cæsaris, m. the fifth Roman emperor, was the son of Decimus, afterwards Nero Drusus, and Antonia the younger. His parents had several children; but only three, Germanicus, Livilla, and Claudius, survived their father. The last was born at Lugdunum, Lyons, named Tiberius Drusus Caesar; on the adoption of his elder brother into the Julian family, he took the surname of Germanicus. His father died when he was an infant, and the various diseases to which he was subject in his earlier years, debilitated both his body and mind. Even his mother spoke with contempt both of his person and talents; nor did his grandmother, Augusta, the sister of the second Roman emperor, treat him with less disrespect. Notwithstanding these discouragements, he applied with assiduity to the study of the liberal sciences, in which he made considerable progress. His success, however, did not raise him in the opinion of his relations, and he continued to be esteemed unfit either for public or private employment. Thus disappointed and mortified, after repeated attempts to obtain an office of state, he gave himself up to indolence and vicious company. However, on the accession of his brother's son, C. Caligula, he received some public appointments, although it does not appear that he was ever treated with ordinary respect, and his numerous attempts at popularity rather sunk, than exalted, him in the opinion of the Romans. He obtained the empire by accident. On the death of his nephew, a common soldier discovered him concealed behind the hangings of a door, and poor Claudius, expecting nothing but death, was astonished to see the soldier kneeling at his feet, and saluting him emperor. The senate debated for some days about re-establishing the republic; but the commons, insisting on the government of one man, the succession was confirmed to Claudius. He promised to each of the soldiers who supported him, fifteen thousand sesterces, and was the first of the Caesars who purchased their fidelity by money. Many of his subsequent acts merit high approbation, and had they proceeded from a vigorous mind, or respectable character, would unquestionably have been extolled by Roman writers. His government, for the same reason, was disturbed by conspiracies, and a civil war was raised against him by Publius Camillus Scribonianus, his lieutenant-general in Dalmatia, which superstition, not the energy of the emperor, terminated. Ambitious of military distinction, he undertook an expedition against the Britons, was some time on the island, received the submission of a few of the petty states, for which he exhibited a most splendid triumph on his return to Rome. He enacted a number of useful laws, in which caprice or accident, rather than prudence and judgment, appeared. The reader of his life finds much to censure, both in his conduct and government, arising from a feeble mind, and corrupted principles. He exempted the Ilienses from all taxes for ever, considering them as the forefathers of the Roman people. He banished the Jews from the city, from their being impelled to commotions at the instigation of one Christus, probably a Greek, professing the Jewish religion. He entered into marriage contracts with two wives, Æmilia Lepida, grand-daughter of Augustus, whom he divorced a virgin, and Livia Medullina, who had the surname of Camilla, a descendant of the famous Camillus, who died on the day fixed for their nuptials. He afterwards married Plautia Urgulanilla, and soon after Ælia Petina, the former of whom he divorced for lewdness, and being suspected of murder, and the latter on frivolous pretences. He next married Valeria Messalina, to whom he was related, and whom he put to death for her shameful debaucheries. After vowing to remain a widower, he married Agrippina, daughter of his brother Germanicus. He had by his different wives five children, Drusus and Claudia by Urgulanilla, Antonia by Petina, Octavia and Tib. Claudius Germanicus, afterwards called Britannicus, by Messalina. Drusus died in early life, being choked by a pear; he ordered Claudia to be thrown naked at her mother's door, after she was divorced, and married Antonia to Cn. Pompeius, afterwards to Faustus Sulla, and Octavia to his stepson Nero, whom he adopted as his son and heir. He put to death his son-in-law Cn. Pompeius, and Silanus, to whom Octavia had been betrothed. His chief favourite was Pöside, a freedman, and an eunuch, and next ranked Felix, whom he set over the troops and province of Judæa (see Acts chap. xxiv). In the latter years of his reign, he resigned all the feigned appearance of humility, mildness, prudence, moderation, and justice, and showed his vicious propensities in their naked deformity. To describe actions at which humanity revolts, and vices from which nature recoils, would be equally irksome and injurious. He died by poison, but in what form, and by whom administered, is doubtful. According to some, his wife Agrippina conveyed it in a mushroom, a kind of food of which he was particularly fond. Juvénalis seems to have adopted this idea (Sat. v. 147). Suetonius mentions several literary works of Claudius, and, although that biographer says nothing of the ability with which they are written, he commends their style. He admired Grecian literature, and spoke the Greek language with precision and fluency. His works are all lost. To him Stifius alludes (Syl. iii. 3. 78). Adj. Claudius, et, Claudianus, a, um. Claudia porticus (Mart. Spec. 2). Claudiana tempora, the reign of Claudius (Mart. iii. 20).

Tib. Claudius Drusus Nero, Tib. Claudii Drusi Neronis, m. son of Tib. Claudius Nero and Livia, whom Augustus married at the time she was pregnant with Nero Claudius Drusus. From his love of wine, his name was jocularly changed to Cælius Bibulus Nero (Aur. Vic. Épit. 2). He was a brave soldier, and, with his brother, D. Claudius Drusus, conquered Rhætia, in 17 B. C. Four years after, he compelled the Dalmatæ and Pannoni to submit to the power of Rome (Liv. Ep. 136: 139). He succeeded his stepfather, Augustus, and is generally known in history by the name of Tiberius Cæsar. Whilst a private person he displayed almost every virtue; but no sooner had he obtained full possession of the government, than he appeared in his native colours, a monster of cruelty, extravagance, and debauchery. After some years, he withdrew to the island of Caprée, Capri, where he spent his time in the excess of vice, disregarding the concerns of the empire, and the happiness of his subjects, by whom he was dreaded and abhorred. He was first married to Vipsania Agrippina, whom he reluctantly repudiated during the time of her pregnancy with Drusus, in order to make way for a match with Julia, daughter of Augustus. During the lifetime of her sons, Caius and Lucius, the arrogance of her conduct showed that she considered Tiberius her inferior; to her supercilious haughtiness, and the domineering spirit of his mother, Tacitus attributes his retiring to the island Rhodus (Ann. i. 53: iv. 57). He died in the seventy-eighth year of his age, after a reign of twenty-two years, leaving the empire to Caligula, whom he had nominated his successor, only because he expected that his own barbarities would cease to be remembered, from the greater enormities which would be committed in the next reign. Publi Neronēs, i.e. Tib. Claudius Drusus Nero, and Nero Claudius Drusus (Hor. Od. iv. 4. 28). Tiberiōlus, little Tiberius, used in contempt (Tac. Ann. vi. 5).

Tib. Claudius Germanicus, Tib. Claudii Germanici, m. son of the Roman emperor Claudius, and Messalina. In consequence of part of Britain being subdued soon after his birth, his father called him Britannicus, the name by which he is most known in history. Britannicus was the first son born to a Roman emperor whilst on the throne, yet the extraordinary event had little effect on the unfeeling emperor, who did not celebrate his birth by any remarkable rejoicings. Agrippina, the mother of the Emperor Nero, had sufficient influence with Claudius to get her own son appointed to the succession, in preference to Britannicus, the legal heir. An act of greater atrocity followed this act of injustice. Nero employed Julius Poppo to accomplish his death, and he called in the skill of the infamous Locusta, who gave, at first, a weak potion which produced no effect, but afterwards a mixture of such strength and activity, that the unhappy Britannicus sunk down almost as soon as he had swallowed it. Nero witnessed his dissolution with savage joy, and hastened the interment of the body secretly to prevent the discovery (Tac. Ann. xiii. 15—17).

Tib. Claudius Nero, Tib. Claudii Neronis, m. rose to the praetorship, in 206 B. C., when Sardinia became his province, two years after was elected consul with M. Servilius Geminus. It was the wish of both consuls to have the government of Africa, in which they were both disappointed, as the senate, through the interest of Q. Caecilius Metellus, referred it to the people, who unanimously concurred in the appointment of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus. It says little for the wisdom of the senate, that they gave the command of a squadron of fifty ships to Claudius to conduct to Africa, where he was to have an authority equal to that of Cornelius. A violent storm had nearly wrecked this fleet between the ports of Cosa and Lauretta, but he reached Populonia, where he continued till the tempest ceased; afterwards he sailed to Ilva, Elba, then to Corsica, and, doubling the Mad mountains in Sardinia, he encountered another storm, which dispersed the fleet, shattered some of his ships, and wrecked others. He repaired the damaged at Carales, Cagliari, and brought back the squadron to Rome, after the expiry of his consulship (Liv. xxix. 11 seq.).—2. Elected praetor, and obtained Sardinia for his province, in 183 B. C. (Liv. xl. 18).—

3. Chosen praetor, in 180 B. C., when Pise was the province allotted him, for which he set out, habited in a general's robes, but did nothing that history has recorded, although the government was continued to him next year. The senate sent him, with M. Decimius, in 174 B. C., to renew the treaties of alliance with the Cretans and Rhodians, and to obtain information respecting the plans and measures of Perses (Liv. xl. 59 seq.).

—4. Another of the same name, who obtained the praetorship, in 169 B. C., and the lots assigned him Sicily as his province (Liv. xlvi. 16).—5. A noble Roman, was the grandfather of the Emperor Tiberius Claudius Nero. On the discovery of Calpurnia's conspiracy, and apprehension of several of the ringleaders in that treasonable combination, Tib. Claudius Nero moved in the Senate, that the guards on duty should be strengthened, and the debate adjourned. This motion seems intended to produce an unanimous sentence, with the view of giving time to the parties to come to an agreement, abating, perhaps, somewhat the severity of D. Junius Silanus, and adding to that of C. Julius Caesar; the former having voted for death, the latter only for confiscation and confinement. Junius, after the speech of Caesar, fell from his own motion and adopted that of Tiberius (Sal. Cat. 50).—6. The first husband of Livia, by whom he had two sons Tiberius, the Emperor, and Nero Claudius Drusus. Possessed of brilliant talents and great learning, added to the advantages of his birth, procured him high distinction among his countrymen. Under C. Julius Caesar, he commanded the fleet in the Alexandrian war, at which time he filled the office of quaestor. His bravery contributed greatly to the success of his general. He held the offices of praetor and pontifex. After the defeat of M. Antonius, to whom he had attached himself, he fled from Augustus into Sicily, carrying with him his wife and eldest son, then an infant. Claudius became reconciled to Augustus, who took from him his wife, then advanced in pregnancy with her second son. He died three years after that separation, in 35 B. C. (Tac. Ann. i. 10).

Clausula, a, m. a river of Illyricum, which passes the town Scodra on the east side, afterwards mixes with Barchana, which passes the same town on the west side, and their united stream falls into the river Oriundes (Liv. xlv. 31).

Clausus, i, m. a commander of the Sabines, of a very ancient family, and of great bravery, who assisted Turnus against Aeneas. From him, according to Virgilus, the Claudia gens, e. tribus were descended (Aen. vii. 707). On removing to Rome, he was not only made a citizen but a patrician (Tac. Ann. xi. 24).

Clazōmēne, arum, f. a town of Ionia, on Smyrnaeus Sinus, the Gulf of Smyrna, at a considerable distance from the modern town Vourla. Inh. Clazōmēnii, orum, m. to whom the Romans granted independence, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 39). Plinius mentions Clazōmēnii, a people of Pontus (i. 661). Adj. Clazōmēnius, a, um. Clazōmēnium (vinum) (Plin. iii. 136).

Clēdas, a, m. a native of Sidon, Sēide, who commanded a troop of archers, splendidly accoutred, under Hannibal, and was killed by Brütus, in the battle between that general and M. Minicius Rūfus, the Roman dictator (Sil. Ital. vii. 637 seq.).—2. A Theban, who interceded with Alexander the Great for the preservation of their capital, and used arguments which would have swayed a mind susceptible of commiseration or tenderness. Uncontrollable anger and desire of revenge rendered all unavailing (Just. xi. 4).

Clēander, dri, m. an officer under Alexander the Great, in his wars in the east. For his immoralities he lost his life by order of his sovereign (Curt. iii. 1 seq.).

Clēandrus, i, m. a native of Egina, who gained the prize at the Isthmian games, in the Pāncrātium (Pin. Isth. viii).

Clēānthes, is, m. son of Phānūs, was born at Assos, a town of Lycia. By his first profession he was a wrestler, which seems to have yielded him but a small income, since he had only four drachmas when he came to Athens. He studied under Crates, and, to obtain the means of subsistence, he wrought during the night, that he might give the whole of the day to the acquisition of knowledge. Being summoned before the court of Arēōpāgus, to show how he obtained provisions and clothing, he produced a woman, who proved that he ground meal for her, and a gardener certified, that he paid him for drawing water. To the judges he exhibited the doctrines of Zēno, written on shells and the shoulder blades of oxen, because his poverty did not admit of his buying paper. His erudition and knowledge procured him such distinction among Stoic philosophers, that he succeeded Zēno, the founder of that sect, in his school. He flourished about 240 B. C., lived upwards of eighty years, and died a voluntary death. To cure an ulcer under his tongue, his physicians ordered him to fast for two days, and, on being allowed to take food again, he refused, saying, that he was already two days on his journey, and continued the same system other two days, when he expired. Jubet plātūm servāre Archētēpos Clēānthēs, commands his book-case or library to keep originals (original images) of Clēānthes (Juv. Sat. ii. 7). Adj. Clēānthēs, a, um. Clēānthōā frūgē, with the grain of Clēānthes, i. e. the doctrines of the Stoics (Pers. Sat. v. 64). Clēānthēa turba, the scholars of Clēānthes (Claud. xvii. 88).

Clēarchus, i, m. an exile of Hērāclēa, Erechli, in Pōntus, who entered into a treacherous agreement with Mithridātes, which he never fulfilled, and being recalled to his native city, put sixty of the senators in irons, drove others into banishment, and deprived them of their property. To secure in his interest the wealthier citizens against the senate, he compelled the wives of the banished and murdered senators to marry slaves, which many avoided by self-destruction, and others by killing their new husband during the first night. At last Chion and Lēōnides, young men of the highest rank, put him to death. His brother Sātýrus succeeded him (Just. xvi. 4 seq.). According to Diōdōrus he reigned about 364 B. C.

Clēmōns, ēntis, m. a man, who had once been a slave of Pōstūmus Agrippa, and, on the death of Augustus, formed the bold design of secretly passing to Plānāsia on purpose, either by force or stratagem, to carry off Agrippa to the army in Germany. Before he reached that island, Agrippa had been murdered. Being of the same age, and not unlike that youth in form and stature, he carried away his ashes, remained concealed for some time in Tuscany, and, having allowed his beard and hair to grow, he spread a report that Agrippa was alive. Aware that delay is apt to discover falsehood, he hastened from place to place, seldom appeared except in the evenings, and left the surmise which he threw out to spread over the country. At last, being apprehended and brought before the emperor Tiberius, he refused to make any discovery of his accomplices, and dreading the effects of a public execution, the emperor ordered him to be put to death in the palace, and his body privately conveyed away. So dexterously did this impostor concert measures, that he had nearly produced a civil war (Tac. Ann. ii. 39, 40).

Clēmēns Jūlius, Clēmēntis Jūlii, m. a centurion of considerable talents, spared by the soldiers who revolted in Pānnōnia, in the year 14, on purpose that he might manage their business and secure their claims (Tac. Ann. i. 23).

Clēo, ōnis, m. a Sicilian versifier, who followed Alexander the Great into Asia (Curt. viii. 5).

Clēōbis, is, m. brother of Biton q. v. They were sons of Argia, and natives of Argos.

Clēōbūlus, i, m. one of the warriors at Troy, killed by Ajax, son of Oileūs (Hom. Il. xvi. 330).

Clēōchāres, is, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, whom he sent to Pōrus, with the view of persuading him to surrender. In that mission he failed (Curt. viii. 13).

Clēōdāmus, i, m. the father of Asōpichus (Pin. Ol. xiv. 31).

Clēōmbrōtus, i, m. the twin-brother of Lēōnidas (Herod. v. 41).

Clēōmēdon, ōntis, m. ambassador of Phīlippus, king of Mācēdōnia, at the assembly of the Achæi, met at Sicyon, when that nation renounced the alliance of Phīlippus, and joined the Romans, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 19).

Clēōmēnes, is, m. the first tyrant of Lācēdæmon, who, on the conquest of the Lācēdæmonians, and taking of their city by Antigōnus, the usurper of the throne of Mācēdōnia, fled to Egypt with his wife and children. Ptolēmaeus treated him with great kindness, but, after his death, Clēōmēnes and his whole family were cut off by the son of the Egyptian monarch (Just. xxviii. 4).—2. An architect who built Alexāndria (Just. xiii. 4).—3. Appointed collector of the tribute, in the part of Africa adjoining to Egypt, in 331 B. C. (Curt. viii. 4).

Clēon, ōntis, m. a slave who, having collected seventy thousand men of the same condition with himself, joined Eunus q. v., and with their united army frequently engaged the Roman forces in Sicily (Liv. Ep. 56).

Clēōnē, es, v. v. arum, f. Courēne (Kelenes, Leake), a town of Argolis, situated upon a circular and insulated hill, which seems to have been completely covered with buildings, now in ruins. The Nemean games were sometimes celebrated at Clēōna. Strābo and Hōmērus call it a well-built town; Pausanias says it was small, in which Strābo agrees with him. It is almost in a line between Argos and Cōrīnthus, and nearly equidistant from these cities. At Clēonē, Hērclēs slew the Nemean lion, which was converted into the sign Lēo. Adj. Clēonēus, a, um. Clēonēus monstrum, the lion of prodigious size and ferocity, killed by Hērclēs (Stat. Th. i. 487). This animal is generally called Nēonēus lēo, but Lūcānus calls it Clēonēus lēo (Phar. iv. 612). Clēonēus hiātus, the expanded jaws of the Nemean lion (Val. Flacc. l. 34). Clēonēus sidus, the fifth sign of the Zōdiac (Mart. iv. 60). Clēonēus ager (Liv. xxxiii. 14).—2. Another town on Athos, Monte Santo (Herod. vii. 22).

Clēonēus, i, m, a native of Egīna, mentioned by Pindārus, in his ode on Phylāides (Isth. v. 71).—2. A freedman of L. Annæus Sēneca, who, by order of the emperor Nēro, prepared a dose of poison for his master. This squire Sēneca escaped, either by Clēonēus discovering it to him, or by his own natural precaution (Tac. Ann. xv. 45).

Clēonēymus, i, m, a Theban, one of the descendants of Cādms (Pin. Isth. iii. 24). Clēonēymidæ, arum, m. (Pin. Isth. iv. 6 seq.).—2. A Lacedæmonian commander, who, with a fleet, consisting of large and smaller vessels, crossed to the eastern coast of Italy, in 303 B. C., landed at Thūriæ, whence the consul M. Æmilius Paulus drove him, with considerable loss, and compelled him to embark. Dreading the inhabitants on both coasts, he sailed up the middle of the gulf, till he reached the river Mēdiūcus q. v., the Brenta, where he experienced another defeat from the Pātāvini and Vēnētī, who cut in pieces the troops who had quitted their ships, attacked Clēonēymus in the rest, of which some stuck in the flats, and were burned, whilst the general himself escaped with scarcely a fifth part of his fleet (Liv. x. 2).

Clēōpātra, æ, f. (Clēiōpātra, Greek) sister of Cālās and Zēthes, who was married to Phīnēus, king of Thrācia (Val. Flacc. iv. 464 seq. Apol. Rhod. ii. 239).—2. Daughter of Phīlppus, king of Mācēdōniā, by his queen Olymphas, who gave her in marriage to Alexander, king of Épīrus. At the celebration of her nuptials, Pausānias deprived her father of life, about 336 B. C. (Just. ix. 61).—3. The sister of Attālus, a general of Phīlppus, king of Mācēdōniā, whom that monarch married, after he had divorced Olymphas. No sooner had Pausānias killed Phīlppus, than Olymphas compelled Clēōpātra to end her life by strangulation, not, however, before she had murdered her daughter in her arms (Just. ix. 7).—4. The sister and wife, first of Ptōlēmæus Philōmētōr, and, after his death, of his brother, Ptōlēmæus Phýscōn. Repudiated by the latter, she fled to Dēmētrīus, king of Sýria, who was her son-in-law. Phýscōn murdered both her son by Philōmētōr and the one which she had to himself, as well as his son, whom he had left at Cýrēnē (Just. xxxviii. 8: xxxix. 1).—5. Daughter of Antīochus, king of Sýria, married to Ptōlēmæus Epīphānes, in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 13 seq.).—6. Daughter of Ptōlēmæus Philōmētōr, married to Dēmētrīus Nicātōr, whom she afterwards murdered, and also her son Sēlūcus, because, on the death of his father, he had mounted the throne without her order, in 125 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 69). She afterwards married Antīochus, the brother of Dēmētrīus (Just. xxxvi. 1).—7. Daughter of Mithridātes, and wife of Tigrānes (Just. xxxviii. 3).—8. Daughter of Ptōlēmæus Philōmētōr and Clēōpātra, who, on her mother being driven from the throne, became the wife of her stepfather, Ptōlēmæus Phýscōn, hence Jūstinus calls her matris peller. On the death of the king, the people compelled her to nominate her elder son, Ptōlēmæus Lathūrus, to the crown. Not satisfied with his banishment, she made war upon him, in Cýprus, and, on his being driven out of the island, she put her commander-in-chief to death, because he had allowed him to escape from his hands. She then recalled her younger son, Alexander, who, terrified at the cruelty of his mother, had fled from Egypt; but he was no sooner in that country, than she plotted his destruction. To save his own life, he put her to death, which Jūstinus says she well merited for her cruelty to her mother and her own children (xxxviii. 8: xxxix. 4).—9. The daughter of the preceding, and wife of her brother, Ptōlēmæus Lathūrus, by whom she was repudiated, and then married Antīochus Cýzicēnus, king of Sýria, who put her to death at the request of her sister (Just. xxxix. 3).—10. The celebrated queen of Egypt, was a daughter of Ptōlēmæus Aulētes. She was equally admired for her personal accomplishments and mental qualifications. C. Jūlius Cæsar, who was unable to withstand her winning manners and artful address, became a slave to her charms, and by him she had a son called Cæsārio, or Cæsārion. At the termination of the Alexandrian war, that great general bestowed the crown of Egypt on Clēōpātra, associated with her in the government her younger brother Ptolemy, and ordered her to marry him, agreeably to the Egyptian custom. The appointment of Ptolemy was merely nominal, and not intended to give him any right to interfere with Clēōpātra in the management of the country. She lived with her brother in an apartment of Cæsar's house in Rome, when that successful warrior was in the zenith of his power. In a short time after the death of Cæsar, Clēōpātra sent supplies to Brūtus, for which Antōnius summoned her to appear before him in person. She readily obeyed the order. This Roman too, like Cæsar, was so captivated by her personal charms and ensnaring address, that, forgetting his connexion with Octāvia, the sister of Augustus, he publicly married the queen of Egypt. By him she had two sons, Philādēlphus and Alexander. But this marriage occasioned a quarrel with Augustus, which terminated in the battle of Actium, in which Antōnius, by 60 of Clēōpātra's galleys flying at the very onset, was completely defeated. On reaching Egypt, knowing well the ungovernable fury of Antōnius, which prudence dictated it was her duty, if possible, to avoid, she gave out that she was dead, upon which he stabbed himself. His wound being mortal, after he was carried into her presence, he expired. Augustus took Alēxandriā, and, having gained possession of her person, he endeavoured to reconcile her to life, on purpose to grace his triumph. But, learning his intention, she killed herself by the bite of an asp, in the 39th year of her age, and 24th of her reign. The mental abilities of Clēōpātra must have been of no ordinary kind. She could give audience to the ambassadors of seven different nations, and spoke their various languages as fluently and correctly as her own. She was also well acquainted with the philosophy of that age. But the immoralities of her life, and the enormous extravagance both of her dress and table, which exhausted the wealth of the richest nations, command us to withhold our approbation from a character formed on principles equally injurious to the best feelings of the heart, and the best interests of society. She added, with the consent of Antónius, the library of Përgämus to that of Alëxändria. With her ended the family of the Ptolemies, which had reigned over Egypt from the death of Alexander, 297 years. Augustus reduced that country to a Roman province, and it continued in that state of subjection, until it was taken from the Romans by the Saracens, in the year 641. See Egyptus. Nec mastä Clëpätä fëcit Actiäcä cärinä, nor sorrowful Clëpätä did in her Actean galley; referring to her defeat at Actium (Juv. Sat. ii. 109).—11. Wife of Phineüs, king of Thräcia, sister of Cäläis and Zëthes (Val. Flacc. iv. 464).—12. Wife of the poet Märtiläis, who mentions a circumstance respecting her, which, although true, a purer mind would have concealed (xiv. 22).—13. A concubine of the emperor Claudius, who, with Cälpürnia, a woman of the same character, plotted the destruction of Mëssälina at the suggestion of Cälistus (Tac. Ann. xi. 30).

Clëphäntus, i, m. a native of Cörinthus, Corinth, celebrated as a painter. To him has been ascribed the invention of colouring; and either he, or one of the same name, followed Dëmarätus, the father of Tärquinius Priscus, when he fled from his native city to Italy (Plin. v. 178).—2. A son of Thëmistöcles.—3. A medical practitioner of some note (Plin. iv. 15, 444).

Clëphis, idis, f. an Indian queen, who bore a son to Alexander the Great, whom she called by his father's name. She recovered her kingdom by this act of impurity, on which account the Indians called her Scörtum rëglum (Just. xii. 7).

Clëptölëmus, i, m. of Chälcis (Chalcidensis), gave, with some reluctance, his daughter in marriage to Antöchus, king of Sýria, with whom he spent the remainder of the winter in feasting and dissipation, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 11).

Clëpsýdra, æ, f. an instrument contrived to measure time by water. The merit of this invention belongs to the Egyptians, as well as the discovery of the sundial. The use of the former was much greater than that of the latter. The dial can only ascertain the hour when the sun is above the horizon, and his rays not intercepted by a cloud; but the Clëpsýdra, like clocks and watches, pointed out the hour with equal precision at all times. There were different kinds of Clëpsýdræ among the ancients, which, however, were all constructed on this principle, that the water ran through a narrow passage from one vessel to another, and that on the surface of the water in the lower vessel, to the side of which a scale of hours was affixed, floated a piece of cork which showed the hour. It is manifest the water would be discharged with a rapidity proportioned to the quantity, and that, of course, it ran fastest when the vessel was full, and gradually became slower as the less water remained. Hence, if the upper vessel discharged its water in 12 hours, and the under one was an exact cylinder, having its height divided into 144 equal parts, the water, in the first hour, would rise 23 of these parts, in the second hour, 21, in the third 19, &c., and the last or twelfth hour only one part. The state of the atmosphere would have considerable influence on the Clëpsýdra, a defect which the ingenuity of a modern French philosopher, William Amontons, has completely remedied. By means of several important inventions he also freed it from other less inconveniences to which it was subject; and rendered it a very accurate divisor of time.—2. A fountain, says the Scholiast of Aristöphänes, in the citadel of Athens, which, like a Clëpsýdra, now received, now lost its waters. It filled when the Etesian winds blew, and emptied when they ceased (Ap. Bel. Par. 156).

Clëvas, æ, m. an officer under Përsëus, king of Macëdönia (Liv. xliii. 21).

Clibänärii, orum, m. the Persian name, according to Ammlianus Märcellinus, of soldiers or horsemen, covered with a complete suit of armour which protected every part of their body. This kind of panoply consisted of thin plates of metal, so united as to allow the wearer the full use of every member and joint. That author says, that, from the metal being highly polished, the Clibänärii had the appearance, not of men, but of statues, burnished by the hand of Präxitéles (xvi. 10). Some critics consider the term as a derivative from the Greek κλιβανος, and others, with less probability, from κλιβανος.

Climënus. See Clymënus.

Clinias, æ, m. an Athenian, the father of the illustrious Alcibiädes, whose grandfather was of the same name, gained great honour in a naval engagement off Artëmisium, Syrocchori, or, Lero, where he fought in a ship fitted out at his own expense, and he afterwards fell in the battle at Cöröncä, Granizza, where victory declared for the Bëotians (Cor. Nep. Alcib. i. Plut. Alcib.). Clinädes, æ, m. a patronymic of Alcibiädes (Ov. Ib. 633).

Clinicus, i, m. a medical practitioner, who visited patients in bed. Märtiläis distinguishes between Clinicus and Chirürgus (i. 31). See Diadus.

Clío, ùs, f. the first of the nine muses, whose name is derived from κλέος, fame, glory. She presided over history. Apöllödorus makes Cälliöpë the first of the muses, and Clío the second. She was the mother of Hyäcynthus by Piërus, son of Mägnës (Apol. i. 3). Jüvënalis uses Clío by metonymy, to signify a poet; Esurlens Clío, a hungry poet (vii. 7).—2. One of the Ocëänitides, and sister of Bërocë (Virg. G. iv. 341).

Clitæ, arum, m. the Cliteans, who revolted from Archëläus, king of Cäppädöcia, in consequence of the taxation of the Roman provinces, and made a secession to the heights of mount Taurus, but M. Trëbëllius inclosed them within lines of circumvallation; hunger and thirst then obliged them to surrender, in the year 36. Tacitus describes them as the peasantry of Cilicia, a race both wild and savage, inured to plunder and commotions (Tac. Ann. vi. 41; xii. 55).

Clitæ, arum, f. a town or place near Cäsclaudrēn, at which the Roman commander slew a trench from Macedōnīcum mārē, the Gulf of Salonica, to Tōrōnāicūm mārē, the Gulf of Aiomana, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xiv. 11).

Clitarchus, i, m. a historian who accompanied Alexander the Great in his expedition to India, and wrote his life (Curt. ix. 5).

Clitō, es, f. daughter of Mērops, and wife of Cyzicus, king of the town of that name (Val. Flacc. iii. 11). See Cyzicus.

Clitōmāchus. See Clitōmāchus.

Clitor, ōris, m. a town of Arcādia, on the banks of Clitor, the Clitorea, a branch of Arctolus. It was built by Clitor, who called it by his own name (Paus. viii. 21). Here a council of the Achai was held to give audience to an embassy of the Romans, at the head of which was Appius Claudius Pulcher, in 186 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 35). Inh. Clitōrii, orum (Sing. Clitōrius, i), m. Adj. Clitōrius, a, um. Clitōrius fons (Ov. Met. xv. 322). Stātus calls the river Cliton (Th. iv. 239).

Clitumnus, i, m. Il Clitunno, a river of Umbria. It has been inferred from Virgilius, that the water of this river rendered cattle white (G. ii. 146), and Plinius has been supposed to allude to this river, when he says "in Falisco omnis aqua pota candidos boves facit" (i. 252); but Clitumnus is not in the territory of the Falisci, therefore he could not have any reference to this river. Adj. Clitumnus, a, um. Clitumna novalla (Stat. Syl. i. 4. 129).

Clitus, i, m. son of Pisēnor, friend and charioteer of Polydamas, son of Panthōus, was killed by Teucer (Hom. Il. xv. 445).—2. Son of Mantius and brother of Polyphidēus (Hom. Od. xv. 249).—3. An officer in the army of Alexander the Great, who had served under his father Philippus, and had saved his own life at the battle of Granicus. When of a great age, Alexander stabbed him at an entertainment given to his officers in Asia, merely because he had defended the character of Philippus in preference to that of his son, whose vanity had then become insufferable, and his cruelty unbounded. Of this barbarous act Justinus says he bitterly repented (xii. 6).—4. An officer under Alexander the Great, dismissed in 326 B. C., on account of his long services. After the death of that conqueror, he commanded the fleet of Pēdiccas, when the latter made war on Egypt with a great army (Just. xii. 12: xiii. 6).

Clōaca, æ, f. a common sewer, of which those at Rome were not more remarkable for their public utility than admirable as specimens of ancient architecture. Tarquinius Priscus first constructed these drains to carry off water from the lower parts of the city about the Fōrum and the other hollows between the hills into the Tevere. These conduits are still in preservation, and serve for their original purposes. After traversing the city, they united at the Fōrum Rōmānum, where the waters and filth were conveyed into the Tevere by means of two canals, of which the larger was called Clōāca Māxima, the other, Clōāca Minor. Tarquinius Sūpērbus enlarged the former, or great sewer; in consequence of the increased population, it was not sufficiently extensive to answer the original purpose. It is constructed of three courses of stone, each five feet long and three feet thick, joined without cement of any kind. The width and height are each twelve feet, and its opening at the Tevere is still visible at the ancient temple of Vesta. From a small arch under ground, near this sewer, issues a streamlet which falls into the great drain; it descends from Mons Palātinus, and it has been conjectured that it is part of the water which formed the lake of Juturna in Fōrum Rōmānum. In 185 B. C., the censors, M. Pōrcius Cato and L. Valērius Flaccus, made common sewers in Mons Avēntinus, besides contracting for constructing them in other places where they were requisite, and where none had been before (Liv. xxxix. 44).

Clōācina, æ, f. the goddess of fetid smells. Near her statue, or temple, in Rome, stood sheds used by butchers, which must have been in the Fōrum (Liv. iii. 48).

Clōānthus, i, m. one of the Trojan commanders, a man of bravery, who was victorious in a naval contest. From him the Clōēntii derived their descent (Virg. Æn. v. 122).

Clōdianus, i, m. one of the conspirators against the life of the Emperor Dōmītiānus (Suet. Dom. 17).

Clōdus Aquilius, Clōdii Aquilii, m. one of Cæsar's officers, who was wounded in an engagement with Pōmpeius, on the bank of Salsum, the Salado, or the Guadajós, a river in the south of Spain (Hirt. B. Hisp. 23).

Clōdus Licinius, Clōdii Licinii, m. a Roman historian, whose writings are now lost (Liv. xxix. 32).

Clōdus Mācer, Clōdii Māceri, m. murdered in Africa by Trēbōnius Gārdeianus, the governor of that province, who had his orders from the Emperor Gālba (Tac. Hist. i. 7).

Clōdus Quirinālis, Clōdii Quirinālis, m. brought to trial on a charge of rapine, whilst he had the command of a fleet at Ravēnna. He anticipated his condemnation by poison (Tac. Ann. xiii. 30).

A. Clōdus, A. Clōdii, m. an officer in Cæsar's army during the civil war, whom he sent to Scipio, to negotiate a peace, after the two armies had arrived in Greece, previously to the fatal battle of Pharsālia (Cæs. B. C. iii. 90).

P. Clōdus, P. Clōdii, m. an orator who acquired great wealth by pleading at the bar (Tac. Ann. xi. 7).

P. Clōdus Pulcher. See P. Claudius Pulcher.

Servius Clōdus, Servii Clōdii, m. a learned critic and grammarian, mentioned with approbation by Cicero, and by Suetonius, as an author only, not for the purity of his moral conduct, since the latter records an instance of fraud which rendered it necessary for him to leave Rome (Il. Gram. 3).

Clōelia, æ, f. a Roman virgin, one of the hostages given to Pōrsēna, who escaped from her keepers and swam across Tiber, the Tevere, at the head of a band of virgins amidst the darts of the enemy, and restored them to their relations, in 508 B. C. The Romans, in fulfilment of the treaty, sent her back to the king of Clūsium, Chiusi, who had demanded her, but disregarded the rest, and, in admiration of her bravery, he allowed her to return home, and to take along with her a part of the hostages. She, from delicacy, chose the youngest of the boys, alleging they were most exposed to injury. The Romans honoured her with an equestrian statue, which was erected at the head of Særa Via (Liv. ii. 13). To her Mānilius alludes (iv. 33); and Silius Itālicus (x. 492).

Clœlii, orum, m. an Alban clan, which was transported to Rome and enrolled among the senators (Liv. i. 30).

Clœlius, i, m. a Roman, killed in the battle at Cannæ. On his falling, Bāgēsus, a Carthaginian, mounted his horse which threw the new rider, discovered his master lying among the killed and wounded, gently approached him and fell down on his knees to receive him on his back. To this habit Clœlius, who excelled in horsemanship, had trained him (Sil. Ital. x. 456 seq.).

Clœlius Tūllus, Clœlii Tūlli, m. one of the four Roman ambassadors put to death by Lars Tōlūmīlus, king of the Vēientes, in 437 B. C. (Liv. iv. 17).

P. Clœlius, P. Clœli, m. a tribune of the soldiers, with consular power, in 377 B. C., mentioned by Livius (vi. 31).

P. Clœlius Sicūlus, P. Clœlii Sicūli, m. appointed rex Sacrificus, in 182 B. C. (Liv. xl. 42).

Q. Clœlius Sicūlus, Q. Clœlii Sicūli, m. was elected consul in 498 B. C. (Liv. ii. 21).

T. Clœlius Sicūlus, T. Clœlii Sicūli, m. one of the commissioners for conducting the colony to Ardēa (Liv. iv. 11). See M. Æbū-tius Elva.

Clōndīcius, i, m. one of the Bāstārnæ, who advanced at the head of thirty thousand men towards Dārdāniā, whither he had been invited by Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, at the time the rest of the Bāstārnæ returned to their country, in consequence of a dreadful storm which assailed them, as they attacked the Thracians on the mountain Donūca (Liv. xl. 58).—2. A chieftain of the Gauls, who came to the aid of Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōniā, at the head of ten thousand horsemen, and the same number of foot, who kept pace with the horses in their movements, and when any of the horsemen fell, mounted in their stead, and carried on the fight. The Macedonian king promised them each ten golden philippi, and five to each foot soldier, and a thousand to their commanders; but he acted insincerely, and his avarice lost him the valuable services of these ferocious but valiant troops (Liv. xlv. 26, 27). Perhaps this is the same with the former.

Clōnius, i, m. a Trojan, killed by Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 574).—2. Another Trojan, of the same name, killed by Mēssāpus (Virg. Æn. x. 749).—3. A Theban commander, killed at Troy by Agēnor (Hom. Il. xv. 340).—4. A man in the Theban army, who fell by the hand of Tydeus in the war between Etēocles and Pōlyneices (Stat. Il. viii. 697). Some copies read Chthōnius.

Clōnus, i, m. an engraver, who had either learned that art under Eurýtus, or had adopted the manner of that ingenious mechanic, hence called Eurýtides (Virg. Æn. x. 499). The readings here differ much. If the true reading be Clōnus Eurýtides, which is that of Heyne, the engraving on the belt of Pallas was the work of Clōnus; if not, of Eurýtion.

Clōta, æ, m. the Clyde, one of the principal rivers of Scotland, has its source in a hill called Arrikstane, whence running in a westerly direction it receives a large stream called the Dair. On their junction, its course is almost due east until it passes the lofty mountain Tinto, after which, on approaching the parish of Carnwath, its direction becomes nearly due west, and it has three considerable falls within a distance of four miles, where it forms the boundary between the parishes of Lanark and Lesmahago. Here it is joined by the Mouss, a dark and winding stream, immediately after its issue from the romantic dell of Carlisle Crag. See Tempe. The general course of the Clyde from the time it leaves the parish of Lanark until it passes Greenock may be considered western. It is navigable to Glasgow, and the tide rises three miles beyond that city. In a commercial point of view the Clyde is the first river in Scotland, and is only surpassed in Britain by the Thames and the Mersey. Tācītus appears to have understood by Clōta and Bođō-tria the firths of Clyde and Forth, and mentions that the neck of land between them had a chain of forts when Agricōla was in this island (Agric. 23). This wall, of which no vestige now remains, the Scots called Grahams-dyke, from a tradition that one of the noble clan of Graham made the first breach in it at the time he displayed his daring courage by attacking the Roman province.

Clōthō, ūs, f. one of the three destinies or Fates whom the ancients represented spinning the thread of human life. Clōthō held the distaff, Lāchēsis span, and Atrōpos cut the thread. Mea Clōthō et Lāchēsis gaudent (Juv. Sat. ix. 135).

Clūēntius, et, Clūēntiānus, a, um. Clūēntia gens, a Roman clan, who derive their origin from Clōānthus, q. v., Clūēntiāna (oratio) (Amm. Mar. xxx. 4).

A. Clūēntius, A. Clūēntii, m. one of the commanders of the Picēntes and Mārsi against the Romans, in 91 B. C. (Eutrop. v. 3).

Clūllius, i, m. one of the Æqui, who commanded the Vōlsci in an attack on Ardēa, but was defeated and led in triumph by the consul, M. Gēgānius Macerinus, in 442 B. C. (Liv. iv. 9, 10).

C. Clūllius, C. Clūllii, m. king of Alba, died in the camp which he had pitched against the Romans, five miles from Rōme, in the reign of Tūllus Hōstilius. He had surrounded it with a ditch which long retained his name (Liv. i. 22, 23). Dionýsius says, that he was found in his tent lifeless in the morning with evident marks of a violent death. Adj. Clūllius, a, um. Clūllia fossa, at which Cōrīolānus pitched his camp, when he made war upon his native country, in 491 B. C. (Liv. ii. 39).

Clūnia, æ, f. called also Sūlpīcia, a town of Spain, belonging to the Arēvāci, in which Q. Sērtōrius was besieged by Q. Cæcilius Mētellus Pinna, v. Pius and Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus. From it he made many successful sallies, to the great loss of the besiegers, in 78 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 92).

Clūpēa, v. Clýpēa, æ, f. Aklibia, a seaport town of Africa, 22 miles southeast from Carthage, called by the Greeks Aspis, from the hill upon which it stood, promontorium Mērcūrii, Cape Bona, resembling a shield. In clypei speciem curvatis turribus Aspis (Sil. Ital. iii. 244). Ptolemy seems to consider Clūpēa and Aspis different towns, in which he varies from almost all the writers of antiquity by whom it is mentioned. In the first Punic war, Clúpea was the first town which submitted to the Romans. There is nothing standing of this ancient city; for the castle is a modern structure, and what is now called Akkibia, consists of a few miserable huts at the distance of a mile from the old town (Cæs. B. C. ii. 23).

Clusium, i. n. Chiusi, a town of Etruria, Tuscan, anciently called Cāmārs, on Clānis, the Chiagno, which takes its name from its situation. Its site is terminated by a tremendous defile, of which the rocky sides jut out so far, and rise so high as almost to conceal the face of the heavens, while the river contracted into an impetuous torrent, or rather continued cascade, rolls in thunder from steep to steep, hurrying fragments of the rock down its eddy, and filling the dell with uproar. The founders of this city are not certainly known. Plinius states that there were two cities of this name, the old and the new, the former deserted on account of its unhealthiness (i. 321). Inh. Clūsini, orum (Sing. Clūsini, i.), m. applied to the Romans for aid against the Gauls, who were besieging the town, in 390 B. C. The former sent ambassadors to treat with the barbarians, who, having failed of success, inconsiderately took up arms against them, and led on the Clūsini to battle. To this rash and unjustifiable act on the part of the Roman ambassadors, may be attributed the subsequent destruction of Rome by that ferocious and warlike people. Adj. Clūsini, a, um. (A) Clūsini oris, from the coast of Clūsium (Virg. Æn. x. 655). Clūsini fontes, the springs of Chiusi. There were cold baths at Chiusi, to which Horātius here manifestly refers (Epist. i. 15. 9).

Clusius, i. m. a name of Jānus, frequently written Clausius, by which he seems to have been called only when his temple was shut (Ov. Fast. i. 130).

Cluvia, a, f. a woman of a vicious character (Juv. Sat. ii. 49).

Clūyla, a, f. a town of Sāmniūm, which the Sāmmites obliged, by blockade, to capitulate, and put to the sword all who surrendered, 311 B. C. C. Junius Bubulcus, consul, carried it by storm on the first day of the assault, and put to the sword all who were full grown. Adj. Clūylanus, a, um. Clūylana expugnatio (Liv. ix. 31).—2. Chiodi, a mountain in this district.

Clāvidicius Quiētus, Clāvidicieni Quiēti, m. a Roman, banished with several others to islands in the Archipelago by the emperor Nēro, in the year 65 (Tac. Ann. xv. 71).

Clāvicus, i. m. a bad poet, mentioned only by Jāvenālis, who satirizes him with considerable severity (Sat. i. 80).

Clāvius, i. m. a historian, mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xiv. 2).

Clāvius Rufus, Clāvii Rūfi, m. a governor of Spain, distinguished for his eloquence, and skilled in the arts of peace, but inexperienced in war (Tac. Hist. i. 8). Plinius, the younger, mentions him (Epist. ix. 19).—2. A man of consular rank, who proclaimed to the senate that the Emperor Nēro was to sing the story of Nibē (Suet. Ner. 21).

C. Clāvius, C. Clāvii, m. a lieutenant-general in the Roman army under L. Æmilius Paulus, in Greece, 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 40).

C. Clāvius Sāxūla, C. Clāvii Sāxūla, m. a Roman, who, in his second praetorship, obtained the jurisdiction between citizens and foreigners, in 175 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 1).

Sp. Clāvius, Sp. Clāvii, m. obtained the praetorship and government of Sardinia, in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 10).

Clāde, arum, f. two small islands in the eastern part of the Mediterranean Sea. Adj. Clādus, a, um. Clāda arces (Manil. iv. 796). The readings here differ.

Clēmēne, es, f. a daughter of Océānus and Tēthys, who married Iāpētus, to whom she bore Atlas, Mēnetius, Prōmētheus, and Epimētheus (Hes. Th. 351 seq.). She was the mother of Phāethon by Apollo. Clēmēneis, ēidos, f. a daughter of Clēmēne. Adj. Clēmēneis, et. Clēmēneus, a, um. Clēmēneia Proles, Phāethon (Ov. Met. ii. 19). Clēmēneia gēmina, the trees of Clēmēne, i. e. trees which the ancients supposed produced amber (Stat. Syl. i. 2. 123). See Electrum.—2. An attendant of Hēlēna at Troy (Hom. Il. iii. 144).—3. One of the Nereids (Hom. Il. xviii. 47).—4. The wife of Phylacus, and mother of Pōdōces (Hom. Od. xl. 325).

Clēmēnus, i. m. a man by whom Odites was killed at the nuptials of Pērsēus (Ov. Met. v. 98).—2. Father of Eurýdicē, wife of Nestor (Hom. Od. iii. 452). To him Pindarus alludes (Ol. iv. 31).—3. An Argonaut, whose parentage is unknown, and he is only mentioned by Valērius Flaccus (i. 369).

Clēpēus, i. m. a target, first used by the Romans, afterwards when they received pay they made Scūtum, a shield, in place of it. The clēpēus was round and protected the breast chiefly, but the Scūtum was oblong, and covered the whole body. Hence it superseded the use of Clēpēus and Lōrica (Liv. i. 43).

Clētē, v. Clitē, es, f. daughter of Pērcōsius, and wife of Cýzicus, king of Cýzicus, Chizico, at the time of the Argonautic expedition. From her father, Valērius Flaccus, in speaking of Cýzicus, calls Clētē Pērcōsia Conjux (iii. 10). On her husband being killed she hanged herself (Apol. Rhod. i. 1063).

Clētēmnēstra, a, f. a daughter of Tëndārus, king of Sparta, and Lēda. She was married to Agāmēmnon, by whom she had one son, Orēstes. During the absence of her husband at Trōja, she formed an unlawful intimacy with Ægisthus, who murdered Agāmēmnon on his return from that war. Orēstes revenged his father's death by killing both his mother and her paramour (Hyg. 119). Nullus vicus non habebit Clētēmnēstrum māne, no street will not have a Clētēmnēstra (i. e. every street will have a murderer of her husband) in the morning (Juv. Sat. vi. 655).

Clētūe, es, f. a daughter of Océānus and Tēthys, with whom Sol became enamoured, but she lost his favour by giving publicity to his intercourse with Lēucōthēe, on which account she pined away in sorrow, and was at last changed into the sunflower. The Greek name of this flower (Heliopterus, sun-turning), probably gave rise to this fable, because it follows the sun, and as it were in regret of his absence, refuses to show its beauties by shutting when he sets (Ov. Met. iv. 206—270).

Clētius, i. m. a noble Trojan, the father of Clētor q. r., and brother of Priāmus (Hom. Il. iii. 147).—2. A noble Greek, the father of Dōlops. Some suppose his name to have been Clýtēus, hence Clýtēides, a patronymic of Dólōps (Hom. Il. xi. 302).—3. A noble Ithacan, the faithful friend of Tēlēmāchus (Hom. Od. xvi. 327).—4. A Trojan, the son of Æólus, who was killed by Túrnu (Virg. Æn. ix. 774).—5. The father of Acmon and Mēnesthēus, a native of Lyrnēssus (Virg. Æn. x. 129).—6. A youth to whom Cýdon was attached (Virg. Æn. x. 325).—7. The father of Eunæus, whom Cāmilla killed (Virg. Æn. xi. 666).—8. A native of Pella, Palatisa, a town of Măcēdōnia, killed by Sēlius in the battle at Zăma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 429).—9. The brother of Clānis, killed by Pērseus.—10. An Argonaut, according to Apollōnīus Rhōdius (i. 86). Other writers on that famous expedition do not mention his name.

Clýtōmāchus, i. m. a native of Ēgīna (Pin. Pyth. viii. 51).

Clýtōmēdēs, ēos, m. son of Enops, whom Nēstor conquered at the Cestus (Hom. Il. xxiii. 634).

Clýtōnēus, i. m. a son of Alcīnōus, king of Phăciā, and Arētē, who gained the prize in the foot-race at the games exhibited by his father in the presence of Ulysses (Hom. Od. viii. 119 seq.).

Clýtus, i. m. a man whom Pērseus killed at his nuptial feast.—2. Prætor of the Acarnānes, by which office he possessed the highest authority in the state. By Mnēsilōchus he was gained over to the interest of Antīochus, king of Sýria, in 193 B. C. After this departure from good principle, he prevailed on his countrymen to raise five hundred men on pretence of garrisoning Mēdion, Medenico, and Thýrium, Tripho, but in reality that these troops might fall into the hands of Antīochus, and that he might keep them as hostages. Through the treachery of Clýtus and Mnēsilōchus, Mēdion came under the power of Antīochus (Liv. xxxvi. 11, 12).—3. A man with whom Făbulla was in love (Mart. iv. 19).—4. A mean and avaricious character, who celebrated his birthday oftener than once a-year that he might receive presents from his friends. Martialis ridicules this dishonourable practice (viii. 64).

Cnēus, seldom Cnēius, i. m. a frequent prænomen among the Romans.

Cnidus, i. f. Cnido, a town of Căria, of which the site is pointed out by a mass of ruins. Vēnus was the favourite goddess of that city, hence Hōrātius calls her queen of Cnidus (Od. i. 30. 1). Off this town, Cōnon gained a naval victory over the Lacedæmonians, which relieved Athens and the rest of Greece from the tyranny of that nation (Cor. Nep. Con. 4). Inh. Cnidii, orum (Sing. Cnidius, i), m. (Strab. 398). Adj. Cnidius, a, um. Cnidia dēa, Vēnus (Mart. xiii. 66).

Co, v. Cos, ōis, m. Lango, a very celebrated island in Mărē Ēgēum, the Archipelago, fifteen Roman miles distant from Hălciăr-năssus, and a hundred miles in circumference. It was anciently called Mērōpē, et, Mērōpis, from Mērōps, a king of the island, Coos, v. Cēa, from the name of his daughter, and Nýmphaea, from the wife of that monarch. This island gave birth to the celebrated physician, Hippocrātes, the unrivalled painter, Apelles, and many other men of great celebrity. The women of Cos, for preferring themselves in beauty to Vēnus, were changed into cows, to which Ovidius alludes (Met. l. 369). Inh. Cōi, orum (Sing. Cōus, i), m.

excelling in fabricating silk or cotton cloths of the finest and thinnest texture, to which Tibullus alludes (ii. 3. 53). Adj. Cōus, a, um, of Cos; also silken, transparent; applied to dress, immodest, indelicate, because it showed the shape and skin almost as distinctly as if naked. Cōæ vestes, silk, cotton, transparent clothes. Cōa conchylia, purple of Cos. Near this island the fish was taken from which the purple dye was obtained (Juv. Sat. viii. 101).

Cōastes, is, m. a commander of the Scythians in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. vi. 155).

Cobāres, is, m. a Mede, celebrated for his profession rather than his knowledge of magic, says Curtius, in other respects a man of virtue and temperance (vii. 4).

Cobulātus, i. m. a river of Asīa Minor, Natolia, on the confines of Pămphyliā (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Cōcālus, i. m. a king of Sicily, by birth a Cretan, to whom Dădālus, the ingenious artist, fled from Crēta, Candia, for protection, when Minos sought his life. From this monarch Dădālus received both kind entertainment and perfect security (Ov. Met. viii. 261). Jūstinus represents him as the first king of the island after the extinction of the Cyclops (iv. 2). Cōcālides, um, f. daughters of Cōcālus, who put Minos to death by pouring boiling water on his head in the bath at the time he pursued Dădālus into Sicily (Sil. Ital. xiv. 43).

Cōcēius Nērvā, Cōcēiū Nērvæ, m. a man of amiable character, and respected both by Augustus and Antōnius. Măcēnas and he were deputed to form a treaty between these powerful and ambitious noblemen, which they concluded at Brūndisium, Brindisi, in 39 B. C. Hōrātius, who was one of the party, describes their journey from Rome to that town with great spirit and humour (Sat. i. 5). The number of persons associated in this journey, their eminence and talents, as well as the important business left to their arrangement and determination, give an interest to this poem which has produced numerous imitations in different languages. The poet has, however, injured the whole by a gross violation of decency, deserving the severest reprehension. Cōcēius Nērvā was the ancestor of the emperor Nērvā (Horace Sat. i. 5. 50).—2. A senator of consular rank, distinguished by his legal knowledge, one of the three who attended Tiberius, when he quitted Rome to take up his residence in the island Căpræa, Capri, in the year 26. Seven years after, he starved himself to death in order to escape the horrors of the time. In possession of a splendid fortune, and in the vigour of health, he formed this resolution, from which no entreaty of the emperor could induce him to depart (Tac. Ann. iv. 58; vi. 26). Some have supposed that he was the father of the emperor Nērvā, others think him a more distant relative.

Cōcēius Prōcūlus, Cōcēiū Prōcūli, m. a soldier of the guards, who disputed in a court of law the boundaries of a property with one of his neighbours, and Otho bought the property of the other litigant and gave it to the soldier. This apparent act of generosity, in reality a bribe, excited no suspicion in the mind of the commander of the prætorian bands (Tac. Hist. i. 24).

M. Cōccū Nērvā, M. Cōccū Nērvā, m. who succeeded Dōmītiānus in the Roman empire, was born at Nārnā, Narni, a town of Umbria, a district of Itālia, Italy. He was the first Roman emperor of foreign extraction, his ancestors being originally Cretans. His father, grandfather, and great-grandfather held the consulship, an honour which he himself twice enjoyed before he was made emperor. According to Mārtiālis, he not only admired poetry, but wrote excellent verses (viii. 70: ix. 27), which procured him the respect of the emperor Nēro, who conferred on him several marks of his particular favour. Of his early history we have few particulars, and the empire came to him at an advanced age; according to Eutrōpius, in his seventieth year. Others make him five or six years younger. In every respect he stood opposed to his predecessor, Dōmītiānus, and had no sooner received the crown from the assassins of that emperor, than he began to rectify the abuses of the former reign. The mildness of his temper, added to rectitude of principle, promised to his subjects a mild and equitable administration of government. Perhaps greater vigour and resolution were necessary to render him an accomplished prince. The abolition of the laws relating to high treason, the recall of numerous exiles, the punishment of informers, and suppression of persecution against the Christian church, prove both his justice and political wisdom. The grants of his predecessor he not only confirmed, but, by an edict, rendered new rights for their tenure unnecessary. He expended considerable sums in the purchase of lands, which he gave to poor citizens, and provided for the maintenance and education of destitute children over all Italy. Honours were not conferred without discrimination. The virtuous and meritorious found in him a patron, whose liberality raised them nearly to a level with himself. Of his laws it may be proper to mention that he confirmed that of Dōmītiānus, prohibiting the mutilation of male children, and repealed that of Claudius, allowing uncles to marry nieces. In one word, he united in his government what had before been considered impossible, unlimited power and the liberty of the subject. The extreme facility of Nērvā exposed him to the outrages of the wicked and seditious. An insurrection of the prætorian guards, headed by Cāspērius Æliānus, proved that his feeble age was unequal to the checking of public disorder. They demanded the assassins of Dōmītiānus, on which the emperor placed his naked breast to them, begging that they would stab him and desist from their demand. The ferocious soldiers refused to imbrue their hands in his blood, but compelled him to comply with their request. This outrage induced him to adopt Trājanus, and appoint him his successor. Like every other act of his reign, this proclaimed to his subjects, that it was public good, not family aggrandizement, which he studied. From this period, the care of public matters devolved on Trājanus. A fever, induced by a sudden burst of passion at one Rēgūlus, terminated the life of Nērvā, after a reign of about sixteen months, in the seventy-second year of his age. Mārtiālis writes an epigram in praise of this emperor, in which several of the blessings enjoyed by his subjects are enumerated (xii. 6). He is the person called by Tācītus prator elect (Ann. xv. 72).

Cōchē, es, f. a town of the Persians, called also Sēlēucia q. v. (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 5).

Cōcles, Itis, m. a man of impure character (Mart. iii. 83).

Cōcles. See Horatius.

Cōcōsātes, um, m. a people of Aquitānia in Gāllia, France, whose country lay along the coast of Océānus Cāntabrieus, the Bay of Biscay, to the north of the territories of the Tārbēlli. Their chief town was Cōcōsa (Cæs. B. G. iii. 27).

Cōcūntus, i, f. Stilo, a town of Italy, near Lēucopetra. Adj. Cōcūntus, a, um. Cōcūntum promontorium, Cape Stilo (Ap. Bel. Civ. 735).

Cōcūtus, i, m. (i. e. the wailing), one of the rivers in the infernal regions, which flowed from Styx (Hom. Od. x. 514). There was a river of this name in Epirus, lower Albania, now the Vaca, which falls into Achéron, the River of Suli. From these streams and marshes Pausānias thinks Hómērus formed part of his ideas respecting the infernal regions (i. 17). Adj. Cōcūtus, a, um. Cōcūta Virgo, Alēctō, one of the Furies (Virg. Æn. vii. 479).

Codeta, æ, f. (minor), a piece of level land on the bank of Tiber, the Tecere, in the fourteenth division or district of Rome. There appear to have been two, as Codeta Minor occurs in Suetōnius, from which it may be inferred that there was also a Codeta Major. Adj. Codetānus, a, um. Codetānus campus, the same in meaning with Codeta Minor (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 39).

Codomannus. See Darius Codomannus.

Cōdrīo, ōnis, m. a fortified town of Mācēdōnia, which voluntarily surrendered to L. Apūstius, a lieutenant-general of P. Sūlpicius Gālba, in consequence of the fate of Antipātria q. v., in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 27).

Cōdrus, i, m. the last king of Athena, was the son of Mēlanthus in Pēlōpōnnēsus. Having heard that the Athēniēses or Hērāclidæ would be victorious if their king fell in battle, he put off his royal robes, and engaged one of the enemy, by whom he was killed. To this Hōrātius alludes (Od. iii. 19. 2). The victory was gained by the Athenians, who, from respect to his memory, decreed that no man should reign after him, and, therefore, changed their government from being monarchical to republican. They show the spot on the banks of Ilissus where he fell (Paus. i. 19).—2. A shepherd, who was an excellent poet (Virg. B. v. 11 seq.).—3. A contemptible poet (Juv. Sat. i. 2).—4. A Lemnian, the husband of Eurynōmē (Val. Flacc. ii. 136).—5. A person distinguished for his poverty (Juv. Sat. iii. 208).—6. A man mentioned by Mārtiālis, respecting whose character different opinions have been entertained. Too little of his history has reached modern times to determine the intention of the poet in regard to him. From one of Martial's epigrams it seems probable that he meant to describe him as poor (ii. 57: v. 27).

Cōla, æ, f. a town on Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Cōla, orum, n. a bay of Eubœa, Negropont, reckoned dangerous by mariners (Liv. xxxi. 47).—2. A pass or defile in Thessālia (Liv. xxxii. 4).

Cōlē-Sŷria, æ, f. (i. e. Hollow Sŷria), the plain of Bekka, so called from the valleys or plains between Libānus and Antilibānus, to which the name was originally confined, afterwards applied to the country of Sýria, stretching over all Phenicia and Pālestina, to Rāphā, Relah, on the confines of Egypt. Antiochus conquered all the states in Cælē-Sýria belonging to Ptōlōmæus, king of Egypt, during the summer of 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 47: xxxiii. 19).

Cælētæ, arum, m. the Cæletans, a people of Thrācia, Romulia, one part of whom lived at the foot of Hæmus, Eminehdag, and the other, near Rhōdōpē; the former are called by Plinius, Mājōres, and the latter Minōres (i. 438). Adj. Cælēticus, a, um.

Cælicōla, m, c. g. (Cælitæ, um, Stat. Th. xi. 132), an inhabitant of heaven. Potentēs et clarī cælicōla, are the greater gods of the nations (Dii majorum gentium), who formed the supreme council of Jūpiter (Ov. Met. i. 174). Ennius has included their names in the two following lines:

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars;
Mercurius, Jovis, Neptunus, Vulcanus,
Apollo.

Ovidius calls the other gods Plebs, the celestial populace (Ov. Met. i. 173).

Cælius, a, um. Cælius mons. See Cælius.

Cælius, i, m. a robber, whom Hōrātius mentions along with Birrius. That both were probably notorious for that crime seems a fair inference, from the manner in which the poet speaks of them (Sat. i. 4. 69).

Cælius Cūrsor, Cæli Cūrsoris, m. a Roman knight, who, with Cōnsidius Æquus, preferred a false accusation against Māgius Cæciliānus, and for that offence, at the request of the emperor, Tiberius, was condemned in the year 21 (Tac. Ann. iii. 37).

Cælius Pōllio, Cæli Pōlliōnis, m. a Roman prefect, who commanded, in Armēnia, the fort Gōrnūe, Khorien, or, Gerni, in the year 51 (Tac. Ann. xii. 45).

Cælius Sabinus, Cæli Sābini, m. with his brother Flāvius, were to hold the office of consul, during the months of May and June, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 77).

C. Cælius Rufus, C. Cæli Rūfi, m. was consul at Rome, with L. Pōmpōnius Flæcus, in the year 17. Tacitus calls him C. Cæcilius (Ann. ii. 41).

L. Cælius Antipāter, L. Cæli Antipātris, m. a writer of Roman history or annals, nearly of the same age with Pōlybius (Liv. xxi. 28 seq.). Vālērīus Māximus commends his accuracy as a historian (i. 7), and Cicero mentions with approbation his knowledge of the civil law, and the improvement which he effected in the style of historical composition, although he does not appear to have attained to elegance (Cic. Brut. 26: Leg. i. 2).

M. Cælius Rūfus, M. Cæli Rūfi, m. a noble Roman, in early life greatly addicted to pleasure, and afterwards ambitious of renown, was distinguished for his eloquence and talents as a speaker. He arraigned C. Antōnius, the colleague of Cicero in the consulship, for the improper administration of Mācēdōnū, of which he had been governor, and procured sentence of banishment against him. When a son of L. Atratinus preferred an accusation against Cælius for public violence, and an attempt to cut off Clōdīa by poison, Cicero procured his acquittal by an oration still extant. The orator commends him for his defence of the state when a tribune of the people, and his devotion to the will of the senate. He obtained the office of curule edile, with the approbation of all good men; but he afterwards preferred ambition to patriotism, by adopting the interest of C. Jūlius Cæsar, who left him Prætor Pēgrīnus, when he went against Cn. Pōmpeius. For his turbulence in that office, the senate banished him. Enraged at this ignominy, Cælius pretended that he would immediately set out to Cæsar, and having gone to Thūri, he was killed by some horsemen in Cæsar's army, who guarded that place, because he had attempted to rouse the inhabitants against him, and to seduce the troops from their allegiance to that general. This agrees with the statement in his letter to Cicero, in which he writes, that he repented of having joined Cæsar. Much respecting his opinions, conduct, and character, may be learned from different parts of Cicero's writings, and also from Quintiliānus, and Velleius Pātērcūlus.

Cænus, i, m. an officer under Alexander the Great, and one of those who had a command next to Nicānor in the battle at Issus. He died a natural death, in 327 B. C. (Curt. iii. 9 seq.).—2. A freedman of the emperor Nēro, whom Vitēllius put to death, probably on account of a false statement made by him in the senate (Tac. Hist. ii. 54).

Q. Cæparius, Q. Cæparii, m. a native of Tārrācina, Terracina, an associate of Cātīlina, who was preparing to set out for Apūlia to rouse and arm the slaves against the state, at the time the conspiracy was discovered. Having learned that the plot was detected, he fled from Rome before the officers, sent by the consuls to apprehend him, arrived at his house, but was afterwards taken and strangled in prison (Sal. Cat. 46—55).

Cerānus, i, m. a companion of Sārpēdon, king of Lýcia, killed by Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 257).—2. A Greek philosopher, commended by Plinius, and supposed by some to be the same with Clarānus, celebrated by Seneca (Epist. 66. Tac. Ann. xiv. 59).—3. A friend of Mēriōnes, killed by Hector (Hom. Il. xvii. 614 seq.).

Cæus, i, m. one of the Titans, who married Phœbē, by whom he had Astēria and Lātōna (Apol. i. 1 seq.). To this Ovidius alludes (Met. vi. 185), where many of the copies improperly read Cæo. The emperor, Claudius, considers Cæus as perhaps the first settler on the island Cos, Lango (Tac. Ann. xii. 61). Of him Vālērīus Flæcus gives a full account (iii. 224 seq.).

Cogidūnus, i, m. a British king, to whom the Romans assigned certain districts in the southern part of the island in the age of the historian Tacitus (Tac. Ag. 14).

Cōhibus, i, m. the Kobidzali, a river, which had its rise in Mount Cāucāsus, and falls into the Black Sea (Tac. Hist. iii. 48). Plinius calls this river Cōbum (i. 656), and Arriānus, Cōbus.

Cōhōrtānus, i, m. a Sogdian satrap (Curt. viii. 4).

Cōlāpis, is, m. the Kulp, a river of Illýriūm, which falls into the southern bank of Sāvus, the Save, at Siscia, Sisseck (Plin. i.

385). Cōlōpītāni, orum, m. people living on the banks of that stream.

Cōlāxes, is, m. a general of the Bisaltæ, a Scythian nation. He was a son of Jūpiter, and the nymph Hōra, and fell in battle with the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 48 seq.).

Cōlchas, æ, m. a king, who reigned over eighteen towns in the south of Spain. He raised three thousand foot and five hundred horse to support the Romans, which M. Jūnius Silānus, by order of P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Africānus, received from him immediately before the decisive battle which that general fought with Māsīnissa, Māgo, and Hāsdrūbal, the son of Gisgo, in 208 B. C. Nine years after, seventeen towns joined this powerful chieftain against the Romans (Liv. xxviii. 12 seq.).

Cōlchis, idis, f. an extensive country, which lay on the east of Pontus Euxinus, the Black Sea, now Mingrelia. It was remarkable for the fable of the golden fleece, and the consequent Argonautic expedition. This country abounded with poisonous herbs, and gave birth to the famous sorceress, Mēdēa. Cōlchis, idis, f. of Cōlchis, applied to females or nouns feminine. Cōlchis mātēr, Mēdēa (Virg. Cū. 248). Cōlchis (Mēdēa) (Ov. Met. vii. 301. Mart. x. 35). Cōlchides (Mēdēa and Scylla) (Mart. x. 4). Inh. Cōlchī, orum (Sing. Cōlchus, i), m. were originally a colony from Egypt (Herod. ii. 104). Mistis hic Cōlchus Iberis (Claud. xxi. 155). Adj. Cōlchus, Cōlchius, Cōlchicus, et, Cōlchiacus, a, um, of Cōlchis; poisonous, magical. Cōlcha cēnāna, Colchian poisons, i. e. most active poisons (Hor. Od. ii. 13. 8). Cōlchica flamma, magical fires, such as were used by Mēdēa, a native of Cōlchis (Hor. Epod. v. 24).

Cōlēnda, æ, f. a town of Spain, taken by T. Didius, after his defeat of the Vacciæ. It withstood a siege of seven months, and he rewarded the bravery of the townsmen by selling them, with their wives and children, for slaves. Inh. Cōlēndēnses, ium, m. (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 312).

Cōlinus, i, m. a man, whose name Mārtialis introduces (iv. 20), and to whom he addresses iv. 54, on a happy life. It is a gay, spirited, well-written poem.

Cōllācia, e. Cōllātia, æ, f. the name of a vicious woman (Juv. Sat. vi. 306). Here the good editions read Cōllāctēa.

Cōllātia, æ, f. a town of the Sabines, which stood on an eminence of considerable height. From this town L. Tārquinius, the husband of Lūcrētia, was surnamed Cōllātinus. Cōllātia and the district round it, were taken from the Sabines by Tārquinius Priscus, who appointed his brother's son, Egērius, governor of the city. Livius has recorded the form of the surrender (i. 38). Silius Itālicus makes L. Jūnius Brūtus a native of this town (viii. 361). Adj. Cōllātinus, a, um. Cōllātina pēntrālia (Ov. Fast. ii. 787). Cōllātinus. See Tārquinius.

Cōllinus, a, um. Cōllina pōrta, a gate of Rome, at Collis Quirinalis, near which Vēnus Erycinā had a temple (Ov. Fast. iv. 871). Cōllina hērbæ, herbs which grew within that gate, where was Cāmpus Scēlērātus, in which vestals for impurity were buried alive (Prop. iv. 5. 11). In Cōllinā tūrre, in the tower of Cōllina (Juv. Sat. vi. 290). It is probable, from this expression, it was strongly fortified, or from the camp which Fūlvius Flācus pitched between Esquillina pōrta and Cōllina, after the battle of Cannæ.

Cōllinus, i, m. a Roman, killed by Hānūbal at the foot of the Alps. He was born on Fūcinus, the Lake of Celano (Sil. Ital. iv. 344).

Cōlōnæ, arum, f. a place in the territory of Trōas, at which Pausānias for some time resided, and formed plans, says his biographer, injurious both to himself and to his country (Cor. Nep. Paus. 3). Plineius writes Cōlōnē, but Strabo uses the word in the plural (869).

Cōlōnia, æ, f. a woman, to whom Cātullus addresses his 17th poem. She appears to have been beautiful and handsome, whereas her husband was neither young nor of genteel appearance. This poem claims higher praise for beauty of language and melody of numbers than for the act which it recommends.

Cōlōnia, æ, f. a colony, a body of people, who quitted their mother-country to take possession of a distant province, either in consequence of an overgrown population, or with the view of securing the tranquillity of vanquished nations, or for the purposes of trade. The Phœnician colonies were of the first kind, and also the Grecian, the Roman were almost wholly of the second, and the third must be referred chiefly to what, comparatively speaking, may be called modern times. The Romans began their colonisation, an important part of their policy, almost with their first conquests, and continued them till a late period of their history. Such as were of importance will be found mentioned under the name of the town, or country, to which the colony was sent.

M. Cōlōnius, M. Cōlōnī, m. a Roman, whom L. Cānīnius Gāllus employed as his agent, although he had procured sentence against him for taking illegal means to obtain the favour of the populace, when Cānīnius was a candidate for the prætorship, in 60 B. C. (Val. Max. iv. 2).

Cōlōphon, ōnis, f. Beledere, a town of Iōnla, now in ruins, on the bank of Hālēsus. The famous oracle of Apōllo was in the neighbourhood of this town (Plin. i. 254: 603). Inh. Cōlōphōnī, orum (Sing. Cōlōphōnius, i), m. implored the protection of L. Æmilius Rēgūlus, prætor, who commanded the Roman fleet in the Archipelago, when their town was besieged by Antiochus, king of Sýria, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 26). Adj. Cōlōphōnius, et, Cōlōphōniæus, a, um. Cōlōphōnius Idmon, Idmon, a native of Cōlōphon (Ov. Met. vi. 8). Cōlōphōniæus Hēmērus, from this town being one of the seven which contended for the honour of Homer's birthplace (Virg. Cir. 65).

Cōlōssæ, arum, f. Konous, a town of Asiā Minor, in the vicinity of Lāōdiēcā. Inh. Cōlōssī, orum, m. To them the Apostle Paul addressed one of his Epistles. Adj. Cōlōssinus, a, um. Cōlōssinus flos (Plin. iv. 124).

Cōlōssus, i, m. a brazen statue of Apōllo at Rhōdos, Rhōdes, reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. It stood near the entrance to the harbour, was seventy cubits in height, the head represented the sun, one hand held a lighthouse. Chāres, a native of that island, planned this astonishing figure, and spent twelve years in the execution. An earthquake destroyed the work of this ingenious artist, about sixty-six years after its completion, and it does not appear that any attempt was made to repair this monument of the genius of Chāres. Of its weight we have no certain account, but some idea may be formed of the enormous quantity necessary for such a structure, aided by the statement of ancient authors, that the brass of it loaded nine hundred camels. Mirus Cōlōssus (Mart. i. 71).

Cōlūmen, inis, n. a place in Latium, near Algidus (Liv. iii. 23).

Cōlūmnæ Hērēulīs, the pillars of Hērēulēs, two mountains, Calpē and Abŷla, near the Strait of Gibraltar, the former in Spain, and the latter in Africa (Liv. xxi. 43).

Cōma, æ, m. the brother of Clēon q. v.

Cōmāna, orum, n. Bostan, the largest town in Cāppadōcia. It had a temple remarkable both for its riches and sanctity (Ap. Bel. Mith. 214).

Cōmānus, i, m. son and successor of Nānus, king of the Sēgōbrigii, who entered into a plot for the destruction of the Grecian colony lately settled in that country, to which his father had given ground for building a city, and his daughter Gyptis to Protis, a chief man in the expedition. A female relation of his own discovered the plot, which proved the safety of the colony, and the destruction of Cōmānus, with seven thousand of his subjects (Just. xliii. 4). See Māssilla.

Cōmbē, es, f. one of the Ophlēnses q. v., was the mother of the Curētes in Ætōllia. Her sons, who were said to be one hundred in number, attempted to put her to death; but she escaped, found safety in Pleuron, and was transformed into a bird (Ov. Met. vii. 383).

Combolomārus, i, m. the chieftain of the Trēmī Gālli, when Cn. Mānlius Vūlso marched against the Gallogræci, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 19).

Cōmbrea, æ, f. a town in Rēgio Crōssæa (Herod. vii. 123).

Cōmēdus, i, m. a mountain in the country of the Sāce (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Cōmētes, æ, m. a man unintentionally killed at the nuptials of Pirithōus, by his companion Chāraxus (Ov. Met. xii. 284).—2. The father of Astērion, one of the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. i. 356).—3. A magician whom Cāmbyses, king of Pērsia, ordered to kill his brother Smērdīs. The monarch died before he had committed the murder, which did not prevent his shedding innocent blood; having deprived Smērdīs of life, he substituted his own brother, Orōpāsta in his stead (Just. i. 9). Here some editions read, in place of Cōmētes, Prēxāspes, which agrees with Hērōdōtus (iii. 30).

Cōminium, i, n. a town of the Sāmmites, or Hirpini, taken, plundered, and burned by Sp. Cārvilius, the Roman consul, in 295 B. C. (Liv. x. 39—44).—2. A town of Cāmpānia, the situation of which seems doubtful. To distinguish it from the former, it is commonly written Cōminium Ceritum (Liv. xxv. 14).

Cōminius, i, m. a man of wicked morals, who had excited against himself the hatred of the people by abusive language. To him Cātullus addresses his 108th poem.

C. Cōminius, C. Cōminii, m. a Roman knight, who wrote defamatory verses against the emperor Tiberius, for which sentence was pronounced against him, but Tiberius pardoned him at the intercession of his brother (Tac. Ann. iv. 31).

L. Cōminius, L. Cōminii, m. served under Q. Fābius Māximus Rūliānus, master of the horse, in a battle with the Sāmmites, 324 B. C. By his advice the cavalry pulled off their horses' bridles, and spurred them on with such fury that they broke the enemy's ranks, and, being followed by the infantry, gained a complete victory (Liv. viii. 30).

Cōmitium, i, n. a place in the forum at Rome, originally uncovered, afterwards roofed in, and ornamented with pillars, paintings, and statues. After the successful engagement with the Antiatēs, it was called Rōstra, from being decorated with the beaks of their ships. Cōmitia, orum, n. assemblies of the Romans. The Cōmitia were of different kinds. Cālāta Cōmitia, which were held by a college of priests, either on account of consecrating a Rex Sacrorum, or a Flāmen. Cōmitia Cūriāta, called together by the lictor of the ward or district, in which the people gave their votes in their own wards, of which the number was thirty. No measure could come before the people but through the Cōmitia Cūriāta, because at one time there was no other. Cōmitia Cētūriāta, in which the people voted in their different classes, i. e. according to their wealth. Servius Tullius first divided the citizens into classes, and to him the Cōmitia Cētūriāta must be referred. Cōmitia Tribūta, in which the people gave their votes by tribes, and the first were said to have been held by the tribunes of the people at the trial of C. Mārcius Cōriōlānus (Gel. xv. 27).

Cōmmāgēnē, es, v. Cōmmāgēna, æ, f. a district of Asia, to the east of Cilicia, which, in the age of Ammianus, was called Euphrātēnsis. Samōsāta, Scempsat, was, according to Plinius, the capital of Cōmmāgēnē. Inh. Cōmmāgēni, orum, m. the Commagenians (Tac. Ann. ii. 56). Adj. Cōmmāgēnus, a, um. Cōmmāgēnus hāruspes (Juv. Sat. vi. 549).

Cōmmius, i, m. one of the nation of the Atrēbātes, hence called Atrēbas, whom Caesar appointed king over that people, in return for his important services. He afterwards fell under the suspicion of T. Attius Lābrius, who employed C. Vōlūscenus Quādrātus to kill him in an interview. This perfidious design did not succeed; but in the scuffle Cōmmius was wounded in the head. He was, from that period, a violent enemy to the Romans. Being at last defeated, he was obliged to submit to Antōnius, which he did, on condition that he should not appear before any Roman. On these terms Antōnius granted him peace (Cæs. B. G. iv. 21 seq.).

Cōmmōdus. See L. Annius Antōnius Vērus, and L. Antōnius Cōmmōdus.

Cōmplēga, æ, f. a town of Spain, in Celtiberia (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 278).

Cōmpsa, æ, f. Conza, a town of Italy in the Apennines, near the source of Aufidus, the Ofanto. It was delivered over to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, through the agency of Stātiūs Trēblius, and retaken by Q. Fābius Māximus, the Roman consul, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 1: xxiv. 20). Inh.

Cōmpāni, orum, m. Adj. Cōmpānus, a, um. Cōmpānus ager (Liv. xxiv. 44).

Cōmpās, i, m. a river of Thrācia, which runs into the lake Bistōnis (Herod. vii. 109).

Cōmpūtēria, æ, f. a town of Sāmnum, of which the situation is uncertain. It had revolted to Hānnibal, and was retaken by Q. Fabius Māximus, consul, 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 39 seq.).

Cōmum, i, n. Como, a town of Gāllia Trāspādāna, built by the Gauls, and taken by the Roman consul M. Claudius Mārcellus, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 36). Inh. Cōmenses, ium, m. Adj. Cōmēnsis, is, e. Cōmēnsis ager, the land belonging to Cōmum (Liv. xxxiii. 36).

Cōncāna, æ, f. Cangas do Oms, a town of Cāntābria in Hispānia, Spain. Inh. Cōncāni, orum (Sing. Cōncānus, i, m. like many other barbarous nations, drank the blood of horses, and, most probably, ate their flesh, which is still done both in Europe and Asia. Hōrātius mentions this custom (Od. iii. 4. 34), and Silius Itālicus (iii. 361).

Cōncōrdia, æ, f. Drusenheim, a Roman fort in the territory of the Nēmētes (Amm. Mar. xvi. 12).

Cōndrūsi, orum, m. a people of Gāllia Bēlgica, who lived on the river Mōsa, the Meuse, north of Silva Ardūēna (Cæs. B. G. ii. 4 seq.).

Cōndylon, i, n. an impregnable fort in Tēpē, mentioned by Livius (xlv. 6).

Cōndylus, i, m. a man who performed on the pipe (Mart. v. 79). Some think that Mārtiālis refers to the appearance of the tibia, or pipe, which had stops resembling a knuckle, which is the proper meaning of Cōndylus. This appears far-fetched, and, therefore, the former, giving a better sense, ought to be preferred. Besides, the poet addresses an epigram to a man of this name (ix. 94).

Cōnē, æ, f. a river of Sārmātia, one of the branches of the Danube; mentioned only by Lūcānus. Barbāra Cōnē (Luc. Phar. iii. 200).

Cōnētōdūnus, i, m. a nobleman of the most daring resolution, who, along with Cōtūātus, a man of equal intrepidity, headed their countrymen the Cārnutes, when they put to the sword all the Roman citizens, who had settled at Gēnābūm, Orleans, on account of trade, and seized on their property (Cæs. B. G. vii. 3).

Cōnfluentes, ium, f. Coblenz, a town of Germany, situated at the junction of Rhēnus, the Rhine, and Mōsella, the Moselle, whence its name (Amm. Mar. xvi. 3).

Cōngēdus, i, m. the Congedo, a river in the north of Spain (Mart. i. 50).

Cōngēntiātus, i, m. son of Bitūtus, king of the Arvērni, whom the Roman senate ordered to be seized, and sent to Rome, on his father being put into custody at Alba, when he had come to Rome to satisfy the senate for his having joined the Allōbrōges, with whom the Romans were then at war, in 121 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 61).

Cōnīstōrgis, is, f. Conna, a town of Portugal (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 287).

Cōnnōba, æ, m. a noted Spanish robber (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 286).

Cōnon, ōnis, m. a native of Athens, celebrated for his patriotism and military knowledge. On the defeat of his countrymen at the river Ægos, he went directly to Pharnabāzus, governor of Iōnia and Lydia, whose favour he procured by much exertion, and by exposing himself to many dangers. At the instigation of Tissaphernes, the Lacedæmonians broke their alliance with the Persian monarch, and sent Agesilāus to make war in Asia. Cōnon impeded the operations of that able general, and continued with the royal lieutenants, although his countrymen had recalled him, on their declaring war, in conjunction with the Bæotians, against the Lacedæmonians. By this measure, he eventually destroyed the ascendancy of the Lacedæmonians, and recovered the liberties of the rest of Greece. Having been sent by Pharnabāzus to the king, on purpose to impeach Tissaphernes, he not only convinced the monarch of his treachery, but obtained the command of the war against the Lacedæmonians, whom he conquered in a naval engagement off Cnidus, taking many of their ships, and sinking more. This victory delivered Athens and the rest of Greece from the Lacedæmonian yoke. After repairing the walls of Athens and Piræus, Porto Leone, he formed a design to restore Iōnia and Æolia to the Athenians. Tiribāzus, governor of Sārdes, Sart, came to the knowledge of this intention, sent for Cōnon, pretending he meant to entrust him with business of importance to the king. Cōnon, unsuspecting of his plan being discovered, waited immediately on Tiribāzus, who put him into confinement. According to some, he was sent to the king, by whom he was put to death; according to others, he effected his escape, either with the knowledge, or from the inattention of Tiribāzus (Cor. Nep. Vit. Con.). Jūstinus relates, that the Lacedæmonians defeated him, and that, fearing the cruelty of his countrymen, he fled with eight ships to Evāgōras, king of Cyp̄rus (v. 6).—2. The father of Timōthēus (Cor. Nep. Timoth. 1).—3. The son of Timōthēus, whom the Athenians obliged to pay ten talents, the tenth part of the fine which they had imposed upon his father, and in consequence of which he died in exile (Cor. Nep. Timoth. 4).—4. An astronomer of great distinction, whom Virgilius mentions (B. iii. 40), and Prōpērtius (iv. 1. 78).

Cōnōnūs, i, m. the man who betrayed to Hānnibal, Tārēntum, at the time it was in the possession of the Romans (Ap. Bel. An. 331).

Cōnsēntia, æ, f. Cosenza, the capital of the Bruttii, taken by Alēxānder, king of Epirus, in 325 B. C., afterwards by the troops under Hānnibal. Inh. Cōnsēntini, orum, m. put themselves under the protection of Rome, in 215 B. C. Adj. Cōnsēntinus, a, um. Cōnsēntinus ager (Liv. xxviii. 11).

Cōnsidius Æquus, Cōnsidii Æqui, m. a Roman knight, punished by authority of the emperor Tiberius, and a decree of the senate, for having, with Caius Cūrsor, falsely accused Māgius Cæciliānus, in the year 21 (Tac. Ann. iii. 37).

Cōnsidius Prōcūlus, Cōnsidii Prōcūli, m. a noble Roman, charged with the crime of treason. Whilst engaged in celebrating his birthday, without the slightest apprehension of danger, he was dragged to the senatehouse, condemned, and instantly put to death, in the year 33 (Tac. Ann. vi. 18).

C. Cōnsidius Lōngus, C. Cōnsidii Lōngi, m. a partisan of Pōmpeius, who was at one time the governor of Adrūmētum. He committed several acts of enormous cruelty. Cōnsidius afterwards commanded at Tisdra, a garrison of Gætulians, and, on hearing of the defeat of his party, fled from that town with his treasures. Escaping from these barbarians, and taking the road for Nūmīdia, Algiers, he was pursued by them, and, to obtain possession of his money, they put him to death (Cæs. B. C. ii. 23 seq.).

P. Cōnsidius, P. Cōnsidii, m. one of Cæsar's officers in the Gallic war. His military knowledge was highly esteemed, but his courage does not appear to have been very remarkable. He had served both in the army of Sūlla and of Crāssus (Cæs. B. G. i. 21).

Q. Cōnsidius, Q. Cōnsidii, m. a plebeian tribune, who united with his colleague, T. Gēnūcius, in proposing an agrarian law. They arraigned T. Mēnēnius, against whom they procured a sentence of condemnation, in opposition to the most zealous efforts of the patricians, in 496 B. C. (Liv. ii. 52).—2. A wealthy Roman, who, during the commotion excited by Cātīlina, contributed, by his liberality, to confirm the confidence of the public, and to prevent a general mistrust as to pecuniary matters (Val. Max. iv. 8).

Cōnstāns, āntis, m. third son of Cōnstāntinus Māgnus and Fausta, daughter of Māximīānus Hērclēus, who, on the death of his father, obtained the western provinces of the empire. Not satisfied with the division assigned to him, and having received no share of the spoil of his murdered relation, Cōnstāntinus, his elder brother, invaded his territories, defeated him in a pitched battle, and compelled him to flee. In the usurpation of Māgnēntius, Cōnstāns was killed at Illibēris, Helena, a town of Spain, at the foot of the Pyrenees, in the seventeenth year of his reign. Eutrōpius has drawn his character in terms which do not recommend him to the approbation of his readers (x. 9).

Cōnstāntina, a, f. a town of Mēsōpōtāmīa, which received this name from the rebuilder, Cōnstāntinus. Its ancient name was Antōnīnōpōlis q. v. (Amm. Mar. xviii. 7).

Cōnstāntinōpōlis, is, f. Constantinople, called by the Turks Stamboul (Amm. Mar. xiv. 11). See Bijzantium. Adj. Cōnstāntinōpōlitānus, a, um. Cōnstāntinōpōlitāna urbs (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 7).

Cōnstāntinus. See Flāvius.

Cōnstāntius, i, m. second son of Cōnstāntinus the Great, by Fausta, daughter of the emperor Māximīānus Hērclēus, and nephew of Jūlius Cōnstāntius. To his education in early life, every possible degree of attention was paid, and all who mention his talents or instruction in youth allow, that he distinguished himself in running, leaping, archery, and horsemanship. Besides, he used, with great dexterity, all the weapons then in use, either among the cavalry or infantry. His father employed, for the benefit of Cōnstāntius and his brothers, the most celebrated teachers of Christianity, of Grecian philosophy, and of Roman jurisprudence.

The science of government, and knowledge of mankind, they learned from the emperor himself. Cōnstāntius obtained the provinces in the east when very young; and his father had no sooner expired than he seized on Constantinople. To remove all apprehensions from the minds of his relations, he pledged himself by a solemn oath for their security. The bishop of Nicōmēdēa put into his hand a paper which he affirmed to be the genuine testament of his father, in which he alleged that his brother had poisoned him, and advised his sons to avenge his death. This suspicion reported to the soldiers, inflamed their resentment, and the two uncles of the emperor, seven of his cousins and other relations fell in the massacre that immediately ensued. Cōnstāntius had married the daughter of his uncle, Jūlius Cōnstāntius, and had given his own sister, Cōnstāntina, in marriage to his cousin Annibālīanus. In the new division of the empire which followed, he obtained the east, restored Chōsrōes, son of Tiridātes, to the throne of Armēnia, marched against Sāpor, king of Pērsia, whose troops, after a slight skirmish, fled in confusion, yet afterwards attacked the Romans rioting in the camp during the night, and gained a complete victory, on which the remains of the legions fled, and afterwards endured the severest hardships. The military talents and personal valour of Cōnstāntius cannot be doubted, notwithstanding this defeat; since the soldiers rushed into the enemy's camp in opposition to the orders of their emperor, whom they disregarded on account of his youth, for he was only twenty years of age at his father's death. His elder brother Cōnstāntinus, who expressed great dissatisfaction from receiving no share of the spoil, obtained from the massacre of his relations, and thinking his division of the empire too small, made war on the youngest, Cōnstāns, with the view of forcing him to yield the provinces of Africa, to form an equivalent for Greece and Macedōnia, which Cōnstāntius acquired by the death of Dalmātius. A domestic traitor, named Māgnēntius, encouraged by popular discontent, assumed the purple, and Cōnstāns was killed in a temple at Illibēris, Helena, a town of Spain, at the foot of the Pyrenees. The legions under the command of Vētrānio, followed the example of the troops who declared for Māgnēntius, and Vētrānio had the crown set on his head by Cōnstāntina, daughter of Cōnstāntinus Māgnus. Cōnstāntius acknowledged him his colleague in the empire, on condition that he should renounce the alliance formed by Māgnēntius. At a future period he effected an interview, and concerted measures so artfully that Vētrānio laid down his crown, threw himself at the emperor's feet, and begged his life, which Cōnstāntius granted, and fixed the place of residence where he passed the remainder of his days in tranquillity and safety. On coming to an engagement, the emperor gained a decisive victory over Māgnēntius, on the right bank of Drāvus, the Drave, but the usurper effected his escape. This deliverance neither re-instated him in the kingdom, nor obtained for him safety. Cōnstāntius continued his pursuit, defeated him in every engagement, and, at last, rather than come into the hands of his inflexible enemy, he fell on his own sword. Cōnstāntius, now sole emperor, attended to the education of his cousins, Gāllus and Jūliānus, of whom the former fell into disgrace and lost his life. On Jūliānus he bestowed the title of Cæsar, with the view of his succeeding him in the empire.

He retaliated the calamities brought on the Roman provinces by the Quādi and Sarmāte; but, at the last, matters were managed without judgment, and without success. The empress and his counsellors secretly and indirectly led him to adopt, with great zeal, the tenets of Arius, and to banish Athanasius, whom fear of his brother Cōstantius afterwards induced him to recall. The subsequent part of his reign is chiefly occupied with his contentions with the bishops, of whose measures or doctrines he disapproved, and of others whom he countenanced and supported. The military fame of Jūlianus excited the fears of Cōstantius, and he recalled the army from Gallia, France, to march for the east. The troops, however, declared him Augustus, and, in spite of his opposition, assured him that if he wished to live he must reign. Cōstantius and Jūlianus now made preparations for supporting their respective honours by the sword. The death of the former delivered the Roman empire from the calamities of a civil war, and the latter obtained the peaceful possession of the empire.

Cōstantius Chlōrus, Cōstantii Chlōri, m. was son of Eutrōpius, a nobleman of Mesia, and Claudia, daughter of Crispus, and niece of the emperor Claudius II. and Quintillus. Under the emperor Prōbus he acquired a knowledge of war, and became an excellent general. Māximianus Hērclēus adopted him, and in consequence of his admission into that family he acquired the name of Valērius. His family name appears to have been Flāvius, hence in ancient monuments we find him called Flāvius Valērius Cōstantius. He never used Chlōrus as a part of his name, and therefore it appears probable that in public he was known by this name from the paleness of his complexion. His noble birth and humane dispositions gave him a decided superiority over some of the emperors of his time, who were of mean extraction. Before his adoption he had married Hēlēna, mother of Cōstantinus the Great, whom Māximianus compelled him to divorce, on which he married Thēodōra, daughter of the empress Eutrōpia, wife of Māximianus, by her former husband. On obtaining the title of Cēsar, Māximianus assigned to him Spain, France, and Britain, for his provinces. At this period two had the title of Augustus, two that of Cēsar, and Diocletianus wore the purple. He waged war in France against Cāraulus with success, carried his arms into Germany, and overpowered the nations who opposed him. Having defeated the troops of Allēctus in Britain, he reunited that island to the Roman empire. After the battle, laying aside his imperial ornaments to prevent discovery, he fled, but was overtaken and killed. In every instance Cōstantius made the noblest use of his victory, and it reflects honour on his character, that he treated the Christians with great kindness. On the resignation of Diocletianus, he and his colleague Gālērīus obtained the title of Augusti. The latter chose their successors from his own dependants, still in point of influence and esteem he fell greatly short of Cōstantius. Gālērīus governed with cruelty, and Cōstantius with mildness; as the former had obtained nearly two-thirds of the empire, he resolved to use the power which he had thus acquired to destroy his colleague, and appears even to have meditated the death of his sons. Cōstantius, afterwards surnamed the Great, escaped from his hands, joined Cōstantius, his father, in France, and accompanied him into Britain to make war on the Picts whom they conquered. Cōstantius then appointed Cōstantinus his sole successor, and died in his arms at Eboracum, York, in the year 306. By his second wife, Thēodōra, Cōstantius had three sons, Dalmāticus, Jūlius Cōstantius, and Annibālānus, and as many daughters, Cōstantia, Anastasia, and Eutrōpia. Cōstantinus, probably his only child by Hēlēna, was then in the thirty-third year of his age, and had given proofs of that valour, and of the numerous virtues which afterwards adorned his reign. See Flāvius Cōstantinus.

Cōsules, um (Sing. Cōsul, ūlis, m. Consuls, the two supreme magistrates in the Roman state. Various derivations of this term have been given. As they consulted or took the opinion of the senate on every important matter, there can be little doubt that it ought to be referred to the verb consulere. It has been maintained that these magistrates were at first called Pratōres; but classic authors scarcely justify that assertion. Perhaps it may be referred to an inaccurate translation of a sentence in Līvius (iii. 55). That author, in the conclusion of his first book, says, that, on the expulsion of the kings, two consules were created at the Cōmitia Cēnturiāta. The Romans appointed two, in order that they might mutually restrain each other, and to check the insolence of power they limited the continuance of this office to one year. From particular circumstances they sometimes continued in office two years, as in the case of Cn. Serrilius Gēmīnus and C. Flāminius Nēpos, in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 34). On the authority of Līvius it may be stated, that their power was equal to that of the kings, and the badges of office the same, except that they wanted the crown. They wore the toga prætecta, held in their hand an ivory sceptre, sat on an ivory chair, and were preceded by twelve lictors, or public officers, who carried a bundle of rods in the midst of which was an axe, hence called fascēs et scūres. This last badge of office seems to have been intended to deter the citizens from the commission of crimes, by showing the power of the consuls not only to beat with rods, but also to behead, or punish capitally. Pōplicōla lessened the authority of the consuls, by restricting their jurisdiction to scourging only. The same citizen made other entrenchments on the consular prerogative. He passed a law rendering an appeal, from the sentence of the consuls, competent to the people. He also ordained, that when even the consuls entered an assembly of the people they should own the supremacy of the Commons by lowering the fascēs. The creation of the tribunes of the people most of all weakened the authority of these magistrates; since they could, in every instance, interpose their negative, which rendered the decision or law of the consuls nugatory. Besides they had, or at least exercised, the power of committing them to prison, as in the case of L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Postumius Albinus, in 153 B. C., and P. Cornēlius Scipio Nāsica, and Decius Junius Brūtus, 140 B. C. Authority was vested in the tribunes of the people to oblige the consuls to name a dictator, and to follow the directions of the senate; if the consuls refused, the tribunes might order them to be imprisoned (Liv. iv. 26). See Tribūnus. Anciently the consul who had the greatest number of children received the fasces first; if both had the same number of children, the married man was preferred to the widower; if both were husbands, and the number of their children was the same, the elder had the badges of office first (Gel. ii. 15). In the city, the consuls had the lictors with their fasces alternately, not both at the same time, lest the people might be alarmed by double terror (Liv. ii. 1); but when abroad, or in different places, each enjoyed the full pomp of office. Every mark of respect was paid them by their fellow-citizens. While they passed, no person continued to sit, all rose up, uncovered their heads, went out of the road, and alighted from horseback. Neglect in any of those particulars subjected to punishment. Being at the head of the state, they necessarily possessed great authority. They convened the senate at pleasure, proposed whatever laws they deemed necessary, held a certain jurisdiction over all the other magistrates, with the exception of the tribunes of the people, gave audience to foreign ambassadors, and all letters respecting the state, whether from the kings of other nations, or from the governors of provinces, were addressed to them. During war, they levied troops, appointed the officers, procured provisions, and held the supreme command of the armies. If the person whose name came out refused to answer, that is, declined to enlist, the consul sometimes sold both his property and himself, as was done by M. Curius Dentatus (Liv. Ep. 24. Val. Max. vi. 3). In dangerous conjunctures, the senate invested them with unlimited power by a solemn decree in these words, Dent opēram Consules, ne quid detrimenti respublica caperet. From the dignity and power attached to the office of consul, it was consequently aspired at by all distinguished by birth, talents or fortune. Ambition among the Romans had no higher aim, until the lawless lust of dominion stimulated C. Julius Caesar to grasp at the sovereignty, by crushing the liberties of his country. From that period, the consular power became in a great measure nominal, and was at last finally suppressed. The Romans marked the year by the names of the two consuls, and the scholar must not confound it with the civil year. The former commenced with the day on which these magistrates entered on office, and that period underwent several changes. The first consuls were inducted on the 23d, or 24th of February, which, from the festival celebrated on that day called Regifugium, seems intended to commemorate the expulsion of the tyrant Tarquin, and the commencement of Roman liberty. At a future period, we find the consular year commenced on 15th December, afterwards 1st July, then 15th March, and in the year 153, or 154, B. C., it was changed to 1st January, which, from its coincidence with the civil year, continued without further alteration. They were elected at the Comitia Centuriata, and, as soon as the votes had been taken, a public crier proclaimed the names of the successful candidates. Hence the expression, Declarantur Consules, are declared consuls, i. e. by a public crier (a præcōnē). The consuls presided at the election of the magistrates; but if both consuls had been substituted in the room of others deceased, in the opinion of those skilled in religious rites and public law, they could not preside at the elections (Liv. xli. 18). The election of the consuls always preceded their induction several months. In the latter years of the republic, they were elected end of July, or beginning of August; and, to the first of January, were called Consules Designati. During that time they had no authority, but certain honours peculiar to themselves. In that interval, too, if suspicion arose respecting the means employed to procure the election, their conduct, during the canvass, was investigated, and conviction of bribery deprived them of the consulship, by annulling their appointment. On the day fixed for their induction, the senate and people met at the house of the new consuls, and conducted them, in a formal and pompous procession, to the capitol, when each of them sacrificed an ox to Jupiter, and entered on office by consulting the senate respecting the Latin holidays, and other matters of religion. Within five days, they had to swear that they would scrupulously observe the laws; and, at the expiry of their office, they assembled the people, when they declared on oath, that they had fulfilled their promise. They commonly made a speech, in which they stated what they had done for the state, and the fortunate events which had occurred during their consulship. The Tribunes had the power of preventing them delivering any address to the people, but not from making oath, that they had not violated the laws. Among their first acts was the settling of their provinces, which they did either by lot or agreement. That power properly belonging to the senate, and, in latter times, when it signified a conquered country under the Roman dominion, that body generally exercised it. In the early ages of the state, they had no such departments to fill, and province then signified a certain duty to be performed, or a certain trust committed to the consuls. The senate sent the consuls to the provinces, or recalled them at pleasure, though the latter was much seldomer done than justice demanded, as the governors of provinces were often guilty of enormous cruelty, injustice, and oppression. The patricians at first engrossed all the higher offices of the state, and only those of the very first families were, for a long time, deemed worthy of being consuls. Afterwards a law was passed, permitting one of the consuls to be a plebeian. In 365 B. C., L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus, a plebeian, obtained the consulship in consequence of the law passing which he himself proposed (Liv. vii. 1). Sometimes, but rarely, both consuls were plebeians. Before so high an office was attainable, the candidate must have been Questor, Edile, and Prætor; but this order was not always observed. In 213 B. C., P. Sulpicius Galba was chosen consul, and had not previously borne any curule office (Liv. xxv. 41). To secure respect to the highest office, a law declared that none could be elected under 43 years of age. This regulation, too, as well as those decreeing a man to be in a private situation, and present at his election, with its being unlawful to be re-elected within ten years, were often violated, particularly after bribery began to prevail, and tyranny to sap the foundation of the constitution. Sometimes, in the latter years of the republic, there was only one consul. Cn. Pompeius Magnus was elected without a colleague, in 54 B. C., a circumstance which had not previously occurred (Liv. Ep. 107). Under the emperors the office was frequently held only for a few months. The senate then lost the ruling passion of the Romans, love of their country, and, under the emperors, passed any law which caprice might dictate, or barbarity enforce. Roman liberty expired at Philippi q. r., and consular power was, from that period, an empty name. Cōsulātus, ūs, m. the office of consul, the consulship. Cōsulārītas, ātis, f. wants classical authority. Adj. Cōsulārīs, is, e, of a consul, or who had been consul, relating to the consulship, consular. Adv. Cōsulārīter, in the manner of a consul.

Cōsus, i, m. a name of Nēptūnus among the Romans (Ov. Fast. iii. 199). According to Festus, Cōsus was the god of counsel. Cōsusilla, ium, n. games in honour of Cōsus, which were celebrated on the twelfth day of the kalends of September. Rōmulus celebrated them with a view to obtain wives for himself and his subjects from among the Sabines, who were spectators. They were afterwards called Circēnes, from the place where they were exhibited (Liv. i. 9). Perhaps they were the same with Lūdi magni, e. Māximi, et, Rōmāni.

Cōtādēsūs, i, m. a branch of the Agrīnes (Herod. iv. 90).

Cōtēnēbra, æ, f. a town of the Etruscī, taken, plundered, and destroyed by the Romans, in 388 B. C. (Liv. vi. 4).

Cōtrēbia, e. Cētrōbrīca, æ, f. Santavert, a town of Hispānia Tārrācōnēnsis, taken by the Roman prætor, in 184 B. C., after which the greater part of Cēltibēria surrendered (Liv. xl. 33).

Cōvictōlītānis, is, m. a young nobleman of the Ædūi, who disputed with Cōtus for the supreme power. The Ædūi referred the matter to the decision of Caesar, who confirmed the election of Cōvictōlītānis. Being gained over by the Arvērni, he afterwards induced his countrymen to revolt (Caes. B. G. vii. 32 seq.). See Litavicus.

Cōon, ōnis, m. elder son of Antēnor, killed by Agāmēmon, whom he had severely wounded (Hom. Il. xi. 248 seq.).

Cōpe, arum, f. a village of Bœōtia (Hom. Il. ii. 502). From it Cōpāis has been derived. If this etymology be accurate, λυπεύω, or, læus must be understood.

Cōpāis, idis, f. Licadia limnæ, a lake of Bœōtia, into which a number of the Roman soldiers, after having been murdered, had been thrown, with earthen jars or stones tied to them, in order to make their bodies sink, 193 B. C. For this outrage, T. Quinctius Flāminius was going to make war on the state; but, at the intercession of the Achæi, he raised the siege, on condition that they paid thirty talents and delivered up the guilty (Liv. xxxiii. 29). This lake abounds with fish and wild fowl; its banks are covered with fine reeds, from which are made the best pipes.

Cōphas, æ, m. son of Artābāzus, sent by Alexander the Great on purpose to prevail on Artimāzes to give up the rock which it was his business to protect. Trusting to its strength, Artimāzes answered him haughtily and refused compliance (Curt. vii. 11).

C. Cōpōnius, C. Cōpōnī, m. one of Pompey's officers, who had the command of the Rhodian squadron at Dyrāchium, Durazzo (Caes. B. C. iii. 26).

Cōprēus, ēos, m. a Mycenian, the father of Pēriphētes (Hom. Il. xv. 639).

Cōptus, i, f. Kypt, or, Cana, a town of Egypt, near the Nile, the emporium of the Indian and Arabian trade. Ptolēmaeus Philādēlphus made a road two hundred and fifty Roman miles in length, across the desert, from Cōptus to Bērenicē, on Mārē Rūbrum, the Red Sea, at which the Indian goods were landed. Strābo mentions, that the merchants carried their articles along this road on camels, travelled during the night, and steered their course like sailors by the stars. He adds, that the journeys were performed in six or seven days (1154). Calida Cōptus, hot, or, scorching, Kypt, from its latitude being somewhat less than twenty-six degrees north, consequently within two and a half degrees of the Tropic of Cancer (Juv. Sat. xv. 28).

Cōquus, i, m. a cook, considered by the ancient Romans as the meanest of their slaves, both in value and use. After the conquest of Antiochus, king of Syria, and the Galatians, a taste for luxuries began to prevail, and victuals were dressed with greater care and cost; cooks then rose in estimation, and their office, anciently esteemed servile, began to be considered a reputable art, in 188 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 6).

Cōra, æ, f. Cora, a town of Lātium, built by Dardānus. Inh. Cōrāni, ōrum (Sing. Cōrānus, i), m. joined the Aurūci, along with Suessa Pōmētia, against the Romans, but at sight of the legions gave hostages, which prevented hostilities, in 495 B. C. (Liv. ii. 16: 22). They were frequently ill treated by the Romans, against which they remonstrated in vain, as well as when they declared their inability to furnish the demanded supplies. Adj. Cōrānus, a, um. Cōrānus ager (Liv. viii. 19).—2. See Chōra.

Cōrācēsium, i, n. Alaiāh, a town of Cilicia, under Ptolēmaeus, king of Egypt, which Antiochus, king of Syria, besieged in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 20). Near it was the mountain Cōrācēsius, i, m. (Plin. i. 590).

Cōrācinus, i, m. a man, frequently mentioned by Mārtiālis, who appears to have led a very depraved and vicious life (Mart. iv. 43).

Cōrālētæ, arum, m. a Scythian nation, who lived in waggons, and engaged in war with the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 81).

Cōrālla, æ, f. Korabali, a town on the coast of the Black Sea, on the western boundary of the Colchians.

Cōrālli, ōrum, m. a Scythian nation, who engaged in war with the Argonauts, and were commanded by Phālees (Val. Flacc. vi. 89).

Cōrānus, i, m. an avaricious old man, who duped Nāsica, which Hōrātius has humourously related (Sat. ii. 5. 57).—2. Another of this name is mentioned by Jūvénālis, who describes him as a soldier, and courted by his father, an old man trembling from age, with the view of obtaining the money which he had earned in the camp (Sat. xvi. 54).—8. A man, who filled his casks with water, which Mārtyālis insinuates he sold instead of wine (ix. 100).

Cōras, z., m. a son of Amphiāraus, and brother of Tībūrtus and Cātillus. These three brothers settled in Italy, and built the town Tibur, Ticoli, on Anio, the Teverone. Cōras was an able commander, and assisted Tūrnus against Ænēas (Virg. Æn. vi. 776).

Cōrax, ácis, m. son of Aréthūsa, who was killed by a fall from a rock, to which he gave his name, and his mother dissolved into a fountain. The Scholiast on the Odyssey of Homer, says, there were four fountains of this name, one in Ithāca, one in Syracūse, one in Smýrna, and another in Chálcis (xiii. 408).

Cōrax, ἄεις, m. Coraca, a very high mountain between Cāllipolis and Nāpactēs, L. panto, adjoining to Œta (Liv. xxxvi. 30).—2. Kisilja, a mountain of Lȳdia, to the south of Smyrna.—3. A river, which runs into Pōntus Euxinus. It probably took its rise in the mountain of that name. Ammliānus Mārcēllinus only says, it was in the territory of the Saurōmāte (xxii. 8).

Córdoba, onis, m. a town of the Æqui, taken by Cōrribānus, at the head of the Volsci, in 491 B. C. The garrison at this town was cut off by the Æqui, but the town immediately retaken by the consul, C. Hōrātius Pūbillus, who, on account of the treachery practised against the garrison, levelled it with the ground, in 457 B. C. (Liv. ii. 39 seq.).—2. A town of the Suessitāni, in Spain, taken by the prætor, A. Tērentius Vārro, who carried it by storm, and sold the prisoners, in 186 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 42).

Côrbis, is, m. the cousin-german of Orsûa, with whom he disputed the sovereignty of a state called Ibes. Côrbis was more advanced in age, but the father of Orsûa had been the last sovereign, having succeeded upon the death of an older brother, the father of Côrbis. They insisted on deciding the controversy by the sword, and to fight when P. Cornélius Scîpio Afrîcanus was exhibiting shows of gladiators, in commemoration of his father's and uncle's death. The Roman general endeavoured to terminate the difference by calm discussion; but they refused to submit to any decision but that of Mars, each preferring death in fight to seeing the other in authority. Côrbis easily overcame the ill-managed strength of his younger relation, by his superior experience and skill in arms (Liv. xviii. 21).

Cōrbūlo, ōnis, m. a man, who commanded the ship Cūmāna, in the Second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 408).

Scyræa, ie. f. Corfu, or, Korpha, derived from Koruphoi, from its double Acropolis, which the Greeks now call Kappa; an island on the west of Greece, off the coast of Epirus, Lower Abassia, from which it is only distant about four miles. It was anciently called Scêria, Phœacia, Drèpânè, Makris, Argos, Kerkura, or, Korkura, which the Latins wrote Scyræa. It is included by the Turks in φρουραριστοι, the Frank islands. There are two rocks, most probably fortified in ancient times, forming the Acropolis of the city, which arose from the spoils of Sâtirnos.

falling there into the sea, and the scythe gave its name to the island Drēpānōr, v. Drēpānē. Its circuit is about eighty geographical miles, and its population fifty-five thousand. It had anciently two cities, Cōrēyra and Cassiōpē. In general it is uncommonly fertile, and has a number of small insulated rocks about it, of which Ptychia, Vido, or, San Vito, is the largest. Its chief mountain is Pāntōrātor, St. Salvatore, to which the Greeks gave that name from its commanding situation. In former times this island was famous for its gardens, and, for several centuries, in the possession of the Venetians; but, by the treaty of Paris (1815), Corfu, Cerigo, Zante, Cephalonia, Santa Maura, Ithaca, and Paxo, are formed into the United States of the Ionian Islands, and placed under the immediate and exclusive protection of the king of Great Britain and his heirs. Inh. Cōrēyrai, orum (Sing. Cōrēyraus, i), et, Cōrēvrēnses, ium (Ap. Bel. Civ. 452), m. the Cōrēyreaus. Adj. Cōrēyraus, a, um. Cōrēygra ūrna, a Cōrēyran urn, or, pitcher (Juv. Sat. x. v. 25). Cōrēyrai horti, the gardens of Aleinōus q. v. (Mart. xiii. 37), whom that poet calls Cōrēyraus rex (viii. 68).

Córdoba, w. f. Cordova, the principal city of Bætica, in Spain, of which Lucan, Martial, and the Senecæ, were natives. According to Martial, it must have been a place of considerable opulence. It stood on the right bank of Bætis, the Guadalquivir, at the foot of a high mountain, one of the branches of Sierra Morena. Here Cæsar defeated the sons of Pompey, in a bloody engagement, declaring that he had often fought for victory, but then for his life (Ap. Bel. Civ. 493). Cordova is still a considerable town, and has a celebrated cathedral, which was a Turkish mosque in the time of the Saracens, and is supported by 365 pillars of different kinds of marble. It had, until the late revolution, a good trade, in wine, silk, and a particular kind of leather manufactured there, which, from the town, is called Cordovan. Facienda Córdoba, eloquent Cordova, from being the birthplace of Lucianus and the two Senecæ (Mart. i. 62). Inh. Córdobaenses, ium. m. Adit. Córdobaensis, is. e.

Cördüenna, æ, f. Kurden, a district to the east of Tigris, forming properly a part of Persia, was mountainous, and yielded to the Roman arms, under the emperor Gallérius (Ann. Mar. xviii. 6). Inh. Cördüenni, r. Cördüeni, orum, m. a people, supposed by some to have lived near the borders of Mæcé Hyrcænum, the Caspian Sea. Plinius says, they were anciently called Cærdüchi, and inhabited the bank of Tigris, the Dejla. Stephānus places them in Mædia, and Strābo in Pārthia.

Cōrdus, i, m. a surname of several Roman clans, as Jūlia gens, Jūnia gens, Vālēria gens, &c.

Córdus, l. m. a Roman questor, who reduced to ashes, on the funeral pile, the murdered body of Cn. Pompeius Magnus, which he afterwards buried. Plutarchus says, that that last office to the remains of the noble Roman, was performed by one Philippus, a freedman, which has led several writers into a2 error, maintaining that Córdus was a freedman. To disprove that statement it is only necessary to mention the office which he filled. The questorship was the first step to honour, and held in high esteem at the period when Pömpöius fell. Besides, Lücäus expressly says, that Cördus was a Roman, therefore he could not have been born a slave (Phar. viii. 715). The authors who maintain the latter opinion write his name Cördus, which does not remove the insuperable objection presented by his military rank.

Cöröli, orum, m. one of the people of Thracia, who, with the Asti, Ceni, and Madoatēni, attacked the Roman army under Cn. Mänlius Völso, when returning home from Asia in 190 B. C. They succeeded in carrying off a considerable part of the booty, besides killing a number of the men (Liv. xxxviii. 40).

Cörfinium, n. S. Pelino, the chief city of the Peligni, a people of Italy, on Atērnus, the Pescara, at no great distance from the source of that river. According to Cluērius it is now in ruins (Luc. Phar. iv. 697).

Cörinna, æ, f. a native of Thēspia, a city of Bēotiā, who excelled in music.—2. A native of Thēba, Theba, or Tānāgra, who studied with the famous lyric poet, Pindārus, over whom she five times gained the prize. Pausānias thinks she owed her victory to using the Æolic dialect, and Pindārus the Doric, which the judges did not so well understand. Besides, she was the most beautiful woman of that period (Prop. ii. 3. 21). The language which Stätius employs respecting Cörinna may be differently understood, but, in its best acceptance, it expresses the "originality of an elegant mind" (Syl. v. 3. 158).—3. A favourite of the poet Ovidius (Mart. v. 10).

Cörinthus, i, f. the capital of Achāia Pröpria, now called Corinth by the British, Korintho, vulgarly Gorho, by the Greeks, Ghiherdas by the Turks, and Corinti by the Venetians, was situated in the middle of an isthmus of the same name, sixty stadia from either sea, between Sinus Saronicus, the Gulf of Egina, and Sinus Cörinthiacus, the Gulf of Lepanto. It was founded 2615 A. M. by Sisöphus, the son of Æölus, and was anciently called Ephyrē. From Cörinthus, the son of Pelöps, it received the name of Cörinthus. At one period this city might be considered the capital of Greece. The inhabitants were very powerful, and had great influence among the Grecian states. L. Münimlus, the Roman consul, reduced it to ashes, and sold the inhabitants for slaves, about 146 B. C. That valuable composition called Corinthian brass (nobilis æ Corinthia, Ov. Met. vi. 416), was formed during the burning of the city, by the different metals mixing together. Non cuius homini contingit adire Cörinthus, it does not fall to the lot of every man to go to Corinth; a proverb which admits of two explanations, of which one is, every man has not wealth to satisfy the lewd women of Corinth; the second, and perhaps the juster, is that of Suidas, viz., it is not the lot of every man to attempt a voyage to Corinth, from its being very dangerous (Hor. Epis. i. 17. 36). Inh. Cörinthis, orum, m. Adj. Cörinthis, Cörinthiscus, a, um, et, Cörinthiscusis, is, e. Cörinthiscus verba, soft effeminate language, the result of Corinthian luxury (Virg. Cat. ii. 1). Cörinthiscus pontus, the sea adjoining to Corinth; the Gulf of Egina (Ov. Met. xv.

507). Cörinthiscus Sinus (which Florus calls Märe Ionium, ii. 16), the Gulf of Lepanto, or, Nepäktos, or, Salöna (Liv. xxvi. 26), is in length sixty miles, from Patra to Corinth, by sea. It included a number of smaller bays, Cirrhæus, Crissæus, Delphicus, Cälödönlus, Halcyonlus, and Rhium, each of which were sometimes poetically used for the whole gulf. Cörinthiscus litus (Tac. Ann. v. 10).

Cöröli, orum, m. Monte Giori, a town of the Völsci in Lätium, which the Romans besieged and took in 493 B. C. From the bravery which C. Märcius displayed in this attack, he received the surname of Cöröliānus. Two years after, it was retaken, and given back to the Völsci by the same Cöröliānus (Liv. ii. 33 seq.). Diönysius writes Cörölla, æ, f. No vestige of this town remained at the time Plinius wrote.

Cörma, æ, m. a river mentioned by Tacitus, but by no other ancient author. It was probably in Assýria (Tac. Ann. xii. 14).

Cörnäsa, orum, n. a town of Pisidia, which the Roman consul, Cn. Mänlius Völso, passed in 191 B. C. as he marched against the Gallögræci (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Cörnäla, æ, f. a woman of patrician family, who had, with other women, entered into an infamous plan to cut off the principal men of the state by poison, and many had fallen by their agency. A servant girl discovered the plot to Q. Fäblius Mäximus q. v., in 331 B. C., conducting him to Cörnäla whom he detected preparing drugs for that purpose. She and her accomplices maintained that the drugs were wholesome. To disprove the testimony of the informer, it was recommended to these poisoners to drink what they had prepared, which, after some consultation, they did, and all perished by their own wicked devices (Liv. viii. 18). See Söröla.—2. Wife of P. Æmilius Lépídus, whose shade Pröpertius introduces, first comforting her husband, and afterwards pleading her cause before the judges of the infernal regions (iv. 11). Many consider this poem as the finest specimen of elegiac poetry in the Latin language.—3. Daughter of P. Cörnellus Scipio Africānus, wife of Tib. Sēmprönius Gräccus, and mother of C. and Tib. Sēmprönius Gräccus, the turbulent tribunes, who fell in attempting to introduce innovations into the Roman state. She educated these young men with great care, and probably entertained similar sentiments with her sons. She was a woman of uncommon abilities, and the father of Roman eloquence has commended the purity and elegance of her language. The death of the elder brother did not deter the younger from attempting the same measures, and with greater rashness, on which account the premature and violent death of both may, perhaps, be referred to the pride and ambition of their mother, from whom they inherited their courage and oratory. Their turbulence, too, may, probably, be referred to her spirit and haughtiness, since she wished their fame to surpass that of her own relations, and boasted of having been the mother of two such sons, after their lives had atoned for their sedition. The manner in which Jüvenälis speaks of her appears to justify this opinion of her character, and the inscription on the basis of a statue erected to her memory, "Cörnäla, mäter Gräccörum," the very words used by that poet (Sat. vi. 167). She was the mother of twelve children. If the authority of Martialis can be trusted, her morality was far from being of the purest kind (xi. 105). To her Claudius refers (xxix. 42).—4. Daughter of L. Scipio Metellus, was first married to P. Crassus, son of M. Licinius Crassus, a triumvir, and afterwards to Cn. Pompeius Magnus. During the civil war he conveyed her to Lēsbos, Mityleni, and communicated to her his designs. After the battle of Pharsalia, he touched at Lēsbos, took her on board, and sailed for Egypt. She witnessed the murder of her husband, and only escaped the hands of the barbarians by the superior sailing of her ship. According to Plutarchus, she attributed many of the misfortunes and calamities of her husband to his marriage with her. In the Pharsalia of Lucanus, she forms an amiable and interesting character, justifying the high praises which her virtues merited from other Roman authors (Phar. ii. 349).—5. Daughter of L. Cornelius Sulla, and the first wife of C. Julius Caesar (Suet. Jul. Ces. 1).—6. A vestal virgin, chosen Flaminica Dialis in the year 22 (Tac. Ann. iv. 16).

Cornelia Cossa, Cornelia Cossie, f. a vestal virgin who succeeded Laelia q. r. (Tac. Ann. xv. 22).

Cornelius, i. m. a creature of Sulla, and detested by the public from aiding that monster in his enormities (Sal. Frag. 1).—2. An informer, who, with Servilius, accused Mamercus Aemilius Scaurus (Tac. Ann. vi. 29).—3. A Roman, whose taste and judgment Martialis questions (i. 36).—4. A centurion, the chief of a deputation, whom Augustus sent to the senate to demand in name of the army that he should be appointed consul. On the senators showing some symptoms of hesitation, Cornelius impudently threw back his cloak and showed the hilt of his sword, saying, "this will make him consul, if you will not" (Suet. Aug. 26).

Cornelius Alexander, Cornelius Alexandri, m. an author who wrote the history of Illyricum, and maintains that one Danthon reached his five hundredth year without any symptoms of old age (Val. Max. viii. 13).

Cornelius Aquinus, Cornelius Aquini, m. a Roman, who, with Fabius Valens, put Fonteus Capito to death (Tac. Hist. i. 7).

Cornelius Balbus, Cornelius Balbi, m. a centurion in Caesar's army, who was wounded at the interview between his men and Pompey's, on the banks of Apsus, the Crevasta, at the time Caesar sent Vatinius to treat of peace (Caes. B. C. iii. 19).

Cornelius Barbatus, Cornelius Barbati, m. pontifex maximus, whom the Roman people compelled to dictate to C. Flavius, a curule edile, the form of words used in dedicating a temple, although he affirmed that, consistently with the practice of their ancestors, a temple could only be dedicated by a consul or a commander-in-chief (Liv. ix. 46).

Cornelius Dolabella, Cornelius Dolabellae, m. a Roman of patrician rank, who married Petronia, who had been the wife of Vitellius, and had separated from him. Otho, under whose suspicion he had fallen, banished him to Aquinum, Aquino, and set a guard over him. After the death of Otho, Cornelius Dolabella assumed his liberty, and returned to Rome, where Plautius Varus, one of his most intimate friends, accused him of attempting to bribe the cohort which guarded Ostia, and of showing himself in readiness to head the conquered party. Vitellius, who indulged resentment against him, on account of his marriage with Petronia, ordered him to be put to death. Even the accuser owned the falseness of the charges, when too late, and this private murder the public received as a very unfavourable omen of the succeeding reign (Tac. Hist. i. 88—ii. 63).

Cornelius Epicadus Sulla, Cornelius Epicadi Sulla, m. supposed to have been the freedman of L. Cornelius Sulla (Cat. xiv. 9).

Cornelius Flaccus, Cornelius Flacci, m. a lieutenant-general under Domitius Corbulo, in the year 58 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 39).

Cornelius Fuscus, Cornelius Fisci, m. praefect of the praetorian cohorts, whom the emperor Domitianus appointed commander-in-chief against the Daci. In that war he was killed, and his ashes were brought to Rome. The account given by Suetonius is somewhat different (Dom. vi). Martialis addresses epigram vii. 27 to him, and to him Juvenalis alludes (Sat. iv. 112).—2. Governor of Pannonia in the year 69. At that period he was in the vigour of life, and had formerly, from love of tranquillity, resigned his senatorian rank. Joining with Galba, his activity procured him the office just mentioned, and his declaration for Vespasianus gave life and vigour to that party. He delighted in war, courted danger, and preferred military enterprise to personal safety. Antoninus Primus and he acted in concert, encouraged discontent, and roused the Roman empire to arms. When the fleet at Ravenna revolted, they deposed their commander, Lucilius Bassus, and chose Cornelius Fuscus in his place. His activity contributed to the success of Vespasianus over Vitellius, on which he received praetorian honours, for his fidelity and services (Tac. Hist. ii. 86—iv. 4).

Cornelius Laco, Cornelius Laconis, m. a man of great influence, but of uncommon indolence, who was praefect of the praetorian guards, in the year 69. Tacitus attributes the ruin of the emperor Galba to the incapacity and wickedness of Cornelius Laco and T. Vinius. On the accession of Otho, Cornelius was banished to an island, but Otho sent after him a veteran soldier, who put an end to his life (Tac. Hist. i. 6—46).

Cornelius Lupus, Cornelius Lupi, m. put to death under the emperor Claudius, for which, and similar crimes, Senilius was brought to trial and condemned to banishment. The Balcæres were his fixed residence (Tac. Ann. xiii. 43).

Cornelius Martialis, Cornelius Martialis, m. a Roman, degraded from the tribunician rank, not from being convicted, but suspected, of disloyalty. He held the rank of a centurion in the army, and fell fighting bravely in the capitol, when a party of the Vitellians set that building on fire, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. iii. 70—73).

Cornelius Nepos, Cornelius Nepotis, m. a celebrated historian and biographer, who was born at Höstilla, Ostiglia, a village belonging to Vérona, on the north bank of Padus, the Po, for which reason Plinius calls him Padi accēla (i. 373). From the place of his birth being in Gallia Togata, Ausonius gives him the name Gallus, and, from its being included in Italy, Cātullus denominates him Italus. He flourished in the reign of Augustus, whose favour he enjoyed, and the purity of his style entitles him to rank high among the writers of that age. He composed a history of the world, which he called his chronicle. This work he divided into three periods or ages, the obscure, the fabulous, and the historical. To it Cātullus, who dedicates his works to Cōrnēlius Nēpos, alludes (i. 5 seq.). That history is now lost, and all his other writings, except twenty-two lives of illustrious men. He enjoyed the friendship of Cicero and Atticus. Of his numerous writings, which time has destroyed, it would, perhaps, be now impossible to make an accurate list, since grammarians are divided both as to their number and titles. His lives form a proper school book, as the style is simple, but neat and appropriate, and his delineation of character deserves approbation from its accuracy and conciseness.

Cōrnēlius Phāgita, Cōrnēlii Phāgītæ, m. a man who seized C. Jūlius Cæsar in the night, with the view of carrying him to Sūlla. By means of a large bribe and other measures, he obtained his freedom with difficulty, yet he did not resent such conduct, or allow the perpetrator to be injured (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 74).

Cōrnēlius Priscus, Cōrnēlii Prisci, m. was consul with Sēxtus Pōmpeius Cōllēgæ, in the year 93 (Tac. Agric. 44).

Cōrnēlius Sābīnus, Cōrnēlii Sābīni, m. one of the conspirators against the emperor Cālgūla, who ran him through the breast (Suet. Cal. 58).

Cōrnēlius Sācērdōs Gēllō, Cōrnēlii Sācērdōtis Gēllōnis, m. an augur of Pātāvium, Padua, who declared that, on a hill near that town, he saw the battle between Cæsar and Pōmpeius, at the very time when the hostile armies were actually engaged. To him Lūcānus alludes (Phar. vii. 192).

Cōrnēlius Scīpiō, Cōrnēlii Scīpiōnis, m. a friend of T. Pōmponius Atticus, at whose request the latter wrote the history of the Æmilian clan (Cor. Nep. Att. 18).

Cōrnēlius Sūlla, Cōrnēlii Sūllæ, m. a spendthrift, who, on that account, was expelled, or allowed to vacate his seat in the Roman senate, in the year 16 (Tac. Ann. ii. 48).—2. A Roman, of illustrious birth, who married Antōnia, daughter of the emperor Claudius. Tacitus describes him as a man of a sluggish understanding, and adds, that his stupidity passed with the emperor Nēro for deep thinking, and the cautious reserve of a designing politician. In this apprehension, Grāptus, a freedman, confirmed him, by alleging a plot formed by Cōrnēlius, for which he was banished to Marselles, and afterwards put to death at the suggestion of Tigēllinus (Tac. Ann. xiii. 23—xiv. 57).

A. Cōrnēlius, A. Cōrnēlii, m. quaestor in 459 B. C. Joined by his colleague, Q. Sērvius, he raised a prosecution against M. Volsellus, because he had manifestly given false evidence against Kæso (Liv. iii. 24).—2. Pōntifex Māximus in 430 B. C. (Liv. iv. 27).—3. A Roman, who was elected a military tribune, with consular power, for the second time, in 366 B. C. (Liv. vi. 36, 42).

A. Cōrnēlius Arvīna, A. Cōrnēlii Arvīnæ, m. a Roman, appointed dictator, in 322 B. C., who nominated M. Fābius Ambūstus master of the horse, marched against the Sāmnites, and, after a long and obstinate battle, so effectually crushed the power of the enemy, that they made every concession to the Romans, and gave up Brūtūlus Pāpius, the author of the war. The dictator triumphed by a decree of the senate (Liv. viii. 38, 39).

—2. A Roman herald, who delivered over Sp. Pōstūmus and T. Vētūrius, bound to the Sāmnites, because, after the defeat at Caudium, they had entered into a treaty which the senate refused to ratify, in 320 B. C. (Liv. ix. 10).

A. Cōrnēlius Cōssus, A. Cōrnēlii Cōssi, m. a man of extraordinary courage, strength, and personal beauty, was a tribune of the soldiers among the cavalry, in the war against the Vēientes and Fidēnates, in 436 B. C. In the first battle, he rushed against Lārs Tōlūmnius, king of the Vēientes, brought him from his horse at a single stroke, and then, with his spear, pinned him to the ground. He then stripped the body of the lifeless monarch, and, having cut off his head, carried it about as a trophy, which struck the enemy with terror at the loss of their king, and contributed to their flight. After obtaining a complete victory, the consul returned in triumph to Rome. In the procession, A. Cōrnēlius Cōssus withdrew the attention of the people from the dictator to himself, as he carried the Spōlia Opīma, which, after the usual dedication, he hung up in the temple of Jūpiter Fērētrius. Following all the preceding writers, Līvius calls Cōssus a tribune of the soldiers, but adds, that the emperor Augustus informed him, that he had seen a linen breastplate, with an inscription, bearing, that the victor of Lārs Tōlūmnius was consul, when he obtained the Spōlia Opīma. The historian does not doubt the truth of that inscription. Cōrnēlius was elected consul, in 428 B. C., and afterwards a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority. In a war with the Vēientes, he commanded in the city, and named Māmērcus Æmilius dictator, who appointed him master of the horse (Liv. iv. 19—31). To his victory over Tōlūmnius, Mānilius alludes (i. 786).—2. Consul, in 412 B. C. (Liv. iv. 51).

—3. A Roman dictator, who triumphed over the Volsi, in 384 B. C. He threw M. Mānilius into prison on account of his turbulent conduct (Liv. vi. 11—16).—4. (Surnamed in con. cal. Arvīna) A patrician, who, after being twice master of the horse, was created consul, in 342 B. C., and had for his colleague, M. Valērius Cōrvus, who had twice before enjoyed that office. He marched against the Sāmnites, and, having entered into a deep defile, had nearly been cut off by the enemy, but the great bravery and skill of P. Dēcius, a tribune of the soldiers, not only extricated the Roman army, but enabled the consul to gain a complete victory over the enemy, for which he had the honour of a triumph. This was the first time the Romans attacked the Sāmnites in their own territory (Liv. vii. 19—x. 31).

A. Cōrnēlius Māmmūla, A. Cōrnēlii Māmmūllæ, m. a Roman, who, after being prætor, held the prætorship in Sārdīnia, in 218 B. C. At that period the senate appears to have been in difficulties, but what they could not effect was accomplished by the liberality of the allied states, which furnished the prætor with pay and provisions. Cōrnēlius had vowed a sacred spring, which the consuls proclaimed, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 25—xxxiii. 44).—2. Held the office of prætor and the government of the territory of the Bruttii, in 193 B. C. Next year he was continued in command with the title of proprætor (Liv. xxxvi. 2 seq.).

C. Cōrnēlius, C. Cōrnēlii, m. a tribune of the soldiers, with consular power, in 386 B. C. (Liv. vi. 5).—2. A Roman knight, who joined in the conspiracy of Cātīlina, and undertook, with L. Vargūntius Sēnātor, to murder the consul, M. Tullius Ciccero, in his own house, on the 4th of November, in 65 B. C. (Sal. Cat. 17, 28).

C. Cōrnēlius Cēthēgus, C. Cōrnēlii Cēthēgi, m. proconsul in Spain, routed a great army of the enemy, in Sūdētānus ager, in 202 B. C. From Livius it does not appear that he had been consul before he was proconsul. In his absence, his countrymen created him a curule edile, and afterwards raised him to the consulship, with Q. Minūcius Rūfus, in 199 B. C. The senate decreed Italy to both consuls, and, for his success over the Galli Insūbres, he had the honour of a triumph. Besides Hāmīlecar, the Carthaginian general, a number of Gauls adorned his procession, and many of the colonists of Crēmōna and Plācēntia followed his chariot with caps of liberty on their heads, in gratitude for his having delivered them from their servitude to the Gauls. In his consulship he had vowed a temple to Sospīta Jūno, and he afterwards obtained the censorship, in 196 B. C., during which he and his colleague ordered the curule ediles to appropriate seats for the senators at the Roman games, distinct from those of the people; previously the spectators sat promiscuously (Liv. xxxi. 49—xxxv. 9). He is probably the person sent as an ambassador to Carthage, with P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Afrīcānus (Liv. xxxiv. 62).—2. A man of vicious morals, who, having been banished from Rome, fled as a suppliant to L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, whose interest he afterwards embraced. In consequence of losing the great influence which he formerly possessed, he joined in the conspiracy with Cātīlina (65 B. C.), in expectation of recovering his former rank and dignity. Cicero informs us, that in rashness and audacity he surpassed Cātīlina himself; and in strength of body, love of arms, and dignity of birth, he was little inferior to that traitor. Sallūstius writes, "he was by nature fierce, in spirit impetuous, and in person prompt and active." In the execution of the plot, Cōrnēlius was to post himself at the door of the consul, Cicero, and, after he had forced an entrance, murder that illustrious Roman; but the precaution and vigilance of Cicero frustrated that design. He, along with Lēntūlus, Stātīlius, and other conspirators, was strangled in prison (Sal. Cat. 17, 55). Cātīlina (accuset) Cēthēgum? alluding to the conspiracy: Should one traitor accuse another? (Juv. Sat. ii. 27). The same poet mentions their noble birth, being both of senatorian dignity (Sat. viii. 231).

C. Cōrnēlius Hīspallus, C. Cōrnēlii Hīspalli, m. prætor peregrinus, in 141 B. C. By edict he ordered the Chaldeans to quit Rome within ten days, because they obtained large sums of money by astrology, and belief in that pretended science had an injurious effect on the minds of the people (Val. Max. i. 3).

C. Cōrnēlius Tācītus, C. Cōrnēlii Tāceti, m. a Roman historian, of great celebrity, who was born about the year 56. Ancient authors neither mention the names of his parents, their rank, nor the place of his birth. For his fame he stands indebted solely to his genius, and had his writings been transmitted entire, it would have been difficult to mention an author to whom the Romans owed greater obligations, yet his political sagacity has failed him remarkably in one opinion, where he declares, that a government in which the three orders, the people, the nobles, and the king, have each a share in the authority, could never in fact exist; or, if it did, could only be of short duration. We know nothing of the place and nature of his education. The correctness of his taste despised the vicious eloquence and frivolous pursuits of that age, and the rectitude of his conduct justified his censure of vice, wherever it appeared. Conscious of his moral purity, he pronounces judgment with firmness, both against wicked men and unlawful actions, writing with the same scrupulous regard to justice and virtue which he practised in his own life. He conceived correctly the duties of a historian, and neither love nor hatred warped his judgment, or induced him to conceal the truth. In one instance, at least, national prejudice, added, perhaps, to inaccurate information, has made him misrepresent the origin, history, and character of a very remarkable people. Oratory appears to have first engaged his attention; for the bar and the army were the only means by which a Roman aspired at the honours of the state. Here Tācītus acquired such celebrity, that Agrīcōla chose him for his son-in-law very early in life, and he then appeared a candidate for the honours of civil preferment. The emperor Vēspāsīanus laid the foundation of his fortune; under the successor of that prince he obtained the office of quæstor, which gave him a seat in the senate. Dōmītiānus bestowed some favours upon our author, who probably acted with the same prudence, moderation, and caution which he has recommended in his father-in-law. In the year 83, Tācītus was a member of the quindēcemviral college, and held the office of prætor. Next year, he and his wife left Rome, and did not return for upwards of four years. He delivered a funeral oration in honour of Virgīnius, and held the office of consul for the remainder of that year. An intimate friendship subsisted between Tācītus and the younger Plīnius, founded on similarity of studies and virtues. They both detested tyranny, and both wished to give perpetuity to merit by contrasting it with the vices of former, or subsequent, reigns. Of this, Plīnius has given a beautiful specimen, in his panegyric on Trājānus, and Tācītus in the whole of his history. Although the latter had planned and perhaps executed part of his history before he attained great celebrity, yet he continued his practice in the Forum, arraigned the governors of provinces for rapine and extortion, or defended people of rank and fortune persecuted by the cruel informers, after such employment became unnecessary. The guilt of the former, and the innocence of the latter, called forth the whole energy of his powerful mind, and he swayed the audience according to his pleasure. His pages furnish many proofs of his talents for pathetic, graphic, and forcible delineation. In the prosecution of Mārius Priscus, proconsul of Africa, Tācitus and Plinius pleaded the cause of the injured Africans, and the senate, after three days' deliberation, sentenced the pannel to pay back the amount of the bribes which he had received, and to be banished from Italy. The emperor Trājānus presided at that trial, and it does not appear that Tācitus afterwards gave any part of his time to the labour of the bar. During the reign of Trājānus, he published his History, which comprised a period of twenty-seven years, beginning with the accession of Gālba, in the year 69, and ending at the death of Dōmītiānus, in the year 96. This important period is full of sudden revolutions, when the armies claimed the right of raising to the imperial throne whomsoever they pleased, without regard either to the will or authority of the senate. Of this valuable work only four books and the beginning of the fifth remain. Vōssius says, that it consisted of thirty books, and it will be readily allowed that the literary world has sustained a great loss by only so small a portion being transmitted to modern times. Encouraged by the high approbation of his countrymen, he selected another period of Roman history, in order to hold up to the detestation of succeeding ages, the tyranny of Tiberius, Cālīgūla, Claudius, and Nēro, which includes a space of fifty-four years, beginning with the year 15, and ending with the year 68. The style of the Annals differs considerably from that of the History. In the latter, Tācitus has, with greater labour, rounded his periods, and used more pompous and dignified expression. In the former, the style is simple, the words few, and the narrative rapid. He seizes on the principal characteristics, and the language conveys as it were but an outline of his meaning. In no Roman author do words convey so much beyond their usual signification, as in the Annals of Tācitus. Here, as well as in the History, the learned reader bewails the ravages of time. Part of the fifth book, which contained three years of the reign of Tiberius, the whole reign of Cālīgūla, the first six years of the reign of Claudius, and the last two of Nēro, perished during the barbarous ages. Had the author lived, he intended to have reviewed the reign of Augūstus, a work which he probably never wholly executed. The time of his death seems doubtful, but may probably be referred to the reign of Trājānus. The same uncertainty prevails respecting the place where he died, and the spot which contained his ashes. His writings constitute the best monument, and a genius like that of Tācitus, stood in no need of sepulchral ornaments. His thorough knowledge of government, his admirable powers of description, and his penetrating judgment, fitted him for historical composition in an eminent degree. Besides observing the laws of history, recommended by Cicero, in his treatise De Oratore, Tācitus considered it his duty to judge the actions of men, on purpose that the worthy might meet with a reward due to their virtue, and the wicked be deterred by the condemnation which awaits evil actions at the tribunal of posterity. This moral principle directed his pen through his whole work. His rich and varied eloquence enlivens his forcible description, which presents every action and character to the view of the reader, who feels himself a witness of the events described, rather than a listener to the narrative of the historian. Besides the History and Annals, Tācitus wrote the life of his father-in-law, Agricola, a treatise on the manners of the Germans, and a dialogue on oratory. Whether he left any family behind him seems doubtful. The only evidence in support of his having had children is, that M. Claudius Tācitus, who ascended the imperial throne, in the year 273, derived his pedigree from our historian. Vanity may have led to this genealogy, since nearly two hundred years had elapsed from the historian's death, and, unless his descendants had been considerable for rank, it would have been impossible to trace the connexion.

C. Cōrnēlius Vērres, C. Cōrnēli Vērris, m. a Roman, of noble birth, who, after he held the office of praetor of the city, obtained the government of Sicily for three years. Avarice and injustice marked the whole of his administration in that island, on which account the Sicilians accused him before the senate, and Cicero supported their cause. The splendid orations which he delivered against that monster of cruelty and oppression, will remain a lasting monument of his transcendent abilities, conjoined with the utmost rectitude of principle, and indefatigable exertion in support of the oppressed. The guilty Vērres, conscious of the just charges preferred against him, and certain that the evidence of his crimes would inevitably produce sentence of condemnation, avoided the disgrace and punishment of a judicial conviction, by a voluntary banishment. He afterwards obtained liberty to return, but, having incurred the displeasure of M. Antonius, he included his name in the list of the proscribed. Cicero had lost his life before him, and Vērres expressed great satisfaction in his last moments, that his accuser had first suffered death. Adj. Vērrēs, a. um, Vērrēa lex (Cic. Ver. iii. 49).

Cn. Cōrnēlius, Cn. Cōrnēlii, m. one of the three ambassadors sent to Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 35).

Cn. Cōrnēlius Blasio, Cn. Cōrnēlii Blasionis, m. was praetor, and Sicily became his province by lot, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 43).

Cn. Cōrnēlius Cōssus, Cn. Cōrnēlii Cōssi, m. was elected a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, in 413 B. C., and re-elected ten years after (Liv. iv. 49, 61).—2. Chosen consul in 408 B. C., when the commons had resolved to thwart M. Manlius, who wished to be appointed a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority. Cōrnēlius twice obtained the office of a consular tribune, and desolated the territory of the Cāpēnātes by burning the houses and the fruits of the earth, in 400 B. C. (Liv. iv. 54—v. 12). He was the brother of P. Licinius Cālvus q. v.

Cn. Cōrnēlius Dōlābēlla, Cn. Cōrnēlii Dōlābēllae, m. was elected king in religious matters, 210 B. C., and died in 182 B. C.

(Liv. xxvii. 36 seq.).—2. A Roman consul in 83 B. C. During his consulship, A. Gabinius was sent to renew a treaty with Mithridates, king of Pontus, and Cn. Pompeius distinguished himself by his acts in Africa. He had interest to procure the government of Macedonia, and he went to that country on resigning the fasces, more perhaps with the view of accumulating wealth, than of contributing to the prosperity of the province. The senate rewarded his success against the Thracians with a triumph, and, soon after, C. Julius Caesar, when very young, accused him of extortion; but the eloquence of Cotta and Hortensius secured his acquittal.

—3. A prætor of the city, whose decree, in the case of Quinctius, gave great offence. M. Scaurus preferred against him a charge of extortion, when prætor in Cilicia, and Verres, his quaestor, gave evidence which proved his guilt. Sentence of condemnation for this abuse of power, reduced Dolabella and his family to poverty and wretchedness, but in the opinion of Cicero his conduct excluded both himself and children from being considered proper objects of commiseration. To which of these two Juvénalis alludes (Sat. viii. 105) is doubtful, since both were brought to trial for the vice which he there censures.

—4. A noble Roman, who seems to have shown some inclination to ascend the throne on the death of Nero, as Galba blamed a battalion of Germans, the body-guard of the preceding emperors, for being more inclined to favour the advancement of Dolabella, and therefore he sent them back to their own country without any gratuity (Suet. Gal. 12).

Cn. v. P. Cornélius Gallus, Cn. Cornélii Galli, m. a man of the lowest extraction, was born at Förcjühensis, Fricul. He became a great favourite with Augustus, who honoured him with his friendship, and in return he contributed to the success of that ambitious Roman in the Alexandrian war. He carried Paretolum, Al-Bareton, baffling the utmost exertions of Antónius, who employed every stratagem which his ingenuity could suggest. On Egypt being reduced into the form of a province, Augustus entrusted the government of it to Cornélius. Want of confidence in the Roman nobility prevented him from nominating to that important office a man of higher birth. Elated with his fortune, he treated the character of his benefactor with contempt, and showed his vanity by erecting statues of himself in that country, and by recording his own acts on the pyramids. We have the authority of Ammianus Marcellinus, that he plundered Thæbe, because the inhabitants became turbulent at the demands made on their property, and Hieronymus adds, that he levelled it with the ground. Augustus, offended at his ingratitude, interdicted him from his house, and the provinces under his authority; but the senate confiscated his property, and pronounced sentence of banishment against him, on which he killed himself. On hearing of his death, the emperor lamented his fate, and blamed the severity of the senate. Among his friends, Gallus reckoned many distinguished Romans, of whom we need only mention Virgilius and Cicero. Of his writings none have been transmitted to modern times. Quintilianus mentions his poetry, which appears to have been composed in elegiac verse, and considers him inferior to Propertius and Tibullus (Quint. x. 1. 93).

Cn. Cornélius Léntulus, Cn. Cornélii Léntuli, m. a military tribune who, after the defeat at Cannæ, fled on horseback, and, observing L. Æmilius Paullus, the consul, covered with blood, generously offered him his horse, which the consul declined. When quaestor he displayed his military skill in an engagement with Hannibal, in which that great general could scarcely be said to have the advantage. After obtaining inferior offices, he was elected consul with P. Ælius Pictus, 203 B. C., and the province of Africa fell to his lot. During that year, the Romans made peace with the Carthaginians. The people afterwards appointed him proconsul of Spain. On his return to Rome the senate voted him an ovation. His countrymen appointed him ambassador to Philippos, king of Macedonia, in which capacity he acted with candour and judgment, neither neglecting the interests of his fellow-citizens, nor insulting the Grecian states by arrogance and unreasonable exactions, a too prevalent practice among his countrymen at that period (Liv. xxii. 49—xxxiii. 35).—2. Obtained the consulship with M. Licinius Crassus, in 15 B. C. Augustus sent him to repel the Sarmæte, who crossed the Danube when frozen over in winter, and pillaged the adjacent countries. Cornélius succeeded in driving them from the northern bank of the river, and placed guards, which prevented their inroads (Flor. iv. 12).

Cn. Cornélius Léntulus Clodiānus, Cn. Cornélii Léntuli Clodiāni, m. held the consulship with L. Gellius Pöplícöla, in 74 B. C. Spartacus, commander of the fugitive gladiators, defeated, in the Apennines, the two consuls, and Q. Arrius, prætor. Cornélius held the office of censor with L. Gellius Pöplícöla, in 71 B. C., when they exercised their office with great severity, expelling sixty-four senators (Liv. Ep. 96—98. Flor. iii. 20).

Cn. Cornélius Léntulus Gætülícus, Cn. Cornélii Léntuli Gætülíci, m. was consul in the year 26, and obtained the command of the legions in upper Germany, in the year 32, where he distinguished himself by his mildness, and by maintaining military discipline without severity. By a spirited letter which he had the courage to write to the emperor Tiberius, he saved his life, when Abudius Riso, who had commanded a legion under him, turned informer, and alleged that he had projected a marriage between his daughter and a son of Sejānus (Tac. Ann. iv. 42—vi. 30).

Cn. Cornélius Léntulus Cössus Gætülícus, Cn. Cornélii Léntuli Cössi Gætülíci, m. a Roman of great distinction, who had obtained consular dignity in 1 B. C., triumphal ornaments, and the title of Gætülícus for a victory over the Getulians. The true glory of his character arose from the dignity with which he supported himself in poverty, and afterwards in great affluence, acquired with integrity, and possessed with moderation. He died in the year 25, leaving the emperor Tiberius his heir, not from inclination, but from being teased and terrified to it by the emperor (Tac. Ann. i. 27—iv. 44).

Cn. Cornélius Léntulus Marcellinus, Cn.

Cornélii Léntuli Mārcellīni, m. consul in 58 B. C., with L. Mārcius Philippus. In the senate he complained of the exorbitant power of Pōmpēius Māgnus, to which the whole people assented with loud acclamation. He then said, "Romans, express your approbation while it is allowed you, for very soon you will not do so with safety" (Val. Max. vi. 2).

Cn. Cornēlius Mērenda, Cn. Cornēlius Mērenda, m. was praetor in 196 B. C., and obtained Sardinia for his province (Liv. xxxiv. 42, 43).

Cn. Cornēlius Mērula, Cn. Cornēlius Mērula, m. was one of the ten ambassadors appointed by the Roman senate to examine and adjust the affairs of Asia, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 55).

Cn. Cornēlius Scīpio, Cn. Cornēlius Scīpiōnis, m. was sent by his brother P. Cornēlius Scīpio, consul, with the greater part of his own forces into Spain, in 220 B. C., against Hāsdrūbal, to drive him out of the country, to protect the old allies of the Romans, and to acquire new. He landed at Empōria, and, in fulfilment of his instructions, brought under the power of Rome the whole coast between the Pyrenees and the Ebro. See P. Cornēlius Scīpio. Over Hānno, whose province that was, he gained a great victory, killing six thousand men, and making two thousand prisoners, among whom were the generals and several nobles. The camp enriched his soldiers, as it contained the effects of Hānno's army, and the most valuable property of Hānnibal's which they had left there, not to be encumbered with baggage in crossing the Alps. After that victory, Hāsdrūbal durst not meet Cornēlius in battle, and the Roman general attacked and defeated different nations in Spain. At sea he gained a victory over a powerful Carthaginian armament, which rendered him master of the whole of the eastern coast. His future success compelled upwards of a hundred and twenty states to submit to the power of Rome. P. Cornēlius Scīpio joined his brother, and, for two years, nothing memorable happened. They acted with the greatest unanimity, confirmed the wavering states, and gained advantages over the enemy, when opportunities of battle occurred. Having received powerful reinforcements from the Celtiberi, they considered their strength sufficient for putting an end to the war, which would effectually prevent Hāsdrūbal from joining his brother Hānnibal in Italy, an object which they had kept steadily in view. The desertion of the Celtiberi gave a decided superiority to the Carthaginians, and the two brothers, Cneius and Publius, fell in the first engagement. The Romans did not more sincerely regret their death than did the Spaniards, whose affections they had gained by their justice and moderation (Liv. xxi. 32—xxv. 36). Cneius held the consulship with M. Claudius Mārcellus, 224 B. C., and to him Eutrōpius alludes (iii. 6).—2. Elected a pontiff in 201 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 7).—3. Chosen praetor, and, with P. Valērius Lēvinus, obtained the government of Gallia, divided into two provinces, in 179 B. C. (Liv. xli. 8).—4. A son of Scīpio Africanus, fell into the hands of Antiochus, king of Syria, but by what accident, or at what place and time, is not ascertained. All accounts agree in his being treated with the greatest generosity and kindness, and that Antiochus, on hearing that Africanus had fallen sick at Elea, sent ambassadors to conduct the youth to his father, in 192 B. C. He was elected a praetor in 176 B. C., and was that year expelled from the senate by the censors (Liv. xxxvii. 34—xli. 27). It is uncertain whether his praenomen was Cneius or Lucius.

Cn. Cornēlius Scīpio Asina, Cn. Cornēlius Scīpiōnis Asinae, m. a Roman consul, colleague to C. Dullius, in 262 B. C. These consuls fought the first naval battle with the Carthaginians, but Cornēlius was captured by the enemy in the harbour, according to Polybius. From the expression used by Eutrōpius (ii. 20), as well as by the narrative of Polybius, Cornēlius appears to have fallen into the hands of the enemy by treachery; but his re-election to the consulship, six years after, with A. Attilius Calatinus, is evidence that no blame attached either to his conduct, or to his plans as a commander. By Livius he is simply called Cn. Cornēlius (Ep. 17).

Cn. Cornēlius Scīpio Hispallus, Cn. Cornēlius Scīpiōnis Hispalli, m. after holding the foreign jurisdiction, rose to the consulship, in 178 B. C., with Q. Pēllius Spurius. His death happened at Cumae during that year, and his body having been brought to Rome, his funeral obsequies were performed with great magnificence (Liv. xl. 44 seq.).

Cossus Cornēlius Lēntulus, Cossus Cornēlius Lēntuli, m. had for his colleague in the consulship M. Asinius Agrippa, in the year 24 (Tac. Ann. iv. 34).—2. Perhaps a son of the former, was the colleague of the emperor Nēro in the consulship, in the year 60 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 20).

L. Cornēlius, L. Cornēlius, m. appointed commissioner by the Roman senate to settle the differences between Antiochus, king of Syria, and Ptolēmaeus, king of Egypt, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 39).

L. Cornēlius Bālbis, L. Cornēlius Bālbis, m. a native of Gades, Cadiz, who obtained the privileges of a Roman citizen at the request of L. Cornēlius Lēntulus, whose praenomen and nomen he assumed. His rights as a citizen having been called in question by one of his countrymen, Cn. Pompeius, M. Licinius Crassus, and M. Tullius Cicero, defended him. Cicero's speech is still extant. He lived in habits of close intimacy with C. Julius Caesar, possessed great wealth, and was adopted by Thēophrastus of Mitylēne. From his intimacy with the greatest men of the state, his name occurs frequently in the writings of Cicero, who relates a number of particulars respecting him, and the state of parties at that eventful period of Roman history. Cornēlius Nēpos mentions him as one of the intimates of T. Pōmpōnius Atticus (Att. 21).—2. Sister's son of the former, frequently called Minor, to distinguish him from his uncle, who, after being questor to Asinius Pōllio in Spain, had the honour of a triumph over the Garamantes, and was the first foreigner permitted to triumph at Rome (Cic. Att. viii. 9. Plin. i. 544).—3. A relation of his, a great favourite with the Roman emperor Claudius (Tac. Ann. xii. 60).

L. Cornēlius Caudinus, L. Cornēlius Causdini, m. was curule edile in 210 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 21).

L. Cōrnēlius Cīna, L. Cōrnēlius Cīna, m. a noble Roman of considerable influence and personal bravery. Of his military talents he gave the first proof in the Social war. In the year 91 B. C., he and Cn. Octāvius were consuls. His colleague deprived him of his consular authority, and drove him and six tribunes of the people out of the city; because he had by force procured the enactment of several injurious laws. By bribery he obtained the army of Appius Claudius, with which he made war on Rome, and called to his assistance C. Mārius, and other exiles, from Africa. Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus secretly encouraged this war, without appearing to take any share in it, until many of the nobles had lost their lives. The inactivity of the consul permitted the continuance of hostilities, which at first might have been easily terminated. Cīna and Mārius, with four armies, two of which they commanded in person, and the other two by Q. Sērtorius and Pāpīrius Cārbo, laid siege to the city, and the principal men, having lost all confidence in the troops on account of their cowardice and treachery, opened the gates. These monsters of cruelty instantly began to murder the inhabitants, seize on their property, and to put to death the consul, Cn. Octāvius, with all the leading men of the opposite party, or that of Sūlla. Without even the formality of an election, they declared themselves consuls, and Mārius died on the very first day of his entering on office. L. Vālērius Flāccus succeeded him. In his third and fourth consulships, Cīna had Cn. Pāpīrius Cārbo for his colleague, with whom he made preparation for a war on L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla; but L. Vālērius Flāccus, Prince of the senate, and the friend of peace, carried, that a deputation should be sent to treat with Sūlla, respecting the terms of pacification. During the fourth consulship of L. Cōrnēlius Cīna, C. Jūlius Cēsar married his daughter, Cōrnēlia, who had to him Jūlia. Many of the nobility fled from the tyrannical domination of Cīna, and took refuge with Sūlla, who had carried on a successful war against Mithridates. Cīna, after raising a powerful armament against Sūlla, was killed by his own men in attempting to force them to embark (Liv. Ep. 79—83). Aj. Cinnānus, a. um. Cinnāna partes (Vel. Pat. ii. 24). Cinnānus tumultus, the civil war between Cīna and Sūlla (Cor. Nep. Att. 2).—2. Son of the former, whose recall from banishment was effected by his sister's husband, C. Jūlius Cēsar (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 5).

L. Cōrnēlius Dōlābella, L. Cōrnēlius Dōlābella, m. elected king of sacrifices in 182 B. C. The chief pontiff insisted on his resigning his commission as a naval duumvir, before his inauguration, which Cōrnēlius refused, and appealed to the people, who insisted on his complying with the requisition of the chief pontiff. An unfavourable omen having occurred, prevented his inauguration, and another was appointed to the office (Liv. xl. 42 seq.).

L. Cōrnēlius Lēntulus, L. Cōrnēlius Lēntulus, m. elected consul, in 326 B. C., and appointed to watch the motions of the Sāmmites, who then meditated war, but hostilities did not commence during that year. He named a dictator to hold the elections, and advised the senate to accept the conditions agreed on at Caudium, a sentiment not more dictated by humanity than necessity (Liv. viii. 22 seq.).—2. Was elected consul, in 277 B. C., with M. Cūrius Dēntātus, who had formerly held that office. Both consuls marched against Pyrrhus, and Cūrius gained a victory over him in Lucania, for which he was allowed to enter the capital in triumph (Eutrop. ii. 14).—3. Held the office of consul with Q. Fūlvius Flāccus, in 239 B. C. During that year the Romans carried on war against the Ligurians, conquered them, and the commanders had the honour of a triumph (Eutrop. iii. 2).—4. Chief pontiff, in 219 B. C. In consequence of certain decrees of the senate, the college of praetors consulted him, and he gave it as his opinion that, before any steps were taken, the people should determine whether it would be proper to vow a sacred spring. Livius has recorded the form. He died in 215 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 10 seq.).—5. Created a decemvir of religious rites, in 215 B. C., and afterwards, on being elected praetor, obtained Sardinia as his province. He died in 175 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 2—xlii. 10).—6. Succeeded Africanus in the government of Spain, 208 B. C., and, with the assistance of his colleague, L. Mānlius Acidinus, crushed, in that country, a rebellion excited by Indibilis, defeated his troops in battle, and killed himself. The promoters of the war were then given up. Next year they were continued proconsuls, and, on returning to Rome, Cōrnēlius claimed the honour of a triumph, which the senate acknowledged was due to his merits, but refused to grant his request, because it was contrary to precedent for one who was not dictator, consul, or praetor to triumph. They allowed him an ovation, and he obtained the consulship in 201 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 38—xxxii. 9).—7. Despatched by L. Cōrnēlius Paullus, with Q. Fābius and Q. Mētellus, to Rome, to inform the senate of his victory over Persēus, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 45).—8. Surnamed Crus, was the colleague of C. Claudius Mārcellus in the consulship, 51 B. C., and, during that year, the civil war between Cēsar and Pōmpēius commenced.—9. An officer in the army of Cn. Pōmpēius, who was seized, imprisoned, and put to death by Ptōlēmæus, king of Egypt, on the murder of his general.

L. Cōrnēlius Maluginēnsis, L. Cōrnēlius Maluginēnsis, m. obtained the consulship, in 459 B. C., and was left to protect the city, whilst his colleague marched against Antium. He appears to have been a man of considerable interest and activity. In a speech of some length, he defended the conduct of the decemvirs, of whom his brother Mārcus was one (Liv. iii. 22 seq.).

L. Cōrnēlius Mēruia, L. Cōrnēlius Mēruia, m. obtained the praetorship of the city, in 200 B. C. The information given him by two slaves, of a plot formed by the slaves to kill the inhabitants of Sētia, Nōrba, and Circēi, and to seize on these towns, enabled him to prevent the execution of their design, and the conspirators suffered the punishment due to their intended crimes. The same spirit of rebellion appeared in concerting a plan for taking possession of Prænēstē, which Cōrnēlius crushed, and five hundred of the guilty lost their lives. After conducting, with C. Sallustius, a colony to Tēmpa, he obtained the consulship, with Q. Minucius Thērminus, in 195 B. C. In the north of Italy he intimidated the enemy, desolated the country of the Boii, and at last compelled them to meet him in the field, when they lost, in killed and prisoners, upwards of fifteen thousand men. In subsequent engagements, his success was less, and therefore the senate refused his demand of a supplication and triumph for his victory over the Boii (Liv. xxxii. 7—xxxv. 8).—2. Was Flāmen Diālis, and likewise obtained the consulship during the tyranny of Cim̄a, by whose orders he was, at last, put to death (Vel. Pat. ii. 20).

L. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, L. Cōrnēli Scīpiōnis, m. a patrician, who, after being interrex, was elected consul, in 349 B. C. Want of health unfitted him for military service, and his colleague, M. Pōpillius Lāenas, commanded the troops against the Gauls. To L. Fūrius Cāmillus, Cōrnēlius was master of the horse (Liv. vii. 21—23).—2. The colleague of Cn. Fūlvius in the consulship, in 300 B. C. In Etrūria he compelled the enemy to take protection in the cities, and continued to harass them by destroying their towns and forts. He was afterwards proprātor (Liv. x. 11 seq.).—3. Held the consulship with C. Aquilius Flōrus, in 261 B. C. For desolating Sārdinia and Cōrsica, and for carrying a number of prisoners from these islands to Rome, he had the honour of a triumph (Eutrop. ii. 20. Flor. ii. 2).—4. Brother of P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, surnamed Africānus, under whom he served in Spain, and, by his military skill, took Oringis. Africānus afterwards appointed him to conduct to Rome a number of prisoners of distinction, and to carry the news of the reduction of Spain, in 209 B. C. In his prātorship, Sicily became his province. To bring the war to a termination, the Roman armies passed over into Africa, where he likewise served under his brother, who became his lieutenant-general on his appointment to the consulship, in 192 B. C. This act of the illustrious Africānus secured, to Lūcius, Greece for his province; and the senate decreed him a powerful reinforcement, besides the army of Mānlius Acilius Glābrio, then in that country, and allowed him to make Asia the seat of war, with the view of conquering Antiōchus, king of Syria. Every measure and movement of the Roman generals had a direct tendency to accelerate their departure from Europe, and the invasion of Asia, with every possible advantage. Having ascertained the friendly disposition of Philippus, king of Mācedōnia, they marched through the territory of that monarch, who escorted them to the Dardanelles, which they crossed on shipping provided by Eumēnes, king of Asia. Thus the first Roman army which ever was in Asia, entered that division of the globe without opposition. On their landing, the inhabitants of Dardānium, Rhētium, and Ilium met them, showing every proof of kindness and respect, and the Romans boasted of their Trojan descent. Antiōchus proposed terms of peace, which the consul rejected; and then his ambassador, Hēracles of Byzantium, attempted to bribe Africānus, at which that noble Roman spurned with contempt. Nothing remained for the Syrian king but vigorous preparations for war. With the exception of a few furious, but unsuccessful, attacks, he retreated before the Romans, and at last they joined battle near the river Phrḡgius, or, Hýllus, when his army, consisting of different nations, which he had drawn up with great ability, yielded to the bravery of the Romans, and a total rout ensued. Forty thousand infantry, and three thousand cavalry, were said to be killed, and fourteen hundred made prisoners. The Romans took fifteen elephants and the camp of Antiōchus, on which he sued for peace, which the consul granted, on the very same terms that had been offered near the shore of the Dardanelles. Cōrnēlius assumed the surname of Asiāticus, and claimed the honour of a triumph, which the senate granted. After the death of Africānus, Asiāticus was accused of not bringing into the treasury a great deal of gold and silver, which he had received from Antiōchus, and of accepting a bribe from that monarch. Without any thing approaching to satisfactory evidence, according to general practice, the people found him guilty, and his declaration of innocence neither lessened the immense sum of which he was fined, nor softened the sentence which doomed him to prison, unless he paid the amount. Tibērius Scmpronius Grācehus, a tribune of the people, protested against his imprisonment, but allowed the prātor to levy the fine from his effects, which fell short of half the sum. His great mind refused the money raised by his relations and friends, which would have made him wealthier than he had ever before been. He only accepted a few necessities for his family, purchased at the sale by his nearest connexions. The games which he had vowed, the kings of Asia defrayed, and these continued ten days, in 188 B. C. In a review of the knights two years after, the censors, M. Pōrcius Cāto and M. Valērius Flāccus, degraded him. Such justice may the generous and the brave expect, when the decision depends on the caprice of the multitude (Liv. xxviii. 3—xxxix. 44). To him Tacitus alludes (Ann. iii. 62).—5. Son of P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus. See Cn. Cōrnēlius Scīpio.—6. A questor, appointed by the senate to attend Prūsias, king of Bithynia, when he came to Rome, in 163 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 44).—7. Held the consulship, with C. Jūnius Nōrbānus Flāccus, in 85 B. C. and, in that year, L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla defeated him, his whole army having previously deserted to that cruel usurper, who, notwithstanding his thirst for blood, and disregard of human life, set him at liberty, when he might have put him to death (Liv. Ep. 85). Eutropius calls him simply Scīpio (v. 7), and Tacitus, L. Scīpio (Hist. iii. 72).

L. Cōrnēlius Sisēnna, L. Cōrnēli Sisēnnae, m. a Roman historian, highly commended by Cicero. This author says, he spoke the Latin language well, was a man of learning, a skilful statesman, and full of humour. In history he excelled all who had written before him; yet the orator reckons his work far from perfect. He wished to improve the style in common use, and therefore used uncommon words. At that time there existed no good specimen of historical composition in the language, and Cōrnēlius does not appear to have been acquainted with the writings of the Greeks (Cic. Brut. 63 &c.). Some allege, that he held the office of prætor, others deny it. He wrote the history of the civil wars between L. Cörnēlius Sūlla and C. Mārius (Vel. Pat. ii. 9). That author says nothing of his merits, only he mentions, that he began to write history in early life, and published that above-mentioned when an old man. In early periods of literature, the historian directs his whole attention to accuracy of date and fact, careless of the style, trusting that truth will interest the reader without the aid of rhetorical embellishments or graphic description. Sallustius bears honourable testimony to his diligence, and excellence in his history of the war between Sūlla and Mārius (Jug. 95).

L. Cörnēlius Sūlla, L. Cörnēli Sūllæ, m. a Roman, of patrician rank, who served, at first, under Mārius. His activity and address contributed greatly to bring the Jugurthine war to a successful termination. He transacted with Bōcchus, by whose treachery Jūgūrtha came into his hands, an action to which both he and his superior officer, C. Mārius, laid claim. It formed the cause of their contention which had so fatal consequences (Val. Max. viii. 14). Mārius became, at last, jealous of Sūlla's merit; hence originated that quarrel between them, which was productive of the most enormous cruelties, and contributed to the final extinction of Roman liberty. Being sent to Asia to restrain the power of Mithridātes, though under a different pretence, he proved himself both a brave soldier and an able general. He plundered the temples of Dēlphī, Olymṗia, and Epidauria, then entered into terms of peace with Archēlāus, afterwards personally with Mithridātes, and thus ended the first war with that prince (Ap. Bel. Mith. 206 seq.). On his return, he displayed his military talents to great advantage in the Social war. So strongly were his soldiers attached to him, that when two tribunes were sent to take the command of his army, and give it to Mārius, they stoned them to death. In revenge, Mārius put Sūlla's friends in the city to the sword, upon which he marched to Rome, and compelled Mārius to fly. The horrid proscription now began. A price was set on the head of Mārius, but he effected his escape. Sūlla then set out against Mithridātes, defeated his armies under different generals, and concluded a peace with him on very advantageous terms. On his way he attacked Piræus, which he carried, after a long and brave resistance, by depriving the inhabitants of food, when he burned and destroyed every thing remarkable. He next obtained possession of Athens, where, indulging his cruelty, he spared neither age nor sex (Ap. Bel. Mith. 190 seq.). He allowed his army to live after the Asiatic manner, which first unnerved the hardy soldiers of Italy. Mārius and Cinna having butchered many of Sūlla's friends in Rome, he returned to Italy, to revenge their deaths. Cn. Pōmpēius and L. Mārcius Philippus served under him as lieutenant-generals, and by them he carried on hostilities, with success, against C. Jūnius Nōrbānus Flāceus, L. Cörnēlius Scipio, C. Mārius, and Cn. Pāpīrius Cārbo. To conciliate the Italian states he formed a treaty with them, securing the right of voting which they had lately obtained. His enemies being now wholly in his power, he committed the most enormous and barbarous acts of cruelty, filled not only Rome but all Italy with carnage, published a list of persons proscribed, and seized on their property. To aggrandize himself, to exalt the Patricians, and to glut his desire of revenge on his enemies, induced Sūlla to assume the reigns of absolute government. He reclaimed the abuses introduced by popular and unprincipled demagogues, restored the ancient laws, and enacted many that were salutary and beneficial. Still tyranny marked his whole conduct, and rendered his administration a scene of terror, by his personal enmities and insufferable despotism. Desire of revenge was a stronger passion in the mind of Sūlla than love of power. After glutting his vengeance with the blood of thousands, and governing with despotic authority for three years, he resigned the sovereignty, and lived undisturbed as a private citizen. He died in great torment of the morbus pediculāris, in the 60th year of his age, about 78 B. C. The perpetual intoxication, to which he had recourse to avoid the horrors of remorse, contributed to hasten his death, and he was buried in Cāmpus Mārtius. Aurēlius Victor states, that he was stoned to death at Ancōna, by the army, on account of his excessive cruelty (Vir. Il. 69). To Sūlla must be conceded the intrepidity of a brave soldier, and the talents of an able general; but his character as a monster of cruelty, cannot be held in too great abhorrence. Crēntus Sūlla (Mart. xi. 6). Adj. Sūllānus, a. um.—2. Son of the former, to whom his father gave the additional name of Faustus, which the writer of the Epitōmes of Livius calls a prænōmen, in consequence of the victory over his enemies. His twin-sister, for the same reason, was called Fausta. Faustus and L. Afrānius were killed at the time C. Jūlius Cæsar defeated the republican forces under P. Cörnēlius Scipio Nāsica, the father-in-law of Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus, at Thapsus, in Africa, 48 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 114). Faustus appears to have been one of the commanders in that army, and Cæsar, after the battle, caused him to be put to death (Eutrop. vi. 23).—3. A youth of high rank, who refused, at a show of gladiators, to give place to Dōmītilius Cōrbūlo, his superior in years. The latter complained of that conduct in the senate, when the elderly members supported ancient usage, which obliged youth to respect old age. His relations undertook his defence, when a keen debate ensued, to which an apology, made for him by Māmērcus Scaurus, his uncle and stepfather, put an end, and Cōrbūlo expressed himself satisfied. The practice of early ages, the reverence due to advanced years, and decrees enforcing that respect, having been considered as decisive authority, rendered submission on the part of the juniors both right and becoming. Cörnēlius obtained the consulship, with Ser. Sūlpicius Gālba, in the year 33 (Tac. Ann. iii. 31).

M. Cörnēlius Cēthēgus, M. Cörnēli Cēthēgi, m. a noble Roman, who, after holding the offices of pōntifex māximus and prætor of the city, was elected censor, in 211 B. C., before he had been consul, and his colleague, P. Sēmprōnius Tūdītānus, was in the same situation. They performed the duties of the censorship with strictness and severity, and appear to have acted with unanimity, except in the nomination of the Prince of the senate.

Cornelius thought that the oldest censor alive, T. Manlius Torquatus, should be appointed, agreeably to the practice of their ancestors; but Sempronius, on whom the lot had fallen to nominate, maintained that he had the full freedom of choice, and named Q. Fabius Maximus, to which his colleague assented. In 206 B. C. he obtained the consulship, and in this office he had the same colleague, when Etruria became his province. Over Mago, he and P. Quinctilius Varus gained a victory of some consequence, and the Carthaginian general was mortally wounded. Cornelius died in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 2—xxxiii. 42).—2. Son of C. Cornelius Cethegus, whose grandfather had the same name, sent by the Roman senate on a deputation with other two, to forbid the consul, C. Cassius Longinus, from attempting to pass through Illyricum to Macedonia, in 173 B. C. Two years after, he was one of the three commissioners for planting a colony at Aquileia (Liv. xliii. 1, 17).—3. Consul, in 162 B. C. It had fallen to his lot to drain the Pomptine marshes, and he had the merit of making them arable land (Liv. Ep. 46).

M. Cornelius Maluginensis, M. Cornelli Maluginensis, m. a Roman, elected twice a decemvir (Liv. iii. 35—41).—2. A consul, in 435 B. C. (Liv. iv. 21).—3. Substituted in room of C. Julius Iulus, the censor, who died in office, in 391 B. C. The Romans considered that substitution as displeasing to the gods, because Rome was taken during this lustrum. From that time, a censor never was substituted in the place of one dying in office. See Censures. Cornelius was twice elected a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority (Liv. v. 31—vi. 42).

M. Cornelius Scipio Maluginensis, M. Cornelli Scipionis Maluginensis, m. elected praetor, in 178 B. C., when the south of Spain became his province. He swore that he was prevented from going into that country by the performance of solemn annual sacrifices, and the senate admitted his excuse. He was afterwards expelled the senate by the censors (Liv. xli. 14—27).

M. Cornelius Mammula, M. Cornelli Mammula, m. a Roman, one of the ambassadors sent to the king of Egypt, in 175 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 6).

P. Cornelius, P. Cornelli, m. obtained the office of a tribune, with consular authority, at Rome, in 389 B. C., and five years after he was re-elected to the same office (Liv. vi. 1—11).—2. A Roman praetor, to whom the senate gave the command on the seacoast, in 310 B. C. He went ashore at Pompeii, plundered the country about Nuceria, and ventured too far from his ships. The peasants met him and his men returning, whom they stripped of their property, and put a great part of them to the sword (Liv. ix. 38).

P. Cornelius Arvina, P. Cornelli Arvinae, m. a Roman, who obtained the consulship, in 307 B. C. With the assistance of his colleague, he defeated the Samnites, and obliged them to sue for peace. Twelve years after, he obtained the censorship, with C. Marcius Rutilius, and they were the twenty-sixth pair of censors from the commencement of that institution (Liv. ix. 42—x. 47).

P. Cornelius Blasio, P. Cornelli Blasio, m. a Roman, appointed one of the commissioners to inquire into a dispute between the inhabitants of Luna and Pisa, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 13).

P. Cornelius Calussa, P. Cornelli Calussa, m. created chief pontiff when he had not sat in a curule chair, and a similar election did not take place again for 120 years (Liv. xxv. 5). See P. Licinius Crassus.

P. Cornelius Caudinus, P. Cornelli Caudini, m. one of the three judges appointed by P. Cornelius Scipio, to determine respecting the merits of the two claimants of the mural crown, for first scaling the walls of Carthago Nova, in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 48).

P. Cornelius Cethegus, P. Cornelli Cethegi, m. was elected a curule edile, in 188 B. C., and next year obtained the office of praetor peregrinus. On the death of C. Decimius Flavius, praetor urbanus, the senate decreed, that he should hold both offices. In 183 B. C., he was raised to the consulship with M. Baebius Tamphilus, when Liguria became the province of both consuls, in which command they were continued next year. They had the honour of a triumph for having done nothing; the procession corresponded to their merits, exhibiting neither spoils nor captives. Cornelius was one of the ten commissioners for dividing unoccupied lands, in 175 B. C. At that time, each Roman received ten, and each Latin three, acres (Liv. xxxix. 7—xlii. 4).

P. Cornelius Cossus, P. Cornelli Cossi, m. was twice a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, and then nominated dictator, by C. Servilius Ahala, in 407 B. C., whom he appointed master of the horse, and marched against the enemy at Antium. Here he gained, without difficulty, a decisive victory, and afterwards desolated the lands of the Volscians, on which he returned to Rome, and, having resigned his office, was a third time elected a military tribune, with consular authority, in 405 B. C. (Liv. iv. 49—58).—2. A military tribune, with consular power, in 304 B. C. The war with the Faliscians fell to his lot, with P. Cornelius Scipio, and they appear to have done nothing which merited the notice of the historian (Liv. v. 24).

P. Cornelius Dolabella, P. Cornelli Dolabella, m. one of the most servile flatterers of the emperor Tiberius. On being appointed proconsul of Africa, he brought to an honourable termination the war with the freebooter Tacfarinas, in the year 24. Tiberius refused him the ensigns of triumph which that victory merited, for no other reason than that he apprehended it would diminish the renown of Blaesius, whom he had succeeded in that proconsulship, and Blaesius was the maternal uncle of Sejanius. Tacitus has recorded a proposal of his, that the quaestors should annually exhibit a spectacle of gladiators, an expense which few could afford, and consequently had the injurious effect of rendering the office venal (Ann. iv. 23—xi. 22).—2. A man of noble family, who, with Domitius Afer, accused Varus Quintilianus, a man of great wealth, related both to himself and to the emperor (Tac. Ann. iv. 66).

P. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Cornelli Len-

tūli, m. elected prætor, in 216 B. C., and the province of Sicily was decreed to him (Liv. xxiv. 9 seq.).—2. Created prætor, 205 B. C., and obtained the government of Sardinia, whence he sailed to Africa, with fifty ships of war and a hundred transports, with all kinds of stores (Liv. xxx. 1–36).—3. One of the three ambassadors sent into Greece, in 173 B. C. He went round the cities of Peloponnēsus, the Morea, and exhorted all the states, who had given assistance to the Romans in the war against Philip, or in that against Antiochus, not to refuse their support now against Perseus. After his return, he was appointed to take the command of a party of Italian soldiers, to fix his quarters at Thēbæ, and to endeavour to keep Boeotia from joining against the Romans (Liv. xlii. 37, 47).—4. An illustrious youth, who, as tribune of the soldiers, went into Macedonia, with the consul, P. Licinius Crassus, in 173 B. C. When curule edile, he and his colleague exhibited, as a part of the show, sixty-three panthers, besides forty bears and elephants. Paullus Æmilius sent him, with some others, on an embassy to Perseus, in 170 B. C., but they effected nothing (Liv. xlii. 49–xlv. 4).

P. Cornelius Lentulus Dōlābella, P. Cornēlii Lēntūli Dōlābellæ, m. a Roman of patrician rank, who procured adoption into a plebeian family, for the express purpose of proposing new laws for the remission of debts, which excited alarming commotions at Rome. He married Tullia, daughter of Cicero, on the death of her second husband. With respect to political matters, he does not appear to have considered it necessary to consult with his father-in-law, for he accused Appius of treason and bribery without the knowledge of Cicero, and his pride must have been mortified by the acquittal of the arraigned. The talents of Dōlābella claim more respect than his principles, and the zeal with which he embraced the interests of Cæsar, proves, that ambition, not patriotism, regulated his conduct. His activity and anxiety in promoting the views of that unprincipled Roman, recommended him more than his prudence or success. M. Antōnius, jealous of his favour with Cæsar, prevented the latter from fulfilling his promise, in appointing him consul at the age of twenty-five. Cæsar satisfied Dōlābella by nominating him as his successor in the consulship, when he set out for the Parthian war, and, on this declaration, he assumed the fasces immediately after Cæsar's death. His poverty induced him to accept the bribes of M. Antōnius, although he seemed inclined to join the conspirators; on which Cicero remarks, “that he not only forsook, but destroyed, the state.” Syria, which had been formerly promised to Cassius, Antōnius gave to Dōlābella, and he set out for that country before the expiry of his consulship. At Smyrna, by treachery, he got C. Trēbonius into his power, and put him to a cruel death, in 45 B. C., for which the senate declared him a public enemy, and confiscated his property. C. Cassius, by order of the senate, besieged him in Lāodicæa, where he died, probably by his own hand (Liv. Ep. 113–121). Vellēus Pitericus says by the hand of his slave (ii. 69). Tullia, whom he divorced, bore him a son, named Lēntulus.

Whether this separation proceeded on legal grounds, mutual consent, or the will of Dōlābella, history has not recorded. Cicero defended him twice when capitally accused, and continued to live on good terms with him, the result of timidity, perhaps, rather than of inclination, in consequence of his great influence with Cæsar, whose power Cicero dreaded. On a review of his life, as recorded by Roman authors, little will be found to merit the esteem either of the patriot or of the moralist.

P. Cornelius Lēntulus Spinther, P. Cornēlii Lēntūli Spīnthēris, m. held the office of a curule edile, in the year 65 B. C., when M. Tullius Cicero and C. Antōnius were consuls. His great wealth enabled him to exhibit a magnificence and splendour in the games, which surpassed what had ever been before seen in Rome. From his being Prætor Urbānus, the traitor P. Cornēlius Lēntulus Sura was committed to his charge (Sal. Cat. 47). In the year 59 B. C., he was proprietor of Hispānia Citerior. He was elected consul with Q. Cæcilius Mētellus Nēpos, and procured the recall of the orator, Cicero, from banishment. On the expiry of his consulship, he obtained the government of Cilicia, which he held for three successive years, and laboured to procure the restoration of Ptolemæus Aulētēs, who had been driven from his kingdom by his subjects; but a difference of opinion prevailing in the senate, he did not succeed. In the Civil War he attached himself to Cn. Pōmpeius, and having been taken prisoner, was brought before C. Julius Cæsar, at Cōfinium, and set at liberty. He fought in the battle of Pharsalia, and fled to Rhodus; but the Rhodians refused him protection. This circumstance both Cicero and Cæsar mention, and nothing further respecting him is known. The former author mentions, that he was not born with any of the requisites of an orator, and that whatever attainments he had acquired in speaking, they were the result of education and practice (Cic. Brut. 77). Vallērius Maximus informs us, that Cornēlius had the surname of Spinther, from his resemblance to a comedian of that name (ix. 14).

P. Cornelius Lēntulus Sura, P. Cornēlii Lēntūli Sūræ, m. a noble Roman, grandson of P. Cornēlius Lēntulus, Prince of the senate. He married Jūlia, sister of L. Jūlius Cæsar, after the death of her first husband, M. Antōnius Crēteus, to whom she had born M. Antōnius, the triumvir. His talents entitled him to rank high among men of genius; and had not his enormous vices destroyed his reputation, and perverted the powers of his mind, he would have been one of the most illustrious men in the state. The interest of his family, and affability of his manners, proceeding from love of popularity, raised him through the usual gradation of honours to the consulship, with Cn. Aufidius Orēstes, in 73 B. C. Expelled from the senate, on account of his immoralities, he had procured the prætorship, the usual step for being again restored to the senate for a second time, when Catiline formed his horrible design of massacre, rapine, and subversion of the government. Poverty, the natural consequence of excessive dissipation, added to immoderate vanity and extravagant ambition, induced him to become an associate of that traitor. The soothsayers easily persuaded him, that he was the third of the gens Cōrnēlia appointed to obtain the supreme power at Rome. L. Cōrnēlius Cinna, and L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, had risen to that authority, and therefore the soothsayers asserted, that it lay with him to fulfil the ancient prophecies respecting the family. Of all the conspirators none exerted greater activity or zeal in accelerating the plot than Lēntūlus, foolishly imagining that he was fulfilling his destiny, and would soon be at the head of the state. The Fates had passed a different decree, and he expiated his crime by the ignominious death of a traitor, at the hands of the common executioner. Plūtārchus informs us, that he received the surname of Sūra, in consequence of having wasted a large sum of the public money in his questorship under Sūlla, who, enraged at his conduct, demanded a state of his accounts in the senate, when Lēntūlus, with the utmost indifference, declared he had no accounts to produce, and contemptuously presented to him the calf of his leg (sura). Among the Romans, particularly among the boys, the player at tennis, who missed his stroke, presented the calf of the leg, to receive, as a punishment, a certain number of blows upon it. Lēntūlus, in allusion to that game, acted in the same manner just described, which accounts for the surname or nickname of Sūra (Sal. Cat. 17. 55). In the epitome of Līvius he is called Lēntūlus, praetor (102).

P. Cōrnēlius Maluginēnsis, P. Cōrnēlii Maluginēnsis, m. elected a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, in 403 B. C., and re-elected seven years after (Liv. iv. 61 seq.).

P. Cōrnēlius Māmmūla, P. Cōrnēlii Māmmūlae, m. a Roman, of whom nothing is known, except that he was elected a praetor, and obtained Sicily for his province, in 182 B. C. (Liv. xl. 35).

P. Cōrnēlius Mērenda, P. Cōrnēlii Mērendae, m. a patrician, who stood candidate for the consulship, in 218 B. C., but lost his election in consequence of a speech of Q. Baebius Hērēnnius (Liv. xxii. 85).

P. Cōrnēlius Rūfinus, P. Cōrnēlii Rūfini, m. created dictator, in 333 B. C., in consequence of a prevailing report that the Sāmnites were making preparations for hostilities, and from its being expected, that the Sidicini, with whom the Romans were then at war, would make a vigorous effort to maintain their independence. An irregularity in the election obliged Cōrnēlius to resign, after he had named M. Antōnius master of the horse (Liv. viii. 17).—2. Was elected consul with M. Cōrilius Dēntātus, in 292 B. C. Both marched against the Sāmnites, over whom they gained some important advantages. According to Eutrōpius, the Romans had then carried on war against that nation forty-nine years, and this historian reckons them the bravest of all the Italian states (ii. 9). Cōrnēlius is probably the person mentioned by Līvius, as being expelled the senate by the censor Fābricius, because he had in his house ten pounds' weight of silver plate (Ep. 14), a fact likewise recorded by Flōrus (i. 18).

P. Cōrnēlius Scāpūla, P. Cōrnēlii Scāpūlae, m. a Roman, consul with P. Plautius Prōcūlus, in 327 B. C. Not a single remarkable transaction occurred during that year. The Romans sent a colony to Frēgēllae, a district which had formerly belonged to the Sidicini, and afterwards to the Volsi (Liv. viii. 22).

P. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō, P. Cōrnēlii Scīpiōnis, m. a noble Roman, whom M. Fūrius Cāmillus appointed master of the horse, in 395 B. C. Next year he was elected a military tribune with consular power, and afterwards twice created interrex (Liv. v. 19—vi. 1).—2. A patrician, elected an edile, in 365 B. C., and, sixteen years afterwards, L. Fūrius Cāmillus nominated him master of the horse (Liv. vii. 1, 24).—3. Created dictator, in 307 B. C., on purpose to elect the consuls (Liv. ix. 44).—4. Was consul with Tib. Sēmprōnius Lōngus, in 220 B. C., when ambassadors from the Sīgintini came to Rome, imploring assistance against Hānībāl, who was about to carry on war against them. Spain fell to the lot of Cōrnēlius, who set sail with sixty ships of war, and cruised along the coast of Etrūria, Tuscany, that of the Ligūres, and having arrived at the eastmost mouth of the Rhone, he encamped. There a brisk skirmish took place between part of his cavalry and some of Hānībāl's, in which the Romans at last gained the victory. Hānībāl declined engaging him, unwilling to diminish his forces, until he had reached Italy. After the consul found it impossible to overtake him, he returned to his ships, sent forward his brother, Cn. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō, into Spain, sailed back to Italy, and, having landed, carried his army across the Po, with the view of attacking the Carthaginian forces before they had recovered the fatigue of crossing the Alps. He addressed his troops on the banks of Ticinus, the Tessino, in an animated speech, which failed to rouse their courage, depressed by prodigies of an unfavourable kind. On the expiation of these omens, he engaged with Hānībāl, by whom he was defeated, and, after he had been wounded, owed his life to the valour of his son, afterwards surnamed Africānus. His consular colleague, in opposition to his opinion, gave battle to the Carthaginians, in which he considered himself victorious, and, transported with the success, rashly led on his troops against the enemy, almost to their total destruction. The senate, next year, sent Cōrnēlius proconsul into Spain, with thirty ships of war, eight thousand soldiers, and a large supply of provisions. Here he was joined by his brother Cnēius, and they two formed their plans, and executed every measure with the greatest harmony. From the precarious state of Italy, they risked a battle in doubtful circumstances with Hāsdrūbāl, a brother of Hānībāl, on his march to that country. By the skill of the commanders, and the bravery of the troops, the Carthaginians experienced a complete defeat, with the loss of their camp. Besides confirming many of the Spaniards who were wavering, this victory prevented Hānībāl from receiving either reinforcements or supplies from Spain. At Illiturgi, Andujar, Cōrnēlius gained a remarkable victory over the Carthaginians, killing more than the number of his own troops, besides taking upwards of three thousand prisoners. Hāsdrūbāl, Māgo, and Hānībāl, son of Bōmīlex, who commanded three Carthaginian camps, fell into his hands the same day, with one thousand horse and fifty-nine military standards. In a second engagement, the loss of the enemy amounted to fifteen thousand in killed and prisoners; and the immediate result of the victory was, that almost every state in Spain declared for the Romans. After keeping the country in subjection about two years, the Carthaginians received strong reinforcements, and the intrepidity of Māsīnissa, who commanded the Numidians, struck terror into the combined army of Cōrnēlius, who, destitute of provisions, and nearly in a state of blockade, resolved to attack Indibilis. Over this Spaniard he would have gained an easy victory, had not the Numidian horse, coming up, charged him on the flanks, and the Carthaginian commanders on the rear. Thus overpowered by superiority of numbers, he fell, and not one of his men would have escaped, had not night stopped the pursuit. His death was not more lamented at Rome than in Spain, for he had gained the affections of the natives by the justice and moderation of his government (Liv. xxi. 6 seq.).—5. Afterwards surnamed Africānus, son of the former, saved the life of his father in the battle with Hānibal on Ticinus, the Tessino, when only seventeen years of age. After the battle of Cānne, the troops collected at Cānūsium, Canoa, conferred the supreme command on him and Appius Claudius Pūlcher, both military tribunes in that disastrous engagement. The plebeian tribunes without success opposed his being appointed curule edile, because he was under age, and he obtained the office of proconsul, before he had completed his twenty-fourth year, to carry on the war in Spain, in which both his father and uncle had fallen. His friend, C. Lælius, attended him, and seconded, with his best efforts, every measure adopted by the commander-in-chief. Humanity, moderation, and justice appeared conspicuous in every action, and attached the natives to Cōrnēlius, although naturally hostile to the Romans. The Spaniards whom he made prisoners, he sent home without ransom, which added to his popularity; and they expressed their gratitude by saluting him king, a title which he refused. In that country the Carthaginian influence declined in proportion as that of Cōrnēlius increased, and success in every engagement soon rendered him master of the whole country in arms. His military skill overcame the Carthaginians, with whom he disdained to treat; but his policy gained an ascendancy over their allies, whom he not only detached from their interest, but added their strength to that of the Romans. The most illustrious, as well as the most important, of these princes, was Māsīnissa, a Numidian, whose activity, bravery, and fidelity, rendered him a very great acquisition not only to Cōrnēlius, but afterwards to the state. On the conquest of Spain, in which he had defeated four Carthaginian generals with their armies, he returned to Rome, was elected consul, and obtained Africa for his province. It had occurred to him, that it would be easier to conquer Hānibal in Africa than in Italy, therefore he proposed to transfer the seat of war to that country. This measure, which success afterwards justified, to many of the senators appeared rash and injudicious. Their opposition occasioned discussion and delay for some time; but the popularity of Cōrnēlius triumphed over every hinderance, and he set out with a powerful army which soon compelled the Carthaginians to recal Hānibal to defend their own capital. To Roman bravery, under this great commander, the Carthaginian troops, commanded by Hāsdrūbal and Sýphax, yielded an easy victory. Hānibal, on reaching his native shore, revived the sinking spirits of his countrymen, and made preparations for a decisive battle between the rival states, Rome and Carthage. This inveterate enemy of the Romans left nothing undone, which human ingenuity or military skill could accomplish, to secure the empire to the Carthaginians. The Fates denied him success, and Cōrnēlius gained at Zāma the most memorable victory perhaps recorded in Roman history. This decisive engagement terminated the second Punic war, in 204 B. C. The conqueror, as usual, dictated the terms of peace, and the senate decreed him the honours of a triumph, and the surname of Africānus, the first instance on record, of a Roman receiving a surname from the country which he had subdued by force of arms. Appianus gives a minute description of the triumph (Bel. Pun. 35). Popular favour next conferred on him the censorship, and elected him consul for the second time. The unrelenting hatred with which the Romans persecuted Hānibal, was at direct variance with the sentiments of Africānus, who considered it a degradation of their national character, to harbour malice against a brave, though implacable, enemy. The senate appointed him ambassador to Carthage, where he had a second interview with Hānibal, the first having preceded the battle of Zāma. When his brother obtained Mācēdōnia for his province, he volunteered his services as a lieutenant-general; and in the expedition against Antiochus, king of Syria, his advice and military skill contributed greatly to the victory which obtained for his brother the surname of Asiaticus. Detraction ever accompanies renown, and envy rejoices at the fall of merit. This noble Roman, the tribune M. Nævius brought to trial, after so long and splendid a career, and being three times first in the list of senators, or Prince of the senate, the highest honour in that venerable assembly. The bare recital of his own transactions formed a sufficient justification in the mind of the people, who, from the tribunal attended him to the Capitol, on purpose to return thanks to the gods for the aggrandizement of the state under his administration. He afterwards retired to Litrernum, Torre di Patria, and did not appear when the pertinacious malignity of the tribunes again summoned him to trial. Tibērius Sēmprōnius Grūcchus, a tribune of the people, from whom a severe sentence might have been expected, pronounced the highest eulogium on his character, which met with the warmest thanks of the senate, and checked the proceedings of the prosecutors. At Litrernum, Africānus spent the remainder of his life, without ever visiting Rome, died there, leaving orders that his body should be buried at his villa, and that his ungrateful country should not possess his ashes. He left behind him one son, who adopted the son of L. Æmilius Paullus, known in history by the name of P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Æmiliānus Africānus Nūmāntinus q. r.—6. Son of the former, was chosen augur in place of Sp. Pōstūmīus Albīnus, in 182 B. C. In the war with Antiochus, king of Sýria, he was in the army under his uncle, and made prisoner by that monarch, who restored him to his father without ransom. He adopted the son of L. Æmilius Paullus, frequently called Africānus Jūnior (Liv. xxxvii. 34 seq.).—7. A lieutenant-general, who, in the year 22, pursued the Africans, ravaging the country near Lēptis. He was the husband of Pōppæa q. r. When her conduct came under the review of the senate, he acted with great judgment, and appears to have thought better of his wife than her immoralities merited. A cautious prudence, accommodated to existing circumstances, marked the character of Cōrnēlius, rather than a bold, upright, and open avowal of his sentiments. He obtained the consulship with Q. Vōlūsius Sātūrnīnus, in the year 56 (Tac. Ann. iii. 74 seq.).

P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Æmiliānus, P. Cōrnēlius Scīpiōnis Æmiliāni, m. sometimes called Africānus Jūnior (Eutrop. iv. 12), a celebrated Roman, was the son of L. Æmilius Paullus, and adopted by P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, son of Africānus. The historian Pōlybius was his teacher (Ap. Bel. Pun. 82). The knowledge of war he acquired in the camp of his father, who commanded in Greece against Pērseus, king of Mācēdōniā, 170 B. C., and fought in the engagement which decided the fate of that monarch. Although only in the seventeenth year of his age, he pursued the enemy, after the rout had become general, with so great bravery, that, from the lateness of his coming back to the Roman camp, anxiety for his son had, in the mind of L. Æmilius Paullus, banished all joy resulting from the decisive victory. Æmiliānus however returned in safety, and followed his father's chariot in the triumphal procession for the conquest of Mācēdōniā (Liv. xlv. 44: xlv. 40). When no Roman citizen would take the command of the army in Spain, in consequence of the ill success with which it had latterly been attended, he declared his willingness to accept of any appointment for which his fellow-citizens might judge him fit, and his example excited the whole to a desire for war. L. Licīnius Lucūllus, consul, on whom the supreme command devolved, appointed him a military tribune, and he distinguished himself by slaying a barbarian who had challenged him to single combat, and by being the first who scaled the walls of Intercātia, Quintanilla del Monte, 153 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 48). The fame which he had acquired in former wars, obtained additional celebrity at the siege of Carthage, under the consuls L. Mārcius Cōnsōrīnus, and Mānius Mānilius, when he saved two military tribunes, with their troops, who had ventured into a place negligently guarded, defended a Roman fort, which the enemy had assailed in the night, repulsed the Carthaginians, who attacked with their whole troops the Roman camp, and rescued one of the consuls (the other having gone to Rome to hold the elections), who had, in opposition to his opinion, charged Hāsdrūbal in a narrow place, and had been routed. For his fortitude and valour, M. Pōrcēus Cāto said, that the rest who fought in Africa were shades, but that Æmiliānus was vigour. On the same account, a majority of the tribes voted for his obtaining the consulship at the ensuing election, though under age. In 149 B. C., the people elected him consul, when he appeared as a candidate only for the edileship, in opposition to an active, but unsuccessful, resistance of the nobles (Ap. Bel. Pun. 68). His military talents gained him a decisive victory over Hāsdrūbal, at Nēphēris, after which he took and destroyed Carthage. Justice, as well as heroism, marked his conduct, and he returned the greater part of the spoil to the Sicilians, from whom it had been taken, and, in the manner of his father, L. Æmilius Paullus, the conqueror of Mācēdōniā, exhibited games, during which he exposed fugitives and deserters to wild beasts. For his conquest of Hāsdrūbal and Carthage, he had the honour of a triumph, and received the surname of Africānus. The unskilfulness of the commanders of the war at Nūmāntia protracted hostilities, and induced the people to appoint him again consul, in opposition to the law which prohibited any person from being elected successively to that office. Æmiliānus first restored the ancient discipline of the army, and then invested Nūmāntia so closely, that the inhabitants, reduced to the utmost extremity of famine, put themselves to death, and the conqueror levelled the town with the ground, in the fourteenth year after the destruction of Carthage, after seven Roman commanders in succession had been either conquered or put to flight by the enemy (Val. Max. ii. 7). For bringing to a successful termination this war, he had the honour of a triumph, and received the additional surname of Nūmāntinus. From this time his full name was P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Æmiliānus Africānus Nūmāntinus. When Antiochus, king of Sýria, sent him some valuable presents, he received them openly, contrary to the practice of other commanders, who used to conceal royal gifts, ordered the questors to place them to the credit of the public, and promised to reward the soldiers who should distinguish themselves during the siege of Nūmāntia out of these donations. Cārbo, a tribune of the people, proposed a law, allowing to the commons liberty to choose the same tribune as often as they pleased, which Æmiliānus opposed, and maintained that Tiberius Sēmprōnius Grāchus had been justly put to death. The powerful influence obtained by his military prowess and success, he employed against the Agrarian law, supported by Fulvius Flāccus, C. Sēmprōnius Grāchus, and C. Pāpīrius Cārbo, and returned home from the senate one evening in perfect health, but was found dead in his bed next morning. Suspicion fell upon his wife, Sēmprōniā, whom public opinion accused of murdering him by poison, chiefly, perhaps, from her being the sister of the Grāchi. Aurelius Victor says that he was buried with his head covered, that the discoloration of his face might not be observed (Vir. Il. 58). No investigation after his death took place, and therefore the matter remained undetermined. The sedition of these triumviri then blazed forth with all its baneful consequences, when their chief opponent was no more (Liv. Ep.

48—59). Plinius informs us, that this illustrious Roman was the first who shaved every day (il. 108), the only personal anecdote recorded of the destroyer of Carthage and Numantia. To him Sallustius refers, Jug. 7. and Eutropius, iv. 10—12.

P. Cornélius Scipio Asina, P. Cornélii Scipionis Asinae, m. an interrex, in 218 B. C. Five years after, he recommended in the senate, that all anxiety about Căpua should be laid aside, and all the Roman armies recalled for the defence of the capital. The fortitude of Fabius Maximus opposed the timidity of Cornélius, and the senate adopted the motion of P. Valerius Flaccus, which embraced a middle course, and the result justified the resolution of the senate (Liv. xxii. 34: xxvi. 8). Livius calls him simply P. Cornélius Asina.—2. The colleague of M. Minucius Rufus in the consulship, in 223 B. C. Eutropius writes only P. Cornélius (iii. 7).

P. Cornélius Scipio Nāsica, P. Cornélii Scipionis Nāsicae, m. son of Cn. Cornélius Scipio, who was killed in Spain. Before he had obtained a quaestorship, the votes of the senate declared him the best of all good men in the city, and therefore appointed him to receive Magna Mater at Ostia, Ostia, whither he went attended by all the matrons. The priests of that goddess delivered her over to him, and he handed her over to Claudia Quinta, the most distinguished of the matrons, who, transferring her one to another, brought her to the temple of Victory, on the Palatine hill, in 206 B. C. The grounds on which the senate formed the very favourable opinion of Nāsica, Livius has not stated, and where evidence is wanting, conjecture is useless. After acting as a triumvir in completing the number of the colonists at Vēnūsia, he was chosen a curule edile, with Cn. Manlius Vulso, and, on being appointed praetor, obtained the south of Spain for his province. The successful battles which he fought south of Ibērus, the Ebro, spread so great an alarm over the country, that fifty towns joined him, in 195 B. C. Next year, he gained a great advantage over the Lusitani, killed twelve thousand, made five hundred and forty prisoners, most of whom were horsemen, and took a hundred and thirty-four military standards. Notwithstanding his success in war, and unequalled personal respectability, he failed in his canvass for the consulship of next year, and, to add to the surprise of the reader, he was supported by P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus, and the whole Cornelian clan. The caprice and absurdity of popular opinion cannot be more forcibly depicted than in the Roman people preferring L. Quinctius Flāminius, through the interest of his brother, T. Quinctius Flāminius, to P. Cornélius Scipio Nāsica, who, next year, obtained the office of consul, and had M. Aclius Glābrio, a plebeian, for his colleague. He brought in a bill for declaring war against Antiochus, king of Syria. Before he quitted the city, after Italy had fallen to him by lot as his province, he asked from the senate money for exhibiting the games which he had vowed during the critical time of a battle in Spain. The request appeared unreasonable, and was unprecedented, on which account that assembly decreed, that whosoever should, in future, vow games on his own judgment, without consulting the senators, must celebrate them either at his own expense, or out of the spoils. In this instance the money was granted, and the games continued during ten days. After expiating certain omens, he marched against the Boii, over whom he gained a very complete victory. Having received hostages from that nation, he deprived them of one half of their lands, and returned to Rome in confident expectation of a triumph, which P. Sēmprōnius Blaesus, a tribune of the people, for certain reasons, opposed. Nāsica having replied to the objections of the tribune, the senate unanimously voted for his triumph, and, Sēmprōnius having desisted, the victorious general exhibited in the procession an immense quantity of gold, silver, and brass, wrought and unwrought. To each soldier he gave a hundred and twenty-five asses, to a centurion double, and to a horseman triple, of that sum. He made an able defence for L. Cornélius Scipio Asiaticus, condemned to pay a heavy fine for alleged offences after the defeat of Antiochus, king of Syria; but the manly eloquence and forcible arguments of Nāsica had no effect on the multitude, who adhered to their former sentence, founded on presumption, not on facts. Livius has not recorded any other important event in his life, except that he acted as a commissioner in conducting a colony of Latins to Aquilēia, 183 B. C., and that he married the eldest daughter of Scipio Africānus (Liv. xxix. 14—xlili. 2). Ovidius has alluded to Nāsica being appointed to receive Magna Mater (Fast. iv. 347); and to him Eutropius refers (iv. 3).—2. An officer who served under L. Aemilius Paullus in the Macedonian war, 170 B. C. Livius seldom mentions his name, and records no particulars illustrative of character (Liv. xlv. 35—46).—3. Completely defeated the Dalmatae, in 158 B. C., and opposed M. Porcius Cato, who urged a declaration of hostilities against the Carthaginians, on account of their employing a great body of Numidian troops intended to act, as he asserted, against the Romans. In the senate, he moved and carried that a theatre, for which the censors had contracted, should be pulled down, as being not only useless, but hurtful to the morals of the people. In the opinion of the senate, Nāsica was the best and Cato the wisest man in the state (Liv. Ep. 47—49). He was twice consul (cons. cal.).—4. Grandson of Scipio, who was declared the best man by the senate, and great-grandson of the uncle of P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus, was nicknamed Sērāpiō, by Cūriatius, a tribune of the people, and obtained the consulship, in 140 B. C., with Dēcius Jūnius Brūtus. The tribunes committed to prison these consuls, because they would not allow them to exempt any ten soldiers whom they chose from serving in the army. By the advice of Nāsica, Tib. Sēmprōnius Grāccus, a tribune of the people, was put to death, in 135 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 55—58).—5. Surnamed Sērāpiō, married Mētella, daughter of Q. Cicerilius Mētellus, surnamed Mācēdōnicus, from subduing Pseudophilippus. Cicero, in his treatise on illustrious orators, mentions, that in wit and humour he surpassed all his contemporaries. He obtained the consulship (113 B. C.) with L. Calpurnius Piso Bēstia, when Italy fell to his lot, and Numidia to that of his colleague (Sal. Jug.

27). He died in office, on which account Călpurnius returned from Nămădia to preside at the elections.—6. Adopted son of Quintus Mătellus Pius, on which account he assumed the name of Q. Căcilius Mătellus Pius Scipio, but commonly called Mătellus Scipio. He was candidate for the consulship with Hăpsăus and T. Annius Milo, in 54 B. C. They carried on their canvass with such violence, that Cn. Pămpăius Magnus was elected sole consul, with the view of repressing their enormities. On the death of Jūlia, Caesar's daughter, Cn. Pămpăius married Cărnălia, daughter of Mătellus Scipio, who was the colleague of his son-in-law in the consulship during the last months of the year already mentioned. The senate, at the suggestion of Mătellus Scipio, passed a decree, ordering Caesar to disband his troops before a certain time, otherwise he would be declared an enemy to the state. This vote of the senate was improved into a pretext for the civil war. Scipio commanded the centre of the army at the battle of Phărsălia, and returned afterwards with Căto to Africa. Caesar defeated him at Thăpsus, and the ship in which he was attempting to fly into Spain, being taken by one of Caesar's, he stabbed himself, and when one of the pursuers asked, "Where is he?" Scipio replied, "The commander is very well." To him Eutrăpius alludes (vi. 23. Liv. Ep. 107—114).

P. Cărnălius Sisenna, P. Cărnălii Sisenna, m. was appointed city praetor, in 185 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 45).

P. Cărnălius Sūlla, P. Cărnălii Sūllae, m. was elected praetor in 215 B. C., and appointed to administer justice both to citizens and foreigners, i. e., to hold the office both of praetor urbānus and praetor peregrius. This appears to have been the first instance of one man discharging the functions of both these offices. He was also the first who celebrated the Apollinarian games (Liv. xxv. 2—41).—2. Elected praetor, in 188 B. C., and obtained Sicily for his province (Liv. xxxix. 6—8).—3. A son of Ser. Cărnălius Sūlla, brother of L. Cărnălius Sūlla, the dictator. Both he and his brother, Ser. Cărnălius Sūlla, were among the accomplices of L. Sărgius Cătilina (Sal. Cat. 17). He and P. Antrănius Pătus, after being elected consuls, were brought to trial for bribery at their election, and, being convicted, their nomination was set aside, and others chosen to fill their place. During the dictatorship of his uncle, this Cărnălius held the office of questor. After the conspiracy had terminated in the death of Cătilina, he was prosecuted as an accomplice of the traitor, when Cicero and Hărtensius pleaded his cause, and made a successful defence. In the civil war, he joined C. Jūlius Caesar, and commanded the right wing of his army at the battle of Phărsălia.

P. Cărnălius Sūlla Faustus, P. Cărnălii Sūllae Fausti, m. was consul with L. Sălvius Otho, in the year 52 (Tac. Ann. xii. 52).

Sărvius Cărnălius, Sărvii Cărnălii, m. was elected consul in 485 B. C. (Liv. ii. 41). In the consular calendar he is called Ser. Cărnălius Maluginēnsis Căssus.—2. The Flămen Quirinalis, lost his life in an epidemic, in 453 B. C. (Liv. iii. 32).—3. Elected consul, in 304 B. C., and had for his colleague L. Gănăcius q. v. (Liv. x. 1). In the consular calendar his name is written Ser. Cărnălius Lăntulus.

Ser. Cărnălius Căthėgus, Ser. Cărnălii Căthėgi, m. a Roman consul, who had for his colleague L. Visėllius Vărro. Nothing further of his history is known, and Tăcitus mentions him merely for ascertaining the date of the transactions of that year, the twenty-third of our era (Ann. iv. 17).

Ser. Cărnălius Lăntulus, Ser. Cărnălii Lăntuli, m. a curule edile, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 10).—2. An ambassador, sent into Greece in 173 B. C. P. Cărnălius Lăntulus and he were instructed, after visiting Căphăllănia, to cross into Pălăpănnăsus, the Morca, and to make a circuit round the western coast before winter. Two years after, he was elected a praetor, when Sicily became his province (Liv. xlii. 37: xliii. 15).

Ser. Cărnălius Maluginēnsis, Ser. Cărnălii Maluginēnsis, m. was elected seven times a military tribune, with consular power, first in 389 B. C., and last in 367 B. C. (Liv. v. 36—vi. 38).—2. Master of the horse to T. Quinctius Pănnus, in 360 B. C. (Liv. vii. 9).

Ser. Cărnălius Orfătus, Ser. Cărnălii Orfăti, m. was consul in the year 51, and had for his colleague the emperor Claudius. At his suggestion the month Aprilis was called Năronius, in honour of the emperor Nėro; Maius, Claudius; and Jūnius, Gėrmănius (Tac. Ann. xvi. 12).

Ser. Cărnălius Sūlla, Ser. Cărnălii Sūllae, m. was praetor in Sărdinăia 176 B. C., and seven years after was one of the commissioners appointed to regulate the affairs of Măcėdănia. Livius says he was of consular rank (xli. 21 seq.).—2. Son of Ser. Cărnălius Sūlla, and nephew of L. Cărnălius Sūlla, the dictator. Both he and his brother, P. Cărnălius Sūlla, were amongst the conspirators who attached themselves to L. Sărgius Cătilina (Sal. Cat. 17 seq.).

Cărnăciolum, i. n. a town of Lătium taken by Tărcuinius Priscus (Liv. i. 38). Adj. Cărnăciolănus, a. um. Oerăstia Cărnăciolăna (Ov. Fast. vi. 628). Cărnăciolăna căptătea, the mother of Sărvius Tăllius (Liv. i. 39).

Cărnăficius Găllus, Cărnăficii Gălli, m. a friend of Cătăllus, to whom he addresses his 38th poem. He appears to have been a poet, both from Măcrăbius and Eusėbius (Ov. Trist. ii. 436).

L. Cărnăficius, L. Cărnăficii, m. a man who built a temple to Dăna at Răome, in consequence of the emperor Augustus recommending to persons of property to add to the beauty of the city, by raising new edifices or by repairing the old (Suet. Aug. 29).

Q. Cărnăficius, Q. Cărnăficii, m. a Roman who held the office of plebeian tribune, and afterwards competed with Cicero for the consulship. From the writings of the orator he appears to have been a man of good principle (Att. i. 13 seq.).—2. Son of the former, to whose custody the traitor, C. Cărnălius Căthėgus, was committed before he suffered the punishment due to his crime (Sal. Cat. 47). He was the colleague of Cicero in the augurship, and after the African war obtained Africa for his province. It was the intention of Caesar that he should be governor of Săria, had he not fallen by the hands of the conspirators. Cicero writes several letters to him (Fam. xii. 17—20).

Cörnix, icis, f. was the daughter of Cöroneus, king of Phocis. To escape the violence of Neptuneus, she prayed Minerva for aid, who turned her into a crow, and made her one of her companions; but she forfeited her favour by informing her, that the daughter of Cécrops had opened the box or hamper in which that goddess had shut up Erichthönus. On this she was dismissed, and Nyctimēnē, the night owl, succeeded to her honourable station. Before this punishment of Cörnix, the crow was silvered over with snow-white feathers, equalling the doves which are without spot (Ov. Met. ii. 531—590).

Cörnus, i, f. Corneto, the capital of the Pelliti, a nation of Sardinia, taken by T. Manlius Torquatus, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 41).

Cöræbus, i, m. a son of Mýgdon, a Thracian king, who was brother to Hécuba, wife of Priāmus. He was deeply in love with Cássandra, a daughter of Priāmus, for whose sake he came to Troy, where he was killed, according to Virgilius, by Pēdēus, some say by Diomēdes, and others by Nēoptólēmus (Virg. Æn. ii. 341 seq. Paus. x. 27). Mýgdōnides, æ, m. a patronymic of Cöræbus (Virg. Æn. ii. 341).—2. See Chöræbus.

Cörāmus, i, m. a petty king of the Boii, who attacked a Roman army under M. Claudius Mārcellus, whilst employed in fortifying their camp, and gained a considerable victory, in 193 B. C. Three thousand of the Romans fell, two prefects of the allies, and two military tribunes (Liv. xxxiii. 36).

Cörōna, æ, f. a crown. Military crowns, or coronets, were of different kinds, of which the most honourable was Cörōna Civica, made of oak leaves, and bestowed on him who had saved the life of a Roman citizen. By the person who received the civic crown, it was worn at the public exhibitions, and he had the honour of sitting next the senate. On his entering an assembly, the company rose up, as a mark of their respect, and by the person, whose life he had preserved, he was regarded as a parent.—2. Cörōna Mūrālis, was conferred for having first scaled the walls of a city under blockade, or in an assault.—3. Cörōna Cāstrēnsis, v. Vāllāris, was the reward of the man who first entered the enemy's camp, or scaled the rampart.—4. Cörōna Nāvālis, was obtained by being the first who boarded the ship of an enemy.—5. Cörōna Grāmīnā Obsidiōnālis, made of grass, as the name imports, was obtained by the very few who had the good fortune to rescue an army, or body of men, that had been blockaded. This kind of crown was among military honours reckoned one of the greatest.

Cörōnæ, arum, m. twin youths, who sprang from the ashes of the daughters of Orion, to preserve the race from extinction. For the good of their country these virgins had devoted themselves to death (Ov. Met. xiii. 698).

Cörōnē, es, f. Coron (Petalidhi, Leake), a town of Messēnia (Liv. xxxix. 49), anciently called Epōnā. By some it is said that Epimēides, the founder, called it Cörōnēia from his being a native of a town of that name in Boeōtia, but that the Messenians incorrectly pronounced it Cörōnē, an error which time confirmed. Others say that a brazen crown was found in digging the foundation, and to this circumstance the nomination may be more properly referred.

Cörōnēa, v. Cörōnia, æ, f. Granizza, a town of Boeōtia, the lands around which were fruitful in grain. At this town a number of Roman soldiers were privately murdered, as well as at Acrophia, and the lake Cōpāis, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 29). Iuh. Cörōnēi, orum, m. multitudes of whom went to Thēbæ, Theba, to support a decree in favour of an alliance with Persēs, king of Mācēdōnīa, in preference to forming a confederacy with the Romans, in 173 B. C. In this measure they failed (Liv. xlii. 44). They joined Etēocles in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 307). Adj. Cörōnæus, a, um, et, Cörōnēnsis, is, e. Cörōnæus, et, Cörōnēnsis ager (Liv. xxxvi. 20).

Cörōnēus, ēs, m. king of Phocis, and father of Cörnix (Ov. Met. ii. 569).

Cörōnis, idis, f. daughter of Phlégyas, a Thessalian, was a native of Lārisa, hence Ovidius calls her Lārisa Cörōnis (Met. ii. 542). Apōllō became attached to Cörōnis, and, after she was pregnant to him, Diāna put her to death, because she had preferred Ischys, son of Elātus, to her brother. Mercūrius rescued the child when the body of Cörōnis was burning on the funeral pile. The infant, thus preserved, so celebrated in Greek and Roman history as the god of medicine, received the name of Æsculāpius q. e. (Apol. iii. 10). Ovidius makes Apōllō, not Diāna, deprive Cörōnis of life (Met. ii. 610). Cörōnides, æ, m. a patronymic of Æsculāpius (Ov. Fast. vi. 746).

Cörōnus, i, m. son of Cēnēus, and one of the Argonauts.

Cörāgon, i, n. a fort in Macedonian Illyricum, taken at the first assault by L. Apūstius, a lieutenant-general in the Roman army, at the same time with Gērrunium and Orgēssum, 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 27).

Cörāgus, i, m. a native of Mācēdōnīa, who joined Cn. Mānlius Vūlso, the Roman consul, on his march against the Gāllogræci, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 13).—2. A prefect of Eumēnes, king of Asia, who assisted Atleshis, a prince of Thrācia, in making inroads on the territories of Cōtys, king of the Odrýsæ, in 173 B. C. Cōtys was at that time fighting at a distance from his own country, in the army of Persēs, king of Mācēdōnīa, against the Romans (Liv. xlii. 67).

Cörribilo, ōnis, m. a Spanish nobleman, taken prisoner by C. Flāminius, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 22).

Cōrsa, æ, f. a native of Ligūria, who, according to Sāllūstius, had the charge of a herd which pastured on the shore, and in which was a bull accustomed to swim across to the island Cōrsica. This Ligurian woman, observing that he returned improved by the rich pasture, on one occasion, when he took the sea, followed him at a little distance in a boat, reached the island; and, on coming back, made known the discovery to her countrymen, who called the island by her name (Sal. Frag. 2). This account is evidently fictitious, since the nearest point of the Italian coast to Cōrsica is distant fifty Roman miles.

Cōrsica, æ, f. Corsica, an island in the Mediterranean, to the north of Sardinia, from which it is separated by the Strait of Bonifacio. Its greatest length, which is from north to south, is about eighty-eight miles, and its breadth forty. The air is very unwholesome, the soil barren, from the whole island being mountainous, except the vallies which are not extensive. It contains some mineral productions, and the coast abounds with fish. The Greeks called this island Cýrnos, v. Cýrnon (Plin. i. 338). From an expression of Claudianus, the coast appears to have been dangerous on account of hidden rocks, cæcis vitatur Corsica saxis (xv. 506). Sallustius, as quoted by Isidorus, states that Corsica was discovered by a Ligurian woman, whose name was Corsa q. v. (Frag. 2). Inh. Córsi, orum (Sing. Córsus, i), m. the Corsicans. Adj. Córsum, et, Córscus, a, um. Corsa aqua, the Corsican sea (Ov. Fast. vi. 194). Corsicum mel, Corsican honey, considered very bad, both by the ancients and moderns. The bitterness of the thyme in Corsica seems to have produced this effect (Plin. iv. 732. Mart. ix. 27: xi. 43). Corsica littora (Manil. iv. 636).

Corsotē, es, f. Erzi, a large city at the time Xenophon wrote.

Córtōna, æ, f. Cortona, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, to the north of Trāsmēnus lācus, the lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. viii. 472). It had also the name of Corýthus, q. v. Inh. Córtonēses, ium, m. Adj. Córtonēnsis, is, e. Córtonēnses mōntes (Liv. xxii. 4).

Córtuōsa, æ, f. a town of the Etrusci, taken, plundered, and burned by the Romans, in 387 B. C. (Liv. vi. 4).

Córuncānī, orum, m. Romans, originally from Cāmērium (Tac. Ann. xi. 24). Cicero makes them Tuscūlāni (pro Planc. 8).

T. Córuncānīus, T. Córuncānī, m. the first plebeian who was elected pontifex mājimus in Rome (Liv. Ep. 18).

Córus, i, m. the wind which blew from 15° to 45° north of west. It is the same with the Argēstēs of the Greeks.

Córvinus, i, m. a friend of Jūvénālis, to whom he addressed his 12th satire.

Córvinus. See Vālērīus.

Córýbas, āntis, m. a son of Iāson or Iāsus and Cýbēlē, from whom the priests of that goddess were called Córýbāntes. Apollodorus says the Córýbāntes were the children of Apōllo and Thālía. Jūvénālis uses Córýbas to denote any frantic person, whether proceeding from mental dereliction, or from intoxication. Vidēbis Córýbānta de convivā, you will see a Córýbas (i. e. a priest of Cýbēlē) of a guest, i. e. you will see one of the guests act the frantic and outrageous part of a priest of Cýbēlē (Juv. Sat. v. 25). Cýbēlēus Córýbas (Claud. viii. 149). Adj. Córýbāntius, a, um. Córýbāntia ara, the brazen cymbals used by the priests of that goddess in their sacred rites (Virg. Æn. iii. 111).

Córýclum, i, n. (Antrum) Sarand' Aulī, i. e. the forty courts, one of the most celebrated caves of antiquity, is near the top of Párnassus, Liabira. It is large enough to hold three thousand persons, and is the retreat of the robbers, who infest this part of the country. By one of those banditti, the situation of Antrum Córýclum, Sarand' Aulī, was lately discovered, when considerable doubt of its reality began to be entertained. At the time the barbarians invaded Phœcis, the inhabitants of Dēlphī concealed themselves in this cave; hence "as safe as the Corycian cave," became a proverb among the Greeks. Córýcis, Idis, Plu. Córýcides, um, f. the nymphs of that cave; supposed, by some, to be the muses. Adj. Córýcius, a, um.

Córýcium, i, n. Cape Courco, a promontory of Iōnia, belonging to the Tēi (Liv. xxxvii. 12).

Córýcus, i, m. a high mountain near Tēos in Iōnia. There was also a harbour and a small island, near which piracy was often committed. Inh. Córýcæi, orum (Sing. Córýcæus, i), m. used to enquire minutely respecting the different kinds of merchandise which were on board the vessels which sailed that way, and whither the ships were bound, with a view to their capture, for which the numerous creeks in their neighbourhood afforded a facility. Hence the proverb nīmīrum et hoc Córýcæus auscultāvit, applied to persons who make diligent and careful inquiry into the secrets of others. Adj. Córýcius, a, um. Córýcium lātum, an herb of mount Córýcus, which dyes a colour between white and yellow (Virg. Cir. 317).—2. A port of Ethiopia (Steph.).—3. A port of Iōnia, near which C. Livius Sāllinātor, and Eumēnes, king of Asia, defeated the navy of Antiochus, king of Sýria, under Pōlyxēnidas, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 43: xxxvii. 8).

Córýcus, i, f. Curco, a celebrated city of Cilicia, taken by Antiochus, king of Sýria, from Ptolēmaeus, king of Egypt, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 20). The poet Applianus was a native of this city. Adj. Córýcius, a, um. Córýcium nēmum, yielded excellent saffron. Córýcia clāsses, Cilician fleets (Luc. Phar. viii. 26).—2. A town and promontory of Crēta, Candia. Adj. Córýcius, a, um. Córýcia puppis, a Cretan ship (Juv. Sat. xiv. 267).

Córýdāllus, i, m. a traitorous Greek, who, with Onētes, conducted the Persians along the path which enabled them to gain the heights over the pass of Thermopylae, Therma, and in this manner overpower Lēonidas and his valiant troops. Herodotus doubts this statement, and imputes the blame to Ephialtes, a Trachynian, q. v. (i. 214).

Córýdon, ōnis, m. a shepherd, mentioned by Virgilius (B. vii. 40). Jūvénālis uses Córýdon, in allusion to Virgilius, in the sense of foolish, and humorously calls Nievōsus Córýdon (Sat. ix. 102).

Córýlēnus, i, m. a city of Cāria, which Antiochus, king of Sýria, took at the first assault in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 21).

Córýnæus, i, m. a Trojan, who performed the last offices to the ashes of Misēnus, and was killed by Asylas (Virg. Æn. vi. 228: ix. 571).—2. Another Trojan, who killed Ebēsus (Virg. Æn. xii. 298).

Córýs, ūis, m. a river of Arabia, which loses itself in the Red Sea. From this stream water was said to have been conducted to the length of twelve days' journey by means of canals formed by the skins of animals sewed together, in order to supply the desert (Herod. iii. 9).

Córýtha, æ, f. a famous blood mare, of which the breed or stock was highly valued (Juv. Sat. viii. 62).

Cörýthus, i. m. the son of Märmärus, hence called Märmärides, who, at the nuptials of Përsëus, pierced the right hand of Pëlätes with a spear, and fixed it to the doorpost (Ov. Met. v. 125).—2. A boy killed by Rhetus in the battle of the centaurs (Ov. Met. xii. 290).—3. A native of Cýzicus, who fell by the hand of Týdëus in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 99 seq.).

Cörýthus, i. m. Cortona, a town of Etrüria, Tuscan, built by Cörýthus, the supposed father of Därdänuus, the founder of Troy (Virg. Æn. iii. 170). Respecting this passage of the Æneid, different opinions have been entertained. The town was also called Cortöna q. v.

Cos. See Co.

Cösa, a. v. Cössa, arum, f. Cassano, a town of Etrüria, Tuscan, on the seacoast. The island of Igiliu, Giglio, is opposite to Cösa, and not above ten miles from the continent. Cösa occurs in Cæsar (B. C. iii. 22), as a town of Lücänia, in Agro Thürino. Cösa the promontory is now called Monte Argentaro (Tac. Ann. ii. 39). Inh. Cösäni, orum, m. (Liv. xxvii. 10). Adj. Cösänuus, a, um. Cösänuus pörus (Liv. xxii. 11).

Cöscönia, a, f. the wife of Urbicus (Mart. xi. 56).

Cöscönius, i. m. a poet at whom Märtiälis laughs (ii. 77: iii. 69).

C. Cöscönius, C. Cöscöni, m. a Roman, who, with L. Luccius, conquered the Säm-nites in battle, killed Märius Egnätius, the most noble of the enemy, and received the surrender of many of their towns, in 91 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 75).—2. Accused by Valërius Val-entinus, and, although evidently guilty, was acquitted (Val. Max. viii. 1).

Cn. v. C. Cöscönius, Cn. Cöscöni, m. a Roman, sent to Illýricum with the title of proconsul. He conquered great part of Däl-mätia, took Sälöna, and, having brought the war to a conclusion, returned to Rome, after an absence of two years (Eutrop. vi. 4).

M. Cöscönius, M. Cöscöni, m. a military tribune, who fell in battle with Mägo, 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 18).—2. A Roman prætor, who conquered the Scördisci in Thräcia, in 157 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 56).

Cösdröes, a, m. a king of Pärthia (Aur. Vic. Cæs. 13).

Cösmus, i. m. a man who excelled in the preparation of perfumes, but others have considered him a man of great riches and luxury. The former is the more probable opinion (Mart. i. 83). Adj. Cösmiänuus, a, um. Cösmiäna ampulla, bottles of Cösmus (Mart. iii. 82).—2. A slave of Augüstus, whose bitter reflections against his master, the emperor punished by putting him in fetters (Suet. Aug. 67).

Cössei, orum, m. an Asiatic nation, whom some have supposed to be the same with the Cuthæi, because the latter, in the Hebrew pronunciation, has nearly the same sound (Curt. iv. 12).

Cössüra, v. Cössýra, a, f. Pantalera, an island between Sicily and Africa, called pärva by Silius Itälicus (xiv. 272). From this island, M. Jünius Brütus was sent in a fishing boat by Cn. Päpilius Cärbo to Lälý-bæum, Cape Boæ, to see if the ships of Cn. Pömpëius were there, in 84 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 89).

i. m. a flatterer and legacy-hunter, who endeavoured by adulation and every servile means to get his name inserted in the Wills of rich old childless men and women (Juv. Sat. x. 202).

Cössütiänuus Cäpito, Cössütiäni Cäpitönis, m. was the son-in-law of Tigëllnus, and had been governor of Cilicia and condemned by the senate for extortion in his province, hence Jüvenälis calls him püräta Cälcum (Sat. viii. 93). By the interest of his father-in-law he obtained the rank of a senator. After being raised to this dignity, we find him acting the infamous part of an accuser, and receiving an exorbitant reward for procuring sentence of death against some of the best citizens of Rome (Tac. Ann. xi. 6: xvi. 33).

Cössýra. See Cössüra.

Costoböcæ, arum, m. a Scythian nation, probably adjoining to the European Aläni. Both the territories and numbers of these nations, Ammliänuus Märcëllinus describes as unbounded (xxii. 8).

Costocus, i. m. a Thracian, who fled with Përsëus, king of Mäcëdönia, after his defeat (Liv. xlv. 42). Here the good copies read Cötys q. v.

Cötho, önis, m. a harbour at Carthage (Ap. Bel. Pan. 79).

Cöthon, önis, m. a man in the army of Hannibal at the siege of Sägüntum, killed by Thëron (Sil. Ital. ii. 164).—2. The pilot of the ship in which M. Atilius Rëgulus sailed from Carthage to Rome. He seems to have been a skilful seaman (Sil. Ital. vi. 357).

Cötilus, i. m. a Roman, of whose character nothing is known. Märtiälis addresses an epigram to him (ii. 70).

Cötison, önis, m. king of the Gëtæ, to whom, according to M. Antönius, Augüstus betrothed his daughter Jülia, after she had been promised in marriage to his son, and sought the daughter of that monarch for his own wife (Suet. Oct. 63). Hörätius calls him a Dacian, and mentions the destruction of his army (Od. iii. 8. 18), in which he probably alludes to the victory of Augüstus over that nation, recorded by Suetönius (Oct. 21). Latin authors, particularly the poets, frequently confound the Däci with the Gëtæ.

Q. Cötius, Q. Cötii, m. a Roman, surnamed Achilles on account of his great bravery. In single combat he overcame Pirësius, the most valiant of all the Celtiberians. After this combat they became intimate friends (Val. Max. iii. 2).

Cötta, a, m. a Roman, to whom Märtiälis addresses several of his epigrams. From the poet, it is manifest, that a virtuous mind could neither approve the conduct nor respect the character of Cötta (i. 10: i. 24 &c.).

Cötta Mëssälinus, or, Mëssälinus Cötta, Cöttæ Mëssälini, m. a Roman of high rank, son of the celebrated orator Mëssäla, who took an active part in the senate. According to Täcitus he was forward to join in any profligate vote, and the ready author of the most sanguinary measures. On being brought to trial, the first men of Rome willingly appeared as evidences against Cötta, long detested for his infamous and cruel conduct; but he overcame his enemies by appealing to Tibërius, who procured his acquittal (Tac. Ann. ii. 32: vi. 5).

Cötta. See Aurélius.

Cöttius, i. m. a king, whose territories lay wholly in the western part of the Alps. He died in the reign of Augustus, and that emperor (Suetonius says Nero) reduced his dominion into the form of a province. Adj. Cōtius, et, Cōtīanus, a, um. Cōtia Alpes, Mont Genevre, that part of the Alps which formed the kingdom of Cōtius (Eutrop. vii. 14). Cōtīana civitates (Plin. i. 379).

Cōtto, ōnis, m, a nobleman of the nation of the Bästärne, who, with Antigōnus, was sent by Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, to persuade that people to come to his assistance, in 181 B. C. (Liv. xi. 57).

Cōtton, ōnis, f, a city of Cūria, which Antiochus, king of Sŷria, took at the first assault, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 21).

Cōtūatus, i, m, a man of desperate resolution, who, along with Cōnētōdūnus, a similar character, headed their countrymen the Cūritēs, and put to the sword the Romans who had settled, on account of trade, at Gēnāhūm, Orleans, and plundered their property (Caes. B. G. vii. 3).

Cōtus, i, m, a nobleman of ancient family, among the Ædūi, whom Caesar compelled to resign the supreme magistracy of that state in favour of Cōnvetōlītānis, who had been publicly and formally elected. According to the laws of the Ædūi, Cōtus was not eligible; because his brother had held that office during the preceding year. Besides, his appointment had been by his brother and in private, both contrary to the law, and with the concurrence only of a few of the electors secretly convened for that purpose, without regard either to "the proper time or place." After the revolt of the Ædūi, both of these noblemen, and likewise Cavarillus, were made prisoners in the battle in which Vercingetōrix was defeated (Caes. B. G. vii. 32 seq.).

Cōtŷæum, i, n, Kutahiah, a town in Lŷcōnīa.

Cōtŷōra, m, f, Bouzonk, a town on the Black Sea, not far distant from Iūsōnium prōmōntōrium, Cape Isaurum.

Cōtŷs, ŷis, m, a Thracian, son of Sēuthēs, king of the Odrŷsæ, who openly declared for the Macedonians. At the commencement of the war, he brought to Pērsēs a thousand chosen horsemen, and nearly the same number of foot, in 173 B. C. On the defeat of that monarch, Cōtŷs accompanied him in his flight, as did also the Odrŷsian cavalry. After Pērsēs had fallen into the hands of the Romans, among the prisoners was Bitis, q. v. son of Cōtŷs. In a few days Cōtŷs sent ambassadors to Rome with money to ransom the hostages, alleging, as an excuse for his withdrawing from the alliance of the Romans and joining the enemy, that he had been obliged to give to the Macedonian king these hostages, which the Romans had now in their power. The senate recognised their former friendship with him and his predecessors; but did not sustain his apology with respect to the hostages, since Pērsēs had it not in his power to have compelled him. Either from generosity, or more probably from a wish to have a friendly power in that part of the country, they returned his son and likewise the hostages without ransom, and sent three commissioners, T. Quinctius Flāminius, C. Licinius Nēra, and M. Cāninius Rēbilus to conduct them home. To each of the Thracian ambassadors, the senate decreed a present of two thousand asses (Liv. xlii. 29—xlv. 42).—2. A king of Thrācia, who sent about 600 cavalry to Pompey, in the civil war, under the command of his son Sādāla (Luc. Phars. v. 54).—3. One of the grandes of Cŷzicus, who fell in a rencontre with the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. iii. 112).—4. A king of Thrācia, Romania, to whom Ovidius addresses one of his epistles from Pōntus (ii. 9). He was the son of Rhēmētāles, on whose death Augustus gave part of his kingdom to his brother, Rhēscūpōris, and part to his son Cōtŷs. The latter received the most valuable part of the country, which was probably the reason why his uncle made war upon him, seized his person by stratagem, and having first loaded him with chains, afterwards murdered him. The senate sent Rhēscūpōris to Alēxandria for this crime, where he was put to death, and the kingdom again divided between his son Rhēmētāles and the children of his nephew Cōtŷs; but the latter being minors the Romans undertook the administration of government till they came of age (Tac. Ann. ii. 64—66).—5. A king of Armēnia Minor (Tac. Ann. xi. 9).—6. A brother of Mithridātes, king of Pōntus, who first betrayed and afterwards became the open enemy of that monarch, in the year 49 (Tac. Ann. xii. 18).

Cōtŷttō, ŷs, f, the goddess of impurity among the Thracians, whose unhallowed rites were celebrated during the night. Adj. Cōtŷttius, a, um. Cōtŷtta (sacra), the sacred rites of Cōtŷttō (Hor. Epod. xviii. 4).

Crāgum, i, n, a very strong fort in Cilīcia, which the pirates surrendered to Pōmpeius without resistance (Ap. Bel. Mith. 237).

Crāgus, i, m, a mountain of Lŷcia. Viridia Crāgus (Hor. Od. i. 21. 8).—2. A promontory, now Capo Serdeni (Plin. i. 592). Stephānus says it had its name from Crāgus, son of Trēmīlēs, and the nymph Prāxīdēa, adding that the inhabitants of this mountain were said to be immortal.

Crānē, es, f, Marafonisi, the island on which Pāris and Hēlēna completed their guilt (Hom. Il. iii. 445). From the latter it was afterwards called Hēlēnē, placed by some on the coast of Lacōnīa, by Strabo near the coast of Africa before Sūnium.

Crānāus, i, m, the second king of Athens, but not a son of Cēcrops (Just. ii. 6).

Crānī, orum, m, a people of Cēphālēnīa, who gave twenty hostages to the Roman consul, M. Fūlvius Nōbīllor, without resistance, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 28).

Crānōn, ōnis, m, a town of Thessaly, taken by Antiochus, king of Sŷria, on his arrival, in 193 B. C., and retaken the same year by the Roman consul, M. Acilius Glābriō (Liv. xxxvi. 10—14). *Luh. Crānōnī, *orum (Sing. Crānōnīus, i), m. Adj. Crānōnīus, a, um. Crānōnīus ager, the territory of Crānōn (Liv. xlii. 64).—2. A city of Athāmōnīa, so called from Crānōn, a son of Pelasgus (Steph.).

Crāntor, ōris, m, a Grecian philosopher, who was a native of Sōli, Mezella, in Cilīcia. On quitting that place he went to Athens, and studied under Xēnōcrātes. He admired the opinions of Plāto, and Cicēro has highly commended some of his works (Hor. Epist. i. 2. 4).

L. Crāssītius, L. Crāssītīl, m, of mean extraction, and, in early life, of mean ex-ployment, until he wrote a commentary on Smūrna, an obscure poem composed by Cinna, and this publication raised him so high among grammarians, that he had among his scholars a son of M. Antōnius the triumvir. After giving up the school, he attached himself to the sect of the philosopher Q. Sēxtius (Suet. II. Gram. 18).

Crāssus Frūgi, Crāssi Frūgi, m. a Roman, who had twice obtained triumphal ornaments, on which account he rode on a horse richly caparisoned, and in an embroidered robe, in the triumphal procession of the emperor Claudius over Britain (Suet. Claud. 17).

M. Crāssus Nōmētānus, M. Crāssi Nōmētāni, m. had this surname from Nōmētum, Lamentario. Hōrātius mentions him as a spendthrift of profligate morals (Sat. i. 1. 102), and as a ruined prodigal (Sat. ii. 1. 22). In Sat. ii. 8. 23 he appears as a parasite, a character which a ruined debauchee naturally assumes.

P. Crāssus, P. Crāssi, m. one of Cæsar's lieutenant-generals in Gallia, France, who was despatched with one legion against the Vēnēti and other maritime nations, which he subjected to the power of Rome. Equal success attended Crāssus in the following year, when he had the command of the troops sent to Aquitānia (Cæs. B. G. ii. 34 seq.).

Crāstinus, i. m. a volunteer in Cæsar's army, who was killed in the battle of Phārsālīa. He was a man of great bravery, and, the year before, had been first centurion of the tenth legion. He is probably the man who commenced the battle of Phārsālīa, as mentioned by Lūcānus (Phar. vii. 471), and Flōrus (iv. 2).

Crāteis, īdis, f. the mother of Scylla (Ov. Met. xiii. 749). She is mentioned by Hōmērus (Od. xii. 124).

Crātērus, i. m. the husband of Nicæa (Liv. xxxv. 26).—2. A general of Alexander the Great, in whom that monarch placed great confidence. After the death of Alexander, Crātērus and Antipāter crossed Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, with a great army of Macedonians against Eumēnes, and, in the first engagement, Crātērus lost his life. Having lived formerly in terms of intimate friendship, Eumēnes made every effort to recover Crātērus, who had been carried half-dead out of the battle, and soon expired. That monarch showed every respect to his memory, performing his funeral obsequies with great splendour, then sent his bones into Mācēdōnia to his wife and children (Cor. Nep. Eum. 4. Just. xii. 12 seq.). Dēmētrius, son of Antigōnus, married his widow Phila after his death (Plut. Demet.).—3. A general of Mithridātes, king of Pontus (Ap. Bel. Mith. 181).—4. A celebrated physician in the reign of Augustus. To his medical knowledge Hōrātius alludes (Sat. ii. 3. 161), and Cicēro mentions him with respect (Att. xii. 13: xii. 14). Pērsius uses his name as denoting any physician (Sat. iii. 65).

Crātes Māllōtes, Crātis Māllōtis, m. the first who taught grammar at Rome, according to Suetōnius. Attālus sent him to Rome between the second and third Punic war, about the time that the poet Ennius died (Suet. II. Gram. 2).

Crāthis, īdis, m. the Crati, a river of Italy, which dyed hair of a red colour (Ov. Met. x.

Crāthis, the Crati, and Sībāris, the Cochile (Plin. i. 351).—2. The Akrata, or, Clukiniatiko, a river of Achāia, which gave name to that in Italy (Herod. i. 145). The Styx is a branch of this river.

Crātīnus, i. m. one of the writers of ancient comedy, of whose works we know little, as none have been transmitted to modern times. He is said to have been contemporary with Eupōlis and Aristōphānes. These authors described real characters in their plays, a practice liable to great abuse, and, perhaps, in no case justifiable. From an observation of this poet, which Hōrātius mentions, it may be inferred he was much addicted to wine (Epist. i. 19. 1), and this character of him is given by different authors (Athen. i. 19).

Crēmēdon, ōnis, m. a commander of the Albāni, by whom Cārcēus lost his life (Val. Flacc. vi. 194).

Crēmēra, æ, m. the Varca, a river of Tuscany, one of the branches of Tiber, the Tevere, which Ovidius describes as being very rapid (Fast. ii. 205). There appears also to have been a rising ground of this name, from which the three hundred Fābli, who alone had undertaken the war against the Vēientes, saw at a distance some cattle belonging to the enemy which they ran to seize, but were surprised by that people, who lay in ambush, and not one of them escaped. Here was also a fort, for the loss of which T. Mēnēnus was condemned to pay a fine of two thousand asses (Liv. ii. 49—52). Quid (sentit) legio Crēmēra? what thinks the legion of Crēmēra? i. e. the three hundred Fābli above-mentioned (Juv. Sat. ii. 155). Adj. Crēmērēnsis, is, e. Crēmērēnsis clādes, the slaughter at Crēmēra, i. e. the destruction of the Fābli, on the eighteenth of August, which the Romans afterwards considered an unlucky day (Tac. Hist. ii. 91).

Crēmētāon, ōnis, m. a man in the army of Etēocles, killed by Amphīlārus, who cut down him and Chrōmis by scythes fastened to the axis of his chariot (falcato curru) (Stat. Th. vii. 712).

Crēmō, ōnis, m. commonly written Crēmōnis Jūgum, Little St. Bernard. Over this ridge, according to some, Hānnibāl passed on his way to Italy, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 38).

Crēmōna, æ, f. Cremona, a town on the north of Pādus, the Po, in the territory of Cēnōmāni, which formed part of the tenth district of Italy (Plin. i. 374). The Romans, according to Tācītus, built it in 220 B. C., the first year of the war with Hānnibāl, and Antōnius Primus destroyed it, after it had stood two hundred and eighty-six years. Vēspāsiānus encouraged the Cremonians immediately to rebuild it (Tac. Hist. iii. 31—34). A colony was settled at Crēmōna in 221 B. C., which was a cause of offence to the Gauls, because it was taking from them a part of their territory (Liv. Ep. 20: xxi. 25). The consequence was, that the colony diminished, and frequent application was made to the senate for additional enrolments, until all that part of Italy was reduced under the power of the Romans. After the battle at Philippi, Augustus divided the lands of Māntua and Crēmōna among his veteran troops, an act of great cruelty, and flagrant injustice to the inhabitants of these places.

To this Virgilius alludes (B. ix. 28). Inh. Crēmōnēnses, ium, m. (Liv. xxvii. 10). Adj. Crēmōnēnsis, is, e. Crēmōnēnsis cohors (Liv. xlv. 40).

Crēmūtus Cōrdus, Crēmūtū Cōrdī, m. a historian who, in his work, after having praised M. Junius Brūtus, called C. Cassius Lōnginus the last of the Romans, for which Sātrius Sēcūndus and Pinārius Natta, creatures of Sējanus, raised a prosecution against him in the reign of Tiberius. That emperor, with a stern countenance heard his bold and manly defence, which made no favourable impression on the mind of the sullen and revengeful tyrant. Crēmūtus, after delivering his sentiments, left the senatehouse, and starved himself to death. The senate ordered the ediles to burn his books, but their destruction exceeded the power of both the emperor and senate. The work having been secretly preserved, copies were multiplied and read with avidity (Tac. Ann. iv. 34, 35). Seneca has given a minute account of the manner in which this great man ended his days, and attributes his death, not to the expression just quoted, but to his keen reflections on Sējanus (Consol. ad Mar. 22).

Crēnā, arum, f. seems to denote the sources whence Meander, the Meinder, takes its rise. The readings differ greatly, and commentators are not agreed with respect to the meaning of the expression Phrygia Crēnā (Sil. Ital. viii. 503).

Crēneus, i, m. a man who fled from the battle of the Centaurs; but, looking back, received a severe wound between his eyes (Or. Met. xii. 313).—2. A Lemnian, son of Thōas, born not in wedlock, hence Hēpistylā, describing his descent, says elegantly and delicately, obliquumque a patre (meo) gēnus (Stat. Th. v. 221). He fell by the hands of the Lemnian women, at the time they murdered all the men in the island.—3. Son of Faunus and Ismēnis, daughter of Ismēnus, the Iameno, whom Hippōmēdon killed in that river; hence its rage against the warrior (Stat. Th. ix. 320 seq.).—4. A nobleman of Cyzicus, at the time the Argonauts passed that city in their expedition to Colchis (Val. Flacc. lib. 178).

Crēnē, es, f. a town of Æolis, which Antiochus, king of Syria, took at the first assault, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 21).

Crēon, ōntis, m. king of Cōrinthus, Corinth, who promised his daughter Glauce, or, Crēusa to Iāson, who, having divorced Mēdēa, married her. In revenge for this act of perfidy on the part of Iāson, Mēdēa sent her rival a poisoned gown, which was no sooner put on than it took fire, and the miserable bride perished in the flames. Hēgēus adds, that the palace, from the robes of Crēusa, took fire, and both Crēon and Iāson were reduced to ashes (25). To this Hōrātius alludes (Epod. v. 64), and Ovidius (Ep. Her. xii. 54).—2. Son of Mēnœcēus, the father of Jōcasta, or, according to Apollōdōrus, her brother. He was king of Thēba, Theba, and, during his reign, Jūno sent the Sphinx to annoy and devour the Thebans. That unhappy nation could only be delivered from this pest by explaining the riddle which it had propounded, and Crēon, anxious to save the lives of his subjects, offered his daughter and the kingdom to the man who should solve the enigma. Œdipus declared the true meaning of the riddle, received Jōcasta in marriage, and obtained possession of the government. By her he had Pōlynices and Etēocles, besides two daughters, Ismēnē and Antigōnē. Some make these the children of Œdipus and Eurygēniā, daughter of Hēpērphas. After the death of Etēocles and Pōlynices, Crēon again resumed the reins of government. He gave his eldest daughter, Mēgāra, in marriage to Hērēcles, and his youngest to Iphēclus. Enraged at the number of lives lost in the Theban war, he ordered the body of Pōlynices, and those of the Argives who had been killed, to remain unburied, and threatened interring alive, as the punishment for transgressing this command. Antigōnē buried Pōlynices, for which Crēon caused her to be thrown into the same grave. This refusal of the rites of burial the Argives considered a violation both of the laws of nature and nations, for which reason Thēseus made war on Crēon, and killed him. Crēontīades, æ, m. a son of Crēon; not a patronymic, but a proper name (Apol. ii. 4). Crēontis, idis, f. applied to females or nouns feminine. Adj. Crēontius, a, um.—3. The first who was elected archon of Athens for one year (Vel. Pat. i. 8).

Crēpēreus Gāllus, Crēpēreū Gālli, m. an attendant of Agrippina, who was crushed to death by the deck of the ship falling upon him, which was intended for the destruction of his royal mistress (Tac. Ann. xiv. 5).

Crēpēreus Pōllio, Crēpēreū Pōlliōnis, m. a notorious spendthrift, of whom nothing is known, except what Juvēnalis has stated. Nobody, at last, would lend him money, even at treble interest (Juv. Sat. ix. 6). The poet introduces him again in the 11th satire, reduced to extreme poverty, having sold his ring, the last article with which a knight parted, and begging with his naked finger, i. e. bereft of its ornament (xi. 49).

Crēscēns, ēntis, m. a freedman of the emperor Nēro, who distinguished himself by his activity in the interest of Otho (Tac. Hist. i. 76).

Crēsphōntēs, is, m. one of the commanders of the Hērāclīdæ, when they invaded Pēlōponnēsus (Vel. Pat. i. 2).

Crēston, ōnis, f. a town of Thrācia. Inh. Crēstōnæi, orum, v. Crēstōnīatæ, arum, m. Adj. Crēstōnīcus, a, um (Herod. i. 57 seq.).

Crēta, æ, v. Crētē, es, f. Candia, a large island in the Mediterranean Sea, opposite to Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago. It is said to have had in ancient times a hundred cities. The first inhabitants of Crēta, Candia, were most probably from Pīlēstīna, or, Phōniciā. The Agareniāns, an Arabian nation, on obtaining possession of the island, erected a fort to secure their conquest, which they called Khandak, i. e. an entrenchment. The adjoining town was built afterwards, and known by the same name. It occupies the site of Hērāclēum. The Venetians, for convenience of pronunciation, changed Khandak into Candia. For many years past, Candia has been the capital of this island, to which it has given its name. Antiqua Crēta, ancient Candia; from its being early inhabited, i. e. in very ancient times (Juv. Sat. xiv. 270). Inh. Crētēnses, ium (Sing. Crētēnsis, is), m. Crēs, ētis, m. et, Crēssa, æ, f. a native of Crēta, Candia. Cres puer, the Minotaur (Claud. liv. 11). Crētis, idis, f. of Crēta, Candia, with relation to a female or noun feminine. Crētes nympha (Ov. Fast. iii. 443). Adj. Crētaeus, Crēticus, Crēsius, Crēsus, a, um, et, Crētensis, is, e. Crētaea Ida (Claud. xxiv. 251). Crēticum bellum, the Cretan war, originated solely, says Florus, in a desire of conquering that celebrated island, and was terminated by Q. Cæcilius Mētellus, 61 B. C., for which he received the surname of Crēticus (Eutrop. vi. 11). Crēticum Mārē, the Cretan Sea, i. e. that part of the Mediterranean which washed the shore of Crēta, Candia (Hor. Od. i. 26. 2). Crēssia nemōra (Virg. Æn. iv. 70). Crēssa nota, the Cretan mark, i. e. a white mark. The ancients used to mark their lucky days with white, generally chalk, and, as the soil of that island was remarkably chalky, Crēssa nota signified the mark of a fortunate day (Hor. Od. i. 36. 10). Crēssa herbae, medicinal herbs, from an opinion that many herbs, possessing healing virtues, grow in that island.

Crētēus, ēos, m. a very valiant Greek, whom Tūrnus killed (Virg. Æn. xii. 538).

Crēthēus, ēos, m. a Trojan, a favourite of the muses, killed by Tūrnus. He excelled in playing on the harp (Virg. Æn. ix. 774).—2. A son of Æōlus by Enarētē, whom Apollōdōrus makes the father of Æson, by Pōlymēdē, daughter of Autōlōyus. He married Tūro, daughter of his brother Sālmonēus (Hom. Od. xi. 236 seq.). Crēthēides, ie, m. Iāson (Val. Flacc. vi. 609). Adj. Crēthēus, a, um. Crēthēia virgo, Hēllē (Val. Flacc. ii. 612).—3. A man who fought in the Theban war, and fell by the hand of Hippōmēdon. Stātiūs calls him Contemptor profundī, a despoiler of the sea, i. e. a fearless sailor (Th. ix. 307).

Crēthon, ōnis, m. a noble Greek, son of Diōcles, killed by Ænēas (Hom. Il. v. 542). He was a brave man, brother of Orsilōchus q. v.

Crētīcus, i, m. See Crītīcus.

Crētīcus Silānus, Crētīci Silāni, m. a governor of Sūria, who acted treacherously to Vonōnes I., son of Phrāates IV. For having promised his daughter in marriage to Nēro, the eldest son of Germānicus, the emperor Tiberius recalled him, in the year 17. According to some authors, his name was M. Jūnius Silānus (Tac. Ann. ii. 4: ii. 43).

Crēūsa, ae, f. a daughter of Prīlāmus, and wife of Ænēas q. v., by whom she had one son, Ascānius. In the night during which Troy was burned by the Greeks, she separated from her husband as he withdrew from the city, carrying his father on his shoulders, and leading his son in his hand, nor could his most diligent and resolute search through the blazing city find her. Virgilius leaves her fate uncertain, but makes her shade appear to Ænēas, and relate his future adventures, as well as his final settlement in Italy (Æn. ii. 772 seq.).—2. Sometimes called Glaucē, a daughter of Crēon, king of Cōrinthus, Cōrinth, whom Iāson married after he had divorced Mēdēa; hence Ovidius calls her Ephīgraea Crēūsa (Art. Am. i. 335). According to one account, Mēdēa, in revenge, set the palace on fire, by which both Crēūsa and her father were burned to death, and, according to another, the sons of Mēdēa brought some presents to Crēūsa tinged with noxious drugs, which being applied to her person, set her on fire, and her father going to her assistance was also reduced to ashes, because the fire was of that kind which water could not extinguish (Hyg. 25. Diod. Sic. iv. 54). Stātiūs calls her Ædōia Crēūsa, to distinguish her from the daughter of Prīlāmus (Syl. ii. 1. 142).—3. The mother of Hūpseus, king of the Lāpithae, by Pēnēus, the Salmopria (Ov. Amor. iii. 6. 31).—4. Daughter of Erēchthēus, king of Athens, who had a son by Apōllo, who was brought up at Dēlphi, and afterwards adopted by his maternal grandfather (Aurel. Vic. Or. 2).

Crēūsa, w, f. Livudostro, a town of Bēōtia (Liv. xlii. 56).—2. The port of the Thēspīenses, at the bottom of Sinus Cōrinthiācus (Liv. xxxvi. 21).

Crēuthungi. See Gruthungi.

Crīmisus, v. Crīnisus, i, m. the Belici, or, Bractalomeo, or, Caltabellotta (the moderns are divided about this river), a river of Sicily, which joins Hūpsa, and their united streams run into that part of the Mediterranean anciently called Libyæum Mārē (Virg. Æn. v. 38). On the banks of this river Tīmōlēon gained a remarkable victory over a very numerous Carthaginian army, about 345 B. C., which proved the deliverance of Sicily (Cor. Nep. Timol. 2).

Crīspina, ae, f. daughter of T. Vinicius q. v. (Tac. Hist. i. 47).

Crīspinus, i, m. a Stoic philosopher, and voluminous writer, at whom Hōrātius sneers, and whom he represents as challenging him to try which can write fastest, a talent which Hōrātius despises, preferring writing well to writing either fast or much (Sat. i. 1. 120 seq.).—2. A friend of the poet Stātiūs, to whom he addressed Syl. v. 2, advising him to imitate the virtues of his father, supposed to have been Vettius Bōlānus, and presages his future eminence as a soldier.—3. A slave from Cāpōpus, a great favourite with the emperor Dōmītiānus, who rose to the dignity and rank of a knight. Jūvénālis has described him as a man of great wealth, excessive luxury, and numerous vices (Sat. i. 26 seq.). Mārtiālis requests Crīspinus to commend his book to the emperor Dōmītiānus (vii. 98). Perhaps the poet wrote ironically, an idea in some degree confirmed by viii. 48.

Crīspus, i, m. a glutton, mentioned by Mārtiālis (v. 33).—2. An insincere friend (Mart. x. 14).

Crīspus Pūssīcēus, Crīspi Pūssīcēni, m. the stepfather of the emperor Nēro, a man of prodigious wealth, which he bequeathed to his stepson (Suet. Ner. 6). Mārtiālis introduces his name as conveying the idea of the greatest riches. Equestrian statues appear to have been erected in honour of this man, at which the poet sneers (iv. 54: x. 2).

C. Crīspus Sāllūstius, C. Crīspi Sāllūstii, m. was born at Amīlternum, Amiterno, a town of the Sābini, about 184 years B. C. The family of the Sāllūstii appears to have been only Plebeian, and Sāllūstius the first of the name who attained either rank or celebrity. The mind of Sāllūstius was early turned to literary pursuits, and under the celebrated philologist Ateius Prætextātus, he is said to have made uncommon progress in his studies. At what age ambition seduced him from the path of science and of virtue, no certain account has been transmitted. Very few particulars respecting his juvenile habits are known, and still fewer are worthy of being recorded. He lived in an age when licentiousness and corruption had arrived at the highest pitch, and he seems to have plunged headlong into the vices which undermined the constitution, and destroyed the liberties of the Romans. At the age of thirty-two, Sallustius was appointed a tribune of the people. According to some, Cato was his rival at that election, and, according to others, when he was made prætor. To his success over that stern patriot, which was a disgrace to the Roman state, he alludes with considerable vanity, in the Introduction to the Jugurthine War. Availing himself of every advantage afforded by his office, he was active in procuring sentence of banishment against Milo. The murder of Clodius, with whom Sallustius lived in the closest intimacy, was the ostensible ground of his violent hatred; but his disgraceful exposure and punishment in the chamber of Fausta, was the real cause why he wished her husband executed or banished. His enmity to Cicero, which originated, perhaps, in opposite political and moral principles, he exerted so vigorously, after that great man had crushed the conspiracy of Catilina, that timidly yielding to the clamour of his persecutors, he went into voluntary banishment. Licentious and corrupted as the Romans at that time were, the lewdness and depravity of Sallustius did not escape severe censure. He was (49 B. C.) degraded from the rank of a senator, and remained two years in ignominious retirement. But the interest of his patron, C. Julius Caesar, who at that time returned to Italy, after a series of brilliant victories, raised his mortified spirit, and kindled anew the flames of ambition. By the influence of that general he was made questor, which restored him to senatorial dignity. In 45 B. C., he was elected prætor, and about the same time married Terentia, the divorced wife of Cicero. Caesar appointed him one of his lieutenant-generals, and gave him the command of a considerable body of men, whom he was to march to the coast, and embark for Africa, to crush the Republicans under Cato and Scipio. Having formerly submitted to long and hard service abroad, they, on learning the place of their destination, mutinied; and Sallustius, after many promises and threats to no purpose, had to consult his safety by flight. The mutineers then marched back to Rome, and put all to death who came in their way, without regard to age or sex. Caesar went out alone to meet them, and in a short speech, in which he used the word Quirites instead of Milites, made them ashamed of their conduct, and beg his forgiveness. After Caesar had been some time in Africa, dreading a scarcity of provisions, he gave part of his fleet to Sallustius, to take possession of the island of Cérina, Kerkeni, to the north of Syrtis Minor, the Gulf of Kabes, where the enemy had a valuable magazine. There is no other important occurrence, either naval or military, in which Sallustius seems to have had a principal concern. That he conducted himself during the whole war to the satisfaction of his general, is unquestionable, from his being appointed governor of the province of Africa, extending from Libya to Mære Atlantæum, the Atlantic Ocean. In one year, so very rapacious and oppressive had his conduct been, he amassed a prodigious fortune, part of which he expended on the extravagant but beautiful gardens at Rome, which, to this day, bear his name. He died at the age of fifty-one, thirty-five years before the Christian era. Sallustius wrote detached parts of Roman history, which were greatly esteemed, and by many considered superior to the work of Livius. The merits of these two authors can scarcely be brought into fair comparison, since Livius wrote a complete history of Rome, and Sallustius selected only important and interesting portions, which gave him a decided advantage over the other who narrated the occurrences of every year with minuteness and fidelity. A sameness unavoidable in the latter wearied the reader, having little to arrest the attention, and less to inform the judgment, but still indispensable in continued history. Only a few fragments of the work of Sallustius now remain. His Catiline's Conspiracy and Jugurthine War, have been transmitted entire. They give sufficient proof, that his talents for historical composition were of no ordinary kind. A sententious brevity, which has been greatly and deservedly admired, distinguishes the writings of Sallustius. His style is perspicuous, animated, and forcible; his descriptions lively, picturesque, and beautiful; and his speeches energetic, appropriate, and persuasive. When he pursues his narration, he does it in a very clear, pleasant, and instructive manner. But he is apt to run into digressions which have little connexion with his subject, apparently with no other view than that of showing the extent of his information, or the superiority of his abilities. It is not to be denied, that many of them are both entertaining and instructive, but they break the thread of the narration, and betray the self-importance of the writer. His Prefaces to the Conspiracy of Catiline and Jugurthine War, are, instead of pertinent introductions to these histories, compliments paid by the author to his own character and pursuits. They contain many excellent sentiments, as well as bitter invectives against corrupt government, which did not probably proceed from the heart, since they are contradicted by the habits of his life. In his commendation of virtue, and in his censure of vice, it is impossible not to charge him with hypocrisy, when we reflect on the gross immoralities of his own life, and that he most probably composed these very works, where he could not turn his eye, but every object reminded him of the crimes which he had committed against the unhappy natives of Africa. To the charge of partiality, Sallustius must plead guilty. Than his character of Caesar, and treatment of Cicero, nothing can be more unjust. In his comparison of Cato and Caesar, the principal point of difference between them is carefully concealed, in consequence of his obligations to the latter. Cato laboured through his whole life to reform and aggrandize, Caesar to corrupt and destroy, the commonwealth. Livius held truth sacred; but Sallustius concealed or disguised it, accordingly as he judged better suited to the prejudices of party, or the malignity of personal hatred. That genius and virtue are seldom united has been often observed; and the life of Sallustius justifies the remark. The powers of his mind cannot be contemplated without admiration, nor the depravity of his heart without contempt. His splendid talents, far from diminishing, aggravate his vices. Nothing sinks the nature of man so low, as the hateful mixture of transcendent abilities, and consummate profligacy. Yet, such was the life of this eminent author, whose writings have immortalized his name. The excellencies of the historian may indeed be studied with advantage, and copied with safety; but the character of the man neither claims respect, nor merits imitation. It must not be concealed, that his contemporaries blamed the elaborateness of his style, love of ancient words and spelling, at which Augustus sneers (Suet. Aug. 86), affixing new meanings to the vocables in common use, and other instances of affectation, in which they alleged he indicated a greater attention to fineness of expression than to accuracy of fact (Gel. iv. 15 §c.). Brēvis Sällūstius, Sällūstius distinguished by the conciseness of his style (Stat. Syl. iv. 7. 55). Mārtiālis bears honourable testimony to the merits of this historian:—"This Crispus will be the first in Roman history, according to the judgment of the learned" (Mart. xiv. 191).—2. Grandson of the sister of the historian, who assumed his name, and was created a knight by the emperor Augustus. To him Hörātius addresses one of his odes (Od. ii. 2). Adj. Sällūstianus, a, um. Sällūstiani horti (Tac. Ann. xiii. 47).

Crissa, æ, f. Crisso, a town at the Isthmus of Corinth. Adj. Crisseus, a, um. Crisseus sinus, the Bay of Corinth.

Crista, æ, m. a Roman, who, with six sons, fought in the battle of Cannæ. He was a native of Tüder, and a man of great bravery. Silius Italicus makes him fall by the hand of Hannibal (x. 93—121).

Crithēis, Ides, f. daughter of Mēlanōpus, and mother of Hōmērus before she was married. She afterwards became the wife of Phēmūs. Her history and pedigree are very different in different authors.

Crithōtē, es, f. Crithiskeni, a town in Chērsonēsus Thrācia, the Peninsula of Gallipoli, on the coast of Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, and vicinity of Callipolis, Gallipoli (Plin. i. 444). Timōthēus received this town and Sestos from Ariobarzānes, for the Athenians. In some editions of Cōrnēlius Nēpos this town is called Erētho (Timoth. 1).

Crītiās, æ, m. son of the Lacedæmonian commander Xānthippus, and Bārē, an African. In the first engagement between the Romans and Carthaginians in Italy, Crītiās and Virbius fell by mutual wounds (Sil. Ital. iv. 383—395).—2. One of the thirty tyrants whom the Lacedæmonians appointed to the government of Athens. He possessed considerable powers of eloquence, and the Roman orator informs us, that some of his writings were extant when he composed his treatise "de oratore." Cicero commends his learning, but not his morals (de orat. iii. 34). Thērāmēnes suffered death by order of Crītiās (Cic. Tusc. i. 40). From Cōrnēlius Nēpos he appears to have been at the head of these tyrants, and he fell in battle fighting with great bravery against Thrāsībūlus (Cor. Nep. Thras. 2).

Crīticus, v. Crētīcus, i, m. a friend of Mārtiālis, to whom he vindicates his writings against the opinion of Mātho (vii. 89).

Crīto Bēræus, Crītōnis Bēræei, m. an ambassador, whom Phīlīppus, king of Mācēdōnia, sent along with Hērāclitus Scotinus, and Sōsithēus Māgnus, to Hannibal, in Italy, after the battle at Cannæ. The former ambassadors were taken by the Romans (Liv. xxiii. 38, 39).

Crītōbūlus, i, m. a physician, whom Alexander the Great carried with him to India. Plīnius considers him a descendant of Esculāpius (Curt. ix. 5). Arriānus calls him Crītōdēmus.

Crītōgnātus, i, m. a nobleman of the first rank among the Arvērui. Caesar has recorded his horrible speech to the inhabitants of Alēsia, Alise, at the time it was besieged by the Romans. To his inhuman proposal the soldiers seem to have conditionally agreed (Caes. B. G. vii. 77).

Crītōlāus, i, m. a commander of the Achæi, who was defeated at Thērōpūlay, Therma, by Q. Cæcilius Mētēlus, on which he poisoned himself, in 148 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 52. Flor. ii. 16).

Crītōn, ōnis, m. a man, skilled in medicine (Mart. xi. 61).

Crīumētōpon, i, n. Cape Aya, the southern part of Chērsonēsus Taurica, the Crimea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).—2. Cape Crīo, a promontory in the western extremity of Crēta, Candia.

Crixus, i, m. a gladiator, who was born in Gallia, France. He and Spārtacus having escaped from the school of C. Lentulus Bātina, commanded the slaves in Bellum servile. They attacked and defeated Appius Claudius Pulcher, prætor; but Crixus was afterwards overpowered and killed by Q. Arrius, prætor, in 73 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 95, 96). Eutrōpius, besides these two, mentions Enōmāus, as a leader in that memorable war (vi. 7. Flor. iii. 20).

Crōbiālus, i, f. a city of Paphlāgōnia (Val. Flacc. v. 103).

Crōcālē, es, f. one of Diana's attendants, a daughter of Ismēnus; hence, Ismēnis Crōcālē (Ov. Met. iii. 169).

Crōcos, i, m. a youth, changed into a flower, at the same time with Smīlax, the nymph whom he loved (Ov. Met. iv. 283).

Cresmus, i, m. a man, in the Trojan army, killed by Mēges (Hom. Il. xv. 523).

Crossus, i, m. son of Alŷattes and a woman of Cāria, the last king of Iŷdia, experienced the extremities of fortune. By the conquest of many neighbouring nations, he accumulated enormous wealth and extensive dominions. The learned thronged to his court, which affords convincing proof of the turn of his mind, not to empty pageantry but useful knowledge. History has transmitted a conversation between the monarch and Sōlon of Athens, one of whose observations, founded on deep knowledge of human nature, although not much praised by Crossus at the time when he heard it, was afterwards the means of saving him from a horrible death. In the midst of his great wealth, he rendered himself miserable by anxiety respecting a dream, in which he saw his son Atys killed by a spear. The grief which followed the premature death of Atys, sunk Crossus into a stupor for some years, and would probably have continued till the end of life had not the safety of his dominions roused him to activity. Cŷrus, king of Pērsia, invaded his territories, defeated him in battle, stormed and carried his capital, Sārdes, to which he had retired. When a Persian soldier was about to kill Crœsus, his only surviving son, till that period dumb, exclaimed, "Soldier, do not put Crœsus to death." This miracle saved him from instant destruction, but reserved him, as it would appear, for greater misery. Cŷrus not only loaded him with chains, but ordered him to be burned alive. To witness the execution of this horrible sentence, the Persian king stood by, when the near prospect of death emboldened the Lydian monarch to speak without fear, and, recollecting the saying of Sōlon, that "no man ought to be called happy before his death," he repeated it aloud, which Cŷrus wished to know. A bystander having translated to him, he ordered the pile to be extinguished, and ever after treated the fallen monarch with kindness. Crœsus survived Cŷrus, but neither the time nor manner of his death is known (Just. i. 7).

Crōnna, æ, f. a city of Pāphlāgōnia, which was afterwards called Amāstris (Val. Flacc. v. 106).—2. A city of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morææ, built by Crōnnus, a son of Iŷcāon, whence the name. The latter is either masculine or feminine, and used both in the singular and plural numbers.

Crōmŷon, ōnis, f. Kasidi, a village near Corinth, where a sow, of prodigious size and ferocity, not only desolated the lands, but also tore in pieces the inhabitants. Thēseūs killed this animal; hence Ovidius, colonus accūsus suis arat Crōmŷōna, the swain regardless of the sow, tills Crōmŷon (Ov. Met. vii. 435).—2. Cape Cornachitti, a promontory of Cŷprus, on the northwest of that island.

Crōnus, v. Crōnŷus, i, m. a man, mentioned by Mārtialis (vii. 86).—2. Homer's name of Saturn (Il. v. 721).

Crossæa regio, a district of Mācēdōnia (Herod. vii. 123).

Crōto, v. Crōton, ōnis, et, Crōtōna, æ, f. Cotrone, or, Crotone, a large city of the Brutians, founded by a Grecian colony (959 B. C.), the walls of which are stated to have been twelve miles in circumference. According to Ovidius, Mŷscēlos built it on the tomb of Crōton, who had entertained Hēracles, and to whom that hero had foretold that a town would be built over his ashes and bear his name (Met. xv. 15 seq.). Diōnŷsius, king of Sicily, Sicily, carried it by storm, but not before he had invested it both by land and sea. Pŷthāgōras established his school there, and is said, by his doctrine and example, to have greatly reformed the dissolute manners of the people, among whom he lived twenty years (Just. xx. 4). Alta Crōton (Sil. Ital. xi. 18). Inh. Crōtōnīātæ, arum (Sing. Crōtōnīātes, æ), et, Crōtōnīēnses, ium (Sing. Crōtōnīēnsis, is), m. the Crotonians (Sal. Cat. 44), in ancient times were reckoned the first physicians, and the Cyrenians held the next rank (Herod. iii. 131). Adj. Crōtōnīēnsis, is, e. Crōtōnīēnsis ager (Liv. xxix. 36).

Crōtōpus, i, m. a king of the Argives, and father of Pāmāthē, the mother of Linus, by Apōllo. Crōtōpiādes, æ, m. a patronymic of Linus, from his grandfather Crōtōpus (Ov. Ib. 489).

Crōtus, i, m. a minstrel, or musician, who played on the harp or flute (Mart. vi. 39).

Crūptōrix, icis, m. a German chieftain, who once served in the Roman army (Tac. Ann. iv. 73).

Crūstūmērium, i, n. v. Crūstūmēria, æ, f. (Virgilius writes, Crūstūmēri), a town of the ancient Latins taken, and a colony sent thither, by Rōmulus. It must have revolted, since it was again taken by Tārquinius Priscus (Liv. i. 11, 38). Inh. Crūstūmīnī, orum (Sing. Crūstūmīnus, i), m. Adj. Crūstūmīnius, et, Crūstūmīnus, a, um. Crūstūmīnus ager, the territory of the Crūstūmīni (Plin. i. 322).

Crūstūmīum, i, n. a town, in the eighth district of Italy, to the south of Arimīnum, Rimini, on the banks of a cognominal river (Plin. i. 366). Adj. Crūstūmīus, a, um. Crūstūmia pŷra (Virg. G. ii. 88), which Columella reckoned the best sort of pears, and Plinius, the best flavoured (Plin. iii. 187).

Crūstūnīum, i, n. the Concha, a river of Italy, which takes its rise in the Apennines, runs eastward, and falls into Mārē Hādrīaticum, the Gulf of Venice. This stream forms the boundary between Arimīnum, Rimini, and Pisaurum, Pesaro. A cognominal town stood on its banks. Rapax Crūstūnīum (Luc. Phar. ii. 406).

Crŷxus, i, m. commander of the Boii, of huge size, who joined Hānnibal when that noble Carthaginian invaded Italy. He traced his descent from Brūnnus, king of the Gauls, and had delineated on his shield the victories of his ancestors over the Romans. Cōrnēlius Scipio, the Roman consul, engaged him in single combat at the foot of the Alps, and laid him dead at his feet, on which the Celtæ fled (Sil. Ital. iv. 148—293).

Ctēatus, i, m. the father of Amphimāchus (Hom. Il. xiii. 185).

Ctēsiphon, ōntis, f. El-Modain, a town on the east bank of Tigris, the Degila, founded, according to Ammianus Mārcellinus, by Vārdānes, and afterwards enlarged by Pācōrus, who gave it the name of Ctēsiphon. It stood three miles from Sēlēucia, Selephē, and was the capital of the kingdom. Plinius states, that it was first built by the Parthians (i. 713). Tācītus and Hērōdiānus call it the seat of empire (Tac. Ann. vi. 42). M. Ulpīus Trājānus Crīnītus, the Roman emperor, took this town about the year 114 (Eutrop. viii. 3).

Ctēsippus, i, m. a native of Sāmē, a man of great wealth, but rude and insolent. He was one of the suitors of Pēnelōpē, and was killed, when fighting bravely, by Philētus (Hom. Od. xx. 288—xxii. 285).

Ctēsŷus, i, m. a prince of the island Syrea, and father of Eumæus, the swineherd of Ulysses (Hom. Od. xv. 413 seq.).

Ctīmēnē, es, f. daughter of Lāertes, and sister of Ulysses. She was the youngest of the family (Hom. Od. xv. 362).

Cubāllum, i, n. a fort of Gallōgræcia, where the Roman army, when encamped, were attacked with great fury by the Gallōgræci, and some killed, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 18).

Cūmæ, arum, et, Cūmē, es, f. a town of Cāmpānia, said to have been built by the first Grecian colony which settled in Italy. They were from Chalcis, the chief city of Eubœa, landed first on the islands Ænaria and Pithecusæ, and afterwards took possession of part of the adjoining continent. It continued long the chief of the Grecian colonies in Italy, but declined in opulence and population after it fell under the power of the Romans, in consequence of their giving a just preference to Baie, Næpōlis, and Pātēōli. Tarquinius Sūpērbus died at Cūmæ, in 494 B. C. (Liv. ii. 21), and near it one of the Sibyls had her residence. Its site is now covered with trees, and forms part of an extensive forest; some of the pavement and ruins are still visible. The road between Baie and Cūmæ is, at one part, subterranean. The tunnel, about eighty feet in length, was made by Agrippa. Vacua Cūmæ, thinly-inhabited Cūmæ; Jūvēnālīs speaks in respect of the crowdedness of Rome (Sat. iii. 2). Chalcidica arx, the tower of Cūmæ, from Cūmæ having been built by a colony from Chalcis, hence Eubœica ora Cūmārum (Virg. Æn. vi. 2: vi. 17). Inh. Cūmāni, orum (Sing. Cūmānus, i), m. received the right of Roman citizenship, without the power of voting, in 337 B. C. The Cūmāni built and possessed Pālēpōlis and Næpōlis (Liv. viii. 14—22). They continued the faithful allies of Rome, after the battle of Cānnæ, and, at their own request, were allowed to use the Latin language publicly, and their auctioneers when selling goods, 181 B. C. (Liv. xl. 42). Adj. Cūmæus, et, Cūmānus, a, um, of Cūmæ; Sibylline. Cūmæa Sibylla, the Sibyl who resided near Cūmæ (Ov. Met. xv. 712). Ovidius calls her Cūmæa anus (Fast. iv. 158), and Silius Itālicus, Cūmæa anus (xiii. 494). Cūmæa dux, the Sibyl (Ov. Met. xiv. 121). Cūmæum cāmen, Sibylline prophecy; because most of the oracles were delivered in verse (Virg. B. iv. 4). Cūmānus Apollo (Flor. ii. 8).

Cunæa, orum, n. appears to have been near Felaja. Here Cŷrus was defeated and killed.

Cūnētes, um, v. Cūnēi, orum, m. a people of Portugal, who lived on the promontory Cūnēus, Cape St. Maria, which had this name from its resembling a wedge. Cūnēus also denoted the adjoining district, now the kingdom of Algarve (Just. xlv. 4).

Cūpāvo, ōnis, m. a Ligurian, an ally of Ænēas. He was the son or descendant of Cŷgnus, which is probably the reason why Virgilius makes his plume of swan feathers (Æn. x. 186).

Cūpēncus, i, m. a Rutulian, one of the soldiers of Turnus, whom Ænēas slew (Virg. Æn. xii. 539)—2. A Carthaginian, of hideous countenance, whom the Roman consul, Scipio, killed in the engagement at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 535).

Cuphites, ium, m. an Indian nation, whom Alexander the Great reached, and with whom his victories in the east terminated (Just. xii. 8). Cūrŷtus, Arriānus, and Diōdōrus, differ in their accounts from that of Jūstinus.

Cūpido, inis, m. Cupid, the god of love. There were two of this name; one, the son of Jūpiter and Vēnus, who presided over lawful love; the other, the son of Erēbus and Nox, who delighted in impurity. Cupid is represented as a naked boy, with wings (hence puer ales, Hor. Od. iii. 12. 4; puer volātilis, Ov. Amor. ii. 7. 27; and volveris, Ov. Ep. Pont. iii. 3. 65), armed with a bow and quiver full of arrows. To show his power, he is, at one time, seen riding on a lion or a dolphin, and, at another, breaking in pieces the thunderbolts of Jūpiter. His worship was nearly the same as that of his mother Vēnus. Adj. Cūpīdīnēus, a, um.

Cūpiēncius, i, m. a man, to whom Cicēro addresses an epistle, in which he solicits his influence in behalf of the inhabitants of Būthrōtum, Butrinto (Att. xvi. 16). Perhaps he is the person mentioned by Hōrātius, as a man of loose and vicious morals (Sat. i. 2. 36).

Cūpra, æ, v. Cūpræ, arum, f. a maritime town of Picēnum, a district of Itālia, Italy, hence littōrēa Cūpræ (Sil. Ital. viii. 432). Inh. Cūprēnses, ium, m. As Plinius adds to Cūprēnses, cognomine montāni (i. 362), perhaps there was also an inland town of that name, to which Ptolēmaeus refers.

Cūrallum, i, n. Coral, a substance produced under the sea, which continues soft as long as it remains under water, but becomes hard on being exposed to the air. Ovidius considers coral as a marine plant, which was at first petrified by the touch of Mēdūsa's head. The seanympis, he adds, spread the seeds thus produced over the ocean, and propagated the plant almost every where. This is merely a poetic fiction. Coral was long considered a vegetable substance; but there is now a strong probability, if not an absolute certainty, that it is the production of a particular kind of animal. Of the three varieties of Coral, red, white, and black, the last is seldome found, of course esteemed the most valuable.

P. Cūrātius, P. Cūrātī, m. a tribune of the people, who, with two of his colleagues, to avert the displeasure of the commons from themselves, accused Sērgius and Virgīnius, military tribunes of the former year, in 400 B. C. (Liv. v. 11).

Cūres, ium, f. Corese, or, Fescovie di Sabina (Cluv.), the principal city of the Sabines, although Virgilius calls it pŷrva, which perhaps he may use in comparison of Rome (Æn. vi. 812). Nūma Pōmptilius was a native of this city, in which he resided, when he was chosen king of Rome (Liv. i. 18). Arat Cūrībus, ploughs at Corese, i. e. land in the territory of Corese (Pers. Sat. iv. 26). What follows, in that poet, is a proverbial expression for an extensive landed estate. Inh. Cūrēnses, ium, m. which the Greeks wrote Cūrītes, changed by the Romans into Quīrites. Ovidius seems doubtful whether Quīrinus, the name of Rōmūlus, was derived from this town in consequence of the union of the Sabines with the Romans, or from the Sabine word Cūris, a spear (Fast. ii. 475 seq.). Adj. Cūrēnsis, is, e.

Cūrētes, um, m. the ministers of Cŷbēlē, whom Ovidius describes as different from the Cōrŷbāntes (Fast. iv. 210 seq.).—2. A people of Crēta, Candia, of which they were said to have been the most ancient inhabitants, and to have been born of showers (Ov. Met. iv. 282). Pausānias considers the Dac̄tŷli Idæi and the Cūrētes the same. He adds that they slept upon the leaves of the wild olive (v. 7). Cūrētis, idis, f. of Candia, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Cūrētis tērra, Candia (Ov. Met. viii. 153). Adj. Cūrēticus, a, um. Cūrētica tēcta (Sil. Ital. xv. 308).

Cūrētius, i, m. son of Urānūs, an astrologer. Against Cūrētius, Claudianus writes his 25th and 26th Epigrams, which, from the character they describe, and the sentiment they contain, ought never to have been either composed or published.

Cūrgōnī, orum, m. a people in the north of Spain (Flor. iv. 12).

Cūrīa, ae, f. one of the divisions or wards of Rome, of which there were thirty, formed by Rōmulus. Their number afterwards increased to thirty-five. According to Livius, they received their names from the virgins, whom the Romans forcibly took from the Sabines. In each of these wards was a place of worship, where, on certain days, sacrifices were offered, and other religious rites observed. The priest was from Cūrīa, called Cūrīo, and seems to have been chosen by the ward. The one who superintended, or had a jurisdiction over the rest, was called Māximus Cūrīo. It is manifest that the Cūrīae of Rōmulus were the prototypes of parishes in modern times. Cūrīae vetēres, in which the priests met on matters of religion (Liv. i. 13). Adj. Cūrīātus, a, um. Cūrīātā cōmītia, assemblies in which the people gave their votes by the wards, of which sixteen formed a majority. This was the original mode of assembling and voting at Rome. After the appointment of Cōmītia Centuriātā and Tribūtā, the Cōmītia Cūrīātā scarcely met, unless to pass particular laws, and to appoint the Cūrīo Māximus and the Flāminēs. Lex Cūrīātā, a law passed at the Cōmītia Cūrīātā.

Cūrīa Hōstīlia, the senatehouse at Rome, so called from being built by Tullus Hōstīlius (Liv. i. 29).

Cūrīātī, orum, m. three Albans, to whom Mētus Fūfētius entrusted the fortune of his country, when Alba and Rome contended for the superiority, about 669 B. C. — Dion. Hal. says, that the three brothers on each side were born on the same day. — 2. A patrician tribe or clan, originally of Alba. After the destruction of their city, they were admitted into the Roman senate (Liv. i. 30). Adj. Cūrīātus, a, um. Cūrīātā gens.

Cūrīātus, i, m. a Roman, who died at Tibur, Tivoli. On that event Mārtiālis wrote an epigram on the certainty of death, however healthy the place in which we live (iv. 60).

Cūrīātus Mātērnus, Cūrīātī Mātērnī, m. a Roman poet, who wrote a tragedy on the death of Cato. In the dialogue on oratory, ascribed to Tācītus, he makes a very conspicuous figure, and this scanty information is all which antiquity has transmitted respecting him (Tac. Orat. 2 seq.).

P. Cūrīātus, P. Cūrīātī, m. held the consulship with Sextus Quīntilius, in 453 B. C., and was afterwards appointed one of the first duumviri (Liv. ii. 32, 33).

Cūrīetē, arum, f. Veglia, an island in Mārē Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, opposite to Illyricum (Plin. i. 380). Inh. Cūrīetes, um, m. described as a warlike nation, by Lūcānus (Phar. iv. 406). Adj. Cūrīeticus, a, um. Cūrīeticum litus (Flor. iv. 2).

Curīus, i, m. a man, appointed by Augustus to the war against the Mārmāride and Gārūmāntes, whom he subdued, and might, says Flōrus, have returned with the surname of Mārmāricus, but his modesty prevented him from rating his victories so high (iv. 12).

Cūrīo, ōnis, m. the person who had the charge or government of a Cūrīa at Rome, in which he performed the public sacred rites. This appointment originated with Rōmulus, who divided the whole people into three tribes, each tribe into ten cūrīae, and every cūrīa had a temple. Cūrīo Māximus exercised a certain jurisdiction or authority over the other Cūrīōnes. The office of Cūrīo Māximus was enjoyed only by patricians, till 211 B. C., when C. Mamilius Vitulus, a plebeian, was elected. Like the other priest-hoods, it was held during life. Vitulus lived thirty-three years after his appointment, and died Cūrīo Māximus (Liv. xli. 21).

Cūrīo, ōnis, m. a Roman commander, drowned in Aufidus, the Ofanto, whilst attempting to stop the flight of the troops after the battle of Cannae (Sil. Ital. x. 209).

C. Cūrīo, C. Cūrīōnis, m. an orator, who pleaded for hire (Tac. Ann. xi. 7).

Cūrīōsōlites, um, m. a people of Gallia Cēltica, inter Armōricas Cīvitātes, whose country was afterwards called Bretagne (Cæs. B. G. ii. 84 seq.).

Cūrīus, et, Cūrīānus, a, um. Cūrīa gens, an illustrious Roman clan.

M'. Cūrīus, M'. Cūrīi, m. a tribune of the people, in 201 B. C., with M. Fulvius g. v. (Liv. xxxii. 7).

Mānius Cūrīus Dēntātus, Mānī Cūrīi Dēntātī, m. a noble Roman, who held the consulship with P. Cōrnēlius Rūfinus, in 292 B. C., triumphed first over the Sāmītes, then over the Sabines, and had the honour of an ovation over the Lūcāni. He drove Pyrrius out of Italy. Eutrōpius relates, that he triumphed over that monarch, leading four elephants in the procession, the first which had ever been seen in Rome (ii. 9—14). He afterwards divided the land which he had taken from the enemy, giving each soldier fourteen acres, and only retained the same quantity for himself, saying, "that with that quantity every man ought to be satisfied." On the ambassadors of the Sāmītes offering him money, when he was roasting rape root, he said, "he preferred having it in his earthen vessels, and commanding them who possessed money." When he was accused of retaining part of the spoils, he declared on oath, "that he had not brought to his own house, except a wooden cask, which he used in sacrifice." When tribune of the people, he compelled the senators to give their approbation at the cōmītia, when the plebeian magistrates were elected. He brought the water of Anīo, the Tevere, into Rome, by the spoils which he had taken from the enemy. For these good offices he had a house at Tifātā, and the state gave him five hundred acres of land (Aur. Vic. Vir. ii. 33). Hōrātius represents him as wearing his hair undressed, probably alluding to the manners of the period in which he lived, when the hardy Romans neglected personal elegance (Od. i. 12, 41). He may be considered a perfect model of bravery, frugality, and moderation, hence Jūvénālis, simulant Cūrīos, they counterfeit the Cūrīi, i. e. pretend they are as frugal as M'. Cūrīus Dēntātus (Sat. ii. 3). To him Claudianus alludes (viii. 412), and Mārtiālis (vi. 64).

Q. Cūrīus, Q. Cūrīi, m. a Roman of no mean extraction, who had been degraded from senatorian rank by the censors, in consequence of his crimes and infamy. He was one of the conspirators who, with L. Sērgius Cātīlina at their head, formed the design of overturning the government, and enriching themselves with the property of those whom they resolved to put to death. Audacity and vanity formed the most prominent features of his character. The latter induced him to discover whatever he knew, and even to boast of his own wickedness; whilst the former rendered him regardless of danger, consequently a fit associate for such a traitor as Cātīlina. Unrestrained by moral principle, Cūrius indulged his unlawful inclinations without reserve, and had formed a criminal connexion with Fūlvīa, a woman of high rank, who, on obtaining information from him of the conspiracy, communicated the danger which threatened the state and the lives of the citizens. A general alarm, excited by the discovery of the plot, pervaded the whole citizens of Rome, called forth the exertions of all who regarded either life, property, or the constitution of the state, and they selected a magistrate capable of thwarting that iniquitous design. The community placed the highest confidence in the activity, energy, and mental capacity of M. Tūllius Cicēro, and elected him consul, as the fittest person to hold the highest magistracy at that dangerous conjuncture. By his ingenuity he prevailed on Cūrius to discover every movement and measure of Cātīlina, and thus baffled every effort of the traitor. The evidence of Cūrius contributed to establish the guilt of some of the conspirators, and enabled Cicēro to adopt measures which clearly convicted others (Sal. Cat. 17-23). In return for the information which he communicated and by which the state was preserved, rewards were voted him from the public funds; but C. Jūlius Cēsar, whom Cūrius named amongst the conspirators, in revenge for that impeachment, exerted himself against the fulfilment of the public promise, and the rewards were not given (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 17).

Cūrtīllus Māncīa, Cūrtīllī Māncīe, m. the commander-in-chief on the upper Rhine, in the year 58 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 56).

Cūrtīllus, i. m. a noted epicure, who spent his time in inventing delicacies in eating and drinking. Hōrātius has mentioned one of his improvements in the cooking of crawfish, which he does to hold up to ridicule both the character of Cūrtīllus and that of Nāsīdīēnus (Sat. ii. 8. 52).

T. Cūrtīsius, T. Cūrtīsī, m. a man, who had formerly been a soldier in the praetorian bands, who excited commotions ready to break forth in a servile war, had his schemes not been fortunately discovered, when ripe for execution (Tac. Ann. iv. 27).

Cūrtius Attīcus, Cūrtī Attīci, m. a Roman knight, and one of the three who attended the emperor Tiberīus, when he quitted Rome and retired to Cāprēe, Capri, in the year 26. Sejānus, by the assistance of Jūlius Mārīnus, afterwards accomplished his ruin (Tac. Ann. iv. 58: vi. 10). To him Ovīdīus addresses an epistle (Pont. ii. 7).

Cūrtius Lūpus, Cūrtī Lūpi, m. a quaestor, who crushed a conspiracy at Brīndīsī, in the year 24 (Tac. Ann. iv. 27).

Cūrtius Mōntānus, Cūrtī Mōntāni, m. a glutton, who was very corpulent, fat, and unwieldy; hence Jūvēnālīs sarcastically says that the belly of Mōntānus is present, as if the belly were the most important part of him (Sat. iv. 107).—2. Accused of writing seditious verses against the emperor Nēro, in the year 67. His poetry gave proof of genius, not of malice, and, through his father, he obtained a pardon, but was declared incapable of holding any public office. Some suppose him to be the person ridiculed by Jūvēnālīs, which appears improbable, since Tacītus describes him as a youth of virtuous character (Ann. xvi. 28-33).

Cūrtius Nicīas, Cūrtī Nicīae, m. an adherent of Cn. Pōmpēius, whose favour he lost, by carrying to his wife books of C. Memmīus, "De Stupro." He lived in terms of intimacy with Cicēro the orator, who had a high opinion of his merits, as appears from his letters (Att. vii. 3 seq.).

Cūrtius Rūfus, Cūrtī Rūfi, m. an officer to whom the emperor Claudīus granted triumphal honours, not for his military achievements, but for his discovery of a silver mine in the country of the Mātīāci, which yielded only a small quantity of that precious metal, and was soon exhausted. From Tacītus he appears to have been well skilled in the mean art of servile adulation, fawned upon his superiors, treated his equals with rudeness, and his inferiors with arrogance. Tiberīus, whose favours raised him to dignity, prefixed to Rūfus, which was his original name, Cūrtius, on purpose to conceal the meanness of his extraction (Tac. Ann. xi. 20, 21).

Cūrtius Sēvērus, Cūrtī Sēvēri, m. an officer in the Roman army, sent to the relief of Anēmūriūm, in the year 52 (Tac. Ann. xii. 55).

C. Cūrtius Phīlo, C. Cūrtī Phīlōnis, m. held the office of consul with M. Gēnūcius Augūrinus, in 445 B. C. During that year the law permitting patricians and plebeians to intermarry was passed.

M. Cūrtius, M. Cūrtī, m. a Roman youth of great military fame, who, being dressed in a complete suit of armour, and mounted on a horse most splendidly accoutred, after devoting himself, plunged into an immense opening which an earthquake, or some other violent cause had made in the Fōrum, and to which the soothsayers had declared the principal strength of the Romans must be sacrificed, in 361 B. C. (Liv. vii. 6). Adj. Cūrtius, a. um. Cūrtius lūcus, had its name from M. Cūrtius, more probably than from Mettus Cūrtius, the soldier of Titus Tātius. The matter is doubtful. Līvius seems rather to be of that opinion, although he considers the tradition as a fiction. Near this lake the emperor Gālba breathed his last (Tac. Hist. ii. 55). At the time Ovīdīus wrote his Fasti, it was dry land (vi. 403).

Mētus Cūrtius (v. Cūrtius Mētus), Mētī Cūrtī, m. a Sabine of great bravery, who signalized himself in an engagement with the Romans, whom he drove back in disorder, and while he was vaunting of his success, Rōmūlus attacked and repulsed him, on which his horse took fright, and plunged into a lake, in which he had nearly lost his life; but the affection manifested to him by his countrymen inspired him with fresh courage, and, by powerful exertion, he effected his escape. Adj. Cūrtius, a. um. Cūrtius lūcus, the dry ground which Mētus first reached. It was afterwards in the middle of Forum Rōmānum (Liv. i. 13).

Q. Cūrtius Rūfus, Q. Cūrti Rūfi, m. a rhetorician, whose name, according to the Scholia, merely occurs in the epilogue of that class of men (Juv. Sat. vii. 213).

Curūbis, v. Curōbis, is, f. a town of Africa Propria, between Cyp̄ea and Neāpōlis. Libera Curūbis (Plin. i. 534). Adj. Curūbitānus, a, um.

Cusibi, is, n. a town of the Oretāni, in Hispania Tarracōnēsis, taken by M. Fulvius Nobilior, proconsul, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 22).

Cūsus, i, m. the Waag, a river of Hungary, and one of the branches of the Danube (Tac. Ann. ii. 63). This stream is not far distant from Marus q. v.

Cūtilla, arum, f. Paterno, a town of the Sabines near a lake, now Lago di Contigliano, which had a floating island, which Sēneca says he saw (N. Q. iii. 25). Hannibal, in his march towards Rome, passed through this town (Liv. xxvi. 11). Here the emperor Vespāsianus died. Inh. Cūtillēnses, ium, m. Adj. Cūtillus, a, um, et. Cūtillēnsis, is, e. Cūtilla aqua, v. Cūtillā aqua, et. Lacus Cūtillēnsis (Plin.).

Cūtina, ae, f. a town of the Vestini, taken by the Romans, in 324 B. C. (Liv. viii. 29).

Cyānē, es, f. a very celebrated Sicilian nymph, and, according to Claudianus, one of Prōserpina's attendants, who endeavoured to prevent Pluto from carrying off Prōserpina, on which account he changed her into a fountain of the same name, which runs into Anāpus, a river of Sicily. From Ovid's description, Cyānē appears to have been a lake of considerable extent; which Pluto violated by forcing through it his passage to the Infernal Regions. The goddess, from grief, dissolved into water (Ov. Met. v. 409 seq. Claud. xxxv. 61 seq.).—2. A woman who kept a tavern, or was a servant in a tavern (Juv. Sat. viii. 162).

Cyānē, es, f. a ship belonging to the Carthaginians, burned in the engagement off Sicily, between them and the Romans, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 567).

Cyānē, arum, f. two small rocks at the entrance into Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, called also Symplēgades q. v. They are each joined to the main land by a kind of isthmus, and appear islands when this is inundated, which always happens in stormy weather. These rocks appear to have been more or less modified by fire, and to have been cemented during the boiling of a volcano. An altar of white marble, long known by the name of Pompey's pillar, stands on the one which is on the European side of the strait. To ascertain how it came to be so called is impossible, and to conjecture is useless (Juv. Sat. xv. 20). Adj. Cyānēus, a, um. Cyānēa cautes (Luc. Phar. ii. 716). Cyānēa cūda (Stat. Th. v. 347). That poet in another place calls them mountains, Cyānēi montes (Th. xi. 438). Cyānēa rūna, i. e. naufragie Cyānēe (Mart. vii. 18).

Cyānēē, es, f. the wife of Milētus, by whom she had Camus and Bylis (Ov. Met. ix. 451).

Cyatides, is, m. the citadel of Sāmē, one of the four towns of Cēphallēnia (Liv. xxxviii. 29).

Cyāxāres, is, m. son of Phāortes, and grandson of Dēiōces, king of Mēdia, improved the military tactics of his subjects, engaged in different wars, and succeeded in conquering the Assyrians (Herod. i. 73 seq.).

Cȳbēlē, es, f. a servant maid, a native of Africa, of whose form, appearance, and colour Virgil gives a most correct description (Mo. 31 seq.).

Cȳbēlē, v. Cȳbēbē, es, f. the mother of the gods, represented as a virgin sitting in a chariot, clothed with precious stones, and a variety of different metals. On her head she had a mural crown, hence Prōpērtius, vērticē tūrrigēro (iii. 17. 35). She is the same with Vēsta and Ignis, according to Isidōrus, and Ovidius says that Vēsta means a burning flame (Fast. vi. 291). She is often considered the same with Rhēa and Ops, which was probably the opinion of Ovidius, as may be inferred from different parts of the Fāsti. Her chariot was drawn by lions which, from H̄gynus, appear to have been Hippōmānes and his wife Atā-lānta. This goddess was, with the permission of Attālus, king of Asia, brought to Rome with great solemnity, in 206 B. C., and games appointed in honour of her, called Megalesia. This mother of the gods was merely a stone, of which the ancients have left us no account either of its form, size, or quality. Idaea, Bērēcynthia, Pēssinuntia, and Phr̄ygia, mater, Cȳbēlē, from Ida and Bērēcynthus, mountains, and Pēssinūs, a town of Phr̄ygia, where she was worshipped. Tūrpia Cȳbēlē, filthy Cȳbēlē, alluding to the abominable conversation and conduct of her priests (Juv. Sat. ii. 111). Adj. Cȳbēlēus, a, um. Cȳbēlēus Attis, Attis beloved by Cȳbēlē, and who was represented as placed in a chariot near her (Ov. Met. x. 104). Cȳbēlēia frēna, the reins with which Cȳbēlē directed the lions which drew her chariot. (Ov. Met. x. 704).

Cȳbēlē, es, f. a mountain in Phr̄ygia, on which Cȳbēlē was worshipped (Ov. Fast. iv. 363).

Cȳblōsactes, a, m. a king of Egypt, sordidly covetous, on which account the name was given to Vespāsianus (Suet. Vesp. 19).

Cȳclādes, um, acc. as (Sing. Cȳclns, adis), f. a number of islands in Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, which had that name from being in the form of a circle (Ces. B. C. iii. 3).

Cȳclādas, v. Cȳclādes, a, m. a leading man amongst the Achæi, and in the command of the army succeeded Philōpōmen, to whom he was greatly inferior as a soldier, and also as a patriot. He was at the head of the faction in the interest of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, to whom he fled on being banished, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 31—xxxii. 32).

Cȳclops, ōpis, Plu. Cȳclōpes, um, m. the Cyclops, were three in number, Hārpes, Brōntes, and Stērōpes, who had only one eye, of a circular form, in the middle of their forehead, from which their name is derived. They were the workmen of Vūlcānus, and had their forge in Mount Ætna, where their chief employment appears to have been making thunderbolts for Jūpiter, which Ovidius calls tela (Met. i. 259). Apōllo killed them all, because they had forged the thunderbolts with which Jūpiter put his son Æscūlāpius to death. Hōmērus, Theocrītus, and Jūstinus consider them as the first inhabitants of Sicily (hence the island is called arva Cyclopæa), and describes them as cannibals, or men-eaters. Ovidius seems to have formed the same opinion of their character; referre ritus Cyclopum, to revive the manners of the Cyclops, i. e. the practice of eating human flesh (Ov. Met. xv. 93). Virgilius speaks of an hundred Cyclops, inhabitants of Sicily, although he only names three of the workmen of Vulcānus; hence it appears that he does not differ in opinion from Hōmērus and Hēsiodus, nor does his description of them differ from that of Ovidius. See Vulcānus. Adj. Cyclopæus, a, um. Cyclopæa saxa, Scogli di Ciclop, seven rocks lying nearly in a straight line from north to south, and about half a mile from the shore of Sicily. Three of them rise to the height of nearly a hundred feet above the surface of the sea, in a pyramidal shape, the rest lower.

Cyēnus, i, m. the son of Sthēnēlus, was king of Ligūria, a country of Italy, in Gallia Cisalpina, who, for lamenting the death of Phāethon, his relation and friend, was turned into a swan. Sthēnēlia proles, Cyēnus (Ov. Met. ii. 367). Adj. Cyēneus, v. Cyēneus, et, Cyēneus, a, um. Cyēnae spēcula (Catul. lxvii. 32).—2. A son of Aurōra, whom Achilles slew at Troy (Pin. Od. ii. 147).—3. A son of Mars, killed by Hērēclēs (Pin. Isth. v. 49).

Cyda, æ, m. See Cida.

Cydas, āntis, m. commander of the five hundred Gōrtyñli, given by Nābis, tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, to T. Quinctius Flāminius, against Philippos, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 8). Pōlybius writes Cydas, æ.—2. A Cretan, an intimate friend of Eumēnes, king of Asia, who, with Antimachus, is said to have carried proposals of friendship between Eumēnes and Pērseus, king of Mācedōnia (Liv. xlv. 18—24).

Cydimos, i, m. a Lemnian, killed in the general slaughter of the men of that island, by his sister Lēcāstē (Stat. Th. v. 227).

Cydippē, es, f. one of the attendants of Cýrēnē (Virg. G. iv. 339).—2. A beautiful girl, to whom Acōntius conceived a violent attachment, whose loves Ovidius has celebrated (Ep. Her. xx: xxi).

Cydnō, ūs, f. a favourite of the poetess Sapphō (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 17).

Cydnus, i, m. a man who commanded the Asturians, appears to have lived on the Pyrenees, and was killed by Lychæus (Sil. Ital. iii. 338 seq.).

Cýdnus, i, m. the Kara-sou, or, the Tarsous, a river of Cilicia, which rises in Taurus, and runs through the town of Tarsus, not far from the place where it falls into the Mediterranean Sea. Q. Cúrtius mentions, that Alexander the Great, when covered with sweat and dust, leaped into this river, on which he was seized with a numbness, and his limbs became rigid, on which his servants carried him to his tent senseless, and almost dead. This accident had nearly proved fatal to his military success and life (iii. 5 seq.).—2. A river of Assyria, one of the branches of Tigris, the Dejilah (Just. xi. 14). Some authors call this river Lēcus (Curt. iv. 9).

Cýdon, ōnis, m. son of Phōrcus, an admirer of Clýtius, whom Ænēas slew (Virg. Æn. x. 325).—2. A Lemnian youth killed at the time that the women of that island rose against the men (Stat. Th. v. 220).—3. A Theban killed by Týdēus, from his having been one of the fifty who waylaid that hero to deprive him of life (Stat. Th. ii. 623).—4. A native of Phōcis, killed in the Theban war by Hippómēdon (Stat. Th. ix. 127).—5. A son of Abas and brother of Argus, killed in the Theban war by Pārthēnōpæus. Perhaps the poet simply meant that he was a Eubœan. He had an improper attachment to his sister, and Státius, with strict regard to poetical justice, makes him receive the mortal wound in the part with which he had transgressed (Stat. Th. ix. 759).

Cýdon, ōnis, v. Cýdōnēa, et, Cýdōnēa, æ, f. Canea, a city of Crēta, Candia, which was anciently called Apōllōnia, and was built by the Samians (Herod. iii. 44). It had this name from Cýdon, son of Apōllo and Acācalidē, a daughter of Minos, was one of the three principal cities in that island. Q. Cæcilius Mētellus, proconsul, took Cýdōnēa and many other cities of Candia, in 70 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 99). Inh. Cýdōniātē, arum, v. Cýdōnēs, um (Sing. Cýdon, ōnis), m. made war against the Gōrtyñli and Gnōssii, in 191 B. C., which shows that both their number and wealth must, at that time, have been very considerable (Liv. xxxvii. 60). Cýdōnis, Idis, f. of Cýdon, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Adj. Cýdōnius, et, Cýdōneus, v. Cýdōneus, a, um, of Cýdon, Cretan. Cýdōnius arcus, a Cretan bow (Hor. Od. iv. 9. 17). Cýdōnēa phuretra (Ov. Met. viii. 22). Cýdōnēa arundo (Stat. Th. iv. 269).

Cýdrus, i, m. a nobleman of Cýzicus, at the time of the Argonautic expedition, who was killed by Pōllux after having been wounded by Cānthus (Val. Flacc. iii. 192).

Cýlārābis, is, f. a place of exercise within three hundred paces of Argos, on which T. Quinctius Flāminius encamped, when he went to set Argos at liberty, in 197 B. C. He failed in his first attempt (Liv. xxxiv. 26).

Cýlindrus, i, m. one of the sons of Phrýxus and Chālciopē, whom Hýgius alone mentions among the Argonauts.

Cýlla, æ, f. a Trojan city, sacred to Apōllo (Ov. Met. xiii. 174), taken by Achilles. Hōmērus spells it Cilla (Il. i. 38).

Cýllārus, i, m. the most beautiful of the Centaurs, killed in the battle against the Lāpithæ, but by whom is unknown (Ov. Met. xii. 393).—2. The horse of Pōllux (Virg. G. iii. 90);—of Cāstor (Val. Flacc. i. 426. Stat. Th. iv. 215. Claud. viii. 557).

Cýllēnē, es, f. v. Cýllēnum, i, n. Olono (Zyria, Lenke), a mountain in Arcādia, a district of Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea, which had a town of the same name, q. v. From being born on this mountain, which was anciently covered with cypresses (Cupressifera Cýllēnē, Ov. Fast. v. 87), Mērcūrius is often called Cýllēnius, to which Státius alludes (Th. iv. 288). Cýllēnis, Idis, f. of Cýllēnē, applied to females or nouns feminine. Cýllēnis hīrpnē (Ov. Met. v. 176). Adj. Cýllēneus, Cýllēneus, et, Cýllēnius, a, um, of Cýllēnē, of Mercury. Cýllēneus vertex, the top of Olono (Ov. Met. xi. 304). Cýllēnia mūnēra (Virg. Cir. 108). Cýllēnius arboriter immensa unda, Mērcūrius, the lord of the boundless ocean (Luc. Phar. x. 209). The Scholiast says that Mērcūrius was the judge and lord of the Nile and ocean, adding that he was the god of all humidity.

Cyllēnē, es, f. Chiarentza, Klarentza, or Glarentza, a town of Elis, at which P. Sulpicius landed four thousand soldiers, in the dead of night, to assist the Ætoli and their allies, in 210 B. C. This motion baffled the design of Philippus, king of Mæcēdonia, and obliged him to withdraw from Elis (Liv. xxvii. 32). Cyllēnē was the arsenal of the Elēi, but was reduced to a village of moderate size in the time of Strabo.

Cyllēnius, i, m. a surname of Mercury, from his having been born on Cyllēnē q. v. a high mountain of Arcādia. Cyllēnis, idos, f. of Mercury, with relation to a female, or a noun feminine. Adj. Cyllēneus, v. Cyllēneus, et, Cyllēnius, a, um.

Cymē, es, f. Foia Nuova, a maritime town of Æolis, on Smȳrneus Sinus, the Gulf of Smyrna, which revolted to Sclēucus, son of Antiochus, king of Sȳria, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 11). Inh. Cymeis, orum, m. To them the Romans granted their independence, after the conquest of Antiochus and the Gallō-græci, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 39). Adj. Cymæus, a, um. Cymæus fundus (Cic. pro Flac. 20).—2. A name of Cūmæ q. v.

Cymolus, i, m. a man killed by Nessus, in the battle between the Lāpithæ and Centaurs (Ov. Met. xii. 454).

Cymioē, es, f. a town of Thessaly, which the Ætoli took by assault, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Cymōdōcē, es, f. a daughter of Nērēus and Dōris, who was one of the attendants of Cȳrēnē (Virg. G. iv. 338). Perhaps the same with Cymōdōcē mentioned by Silius Italicus, whom he calls the eldest of the Italian nymphs (vii. 428).

Cymōdōcēa, v, f. one of the seanympths, or goddesses, into which the ships of Ænēas were changed by Cȳbēlē. She informed Ænēas, as he sailed down the Tevere, of their transformation, of the perilous situation of Ascānius, and of the plans of Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. x. 225).

Cymōthōē, es, f. one of the daughters of Nērēus and Dōris, who assisted Triton, in setting afloat the ships of Ænēas, which had been driven on rocks and shallows by the storm which Æōlus, at the request of Jūno, had raised for their destruction (Virg. Æn. i. 144).

Cynægirus, i, m. an Athenian soldier of great bravery, who, in an engagement with the Persians, put a great number to death, pursued them to their ships, and laid hold of one of them with his right hand, which he did not let go until the enemy had cut off his right arm. Retaining his resolution, he laid hold of the vessel with his left hand, which the enemy lopped off, and he then detained the ship with his teeth (Just. ii. 9).

Cynāpes, is, m. a rapid river of Scȳthia, mentioned by Ovidius (Ep. Pont. iv. 10. 49). The name of this stream does not occur in any other author of antiquity, which renders it impossible to identify Cynāpes with any river in modern times. Besides, the reading is doubtful.

Cynētes, um, v. Cynēsii, orum, m. the most westerly inhabitants of Europe, according to Hērōdotus (iv. 49 seq.).

Cynicus, i, m. a Cynic, one of the sect of philosophers founded by Antisthēnes, the Athenian. According to some, they had this name from their severity and strictures on the lives and characters of other men; and, according to others, from the grossness of their conduct. They despised riches, hence Jūvénālīs, nūdus Cȳnicus, the naked Cynic, or perhaps rather from one of their shoulders being naked (Juv. Sat. xiv. 309).

Cynisen, v, f. daughter of Archidāmas, a Lacedæmonian, who took pleasure in rearing horses, and was the first woman who gained the prize at Olympiā (Paus. iii. 8).

Cyno. See Spaco.

Cynōcēphālæ, arum, f. eminences, or rising grounds, to the north of Phārsālus, near which T. Quinctius Flāminius defeated Philippus, king of Mæcēdonia (Liv. xxxiii. 10. Flor. ii. 7).

Cynōcēphālī, orum, m. an African nation, whose eyes were in their breasts, as was also the case with the Acēphālī. In calling the Cynōcēphālī men, the ancients showed their ignorance of natural history, since there can be no doubt they were a species of baboon (Herod. iv. 191).

Cynōsārges, is, m. a temple of Hērēcles, and a school surrounded by a grove, in the suburbs of Athens, near the Lycæum, which Philippus, king of Mæcēdonia, burned and levelled with the ground, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 24). It had its name from Didymus, by command of the oracle, building a temple where a white dog (συνος αργος) laid down the flesh of a victim killed by himself. Here too were the temples of Hēbē, Alcēmēna, and Iolāus, besides a gymnasium, in which strangers, and those who were not legitimate citizens, performed their exercises, and a court of judicature for trying cases of illegitimacy and of false pretensions to be enrolled among the native Athenians. From this place the sect of philosophers instituted by Antisthēnes, called Cynics (συνικα), had, in the opinion of some, their name (Diog. Laert. in Ant.).

Cynōssēma, ātis, n. a town of Thrācia, at which Hēcūba q. v. was supposed to be buried (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).—2. Arab Kullu, a town of Egypt, to the W. of Alexāndria.—3. Volno, a promontory of Cāria.

Cynōsūra, v, f. a Cretan nymph, one of the nurses of Jūpiter, whom he changed into a constellation near the north pole, called also Ursa Minor, v. Arctos Minor, by which the Phœnicians steered their courses, from its having first been recommended as their guide by their countryman Thāles. For the same reason, they called it Phœnicē. The Greeks directed their voyages by Hēlicē, Ursa Mājor, v. Arctos Mājor (Hyg. Poet. Ast. ii. 2. Ov. Fast. iii. 107).

Cynōsūra, v, f. the Promontory of Marathona, in Attica (Herod. viii. 76).

Cynthus, i, m. Monte Cintio, a very high mountain in Dēlos, which was said to shadow the whole island, and from which it was anciently called Cynthia. Apōllo and Dīāna were born on this mountain; hence the former is called Cynthius, and the latter Cynthia.

Cynus, i, m. Purgos, a town of Lōcris, the emporium and dockyard of Opūs, the capital of the Lōcri (Liv. xxviii. 6).

Cypæra, v, f. a town of Thessaly, taken by Antiochus, king of Sȳria, on his arrival, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 10).

Cypārissēis, ētis, m. the river of Arkadia, a considerable stream, which probably has received this name from the modern, as its former appellation was unquestionably derived from the ancient town, Cypārissēis, now Arkadia, in Messēnia.

Cypārissēia, æ, v. Cypārissēis, ēntis, f. Arkadia, a town of Messēnia, about a hundred and twenty miles from Patrae, Patra, of which the inhabitants, both Greeks and Turks, do not exceed four thousand.

Cypārissus, i, m. a youth of Cēa, Lango, beloved by Apōllo, who unwittingly killed his favourite stag, on which account he pined away in excessive grief. Apōllo in vain attempted to comfort him, but, finding him inconsolable, he changed him into the cypress, declaring that he would mourn for him, and that he also should mourn for others, and be the funeral tree. The ancients made the cypress tree sacred to Pluto. Adj. Cypārissus, a, um. Cypārissae acies, fires resembling a cypress tree, usually seen at night (Fest.).

Cypārissus, i, f. a town of Phōcis according to Pausanias, afterwards called Anticēra. Others make it a city of Boōtia. Perhaps there were two cities of this name, one in Phōcis, and another in Boōtia. We find towns or villages of this name in different parts of Greece, a natural consequence of the cypress tree being a native of that country (Stat. Th. vii. 344).

Cypāssis, is, f. the maid servant of Cōrinna (Ov. Amor. ii. 8. 2).

Cyphara, orum, n. a port overhanging Dōlōpia, which the Ætōli took, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Cyprius vicus, Cyprii vici, m. a street in Rome, at the top of which Servius Tullius was murdered by assassins sent after him by his son-in-law, L. Tarquinius. It was afterwards called Scōllērātus vicus, to perpetuate the remembrance of the atrocious behaviour of the younger Tullia towards the dead body of her father (Liv. i. 48).

Cyprus, i, f. Cyprus, an island in the eastern part of the Mediterranean Sea, off the coast of Cilicia, about 150 miles long, and 70 broad. At the time the Phœnicians took possession of Cyprus, it was covered with wood, which they cut down to melt the ore of copper, found there in great quantities. After a lapse of many ages, it fell under the dominion of the Persians. A law passed 59 B. C., at the instigation of P. Clōdus, a tribune, reducing the island to the form of a province, confiscating the property of Ptolēmaeus in Cyprus, although an ally of the Roman people; and M. Pōrcius Cato brought the wealth of the island in ships to the mouth of Tiber, the Tecere, which enriched the Roman treasury more than had been done by any former triumph (Flor. iii. 9). It continued subject to the Romans till the Saracens conquered it, in 648, but the Romans regained possession in 957. Richard I. of England, during the crusades, in 1192, gave it to the princes of the Lusignan family, who kept it until 1570, when the Turks obtained possession, which they still retain. The soil is in many places very fertile; but the air, particularly on the eastern coast, is not salubrious. Its chief products are wine, raisins, citrons, oranges, pomegranates, almonds, cotton, salt, wool, and silk. Almost all the inhabitants keep silkworms, and it is the business of the females, to wind the silk, which is woven into cloth at Pāphos, Baffa, and Leucōsia, Nicotia. Amianthus, of a very superior quality, is found near Baffa, as flexible as silk, and perfectly white. It is finer and more delicately fibrous than that of Sicily, Corsica, or Norway. This mineral the Cyprians call the cotton stone. The island was, in ancient times, sacred to Venus, who is hence called Cypri, Idos, a term also applied to a woman of Cyprus, and to a noun feminine. Cytherēa Cyprus (Mart. viii. 45). Inh. Cyprii, orum (Sing. Cyprius, i), m. the Cyprians, or, the Cypriots. Tēucerus offered human sacrifices to Jūpiter, a practice which the Cyprians continued until the reign of the Emperor Hadrian (Lactant. i. 21). Adj. Cyprius, Cyprius, et, Cyprius, a, um. Cypria trabs, a Cyprian ship. The ancients reckoned the wood of this island remarkably well adapted for ship-building (Hor. Od. i. 1. 13). Cypriaca pecunia (Val. Max. iv. 1).

Cypsēla, orum, n. a fort in Thraciā, of which Philippus, king of Macedōnia, obtained possession, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 16).

Cypsēlus, i, m. the son of Eētion, whom the Bacchidae sought for anxiously on his birth, to put to death, but his mother concealed him in a chest or coffer, whence his name. After he grew up to manhood, he expelled the Bacchidae, and became king of Corinth. Dēmārātus, father of Tarquinus Priscus, to escape his tyranny, fled from Corinth to Etruria, Tuscany (Plin. v. 178). Cypsēlides, æ, m. a son or descendant of Cypsēlus (Virg. Cir. 464). Several other persons of this name occur in history. Cypsēlis, idis, f. of Cypsēlus, or, Corinth, applied to females or nouns feminine. Cypsēlides, æ, m. a descendant of Cypsēlus, a Corinthian.

Cyras, æ, m. a mountain of which Battus took possession, on landing on the African coast. From it the town Cyrēnē probably took its name; but that is not the opinion of Justinus (xiii. 7).

Cyrēnē, arum, f. See Cyrēnē.

Cyrēnē, es, f. a daughter of Pēnēus, the Salampria, or, according to Pindārus, of Hypsēus (Pyth. ix. 23), who was carried into Africa by Apōllo, where she had Aristeus by that god. Justinus says, that she bore to him four sons, Nōmius, Aristeus, Authōeus, and Argæus (but Diōdōrus Siculus says Nōmius, Aristeus, and Agræus was the same individual), and that the person sent by Hypsēus, king of Thessaly, to search for the virgin, delighted with the pleasantness of the country, continued to reside with her in it (xiii. 7). Three of her sons, when grown up, returned to Thessaly, to receive the kingdom of their ancestors, and Aristeus became king of Arcadia. Justinus considers this as a fiction.

Cyrēnē, es, f. Caren, a city in Africa, near the shore of the Mediterranean, 22° E. longitude, built, according to some, by Aristeus, and named after his mother. Justinus says, that Aristeus, surnamed Battus (i.e. tongue-tied), who built this town, was the son of Cirrus, king of Thēra, Santorin, an island in the Archipelago. Still he allows that Battus gave the name of the virgin to his city, in consequence of an oracular response. In 98 B. C. Ptolēmaeus, king of Cyrēnē, and brother of the Egyptian monarch, died and left his kingdom to the Roman people, who decreed that it should be free. From Livius, it appears to have been frequently under the government of Egypt (xxiii. 10 seq.). Cyrēnāica, n. f. the district of Cyrēnē. Inh. Cyrēnenses, um. v. Cyrēnei, orum. m. the Cyrenians, whom Sallustius calls Greeks (Jug. 79). Adj. Cyrēneus, et. Cyrēnāicus, a. um. Cyrēnase aqua, waters of Cyrēnē, i. e. the poetic inspirations of Cālimāchus q. v. (Prop. iv. 6. 4). Cyrēnāicus ager (Plin. i. 543). Cyrēnāica Africa, that part of Africa of which Cyrēnē was the capital.

Cyreschāta, n. f. Chodjand, a town of Sogdiana (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). By some it is called Cyrōpōlis.

Cyris, is. m. a commander of the Scythians (Val. Flacc. vi. 80). His name has been referred to Cyrus, the Kur, on which stood a temple of the sun, hence Titānius Cyris.

Cyrītēs, arum. f. Teherichani, a city of Thessalia, which, after being taken and plundered by Amynder, king of the Athāmānes, and the Ætoli, fell into the hands of Menippus, a general of Antiochus, king of Syria, in 193 B. C.; but M. Bæbius Tāmphillus, proprietor, retook it the same year, and placed a Roman garrison in it. Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia, carried it by storm on the second day, in 172 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 41 seq.).

Cyranus, i. m. a Colchian youth, son of the priest Aquiles (Val. Flacc. vi. 297).—2. One of the competitors in the chariot race for the prize given by Scipio Africanus at the conclusion of the Spanish war (Sil. Ital. xvi. 343).

Cyranus, i. f. the Greek name of Cōrsica q. v. Inh. Cyrnii, orum (Sing. Cyrnius, i.), m. Adj. Cyrnēus, a. um. Cyrnēi taxi, the yew trees of Cōrsica, from a kind of wood with which that island abounded, and was supposed to render the honey bitter and unpleasant (Virg. B. ix. 30).—2. A town of Carystia (Herod. ix. 105).

Cyrōpōlis, is. f. Kurab, a town of Mēdia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6), which Alexander the Great having carried by storm, plundered.

Cyrrhum, i. n. a town of Syria. Adj. Cyrrhēsticus, v. Cyrēsticus, a. um. Cyrrēsticus ager, the district of which Cyrrhum was the capital (Ap. Bel. Par. 156). In this district Ventidius avenged the death of Crassus.

Cyrtus, i. f. Quars, a town of Syria, in the district of Cōmāgēnē (Tac. Ann. ii. 57).

Cyrtai, orum. m. slingers, who fought in the army of Antiochus, king of Syria, in the battle at Thyātira, Akhissar, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 40).

Cyrtii, orum. m. a people of whose country nothing is certainly known. They fought on the side of the Romans against Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia, in 173 B. C. They were among the auxiliaries of Eumēnes (Liv. xlii. 58).

Cyrus, i. m. father of Cāmbyses (Herod. i. 111).—2. Son of Cāmbyses, king of Persia, and Māndāna, v. Māndānē, daughter of Astyāges, king of Mēdia. Alarmed by a dream, which is very differently related by Hērōdōtus and Jūstinus, respecting his daughter, Astyāges consulted the soothsayers, who interpreted it as portending that he would be dethroned by his grandson. On that account he married Māndānē to Cāmbyses q. v. and ordered her son Cyrus to be killed immediately after his birth. The herdsman to whom Hārpagus q. v. gave the child for that purpose, having lost his own son, brought up Cyrus, whom he called by another name, giving out that he was his own. On reaching maturity the royal youth was recognised and acknowledged by his grandfather, whom he afterwards dethroned and assumed the reins of government. Hērōdōtus says his father was of mean condition; but his account of the birth and preservation of Cyrus is manifestly fabulous, and therefore his statement respecting Cāmbyses is entitled to less credit. Xēnōphon in his Cyrōpedia has detailed, with the utmost minuteness, every circumstance respecting his education, and the manner in which he passed his earlier years. Here too we meet with much which must be referred chiefly, if not wholly, to the invention of the author. His language charms by its elegance, and his narrative by its liveliness; still the treatise can only be counted a historical novel, such as that of Q. Curtius. At the age of thirty, his father placed Cyrus at the head of the Persian forces, when he joined Cṽxāres, his maternal uncle, and their united armies defeated and dispersed the numerous and powerful forces of the king of Bābylon, who was preparing to attack the latter, and those of his numerous allies. Cyrus afterwards entered Cāppādiācia, which he subdued, and then defeated Cræsus, king of Lṽdiā, and forced his capital to surrender, making himself prisoner. In his treatment of that monarch after he had fallen into his hands, we see none of the fine disposition and noble-mindedness which the fancy of Xēnōphon has so admirably delineated. His conduct towards Cræsus, king of Lṽdiā, shows a cruelty at direct variance with the description of the author just mentioned. Afterwards he returned towards his own country, conquered the Assyrians, took Bābylon, and married his cousin, the heiress of all his uncle's dominion. He extended his dominions to the Red Sea, governed the subdued nations by his princes, and fixed his residence at Bābylon, which, from situation, formed the most convenient place for his court. Respecting his death various accounts have been transmitted, which prove that nothing certain with regard to that event is known. It is generally supposed that he died at the age of seventy. He is the person mentioned by Sallustius, Cat. 2. His name frequently occurs in Holy Writ. Sōlomon Cyri, the throne of Cyrus, i. e. the kingdom of Pārthia (Hor. Od. ii. 2. 17).—3. The younger son of Dārius, surnamed Nōthus, and brother of Artāxerxes, who succeeded to the throne on the death of that monarch. His ungovernable ambition first stimulated him to attempt the assassination of his brother, in order that he might obtain the kingdom. Artāxerxes, after the discovery of the plot, saved his life at the entreaty of his mother, Pārysātis, which neither impressed his mind with gratitude, nor diminished the unlawful desire of reigning. According to Jūstinus, Dārius left to Cyrus the states of which he was governor at his father's death, which increased rather than satisfied his immoderate desire of sovereignty (v. 11). Having obtained the government of his mind cannot be contemplated without admiration, nor the depravity of his heart without contempt. His splendid talents, far from diminishing, aggravate his vices. Nothing sinks the nature of man so low, as the hateful mixture of transcendent abilities, and consummate profligacy. Yet, such was the life of this eminent author, whose writings have immortalized his name. The excellencies of the historian may indeed be studied with advantage, and copied with safety; but the character of the man neither claims respect, nor merits imitation. It must not be concealed, that his contemporaries blamed the elaborateness of his style, love of ancient words and spelling, at which Augustus sneers (Suet. Aug. 86), affixing new meanings to the vocables in common use, and other instances of affectation, in which they alleged he indicated a greater attention to fineness of expression than to accuracy of fact (Gel. iv. 15 §c.). Brēvis Sällūstius, Sällūstius distinguished by the conciseness of his style (Stat. Syl. iv. 7. 55). Mārtiālis bears honourable testimony to the merits of this historian:—"This Crispus will be the first in Roman history, according to the judgment of the learned" (Mart. xiv. 191).—2. Grandson of the sister of the historian, who assumed his name, and was created a knight by the emperor Augustus. To him Hörātius addresses one of his odes (Od. ii. 2). Adj. Sällūstianus, a, um. Sällūstiani horti (Tac. Ann. xiii. 47).

Crissa, æ, f. Crisso, a town at the Isthmus of Corinth. Adj. Crisseus, a, um. Crisseus sinus, the Bay of Corinth.

Crista, æ, m. a Roman, who, with six sons, fought in the battle of Cannæ. He was a native of Tüder, and a man of great bravery. Silius Italicus makes him fall by the hand of Hannibal (x. 93—121).

Crithēis, idos, f. daughter of Mēlanōpus, and mother of Hōmērus before she was married. She afterwards became the wife of Phēmūs. Her history and pedigree are very different in different authors.

Crithotē, es, f. Crithisēui, a town in Chērsōnēsus Thrācia, the Peninsula of Gallipoli, on the coast of Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, and vicinity of Cāllipōlis, Gallipoli (Plin. i. 444). Timōthēus received this town and Sestos from Ariobarzānes, for the Athenians. In some editions of Cōrnēlius Nēpos this town is called Erchtho (Timoth. 1).

Crītiās, æ, m. son of the Lacedæmonian commander Xānthippus, and Bārēc, an African. In the first engagement between the Romans and Carthaginians in Italy, Crītiās and Virbius fell by mutual wounds (Sil. Ital. iv. 383—395).—2. One of the thirty tyrants whom the Lacedæmonians appointed to the government of Athens. He possessed considerable powers of eloquence, and the Roman orator informs us, that some of his writings were extant when he composed his treatise "de oratore." Cicero commends his learning, but not his morals (de orat. iii. 34). Thērāmēnes suffered death by order of Crītiās (Cic. Tusc. i. 40). From Cōrnēlius Nēpos he appears to have been at the head of these tyrants, and he fell in battle fighting with great bravery against Thrāsībūlus (Cor. Nep. Thras. 2).

Criticus, v. Crēticus, i, m. a friend of Mārtiālis, to whom he vindicates his writings against the opinion of Mātho (vii. 89).

Crīto Bēræus, Crītōnis Bēræei, m. an ambassador, whom Phīlippus, king of Mācēdōnia, sent along with Hērāclitus Scotinus, and Sosithēus Māgnus, to Hannibal, in Italy, after the battle at Cannæ. The former ambassadors were taken by the Romans (Liv. xxiii. 38, 39).

Crītōbūlus, i, m. a physician, whom Alexander the Great carried with him to India. Plinius considers him a descendant of Æsculāpius (Curt. ix. 5). Arriānus calls him Crītōdēmus.

Crītōgnātus, i, m. a nobleman of the first rank among the Arvērni. Caesar has recorded his horrible speech to the inhabitants of Alēsia, Alise, at the time it was besieged by the Romans. To his inhuman proposal the soldiers seem to have conditionally agreed (Caes. B. G. vii. 77).

Crītōlāus, i, m. a commander of the Achæi, who was defeated at Thērōpŷlæ, Thermopylae, by Q. Cæcilius Mētēlus, on which he poisoned himself, in 148 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 52. Flor. ii. 16).

Crīton, ōnis, m. a man, skilled in medicine (Mart. xi. 61).

Crīumētōpon, i, n. Cape Aya, the southern part of Chērsōnēsus Taurica, the Crimea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).—2. Cape Cris, a promontory in the western extremity of Crēta, Candia.

Crixus, i, m. a gladiator, who was born in Gāllia, France. He and Spārtæus having escaped from the school of C. Lēntūlus Bātātā, commanded the slaves in Bellum servile. They attacked and defeated Appius Claudius Pūlcher, prætor; but Crixus was afterwards overpowered and killed by Q. Arrius, prætor, in 73 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 95, 96). Eutrōpius, besides these two, mentions Eudēmāus, as a leader in that memorable war (vi. 7. Flor. iii. 20).

Crōbiālus, i, f. a city of Pāphlāgōnia (Val. Flacc. v. 103).

Crōcālē, es, f. one of Diana's attendants, a daughter of Ismēnus; hence, Ismēnis Crōcālē (Ov. Met. iii. 169).

Crōcos, i, m. a youth, changed into a flower, at the same time with Smīlax, the nymph whom he loved (Ov. Met. iv. 283).

Cresmus, i, m. a man, in the Trojan army, killed by Mēges (Hom. Il. xv. 523).

Crosus, i, m. son of Alŷāttēs and a woman of Cāria, the last king of Lŷdīa, experienced the extremities of fortune. By the conquest of many neighbouring nations, he accumulated enormous wealth and extensive dominions. The learned thronged to his court, which affords convincing proof of the turn of his mind, not to empty pageantry but useful knowledge. History has transmitted a conversation between the monarch and Sōlon of Athens, one of whose observations, founded on deep knowledge of human nature, although not much praised by Cēsus at the time when he heard it, was afterwards the means of saving him from a horrible death. In the midst of his great wealth, he rendered himself miserable by anxiety respecting a dream, in which he saw his son Atys killed by a spear. The grief which followed the premature death of Atys, sunk Cēsus into a stupor for some years; and would probably have continued till the end of life had not the safety of his dominions roused him to activity. Cýrus, king of Pērsia, invaded his territories, defeated him in battle, stormed and carried his capital, Sárdes, to which he had retired. When a Persian soldier was about to kill Croesus, his only surviving son, till that period dumb, exclaimed, "Soldier, do not put Croesus to death." This miracle saved him from instant destruction, but reserved him, as it would appear, for greater misery. Cýrus not only loaded him with chains, but ordered him to be burned alive. To witness the execution of this horrible sentence, the Persian king stood by, when the near prospect of death emboldened the Lydian monarch to speak without fear, and, recollecting the saying of Sōlon, that "no man ought to be called happy before his death," he repeated it aloud, which Cýrus wished to know. A bystander having translated to him, he ordered the pile to be extinguished, and ever after treated the fallen monarch with kindness. Croesus survived Cýrus, but neither the time nor manner of his death is known (Just. i. 7).

Crōmna, n. f. a city of Pāphlāgōnia, which was afterwards called Amāstris (Val. Flacc. x. 106).—2. A city of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, built by Crōmnus, a son of Lēcāon, whence the name. The latter is either masculine or feminine, and used both in the singular and plural numbers.

Crōmýon, ōnis, f. Kasidi, a village near Corinth, where a sow, of prodigious size and ferocity, not only desolated the lands, but also tore in pieces the inhabitants. Thēseus killed this animal; hence Ovidius, colonus secūrus suis erat Crōmýōna, the swain regardless of the sow, tills Crōmýon (Ov. Met. vii. 435).—2. Cape Cormacitti, a promontory of Cýprus, on the northwest of that island.

Crōnus, v. Crōnūs, i. m. a man, mentioned by Mārtialis (vii. 86).—2. Homer's name of Saturn (Il. v. 721).

Crossæa regio, a district of Mācēdōnia (Herod. vii. 123).

Crōto, v. Crōton, ōnis, et. Crōtōna, n. f. Cotrone, or Crotone, a large city of the Brutians, founded by a Grecian colony (959 B. C.), the walls of which are stated to have been twelve miles in circumference. According to Ovidius, Mýscēlos built it on the tomb of Crōton, who had entertained Hēracles, and to whom that hero had foretold that a town would be built over his ashes and bear his name (Met. xv. 15 seq.). Diōnysius, king of Sicília, Sicily, carried it by storm, but not before he had invested it both by land and sea. Pýthagōras established his school there, and is said, by his doctrine and example, to have greatly reformed the dissolute manners of the people, among whom he lived twenty years (Just. xx. 4). Alta Crōton (Sil. Ital. xi. 18). Inh. Crōtōniātē, arum (Sing. Crōtōniātēs, n.), et. Crōtōniēnsēs, lum (Sing. Crōtōniēnsis, is), m. the Crotonians (Sal. Cat. 44), in ancient times were reckoned the first physicians, and the Cyrenians held the next rank (Herod. iii. 131). Adj. Crōtōniēnsis, is, v. Crōtōniēnsis ager (Liv. xxix. 36).

Crōtōpus, i. m. a king of the Argives, and father of Prāmāthē, the mother of Linus, by Apōllo. Crōtōpiādes, n. m. a patronymic of Linus, from his grandfather Crōtōpus (Ov. Ib. 480).

Crōtus, i. m. a minstrel, or musician, who played on the harp or flute (Mart. vi. 39).

Crūptōrix, icis, m. a German chieftain, who once served in the Roman army (Tac. Ann. iv. 73).

Crūstūmērium, i. n. v. Crūstūmēria, n. f. (Virgilius writes, Crūstūmēri), a town of the ancient Latins taken, and a colony sent thither, by Rōmulus. It must have revolted, since it was again taken by Tārquinius Priscus (Liv. i. 11, 38). Inh. Crūstūmīni, orum (Sing. Crūstūmīnus, i), m. Adj. Crūstūmīnius, et. Crūstūmīnus, a, um. Crūstūmīnus ager, the territory of the Crūstūmīni (Plin. i. 322).

Crūstūmum, i. n. a town, in the eighth district of Italy, to the south of Arimīnum, Rimini, on the banks of a cognominal river (Plin. i. 366). Adj. Crūstūmūlus, a, um. Crūstūmia pýra (Virg. G. ii. 88), which Columella reckoned the best sort of pears, and Plinius, the best flavoured (Plin. iii. 187).

Crūstūmum, i. n. the Concha, a river of Italy, which takes its rise in the Apennines, runs eastward, and falls into Mārē Hādrīāticum, the Gulf of Venice. This stream forms the boundary between Arimīnum, Rimini, and Pisaurum, Pesaro. A cognominal town stood on its banks. Rapax Crūstūmum (Luc. Phar. ii. 406).

Crýxus, i. m. commander of the Boii, of huge size, who joined Hannibal when that noble Carthaginian invaded Italy. He traced his descent from Brēnnus, king of the Gauls, and had delineated on his shield the victories of his ancestors over the Romans. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, the Roman consul, engaged him in single combat at the foot of the Alps, and laid him dead at his feet, on which the Cēltæ fled (Sil. Ital. iv. 148—293).

Ctēātus, i. m. the father of Amphimachus (Hom. Il. xiii. 185).

Ctēsiphon, ōntis, f. El-Modain, a town on the east bank of Tigris, the Degila, founded, according to Ammianus Mārcellinus, by Vārdānes, and afterwards enlarged by Pācōrus, who gave it the name of Ctēsiphon. It stood three miles from Sēlēucia, Selephie, and was the capital of the kingdom. Plinius states, that it was first built by the Parthians (i. 713). Tacitus and Hērōdiānus call it the seat of empire (Tac. Ann. vi. 42). M. Ulpius Trājānus Crīnitus, the Roman emperor, took this town about the year 114 (Eutrop. viii. 3).

Ctēsippus, i. m. a native of Sāmē, a man of great wealth, but rude and insolent. He was one of the suitors of Pēnelōpē, and was killed, when fighting bravely, by Philētiūs (Hom. Od. xx. 288—xxii. 285).

Ctēsius, i. m. a prince of the island Syrea, and father of Eumæus, the swineherd of Ulysses (Hom. Od. xv. 413 seq.).

Ctimēnē, es, f. daughter of Lāertes, and sister of Ulysses. She was the youngest of the family (Hom. Od. xv. 362).

Cuballum, i. n. a fort of Gāllōgræciā, where the Roman army, when encamped, were attacked with great fury by the Gāllōgræci, and some killed, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 18).

Cūmæ, arum, et. Cūmē, es, f. a town of Cāmpāniā, said to have been built by the first Grecian colony which settled in Italy. They were from Chalcis, the chief city of Eubœa, landed first on the islands Ænariā and Pithecūse, and afterwards took possession of part of the adjoining continent. It continued long the chief of the Grecian colonies in Italy, but declined in opulence and population after it fell under the power of the Romans, in consequence of their giving a just preference to Baiae, Nēapōlis, and Pūtēoli. Tarquinius Sūpērbus died at Cūmae, in 494 B. C. (Liv. ii. 21), and near it one of the Sibyls had her residence. Its site is now covered with trees, and forms part of an extensive forest; some of the pavement and ruins are still visible. The road between Baiae and Cūmae is, at one part, subterranean. The tunnel, about eighty feet in length, was made by Agrippa. Vacuū Cūmae, thinly-inhabited Cūmae; Jūvénālis speaks in respect of the crowdedness of Rome (Sat. iii. 2). Chalcidica arx, the tower of Cūmae, from Cūmae having been built by a colony from Chalcis, hence Euboeica ora Cūmarum (Virg. Aen. vi. 2: vi. 17). Inh. Cūmāni, orum (Sing. Cūmānus, i), m. received the right of Roman citizenship, without the power of voting, in 337 B. C. The Cūmāni built and possessed Pālepōlis and Nēapōlis (Liv. viii. 14—22). They continued the faithful allies of Rome, after the battle of Cūmae, and, at their own request, were allowed to use the Latin language publicly, and their auctioneers when selling goods, 181 B. C. (Liv. xl. 42). Adj. Cūmaeus, et, Cūmānus, a, um, of Cūmae; Sibylline. Cūmae Sibylla, the Sibyl who resided near Cūmae (Ov. Met. xv. 712). Ovidius calls her Cūmaea anus (Fast. iv. 158), and Silius Italicus, Cūmes anus (xiii. 494). Cūmaea dux, the Sibyl (Ov. Met. xiv. 121). Cūmaeum cāmen, Sibylline prophecy; because most of the oracles were delivered in verse (Virg. B. iv. 4). Cūmānus Apōllo (Flor. ii. 8).

Cunāxa, orum, n. appears to have been near Feluja. Here Cŷrus was defeated and killed.

Cūnētes, um, v. Cūnēi, orum, m. a people of Portugal, who lived on the promontory Cūnēus, Cape St. Maria, which had this name from its resembling a wedge. Cūnēus also denoted the adjoining district, now the kingdom of Algarve (Just. xlv. 4).

Cūpāvo, ōnis, m. a Ligurian, an ally of Aenēas. He was the son or descendant of Cŷgnus, which is probably the reason why Virgil makes his plume of swan feathers (Aen. x. 186).

Cūpēncus, i, m. a Rutulian, one of the soldiers of Turnus, whom Aenēas slew (Virg. Aen. xii. 539)—2. A Carthaginian, of hideous countenance, whom the Roman consul, Scipio, killed in the engagement at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 535).

Cuplites, ium, m. an Indian nation, whom Alexander the Great reached, and with whom his victories in the east terminated (Just. xii. 8). Cūrtius, Arriānus, and Diōdōrus, differ in their accounts from that of Jūstinus.

Cūpido, Inis, m. Cupid, the god of love. There were two of this name; one, the son of Jūpiter and Vēnus, who presided over lawful love; the other, the son of Erēbus and Nox, who delighted in impurity. Cupid is represented as a naked boy, with wings (hence puer ales, Hor. Od. iii. 12. 4; puer volūtilis, Ov. Amor. ii. 7. 27; and volucris, Ov. Ep. Pont. iii. 3. 65), armed with a bow and quiver full of arrows. To show his power, he is, at one time, seen riding on a lion or a dolphin, and, at another, breaking in pieces the thunderbolts of Jūpiter. His worship was nearly the same as that of his mother Vēnus. Adj. Cūpidinēus, a, um.

Cūpiēnnus, i, m. a man, to whom Cicero addresses an epistle, in which he solicits his influence in behalf of the inhabitants of Būthrōtum, Butrinto (Att. xvi. 16). Perhaps he is the person mentioned by Hōrātius, as a man of loose and vicious morals (Sat. i. 2. 36).

Cūpra, æ, v. Cūpræ, arum, f. a maritime town of Picēnum, a district of Itālia, Italy, hence littōræa Cūpra (Sil. Ital. viii. 432). Inh. Cūprēnses, ium, m. As Plinius adds to Cūprēnses, cognomine montāni (i. 862), perhaps there was also an inland town of that name, to which Ptolēmeus refers.

Cūrāllum, i, n. Coral, a substance produced under the sea, which continues soft as long as it remains under water, but becomes hard on being exposed to the air. Ovidius considers coral as a marine plant, which was at first petrified by the touch of Mēdūsa's head. The seamyphs, he adds, spread the seeds thus produced over the ocean, and propagated the plant almost every where. This is merely a poetic fiction. Coral was long considered a vegetable substance; but there is now a strong probability, if not an absolute certainty, that it is the production of a particular kind of animal. Of the three varieties of Coral, red, white, and black, the last is seldome found, of course esteemed the most valuable.

P. Cūrātius, P. Cūrātū, m. a tribune of the people, who, with two of his colleagues, to avert the displeasure of the commons from themselves, accused Sērgius and Virgīnius, military tribunes of the former year, in 400 B. C. (Liv. v. 11).

Cūres, ium, f. Corese, or, Vescepio di Sabina (Cluv.), the principal city of the Sabines, although Virgil calls it pārea, which perhaps he may use in comparison of Rome (Aen. vi. 812). Nūma Pōmpilius was a native of this city, in which he resided, when he was chosen king of Rome (Liv. i. 18). Arat Cūribus, ploughs at Corese, i. e. land in the territory of Corese (Pers. Sat. iv. 26). What follows, in that poet, is a proverbial expression for an extensive landed estate. Inh. Cūrēnses, ium, m. which the Greeks wrote Cūrītes, changed by the Romans into Quirītes. Ovidius seems doubtful whether Quirinus, the name of Rōmūlus, was derived from this town in consequence of the union of the Sabines with the Romans, or from the Sabine word Cūris, a spear (Fast. ii. 475 seq.). Adj. Cūrēnsis, is, e.

Cūrētes, um, m. the ministers of Cŷbēlē, whom Ovidius describes as different from the Cōrŷbāntes (Fast. iv. 210 seq.).—2. A people of Crēta, Candia, of which they were said to have been the most ancient inhabitants, and to have been horn of showers (Ov. Met. iv. 282). Pausānias considers the Dēctŷli Idæi and the Cūrētes the same. He adds that they slept upon the leaves of the wild olive (v. 7). Cūrētis, Idis, f. of Candia, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Cūrētis tērra, Candia (Ov. Met. viii. 153). Adj. Cūrēticus, a, um. Cūrētica tēcta (Sil. Ital. xv. 308).

Cūrēfius, i, m. son of Urānīus, an astrologer. Against Cūrēfius, Claudīanus writes his 25th and 26th Epigrams, which, from the character they describe, and the sentiment they contain, ought never to have been either composed or published.

Cūrgōnī, orum, m. a people in the north of Spain (Flor. iv. 12).

Cūrīa, ae, f. one of the divisions or wards of Rome, of which there were thirty, formed by Rōmūlus. Their number afterwards increased to thirty-five. According to Livius, they received their names from the virgins, whom the Romans forcibly took from the Sabines. In each of these wards was a place of worship, where, on certain days, sacrifices were offered, and other religious rites observed. The priest was from Cūrīa, called Cūrīo, and seems to have been chosen by the ward. The one who superintended, or had a jurisdiction over the rest, was called Māxīmus Cūrīo. It is manifest that the Cūrīae of Rōmūlus were the prototypes of parishes in modern times. Cūrīae vetēres, in which the priests met on matters of religion (Liv. i. 13). Adj. Cūrīātus, a, um. Cūrīātā cōmītiā, assemblies in which the people gave their votes by the wards, of which sixteen formed a majority. This was the original mode of assembling and voting at Rome. After the appointment of Cōmītiā Centuriātā and Tribūtā, the Cōmītiā Cūrīātā scarcely met, unless to pass particular laws, and to appoint the Cūrīo Māxīmus and the Flāmīnus. Lex Cūrīātā, a law passed at the Cōmītiā Cūrīātā.

Cūrīa Hōstīlīa, the senatehouse at Rome, so called from being built by Tullus Hōstīlius (Liv. i. 29).

Cūrīātī, orum, m. three Albans, to whom Mētus Fuffētus entrusted the fortune of his country, when Alba and Rome contended for the superiority, about 669 B. C. Dion. Hal. says, that the three brothers on each side were born on the same day.—2. A patrician tribe or clan, originally of Alba. After the destruction of their city, they were admitted into the Roman senate (Liv. i. 30). Adj. Cūrīātus, a, um. Cūrīātīa gens.

Cūrīātus, i, m. a Roman, who died at Tibur, Tivoli. On that event Mārtīālīs wrote an epigram on the certainty of death, however healthy the place in which we live (iv. 60).

Cūrīātus Mātērnus, Cūrīātī Mātērnī, m. a Roman poet, who wrote a tragedy on the death of Cato. In the dialogue on oratory, ascribed to Tacitus, he makes a very conspicuous figure, and this scanty information is all which antiquity has transmitted respecting him (Tac. Orat. 2 seq.).

P. Cūrīātus, P. Cūrīātī, m. held the consulship with Sextus Quīntīlius, in 453 B. C., and was afterwards appointed one of the first duumviri (Liv. ii. 32, 33).

Cūrīete, arum, f. Veglia, an island in Mārē Hadrīaticum, the Gulf of Venice, opposite to Illīricum (Plin. i. 380). Inh. Cūrīetes, um, m. described as a warlike nation, by Lūcānus (Phar. iv. 406). Adj. Cūrīeticus, a, um. Cūrīeticum litus (Flor. iv. 2).

Cūrīnus, i, m. a man, appointed by Augustus to the war against the Mārmāridae and Gārāmīntes, whom he subdued, and might, says Florus, have returned with the surname of Mārmāricus, but his modesty prevented him from rating his victories so high (iv. 12).

Cūrīo, ōnis, m. the person who had the charge or government of a Cūrīa at Rome, in which he performed the public sacred rites. This appointment originated with Rōmūlus, who divided the whole people into three tribes, each tribe into ten cūrīae, and every cūrīa had a temple. Cūrīo Māxīmus exercised a certain jurisdiction or authority over the other Cūrīōnes. The office of Cūrīo Māxīmus was enjoyed only by patricians, till 211 B. C., when C. Mamīlius Vītūlus, a plebeian, was elected. Like the other priest-hoods, it was held during life. Vītūlus lived thirty-three years after his appointment, and died Cūrīo Māxīmus (Liv. xli. 21).

Cūrīo, ōnis, m. a Roman commander, drowned in Aufidus, the Ofanto, whilst attempting to stop the flight of the troops after the battle of Cannae (Sil. Ital. x. 209).

C. Cūrīo, C. Cūrīōnis, m. an orator, who pleaded for hire (Tac. Ann. xi. 7).

Cūrīōsōlites, um, m. a people of Gallīa Cēltica, inter Armōricas Cīvitātes, whose country was afterwards called Bretagne (Cæs. B. G. ii. 34 seq.).

Cūrīus, ei, Cūrīānus, a, um. Cūrīa gens, an illustrious Roman clan.

M. Cūrīus, M. Cūrīi, m. a tribune of the people, in 201 B. C., with M. Fūlvius q. v. (Liv. xxxii. 7).

Mānīus Cūrīus Dēntātus, Mānī Cūrīi Dēntātī, m. a noble Roman, who held the consulship with P. Cōrnēlius Rūfīnus, in 292 B. C., triumphed first over the Sāmītes, then over the Sabīnes, and had the honour of an ovation over the Lūcāni. He drove Pyr-rhus out of Italy. Eutrōpius relates, that he triumphed over that monarch, leading four elephants in the procession, the first which had ever been seen in Rome (ii. 9–14). He afterwards divided the land which he had taken from the enemy, giving each soldier fourteen acres, and only retained the same quantity for himself, saying, "that with that quantity every man ought to be satisfied." On the ambassadors of the Sāmītes offering him money, when he was roasting rape root, he said, "he preferred having it in his earthen vessels, and commanding them who possessed money." When he was accused of retaining part of the spoils, he declared on oath, "that he had not brought to his own house, except a wooden cask, which he used in sacrifice." When tribune of the people, he compelled the senators to give their approbation at the cōmītiā, when the plebeian magistrates were elected. He brought the water of Anio, the Teverene, into Rome, by the spoils which he had taken from the enemy. For these good offices he had a house at Tifātā, and the state gave him five hundred acres of land (Aur. Vic. Vir. ii. 33). Hōrātius represents him as wearing his hair undressed, probably alluding to the manners of the period in which he lived, when the hardy Romans neglected personal elegance (Od. i. 12. 41). He may be considered a perfect model of bravery, frugality, and moderation, hence Jūvénālīs, simulans Cūrīos, they counterfeit the Cūrīi, i. e. pretend they are as frugal as M. Cūrīus Dēntātus (Sat. ii. 3). To him Claudīanus alludes (viii. 412), and Mārtīālīs (vi. 64).

Q. Cūrīus, Q. Cūrīi, m. a Roman of no mother of Pērsēus. Both she and her infant son were then, by order of Acrisius, exposed to the sea in a slender bark, which the wind drifted to Sērīphus, Seripho, where both were, by some fishermen, taken ashore, and carried to Pōlydēctes, the king of the island, who committed them to the charge of his brother Dictys. This nobleman paid particular attention to the education of Pērsēus, and to the situation of his mother, for whom Pōlydēctes, at a future period, conceived a violent attachment, but, dreading the anger of her son, wished to accomplish his destruction. After the return of Pērsēus q. v. from the conquest of the Gorgons, and the death of Pōlydēctes, to whom Pērsēus showed the Gorgon's head, Dānāē left Sērīphus, Seripho, and went with her son to Lārissa, where he accidentally killed his grandfather, and thus fulfilled the words of the oracle. Dānāē, with some other emigrants from Argos, according to Virgilius, came into Italy, and built Ardēa, of which the ancient name was Ardūa. On its being burned, the inhabitants said it was changed into a bird, called Ardēa, which, after it was rebuilt, became the name of the city. When Ænēas arrived in Lātium, this city was the capital of the Rūtūli, and Tārquinius Sūpērbus was besieging it at the time he and his family were banished from Rome. Acrisīōnēis, Idis, f. Dānāē, from her father Acrisius (Virg. Æn. vii. 410). Acrisīōnē, es, f. Dānāē (Virg. Cat. xi. 33). Adj. Dānāēus, a, um. Dānāēus Hērōs, Pērsēus (Ov. Met. v. 1).

Dānāus, i, m. a king of Argos, was the son of Belus, king of Egypt, and Anchīnōē, a daughter of Nīlus, the Nile. After their father's death, his brother Ægēptus and he ascended the throne as joint-sovereigns. A quarrel having ensued, Dānāus, with his fifty daughters, went in quest of a new settlement. After visiting Rhōdus, Rhodes, he arrived at the court of Gēlānor, king of Argos, by whom he was kindly entertained, and whom he afterwards succeeded in the throne. Of this event, supposed to have happened about 1570 B. C., we find two accounts; the one, stating that Dānāus, taking advantage of Gēlānor's being unpopular with his subjects, compelled him to abdicate; and the other, that Gēlānor voluntarily resigned to him the crown. In Gēlānor the race of the Ināchīdæ became extinct, and that of the Bēlīdæ began to reign at Argos. Proles Dānāi, the daughters of Dānāus (Tib. l. 3. 79). Dānāi, orum, m. the Grecians. Dānāis, Idos, f. a daughter of Dānāus. Dānāides, um, r. æ, arum, f. the fifty daughters of Dānāus, all of whom, except Hēpērmēstra, in obedience to their father's orders, murdered their husbands, the sons of their uncle Ægēptus, on the night of their nuptials. Adj. Dānāus, a, um, of Dānāus, Grecian. Dānāæ classes, the Grecian fleets (Ov. Met. xiii. 92).

Dāndācē, es, f. a small town in Chērsōnēsus Taurica, the Crimea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Dāndārīdæ, arum, m. a people of Cōlchis. Adj. Dāndāricus, a, um. Dāndārica terra (Tac. Ann. xii. 15, 16).

Dānthelīæ. See Denthēliti.

Dānūblus, i, m. the Danube, the largest river in Europe, rises in the black forest in Germany, according to Strābo and Plīnius, in the mountain Abnōba, runs in an easterly direction, through Austria, Germany, Hungary, part of Turkey in Europe, and discharges itself into Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea. In its course, which is upwards of 1300 miles, the Danube receives 60 navigable rivers, and 120 smaller streams. In the reign of Thēōdōsius II., a plan for establishing a fleet of two hundred and fifty armed vessels to secure the command of the river was conceived. It is always yellow with mud, and its sands are every where auriferous; but in dignity and sublimity, it is much inferior to several European rivers which it greatly surpasses both in length and magnitude. Hōrātius calls it deep (profundus Dānūblus) (Od. iv. 15. 21). At its entrance into the Black Sea, it is very shallow, its waters are extended over an immense surface, and lie stagnating among an infinity of reeds and other aquatic plants. The current of this river communicates a white colour to the sea, gives a freshness to it for nearly nine leagues, and within one league renders it fit for use. The dolphins, which every where else exhibit a dark colour, are, at the mouths of the Danube, perfectly white. Pompōnīus Mēla says it had as many mouths as the Nile, of which three were small, and four navigable; only two now remain, which can scarcely be entered by ships considerable either for size or burden, the rest being choked up. The ancients gave the name of Ister to the eastern part of this river, after its junction with Sāvus, the Save, and Ovid has Septemplex Ister, a proof that the Romans, in general, believed that this river had seven mouths. Though of great breadth and depth in many places, it is not generally navigable on account of the cataracts. Strābo, Diodōrus Sicūlus, Tācītus, and Plīnius, have given descriptions of this river in many respects different, and all exceedingly inaccurate. With the whole course of the Danube the Greeks and Romans were very imperfectly acquainted. They thought that one of its mouths was in the Gulf of Venice. Their knowledge of the countries to the north of this large river was almost wholly obtained by vague report from unlettered barbarians, and, of course, very incorrect. About the year 104, Trājānus, in his second expedition against the Dāci, by which he reduced the country to a Roman province, built at Vīnnaclum, Ram, in Hungary, a bridge of one-and-twenty arches across the Danube. These arches rested on twenty pillars of hewn stone, a hundred and fifty feet high, and sixty broad, founded in the stream. The land-breasts would, consequently, be nearly of the same height. Two of the arches only were of stone, the rest of timber, strongly and boldly executed. This is proved by its delineation on Trajan's pillar. Each arch was a hundred and seventy feet in span, which, added to the breadth of the pillars, each sixty feet, make the whole length of the bridge four thousand seven hundred and seventy Roman feet. Part of the pillars still remain. In the decline of the Roman empire, to that people the Danube became better known, in consequence of almost all the barbarous nations who assailed that state, commencing hostilities by ravaging the country on the banks of the Danube. But learning had sunk with the state, and no minute or accurate account of this river is found in classic authors.

Dāōrsei, orum, m. a people of Illīrīcum, to whom L. Anicius Gallus, prætor, by order of the Roman senate, granted liberty and exemption from taxes, because they had forsaken Caracallus, and come, with their armies, to the Romans. This immunity was granted them after L. Anicius Gallus had won Gēntius, king of the Illýrii, prisoner to Rome, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 25).

Dāphnē, es, f. the daughter of the river Pēnēus, the Salumpria, by the goddess Tērra. Apōllo fell in love with her, and whilst she fled from him, on her entreating the gods for assistance, she was changed into a laurel, which has since been sacred to Apōllo. On account of this god delighting in laurel groves, he is sometimes called Dāphneus. In allusion to her flight from Apōllo, Mārtialis calls her figūtea Dāphnē (xl. 44). Dāphnon, ōnis, m. a grove of laurels (Mart. xii. 50).

Dāphnē, es, f. Nero, a village of Sýria, forty stadia from Antiochia, Antakié, on Orōntes, the El-aasi. From ancient description, it appears to have been a place of great beauty, on which account it was often resorted to and frequently became the scene of great voluptuousness. Adjoining to the town was a large shady grove, watered by numerous springs, and, in the middle, stood a temple sacred to Apōllo and Diāna. Strābo makes the circumference of this grove eighty stadia. Here the inhabitants of the neighbouring country celebrated games, probably sacred to the deities above-mentioned. The son of Antiochus, king of Sýria, was engaged in performing these games, when Hannibal arrived, on his flight from Carthage, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 49). The modern name used by the Greeks, has been derived from the Hebrew word signifying water. Inh. Dāphnēses, ium, m. to whom Cn. Pōmpeius Magnus gave some ground, in order to extend the grove, as he went from Antiochus to Hierosōlyma, in 64 B. C. Adj. Dāphnicus, a, um.—2. A fort in Mœsia, built by Constantine the Great (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 5).

Dāphnēus, ōis, m. the priest of Apōllo at Cirrha, Xeropegano, whom the priest of Jūpiter struck from his horse in the Theban war, an act which Jūpiter commended, and Apōllo bewailed (Stat. Th. viii. 453).

Dāphnida, æ, m. a grammarian who accused Homer of falsehood (Val. Max. i. 8).

Dāphnis, idis, v. is, m. the name of a shepherd (Virg. B. v. 20–25). A variety of opinions has been advanced respecting the person whose death is lamented by Virgilius in the fifth bucolic under this name. Some have supposed the shepherd mentioned in next article, others Jūlius Cæsar, whilst several maintain that Quintilius Vārus, a relative of Virgilius, whose death is bewailed by Hōrātius, is understood, and not a few suppose that Flāceus, a brother of the author, or, Sālōnius, formed the subject of this beautiful pastoral. The first conjecture is the simplest, and liable to the fewest objections, on which account it ought, perhaps, to be adopted; the more so, as the death of Dāphnis is lamented in the first Idyllium of Thēocritus, of whom Virgilius is a frequent imitator.—2. A son of Mērcūrius, who was born in Sicily. His employment was that of a shepherd, and he excelled in playing on the flute; but was deformed in his person. A nymph formed a strong attachment to him, and petitioned that he should not have intercourse with any other, but when drunk he violated this engagement by intimacy with the queen of Sicily, on which the nymph, transported with anger, deprived him of sight. According to Ovidius, he was a Cretan or Phrygian, and she transformed him into a stone (Met. iv. 277).—3. A man killed in an engagement between the Romans and Carthaginians off Sicily, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 462 seq.). From the character given of Dāphnis by Silius, it seems probable that Ovid and this poet meant the same person.

Dāra, w, f. a Parthian city near the Caspian Sea, which Jūstinus commends for its strength, and beauty of situation (xli. 5). In different authors it has different names, Asea, Arsacia, Eurōpus, Agrāgas, or, Dāra.—2. Dara, a town in Mēsōpōtāmia, to the S. of Nisibis.—3. A river of Cārmānia, mentioned by Ptolemy.

Dārādax, ācis, m. the Fay, a remarkable fountain, from which issues a stream supposed by some to be now called Rajih, that runs into the Euphrātes. It is now ninety-two geographical miles from Mýriāndrus. Geographers give the same name to both the spring and river.

Dāraps, āpis, m. a king of the Gāngārīdæ, a Scythian nation, whom he sent under Dāthis against the Argonauts, since, from being lately wounded in battle with the Achēmēnīi, he could not, in person, lead them to the field (Val. Flacc. vi. 65 seq.).

Dārdānēses, ium, m. an Asiatic nation, through whose territory the river Gýndes passes, before it joins Tigris, the Dejilah (Herod. i. 189).

Dārdānia, æ, f. a country lying to the north of Mācēdōnia, and to the south of the Danube, on which Philippus first made war, in 213 B. C. Inh. Dārdāni, orum, m. Livius describes them as inveterate enemies of the Macedonians, and in his history records several of their attacks on that people. Had the monarch just mentioned accomplished his object, which was the extirpation of the Dārdāni, because they were ever on the watch to take advantage of the misfortunes of the Macedonian kings, he would have settled the Bāstārnæ, a German nation of Gallic origin, in their stead (Liv. xxvi. 25 seq.). C. Scribōnius Cūrō subdued them in 75 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 95). Adj. Dārdānus, a, um. Dārdānus rex (Just. xxiv. 4).—2. The ancient name of Trōja q. v., so called from its founder Dārdānus q. v. It gave name to the district in which it stood (Phed. Prol. 3). According to Sāllustius, the country was called Dārdānia, from its inhabitants the Dārdāni, of whom Midas was king, who took possession of Phrygia (Frag. 1). Dārdāni, et, Dārdāni, orum, v. Dārdāniæ, arum (Sing. Dārdānides, æ, m. the inhabitants of Troy and the adjacent district, whom Ænēas, with Archilochus and Acēmas, sons of Antenor, commanded in the Trojan war (Hom. Il. ii. 819 seq.). Dārdānis, idis, f. of Troy, applied to females or nouns feminine. Dārdānis Caiēta (Mart. x. 30). Adj. Dārdānus, et, Dārdānus, a, um. Dārdānus dūctor, P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus (Sil. Ital. i. 14).

Dārdānum, i, n. a promontory and town of Trōas on Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles (Liv. xxxvii. 9. 37).

ceeded the firmament, the sun, moon, and stars, according to Servius, and according to others, he was the first of the gods, and of all things, the creator of the earth, of Erēbus and the Fates. The ancients attached the highest veneration to this name, as the Jews did to that of the Almighty. To this Stātiūs alludes (Th. iv. 516). Ille, i. e. Dāmō-gōrgon (Luc. Phar. vi. 745).

Dātor, ōris, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Tēucer (Hom. Il. viii. 275).

Dāhe, arum, m. a wandering people, whose country seems to have been to the east or north of Cāspium, v. Hyrcānum mārē, the Caspian Sea. They surrendered to Alexander the Great in 328 B. C. (Just. xii. 6). Indōmīti Dāhe, the uncivilized Dāhe (Virg. Ēn. viii. 728). Dāhe vēlti errāre (Luc. Phar. vii. 429).

Dāi, orum, m. a Persian nation who had no fixed habitation (Herod. i. 125).

Dāix, cos, m. the Jaiik, a river of Sārmātia, now of Tartary, which separates it from Turkistan, and falls into the Caspian Sea (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Dālmātia, æ, f. one of the principal divisions of Illyricum, which had Mārē Hādriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, on the west. In modern times, geographers, in general, employ Dalmatia to denote what was anciently called Illyricum, or part of Illyricum. Inh. Dālmāte, anciently Dēlmāte (Vel. Pat. ii. 39), arum, m. the Dalmatians, a ferocious people who subsisted chiefly by plunder. Augustus subjected them to the government of Rōma, Rome. Adj. Dālmāticus, a, um. Dālmāticus triūmphus, his (C. Asīnulus Pōl-līo) triumph over Dālmātia (Hor. Od. ii. 1. 16). Dālmāticī flūctus, the billows of the Gulf of Venice, on the coast of Dālmātia (Luc. Phar. ii. 402). Dālmāticum mārē, the Gulf of Venice (Tac. Ann. iii. 9).

Dālmātiūs, i, m. son of the emperor Cōnstantiūs Chlōrus, by Thēōdōra, and consequently half-brother of Cōstantiūs Māgnus, in whose honour that emperor revived the title of Cēnsor, which had been long discontinued, and which Dālmātiūs appears to have been the last who bore.—2. Son of the former, whom his uncle, the emperor, raised to the dignity of Cēsar, and assigned him Thrācia, Mācedōnia, and Greece for his government. Eutrōpiūs describes him as a man of a very happy genius, and bearing a very strong resemblance to his uncle, the emperor. Soon after the death of that great monarch, he was killed by a faction of the soldiers, a deed which his cousin Cōstantiūs II. rather permitted than commanded (Eutrop. x. 9).

Dāma, æ, m. a servant, or slave, mentioned by Hōrātius (Sat. i. 6. 38).—2. Perhaps a different person (Sat. ii. 5. 101), because he appears to have died rich. Both are probably fictitious characters.—3. A groom, or hostler, whom Pērsiūs describes as faithless, and produces as an instance of the respectability in public opinion, acquired by manumission, and the rank to which he might rise, in consequence of his having acquired mere personal freedom—an acquisition of little value, in the opinion of that poet, in comparison with the mental freedom, which a wise man obtains by the government of his passions (v. 76).

Dāmaeus, i, m. a name of Nēptūnus, called Dāmaeus pater (Pin. Ol. xiii. 98).

Dāmāgētes, æ, m. the father of Diagōras (Pin. Ol. vii. 32).

Dāmāgōras, æ, m. commander of the Rhodian fleet in the Mithridatic war (Ap. Bel. Mith. 187).

Dāmālis, is, f. a woman addicted to drunkenness and lewdness (Hor. Od. i. 36. 13).

Dāmārāta, æ, f. a daughter of Hērō, king of Sīracūse, who was married to Andranodōrus. After the murder of her nephew, Hērōnōymus, the young king, to whom Andranodōrus had been principal tutor, she advised him to secure his present station, probably with the ultimate view of obtaining the crown. Finding the state so ardent in their love of liberty, he considered it prudent to accede to their requests. He was probably insincere in that concession, for being dunned by the importunities of his wife, he meditated a counter-revolution, which cost him his life. After Andranodōrus had been put to death by the senate, a decree passed that all the royal family should be cut off, which was instantly executed on Dāmārāta (Liv. xxiv. 22—25).

Dāmārātus, v. Dēmārātus, et, Dāmārētus, i, m. a native of Corinth, one of the Bāchliādæ, who, according to Diōnysius of Hālicārnassus, traded between his native city and Tuscany, by which means he acquired great wealth. When Cypsēlus overpowered the Bāchliādæ, Dāmārātus considered his property unsafe under that tyrant, on which account he removed to Iuly, and settled at Tārquinii, where he married a woman of family; by her he had two sons, Aruns and Lūcūmo, whom he instructed both in the literature of Greece and Tuscany. On their attaining the age of manhood, he married them to women of the first families, and died of grief, on the death of his elder son, Aruns, who left no children, and Lūcūmo became the heir of his whole property (Dion. Hal. iii. 46: iii. 47).—2. A native of Cōrinthus, who settled in Etrūria, Tuscany, and communicated to the Etrurians a knowledge of letters. The form of the Latin letters was the same as that of the ancient Greek (Tac. Ann. xi. 14).

Damāseo, ōnis, m. a Sicilian commander, whose widow, a woman of lewd practices, Agāthōcles married (Just. xxi. 1).

Dāmāscus, i, m. a king of Sīria, from whom the city took its name (Just. xxxvi. 2).

Dāmāscus, i, f. Demesh, or, El-sham, the capital of ancient Sīria, stands on the west side of an extensive plain, bounded for the most part by mountains. Jūstinus derives the name from Dāmāscus, one of its kings (xxxvi. 2). It extends in length about two miles and a half, and, at its greatest breadth, to three quarters of a mile. The Barady, or, the Berde, called in Scripture, Abāna, and, by the Greeks, Chrūsōrrhōas, supplies this town with water, branching out into several small streams, which pass through the gardens in different parts of the city. The houses, each of which has its fountain, are built chiefly of mud and wooden rafters, sometimes of small bricks sun-dried. To Damascus and Emesa, Ammianus Mārcēlinus ascribes a very high antiquity (xiv. 8). Dāmāscēna, æ, v. Dāmāscēnē, es, f. the territory of Dāmāscus, used also as the name of the town. Ventōsa Dāmāscus (Luc. Phar. iii. 215). Inh. Dāmāscēni, orum (Sing. Dāmāscēnus, l.), m. Atf. Dāmāscēnus, a., un. Cum Dāmāscēnia senibus (prunis) (Mart. v. 18).

Dāmāsichthon, ōnis, m. the sixth son of Amphion and Niōbē, killed by Apōllo, at the same time with his brothers, on mount Sipylus. Ovidius has described the manner of his death (Met. vi. 254).

Dāmāsippus, i., m. a surname of Jūnia gens, according to some, and of Licīnia gens, according to others. See Jūnius.

Dāmāsippus, i., m. a Roman of rank, who, after he had ruined his fortune by an extravagant passion for ancient busts and statues, became a Stoic philosopher. Cicero mentions him (Epist. ad Fam. vii. 23), and Hōrātius has introduced him to ridicule the favourite maxim of the Stoics, that all men were mad except themselves. The poet uses this weapon with great success, not only against the dogma of that sect, but also against the vices or follies, which he wished to expose to contempt or derision (Sat. ii. 3. 64).—2. A fictitious character introduced by Juvēnalis, as a nobleman who excelled in horsemanship, which the name implies (Sat. viii. 147).

Dāmāsthes, is., m. a Grecian author mentioned, but not commended, by Strābo, and the quotation from him by Vālērīus Maximus seems to render his veracity very questionable (viii. 13).

Dāmāstor, ōris, m. a giant of great cruelty (Claud. xxxvii. 101).—2. A Lycian, the father of Tlepōleumus. Dāmāstōrides, a., m. Tlepōleumus (Hom. II. xvi. 416).—3. A noble Ithacan, the father of Agēlaüs. Dāmāstōrides, a., m. Agēlaüs (Hom. Od. xx. 321).

Dāmāsus, i., m. a man in the army of Pōlīxenes, killed by Hemon in the Theban war (Stat. Th. viii. 494).—2. A man in the Trojan army, killed by Pōlypētes, a centaur (Hom. II. xii. 183).

Dāmīppus, i., m. a Lacedæmonian, sent from Syracūse to Philippus, king of Mācedōnia, in 214 B. C., but he was taken prisoner by the Roman fleet. To the proposal of Epīcydes q. c., who wished to ransom Dāmīppus, M. Claudius Mārcellus was not averse, as the Romans were anxious for the alliance of the Ætōli, who were then in friendship with the Lacedæmonians. The deputies on the part of Epīcydes and Claudius met at a place where the latter estimated the height of the Syracusan wall by the rows of stones, and, finding it lower than had been supposed, one of them informed his commander, and the result of this discovery was the taking of the city (Liv. xxv. 23).

Dāmīurgus, v. Dēmīurgus, i., m. a magistrate of the Achæi, so called from Δαμναι, public, and εργον, business. They were ten in number, five of whom declared for the alliance of the Romans at Sicyon, and five against it. The father of one of those who opposed it, Mēmnon, threatened to put him to death, when he joined, and the decree passed (Liv. xxxii. 22).

Dāmīus, i., m. the commander of the fleet of Eumēnes, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 28).

Dāmōcles, is., m. a youth of the Argīvi, who formed a plot for rescuing his native city from the tyranny of Nābis, in 197 B. C. At first he was cautious, but afterwards became careless, by which means the design was discovered to Pŷthagōras, who commanded for his father-in-law, Nābis, tyrant of the Lacedæmonians. When sent for by Pŷthagōras, he perceived the plot was discovered, on which he called to the other conspirators to join him, but they were surrounded by the Lacedæmonians, and killed. Others were afterwards seized, of whom the greater part was executed, and the rest imprisoned. During the next night, many of the Argīvi let themselves down from the walls by ropes, and joined the Romans (Liv. xxxiv. 25).

Damocrītus, i., m. a prætor of the Ætōli, and an enemy of the Romans. From Philippus, king of Mācedōnia, he is said to have received a bribe, which probably secured his interest for him among his countrymen, yet his services could not be of great avail, since he soon fell into the hands of the Romans, who sent him to Italy, where he was thrown into prison, from which he effected his escape, but was pursued, and, to prevent his being taken, stabbed himself with his own sword, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 32 seq.).

Dāmōtas, a., m. a shepherd (Virg. B. ii. 37 seq.).

Dāmon, ōnis, m. a shepherd (Virg. B. iii. 17 seq.).—2. A poet of Athens, but chiefly celebrated for his political knowledge. He taught music, in order to conceal his talents from the vulgar, and, whilst he pretended to give instructions to Pēricles in that art, he communicated to him information respecting government. He was banished by the Ostracism for being friendly to tyranny, and consequently hostile to the liberties of the state. Cōrnēlius Nepos mentions him merely as a musician, but of great celebrity (Epam. 2).—3. A Pythagorean, whose friendship with Pythias has been extolled by various writers of antiquity. Diōnysius, king of Syracūse, condemned him to death, yet, after pronouncing that sentence, allowed him to go and settle his affairs, on condition that he got one to take his place, and to suffer the same punishment, if he did not return at the time appointed. Pythias readily agreed to these terms, but Dāmon appeared just as the sentence was about to be executed on his friend. Lost in admiration at the fidelity of the two, the tyrant remitted the punishment, and solicited a share of their friendship and confidence (Val. Max. iv. 7).

Damotēles, is., m. one of the three ambassadors sent by the Ætōli to the Roman consul, M. Fūlvīus Nōbīlior, to negotiate a peace, in 191 B. C. The terms appeared to them very exorbitant, on which account they returned to consult their countrymen, who, offended at their not having executed their mission, sent them back with orders to accede to any proposal on the part of the Romans; but the Acarnanians, with whom they were at war, seized their persons, and put them in confinement (Liv. xxxviii. 8).

Dānāë, es., f. daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos, and Eurýdicē. To evade the accomplishment of an oracular prediction, which declared that Acrisius would be killed by his daughter's son, he confined Dānāë in a tower, and put her under a close guard, in a bedchamber of brass, to prevent her having children. But this precaution was unsuccessful; for Jūpiter having, in a golden shower (pluvio auro, Ov. Met. iv. 610), entered the chamber of Dānāë, she became the mother of Pērseūs. Both she and her infant son were then, by order of Acrisius, exposed to the sea in a slender bark, which the wind drifted to Sērīphus, Seripho, where both were, by some fishermen, taken ashore, and carried to Pōlydēctes, the king of the island, who committed them to the charge of his brother Dictys. This nobleman paid particular attention to the education of Pērseūs, and to the situation of his mother, for whom Pōlydēctes, at a future period, conceived a violent attachment, but, dreading the anger of her son, wished to accomplish his destruction. After the return of Pērseūs q. v. from the conquest of the Gorgons, and the death of Pōlydēctes, to whom Pērseūs showed the Gorgon's head, Dānāc left Sērīphus, Seripho, and went with her son to Lārissa, where he accidentally killed his grandfather, and thus fulfilled the words of the oracle. Dānāc, with some other emigrants from Argos, according to Virgilius, came into Italy, and built Ardēa, of which the ancient name was Ardūa. On its being burned, the inhabitants said it was changed into a bird, called Ardēa, which, after it was rebuilt, became the name of the city. When Ænēas arrived in Lātium, this city was the capital of the Rūtūli, and Tārquinius Sūpērbus was besieging it at the time he and his family were banished from Rome. Acrisīōnēis, Idis, f. Dānāc, from her father Acrisius (Virg. Æn. vii. 410). Acrisīōnē, es, f. Dānāc (Virg. Cat. xi. 33). Adj. Dānācēus, a, um. Dānācēus Hērōs, Pērseūs (Ov. Met. v. 1).

Dānāus, i, m. a king of Argos, was the son of Belus, king of Egypt, and Anchīnōē, a daughter of Nilus, the Nile. After their father's death, his brother Ægyptus and he ascended the throne as joint-sovereigns. A quarrel having ensued, Dānāus, with his fifty daughters, went in quest of a new settlement. After visiting Rhōdus, Rhodes, he arrived at the court of Gēlānor, king of Argos, by whom he was kindly entertained, and whom he afterwards succeeded in the throne. Of this event, supposed to have happened about 1570 B. C., we find two accounts; the one, stating that Dānāus, taking advantage of Gēlānor's being unpopular with his subjects, compelled him to abdicate; and the other, that Gēlānor voluntarily resigned to him the crown. In Gēlānor the race of the Iuāchīdæ became extinct, and that of the Bēlīdes began to reign at Argos. Proles Dānāi, the daughters of Dānāus (Tib. i. 3. 79). Dānāi, orum, m. the Grecians. Dānāis, idos, f. a daughter of Dānāus. Dānāides, um, v. æ, arum, f. the fifty daughters of Dānāus, all of whom, except Hȳpērmnēstra, in obedience to their father's orders, murdered their husbands, the sons of their uncle Ægyptus, on the night of their nuptials. Adj. Dānāus, a, um, of Dānāus, Grecian. Dānāc classes, the Grecian fleets (Ov. Met. xiii. 92).

Dāndācē, es, f. a small town in Chērsōnēsus Taurica, the Crimea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Dāndārīdæ, arum, m. a people of Cōlchis. Adj. Dāndārīcus, a, um. Dāndārīca terra (Tac. Ann. xii. 15, 16).

Dānthelītæ. See Denthēliti.

Dānūbius, i, m. the Danube, the largest river in Europe, rises in the black forest in Germany, according to Strābo and Plīnius, in the mountain Abnōba, runs in an easterly direction, through Austria, Germany, Hungary, part of Turkey in Europe, and discharges itself into Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea. In its course, which is upwards of 1300 miles, the Danube receives 60 navigable rivers, and 120 smaller streams. In the reign of Thēōdōsius II., a plan for establishing a fleet of two hundred and fifty armed vessels to secure the command of the river was conceived. It is always yellow with mud, and its sands are every where auriferous; but in dignity and sublimity, it is much inferior to several European rivers which it greatly surpasses both in length and magnitude. Hōrātius calls it deep (profundus Dānūbius) (Od. iv. 15. 21). At its entrance into the Black Sea, it is very shallow, its waters are extended over an immense surface, and lie stagnating among an infinity of reeds and other aquatic plants. The current of this river communicates a white colour to the sea, gives a freshness to it for nearly nine leagues, and within one league renders it fit for use. The dolphins, which every where else exhibit a dark colour, are, at the mouths of the Danube, perfectly white. Pōmpōnius Mēla says it had as many mouths as the Nile, of which three were small, and four navigable; only two now remain, which can scarcely be entered by ships considerable either for size or burden, the rest being choked up. The ancients gave the name of Ister to the eastern part of this river, after its junction with Sāvus, the Sava, and Ovid has Septemplex Ister, a proof that the Romans, in general, believed that this river had seven mouths. Though of great breadth and depth in many places, it is not generally navigable on account of the cataracts. Strābo, Diodōrus Sicūlus, Tacītus, and Plīnius, have given descriptions of this river in many respects different, and all exceedingly inaccurate. With the whole course of the Danube the Greeks and Romans were very imperfectly acquainted. They thought that one of its mouths was in the Gulf of Venice. Their knowledge of the countries to the north of this large river was almost wholly obtained by vague report from unlettered barbarians, and, of course, very incorrect. About the year 104, Trājānus, in his second expedition against the Dāci, by which he reduced the country to a Roman province, built at Viminacium, Ram, in Hungary, a bridge of one-and-twenty arches across the Danube. These arches rested on twenty pillars of hewn stone, a hundred and fifty feet high, and sixty broad, founded in the stream. The land-breasts would, consequently, be nearly of the same height. Two of the arches only were of stone, the rest of timber, strongly and boldly executed. This is proved by its delineation on Trajan's pillar. Each arch was a hundred and seventy feet in span, which, added to the breadth of the pillars, each sixty feet, make the whole length of the bridge four thousand seven hundred and seventy Roman feet. Part of the pillars still remain. In the decline of the Roman empire, to that people the Danube became better known, in consequence of almost all the barbarous nations who assailed that state, commencing hostilities by ravaging the country on the banks of the Danube. But learning had sunk with the state, and no minute or accurate account of this river is found in classic authors.

Dāōrsei, orum, m. a people of Illyricum, to whom L. Anicius Gallus, praetor, by order of the Roman senate, granted liberty and exemption from taxes, because they had forsaken Carvantius, and come, with their armies, to the Romans. This immunity was granted them after L. Anicius Gallus had sent Gēntius, king of the Illyrii, prisoner to Rome, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26).

Dāphnē, es, f. the daughter of the river Pēdēus, the Salampria, by the goddess Tērra. Apōllo fell in love with her, and whilst she fled from him, on her entreating the gods for assistance, she was changed into a laurel, which has since been sacred to Apōllo. On account of this god delighting in laurel groves, he is sometimes called Dāphneus. In allusion to her flight from Apōllo, Mārtialis calls her fugitrea Dāphnē (xi. 44). Dāphnōn, ōnis, m. a grove of laurels (Mart. xii. 50).

Dāphnē, es, f. Nero, a village of Sýria, forty stadia from Antiochia, Antakie, on Orontes, the El-asi. From ancient description, it appears to have been a place of great beauty, on which account it was often resorted to and frequently became the scene of great voluptuousness. Adjoining to the town was a large shady grove, watered by numerous springs, and, in the middle, stood a temple sacred to Apōllo and Diāna. Strābo makes the circumference of this grove eighty stadia. Here the inhabitants of the neighbouring country celebrated games, probably sacred to the deities above-mentioned. The son of Antiochus, king of Sýria, was engaged in performing these games, when Hannibal arrived, on his flight from Carthage, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 49). The modern name used by the Greeks, has been derived from the Hebrew word signifying water. Isā. Dāphnēus, ium, m. to whom Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus gave some ground, in order to extend the grove, as he went from Antiochus to Hierosōlyma, in 64 B. C. Adj. Dāphneus, a, um.—2. A fort in Mæsia, built by Constantine the Great (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 5).

Dāphnēus, ōis, m. the priest of Apōllo at Cirrha, Xeropegano, whom the priest of Jūpiter struck from his horse in the Theban war, an act which Jūpiter commended, and Apōllo bewailed (Stat. Th. viii. 453).

Dāphnida, e, m. a grammarian who accused Homer of falsehood (Val. Max. i. 8).

Dāphnis, idis, v. is, m. the name of a shepherd (Virg. B. v. 20–25). A variety of opinions has been advanced respecting the person whose death is lamented by Virgilius in the fifth bucolic under this name. Some have supposed the shepherd mentioned in next article, others Jūlius Caesar, whilst several maintain that Quintilius Vārus, a relative of Virgilius, whose death is bewailed by Hōrātius, is understood, and not a few suppose that Flīceus, a brother of the author, or, Sālōnūs, formed the subject of this beautiful pastoral. The first conjecture is the simplest, and liable to the fewest objections, on which account it ought, perhaps, to be adopted; the more so, as the death of Dāphnis is lamented in the first Idyllium of Thēocritus, of whom Virgilius is a frequent imitator.—2. A son of Mērcūrius, who was born in Sicily. His employment was that of a shepherd, and he excelled in playing on the flute; but was deformed in his person. A nymph formed a strong attachment to him, and petitioned that he should not have intercourse with any other, but when drunk he violated this engagement by intimacy with the queen of Sicily, on which the nymph, transported with anger, deprived him of sight. According to Ovidius, he was a Cretan or Phrygian, and she transformed him into a stone (Met. iv. 277).—3. A man killed in an engagement between the Romans and Carthaginians off Sicily, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 462 seq.). From the character given of Dāphnis by Silius, it seems probable that Ovid and this poet meant the same person.

Dāra, a, f. a Parthian city near the Caspian Sea, which Jūstinus commends for its strength, and beauty of situation (xli. 5). In different authors it has different names, Asca, Arsacia, Eurōpus, Acgrīgas, or, Dāra.—2. Dara, a town in Mēsōpōtāmia, to the S. of Nisibis.—3. A river of Cārmānia, mentioned by Ptolemy.

Darādax, ācis, m. the Fay, a remarkable fountain, from which issues a stream supposed by some to be now called Rajik, that runs into the Euphrātes. It is now ninety-two geographical miles from Mýriāndrus. Geographers give the same name to both the spring and river.

Dāraps, āpis, m. a king of the Gāngārīdæ, a Scythian nation, whom he sent under Dāthis against the Argonauts, since, from being lately wounded in battle with the Achēmēnī, he could not, in person, lead them to the field (Val. Flacc. vi. 65 seq.).

Dārdānēnses, ium, m. an Asiatic nation, through whose territory the river Gýndes passes, before it joins Tigris, the Dejīlah (Herod. i. 189).

Dārdānia, a, f. a country lying to the north of Mācēdōnia, and to the south of the Danube, on which Philippus first made war, in 213 B. C. Isā. Dārdāni, orum, m. Livius describes them as inveterate enemies of the Macedonians, and in his history records several of their attacks on that people. Had the monarch just mentioned accomplished his object, which was the extirpation of the Dārdāni, because they were ever on the watch to take advantage of the misfortunes of the Macedonian kings, he would have settled the Bāstārnæ, a German nation of Gallic origin, in their stead (Liv. xxvi. 25 seq.). C. Scribōnius Cūrio subdued them in 75 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 95). Adj. Dārdānus, a, um. Dārdānus rex (Just. xxiv. 4).—2. The ancient name of Trōja q. v., so called from its founder Dārdānus q. v. It gave name to the district in which it stood (Phed. Prol. 3). According to Sāllūstius, the country was called Dārdānia, from its inhabitants the Dārdāni, of whom Midas was king, who took possession of Phrygia (Frag. 1). Dārdāni, et, Dārdānī, orum, v. Dārdānīdæ, arum (Sing. Dārdānīdæ, a, m. the inhabitants of Troy and the adjacent district, whom Ænēas, with Archilōchus and Acīmas, sons of Antēnor, commanded in the Trojan war (Hom. Il. ii. 819 seq.). Dārdānis, idis, f. of Troy, applied to females or nouns feminine. Dārdānis Caiēta (Mart. x. 30). Adj. Dārdānus, et, Dārdānūs, a, um. Dārdānus dūctor, P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus (Sil. Ital. i. 14). Dārdānum, i, n. a promontory and town of Trōas on Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles (Liv. xxxvii. 9. 37).

Dārdānus, i. f. a town near Abŷdos (Herod. vii. 43).

Dārdānus, i. m. the son of Jūpiter and Elēctra, who, to obtain the kingdom of Etrūria, a district of Itālia, Italy, put his elder brother Iāsius to death. Being obliged to quit his native country, in consequence of this murder, he fled to Sāmōthrācē, and thence to Teūcria, where he married Bātia, the daughter of Teūcer, after whose death he ascended the throne. This, which is the general opinion, has been disputed, and Virgil, Æn. iii. 170, seems to support a different statement. Iāsiusque pater must either mean that Dārdānus was the son of Iāsius, or that Iāsius lived to a great age, and thus tacitly contradicting the murder, which, in our humble opinion, was the object of the poet. Dārdānus built a city, from him called Dārdāniā q. v.—2. Son of Bias, killed with his brother Lāōgōnus by Achilles (Hom. II. xx. 460).

Dārdas, w. m. one of the prætors of the Epirōtæ, who met with Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, at Phōnicē, in Epirus, to negotiate a peace between him and the Romans, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 12).—2. A king of Mācēdōniā, who died in early life (Just. vii. 2).

Dāres, ētis, m. a Trojan, the priest of Vūlcānus. He had two sons, Idæus and Phēgeus (Hom. II. v. 9).—2. A Trojan, who, after Entellus had surpassed him at the cestus, was killed by Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. xii. 363).

Darītæ, arum, m. a native of Mēdia, from whom the country was called Darītis (Herod. iii. 92).

Dārius, i. m. son of Hystāspes, a Persian nobleman. On the death of Cambyses, Orōpastes, pretending to be Smērdis, brother of the deceased monarch, seized on the crown, and Dārius, with six other noblemen, formed a conspiracy against the usurper. On their plan being carried into execution, they agreed among themselves, that the crown should be conferred on him whose horse neighed first. By a skilful device of the groom, the horse of Dārius gave the first neigh, and the other noblemen immediately hailed him king. That the families of these conspirators might have a permanent mark of distinction, it was determined, that they should be admitted into the royal presence without introduction, and that the wives and the concubines of the king should only be taken from among them. Dārius mounted the throne of Pērsia at twenty-nine years of age, and his subsequent reign places him high amongst the kings of antiquity. He took, by incredible labour, Bābŷlon, after a siege of twenty months, and then directed his arms against the Scythians. Their immense extent of country, their prodigious numbers, added to their national hardness and martial courage, proved more than a match for his troops, natives of a more genial soil. Returning, not crowned with glory, but almost overwhelmed with disgrace, he next marched against the Indians, a people most unlike the Scythians in every respect, therefore easily defeated. A war broke out between him and the Greeks, in which the sons of freedom and valour triumphed over his prodigious armament, under Dātis and Artāphērnēs, in the plains of Mārāthon, Marathon, and gained immortal renown by their victory. After the destruction of this, which was his second, army, for the Thracians had cut off the first, he became more exasperated, and determined to march at the head of his troops to extirpate the Athenian nation. Death terminated his mighty preparations, and, most probably, deprived the Athenians of a victory as memorable as that of Mārāthon. This great monarch, whose name occurs in Sacred Writ, is supposed to have died in 485 B. C., after a reign of thirty-six years. To him Claudianus refers (xxxix. 17).—2. Son of Xērxes, killed at the suggestion of Artabānus, by his own brother, Artāxērxes (Just. iii. 1).—3. Dārius Ochus, whom historians generally call Dārius Nōthus, from his being a son of Artāxērxes Lōngimānus, by one of his concubines. His brother Sōgdianus, having rendered himself odious by the murder of his sovereign, and of Bagorazus, the most trusty eunuch which his father had, Ochus took up arms, defeated him, and, on his surrendering, caused him to be suffocated among ashes, and Arsites, another of his brothers, having also taken up arms against him, experienced the same fate. He enjoyed little tranquillity during his whole reign, one insurrection following another, and, at last, submission to his government was refused by the Egyptians, whom he had not strength to reduce to obedience. By his wife Parysatis, he had three sons, Artāxērxes, whom the Greeks surnamed Mnēmōn, on account of his remarkable memory, Amēstris, and Cŷrus the younger. The last was his mother's favourite, and she procured for him the government of Asia Minor, but could not prevail on his father to proclaim him heir to the crown. Dārius Nōthus died in 405 B. C., after a reign of nineteen years, and was succeeded by his eldest son.—4. Eldest legitimate son of Artāxērxes Mnēmōn, to whom his father resigned his crown in his lifetime, and he requited this act of uncommon generosity by meditating the murder of his father, and admitting fifty of his brothers into the plot. The treacherous design was discovered in time to save the life of Artāxērxes, and the consequence was the destruction of Dārius and his associates, with their wives and children (Just. x. 1).—5. Dārius, surnamed Codomannus, obtained the crown of Pērsia on the death of Dārius, through Bagōas, who expected him to act as he should please to direct. Disappointed in this expectation, Bagōas brought him a poisonous drink, of which the king had previous notice, and, therefore, got rid of this dangerous eunuch by obliging him to swallow the draught. Alexander the Great, having formed the design of conquering the East, advanced against the Persian monarch, secure on his throne against internal commotions, defeated his troops in every engagement, and, at last, his own officers became unfaithful, seized his person, and treated him with insult and cruelty. On the approach of Alexander, these perfidious soldiers discharged their weapons at him, by which he was mortally wounded. Alexander bewailed his death, interred his body with the highest honours, and having, at last, Bēssus, the principal traitor, in his power, delivered him up to the friends of Dārius, who put him to death by torture, in 330 B. C., after he had reigned six years. With this monarch ended the Persian empire, two hundred and nine years after it had been founded by Cýrus (Just. x. 3 seq.).

Darēus, ēos, f. a town of Cýrēnāica, or, Pēnāpōlis (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Dārša, ē, f. a city of Pisidia (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Dascylēum, i, n. Dinskilo, a city of Bithýnia (Herod. iii. 120 seq.).

Dāsius, i, m. a Brundisian, who betrayed Clāstidium to Hānnibal, for four hundred pieces of gold (Liv. xxi. 48).—2. One of the two leading men at Sālāpīa, in 212 B. C. He was friendly to the Carthaginians; but Blāttius q. v., the other leading man, embraced the interests of the Romans, and prevailed over Dāsius (Liv. xxvi. 38).—3. A man who deserted to Hānnibal, after the battle of Cānnae, and informed him that Rome could not be taken, on account of the Pālladium (Sil. Ital. xiii. 32).—4. A bath-keeper (Mart. ii. 52).—5. A physician (Mart. vi. 70).

Dāsius Altinūs, Dāslī Altīnū, m. of Arpi, a man of no principle, who changed sides as advantage suggested, and offered to betray his native city to the Romans, under Q. Fābius Māximus, consul. To the treachery of his character, Fābius was no stranger, and, therefore, brought his proposal before a council of war, which, after mature deliberation, sent him to Cāles, where he was attended by his guards during day, and watched during night. Hānnibal, who knew he had great wealth, examined his wife, respecting the gold and silver belonging to Dāsius, of which he had no sooner received complete information, than he burned alive both his wife and children. On retaking Arpi, the Romans put himself to death, in 215 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 45).

Dāssirētī, orum, m. a people of Illyriūm, into whose country P. Sūlpicius Gālba, consul, led an army, and took a number of their villages, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 32 seq.).

Datātes, is, m. son of Cāmissāres, a native of Cāria, whose mother was a Scythian, but her name is unknown. Of all foreigners, says Cōrnēlius Nēpos, he was a man of the greatest conduct, with the exception of Hāmilcar and Hānnibal. To the government of the province, which his father held, he succeeded at his death, and his uncommon activity, added to great military knowledge and undaunted intrepidity, rendered him of the greatest service to the Persian monarch, who employed him on every occasion which required promptitude and judgment. This preference excited against him the hatred of the other commanders, who plotted his destruction, and prevailed on him to resign, without the knowledge of the king. Necessity then obliged him to take up arms in his own defence, and, from his knowledge of naval affairs, he became a formidable enemy of Artāxēxes, who failed to overpower him by his armies, and afterwards to cut him off by assassination. At the suggestion of the Persian monarch, Mithridātes, king of Pōntus, by dissimulation, overreached this brave soldier, and, having brought about an interview, he treacherously stabbed him in a cowardly manner, when he had turned his face from him, to look at a particular object (Cor. Nep. in Vit.).

Dataphērnēs, is, m. a nobleman in whom

Bēssus had the greatest confidence, on which account, he admitted him as a participant of his revolt against Alexander the Great. This measure failed, and Dataphērnēs was given up bound to the Macedonian king (Curt. vii. 5 seq.).

Dāthis, is, m. commander under Dūrāps, king of the Gārgāriāe, in the war with the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 65).

Dātis, idis, m. a Persian satrap, whom Aristōphānēs has introduced speaking bad Greek, from whom those imperfectly skilled in the Greek language were called Datismi.

Dātus, i, f. v. Dātum, i, n. a town on the banks of Strýmon, the Strumona (Herod. ix. 75).

Dātus, i, m. a comedian, who incurred the displeasure of Nēro, in exhibiting, by gestures, one drinking and swimming, alluding to the deaths of Claudius and Agrippina (Suet. Ner. 39).

Davāna, ē, f. a town of Mēsōpōtāmīa, near which the river Belias takes its rise (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 3).

Davara, ē, m. a hill near mount Taurus, mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. vi. 41).

Davāres, ium, m. a people of Africa (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5 seq.).

Daucus, i, m. father of Lārīdes and Thýmber. Adj. Dauciūs, a, um. Dauca prōles, Lārīdes and Thýmber (Virg. Æn. x. 391).

Daulis, idis, acc. da, afterwards, Daulia, ē, f. Thaclea, or, Daulia, a town of Phōcis, an inland district of Greece. Thucýdides says, that Phōcis was formerly inhabited by the Thracians; that Pāndion, king of Athens, and Tērēus, from their vicinity, had probably contracted an alliance for their mutual defence; and that the latter reigned in Daulis, where his wife Prōcnē, and her sister Philōmēla served up to him the flesh of his son Itys (ii. 29); which is also the statement of Strābo (613). It is evident that Ovidius did not understand Daulis to be the residence of Tērēus, as he calls him Rex Odrýsius (See Odrýsæ), and Pāndion speaks of the distant residence of his daughter Prōcnē, queen of Thrācia, which would have been absurd, had she lived in the centre of Greece. Besides, the same poet states, that Tērēus went to Athens for Philōmēla, and returned with her to Thrācia, by sea. This mistake may have originated from Thrācia at one period extending as far south as the Isthmus of Corinth. Daulis, idis, f. et Daulia, ē, f. the territory of Thaclea. Daulias, ādis, f. of Daulis, applied to females or nouns feminine. Daulias āles, the nightingale (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 154). Dauliātes pūllæ, Prōcnē and Philōmēla (Virg. Cir. 200). Adj. Daulius, a, um.

Daunīa, ē, f. Capitanata, the northern part of Apūlia, from being under the dominion of Daunus. Mārē Daunīa, that part of Mārē Sūpērum, which washed the coast of Daunīa (Hor. Od. ii. 1. 34). Horātius here refers to the civil wars, and would not the idea be improved in place of the common translation above given, by construing Quod mare cades Daunīa non decolorare, what sea hath not the bloodshed of Daunīa, i. e. slaughter of Roman citizens, discoloured? We understand Daunīa to be used in place of Italia, and the country in place of the inhabitants. Inh. Daunil, orum (Sing. Daunilus, i), m. Adj. Daunūcus, et, Daunūtus, a, um.

Dauniaci campi, the plains of Daunia, or rather of Apulia (Sil. Ital. xii. 429).

Dauus, i. m. king of the Rütüli, who married Vēnīla, sister of Amāta, daughter of Pīlūmnus and grand-daughter of Sātūrnus. By her he had two children, Tūrnus and Jūtūrna. His sister-in-law, Amāta, was the wife of Lātīnus, king of the Latins, whose only child was Lāvīnīa. Adj. Daunius, a, um. Daunius hēros, Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. xii. 723). Daunīa dea, Jūtūrna (Virg. Æn. xii. 785). Daunīa gens, the subjects of Dauus, i. e. the Rütüli (Virg. Æn. viii. 146). —2. The son of Pīlūmnus and Dānāc, who reigned over part of Apulia. To him Stātilius alludes (Syl. v. 3. 163). —3. An excellent orator, killed by Hānnībal at the siege of Sāgūntum, Murviēdro (Sil. Ital. i. 440 seq.).

Dāvus, i. m. a servant or slave of Chrēmes (Hor. Sat. i. 10. 40). The allusion is to Terence's play of Andria, as is also Pērsius (Sat. v. 161). Menander has the merit of being the original, Terence only copies or imitates the Grecian bard.

Dēbitor, ōris, m. a debtor. According to the Roman law, when a debtor was unable to pay, and could not, within thirty days, find security for the sum which he owed, the judge delivered him over to his creditor bound with cords, or fetters, of not less than fifteen pounds' weight; but they might be heavier. He was then kept in prison for sixty days at his own expense if he chose, if not the creditor was bound to give him not less than a pound weight of meal a-day. At the end of that time he might be put to death, or sold for a slave; and when the creditor took him to himself, the treatment of the adjudged debtor was often more cruel and merciless than that of the purchased slave. This state of servitude did not entirely destroy the rights of a Roman citizen; but the privilege availed little, since it did not protect his person from stripes. In 325 B. C., a law passed restricting the power of the creditor to the goods of the debtor, and prohibiting from putting him in chains or fetters. From that period a debtor was not liable to confinement (Liv. viii. 28). It appears, however, that that law did not continue long in full force, since the people often complained of their being subjected to imprisonment for debt, and often attempted to procure an entire remission of debts, which they were never able completely to procure. By the laws of the twelve tables, when the debtor had more creditors than one, and had not property to satisfy all their claims, they might, if they chose, cut his body in pieces, and divide it among them. It is true, A. Gellius states, that the Romans never carried this law into execution, so far as he had heard (xx. 1), yet this was entirely owing to the clemency of the creditor, and such a legislative enactment shows the severity of the framers of the constitution against all whom misfortune or misconduct rendered insolvent. Most of the laws of the twelve tables were borrowed from the Greeks, and a creditor at Athens had power not only to sell his debtor into a foreign country, but even his children. Among the Jews, the debtor became the slave or bondman of the creditor, who had not power to sell him. The debtor was not even to be compelled to serve as a bondman, but as a hired servant; and his master was not to rule over him with rigour (Levit. xxv. 39, 53). Besides, debtors went out from servitude in the year of the jubilee. The children of that nation did not, in consequence of their father's insolvency, become bondmen or slaves.

Dēcēbālus, i. m. a king of Dācia, whom Trājanus compelled to sue for peace, and to yield to severe terms. According to some, this monarch broke the treaty, after which that emperor marched against him a second time and conquered him, on which he killed himself. Dēcēbālus attempted to cut off Trājanus by means of assassins, a design in which he failed, and he next attempted, by violating the person of an ambassador, to procure peace (Eutrop. viii. 2).

Dēcēlia (Dēcēlēa, Herod.), a, f. Tatoi, a town and castle of Attica, built by Dēcēlus, whence the name. It was fortified by Agis when he made war on the Athenians in 417 B. C. (Paus. iii. 8). Inh. Dēcēlēnsēs, ium, m. (Herod. ix. 73).

Dēcēmvrī, orum, m. ten Roman magistrates, all of patrician rank, appointed to compile the laws brought by the commissioners from the states of Greece, in 450 B. C. During that year there was no other magistrate, from their sentence lay no appeal. This was the third form of government at Rome; the first was monarchical, the second republican, and the third decemviral. They entered on office on the Ides of May, administered justice one day each in succession, which they did at first with great impartiality, and laboured with great diligence and ardour in framing the laws, which they completed and exhibited for public inspection on ten tables. In a speech to the people they declared the purity of their motives, referred each law to the judgment of the whole community, and avowed that those only should be ratified which had the sanction of general consent. To the people all appeared correct, and, therefore, the laws of the ten tables, which Līvius calls the source of all Roman jurisprudence, both with respect to public and private affairs, were ratified at the Cōmītia Cūrīāta. To complete the Roman law, two tables appeared wanting, and the commons, from hatred of the name of consul, and the leniency of the decemviri, agreed to appoint decemviri for another year. Persons of the highest dignity in the state sued for the office, but Appius Claudius q. r., baffled their united exertions, placed himself at the head of the list, and raised to the decemvirate men of very inferior rank in life. From this period their conduct was cruel, tyrannical, and oppressive. Dreaded and detested, all ranks hoped they would resign on completing the two tables; but, instead of laying down their office, they collected around them a number of young patricians, proceeded to beat some of the commons with rods, others they beheaded, and a grant of his effects followed the execution of the owner. In the struggle between patricians and plebeians, mutual hatred had arisen to a very great height, the principal men of the former rank detested the decemviri, but they did not less detest the commons who now looked up to their former patrons for protection, but without success. To the sharers of the confiscated property, the continuance of the decemviri seemed the surest means of gratifying their inclination. Without consulting either senate or people, the decemviri retained their office another year; and how long the state might have been oppressed by their cruelty and rapacity it is impossible to say, but the commencement of hostilities on the part of the Sabines and Æqui, brought matters to a crisis. From the senate not being consulted during the decemviral domination, many of the senators had retired to the country, and it was found impossible to convene a number sufficient for the exigency. At last, in a full house, the conduct of the decemviri was censured with great freedom and severity, their continuance in office rendered them, in the opinion of their countrymen, private persons, whose iniquitous proceedings might be held up to general detestation without injury to the dignity of office. By means of the young patricians, these tyrants carried that a levy should be made, that the army should be led wherever they thought proper, and that no other business should be done till this was completed. To Q. Fabius the command of the army was given. Appius Claudius remained at home, as his violence was considered better calculated to suppress the commotions in the city. Neither the troops which marched against the Æqui, nor the Volsci were successful, and the brutal conduct of Appius Claudius towards Virginia excited a revolt in the camp at Algidum, which was soon followed by the other army. Still the decemviri clung to office, assigning as a reason that the laws of the last two tables were not yet ratified, but resistance against a community is vain, and necessity compelled them to abdicate in 448 B. C., when consuls were elected. Claudius and Sp. Oppius Cornicen died in prison, the rest were banished, and their goods confiscated (Liv. iii. 32—58). Adj. Decemviralis, is, e.

Decemviri Sacrorum, commissioners for performing religious rites, of whom the one-half were patricians, and the other plebeians. At first the number was two duumviri sacrorum, and raised to ten in 368 B. C. Silla added other five. Their duty was to inspect the Sibylline books in dangerous conjunctures, and to expiate prodigies and omens. It was their duty to prescribe the kind of sacrifices deemed most acceptable to the gods, either for averting calamity, alleviating distress, or procuring favour. Connected with this part of their office was the appointment of supplications or thanksgivings, of which they regulated both the continuance and manner. Besides the celebration of the secular games, they performed the sacrifices of Apollo, of whom they were the priests, on which account each had in his own house a brazen tripod. They held their office for life, were exempted from military service, and from certain duties in the city.

Decētia, s. f. Decise, a town of the Ædūi, on a rocky island in Ligēris, the Loire, about 153 miles southeast from Paris. Hither Cæsar summoned the senate of the Ædūi, and those who took part in the election disputed between Convictōlitanis and Cōtus (Cæs. B. G. vii. 33).

Deciānus, i. m. a man, whose conduct and opinions Mārtialis commends (l. 9 &c.).

Deciātes, i. m. a people of Ligūria, conquered by M. Fulvius Nobilior, or by Q.

Fulvius Flaccus. Both these Romans gained victories over the Ligurians (Flor. ii. 3).

L. Decidius Saxa, L. Decidi Saxæ, m. a native of Cētibēria, and a steady friend of Cæsar, by whose interest he had been made tribune of the people. After Cæsar's death he joined himself to Antony. When lieutenant-general in the army of M. Antonius, he was defeated in Syria by the Parthi, under T. Attius Labienus, in 41 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 127).

Decimus, i. m. a prænomen among the Romans. Appianus always writes Dēcimus, not Dēcūs; hence it is probable it was the right name (Bel. Civ. 518 &c.). In general the initial letter only is given.

Dēcimus Brūtus, Dēcimi Brūti, m. one of Cæsar's officers, to whom he gave the command of his fleet in the Gallic war, with which he defeated the Venetians, and afterwards the people of Marseilles, in two engagements during the civil war (Cæs. B. G. iii. 11 seq.). He was one of the conspirators against Cæsar, and exerted himself in the cause of the republic, but lost his life in the north of Italy by means of Cāpēnus q. v., after he had been some time disguised in the Gallic dress. Appianus writes that Cæsar intended to have made him consul next year (Bel. Civ. 588. Vel. Pat. ii. 56 seq.).

Dēcimus Pācārius, Dēcimi Pācārii, m. governor of Cōrsica, in the year 69, who rashly endeavoured to prevail on the inhabitants to join Vitellius against Otho, which he partly accomplished by violence; but the Corsicans afterwards asserted their independence and put him to death (Tac. Hist. ii. 16).

C. Dēcimius, C. Dēcimii, m. was sent one of three commissioners, in 173 B. C., to Crēta, Candia, elected city prætor two years after, and the following year sent an ambassador to put an end to hostilities between Antiochus, king of Syria, and Ptolēmaeus, king of Egypt. He appears to have been a man of prudence and moderation from his speech to the Rhodians, recorded by Livius (xlii. 35 seq.).

C. Dēcimius Flāvus, C. Dēcimii Flāvi, m. a tribune of the Roman soldiers, who displayed great bravery in an engagement with Hannibal, in 211 B. C., snatching the standard of the first company of spearmen, commanded the company of that standard to follow him, advanced to the place where the elephants were throwing all into confusion, and, by discharging their weapons at these huge animals, rendered them unmanageable. In their flight they broke the Carthaginian ranks, on which the Romans, both horse and foot, made a brisk charge, drove the enemy from the ground, and obtained a bloody victory (Liv. xxvii. 14).—2. Elected prætor, and obtained the jurisdiction of the city in 186 B. C. and died same year (Liv. xxxix. 32—39).

L. Dēcimius, L. Dēcimii, m. a commissioner to the prince of Illyricum, from whom he was suspected of taking money, and from whom he returned to Rome, without effecting any thing, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 37, 45).

M. Dēcimius, M. Dēcimii, m. a Roman, sent ambassador with Tib. Claudius Nēro, to Crēta and Rhodus, in 174 B. C., to renew the treaties of friendship, and to watch the motions of Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xlii. 19).

Num. Dēcimius, Num. Dēcimii, m. a native of Bövlānum, and the most distinguished of all the Sāmmites (Liv. xxii. 24).

Dēcius, a, um. Dēcia gens, a Roman clan which produced several illustrious characters (Virg. G. ii. 169).

Dēcius, i, m. a Samnite, whom C. Jūlius Caesar defended in a speech, which Tācītus reckons his best (Orat. 21).

Dēcius Cālpurniānus, Dēcli Cālpurniāni, m. prefect of the nightwatch, put to death by the emperor Claudius at the time he had discovered the guilt, and resolved on the death of the empress Mēssālina, in 48 B. C. (Tac. Ann. xi. 35).

Dēcius Jubellius, Dēcli Jubellii, m. a præfect, who commanded a Campanian legion sent to garrison Rhēgium, 283 B. C., which murdered the inhabitants and seized the town. For this savage act, the legion were afterwards obliged to lay down their arms, and were beheaded (Liv. Ep. 12—15).

Dēcius Lælius, Dēcli Lælii, m. a noble Roman, who, with C. Triārius, commanded the Asiatic ships under Pōmpēius (Cæs. B. C. iii. 5). According to Appiānus, he was killed by the soldiers of Arābio, a king of Africa, during the second triumvirate. Cicerō has introduced him in his treatise, De finibus bonorum et malorum. Adj. Læliānus, a, um.

Dēcius Māgius, Dēcli Māgii, m. a native of Cāmpānia, continued the steady friend of the Romans during the second Punic war, and keenly opposed Pācūvius Cālāvius in surrendering Cāpūa to Hānnibal. He refused to wait on the Carthaginian general, when summoned did not obey, for which he was loaded with chains, and led by a lictor into the Carthaginian camp. Fear of a commotion prevented Hānnibal's depriving him of life, and, therefore, he put him on board a ship to be conveyed to Carthage. A storm drove the vessel out of her course, and they landed at Cŕēnē, then under the dominion of Egypt. Dēcius Māgius fled to the statue of Ptolemy, whence the guards conducted him to Alexāndria, and the Egyptian monarch having heard of his treatment allowed him to return either to Rome or Cāpūa, but he preferred remaining in that country (Liv. xxiii. 7, 10). To him Silius Itālicus alludes (xi. 158).

M. Dēcius, M. Dēcli, m. a tribune of the people who, in 311 B. C., carried a law, that the people should constitute two commissioners for equipping and refitting the fleet (Liv. ix. 30).

P. Dēcius, P. Dēcli, m. one of the two deputies sent from the army in Illŕyricum to inform the Roman senate, that Gēntius, king of that country, had been taken prisoner, and his whole dominion subjected to the power of Rome, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 3).

P. Dēcius Mūs, P. Dēcli Mūris, m. a Roman, appointed a commissioner, with other four, for regulating the interest of money, and payment of debts, in 351 B. C. They were called Mēnsārīi, i. e. bankers. When tribune of the soldiers, he extricated the Roman army under A. Cōrnēlius Cōssus, who had marched into a deep defile, and the enemy, the Sāmmites, had taken possession of the heights; afterwards, by his advice, the consul fought the enemy, and took their camp, for which services he received great rewards, including graminēa corōna obsidō- alis. In his consulship, 339 B. C., he and his colleague marched a powerful army against the Latins, and, in consequence of a dream which they both had, as soon as the line which he commanded in battle began to give way, devoted himself for the safety of the state. His body was found next day, and his funeral celebrated in a manner becoming his death (Liv. vii. 21 seq.).—2. Son of the former, on obtaining the consulship in 312 B. C. was prevented, by the state of his health, from quitting the city, and by direction of the senate he nominated C. Jūnius Būbūlcus dictator. To his bravery and that of M. Vālērīus was ascribed a great share of the honour of conquering the Sāmmites, which procured him the consulship in 309 B. C., when Etrūria, Tuscany, fell to his lot, where his military character and force of arms carried all before him. After being master of the horse to P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, he was raised to the censorship, in which office his judicious regulations in the orders of the state procured him the surname of Māximus. As the Dēcli were plebeians, he naturally supported every law which granted them additional honour or influence. In his third consulship, he marched the legions against the Sāmmites, and assisted his colleague in desolating their country. As proconsul, he retained the command of the army, took several towns in Samnium with an immense quantity of spoil. At the request of Q. Fābius Māximus, he was appointed consul the fourth time, but a contention unhappily arose betwixt them respecting Tuscany, which the senate wished to be given to Fābius without having recourse to the lots. The people opposed this procedure, Dēcius concurred with them, yet so candid, fair, and open was the conduct of his colleague, that on the senate referring the matter to the people, they voted that province to Fābius, who, when appointed to choose another commander to aid him in the war, chose Dēcius. To the rashness of the latter, who did not attend to the character of the enemy, may be attributed his defeat, on which, with the same imprecations, to which he added others of horrible import, and in a similar habit with his father, he devoted himself for the Roman army, and rushing into the midst of the enemy was killed (Liv. ix. 28 seq.). To him Hōrātius has been supposed to allude (Sat. i. 6. 20); but the epithet nōvus would, with more propriety, be referred to his father, whom the poet certainly had in his eye. To both father and son Jūvénālis alludes (Sat. viii. 254).

P. Dēcius Subūlo, P. Dēcli Subūlōnis, m. one of the three commissioners appointed to settle a colony at Aquilēia in 171 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 17).

Q. Dēcius, Q. Dēcli, m. a tribune of the people who brought L. Opimius to trial before the Commons, because he had imprisoned citizens before conviction (Liv. Ep. 61).

Dēcius, i, m. the commander of a Roman cohort, who fought with great bravery when the Numidians attacked a fort on the river Pagida, the Fissato, and continued to resist the enemy after his troops had deserted him. He fell in defending himself with uncommon fortitude in the year 19 (Tac. Ann. iii. 20).

Dēcūrio, ōnis, m. an officer of the cavalry among the Romans, who commanded ten men. Each Turma, or troop of horse, had three Décúriōnes, and each Décúriō chose a subaltern, who was, on that account, called Optio.

Deditamēnes, is, m. became governor of Bābylōnia, under Alexander the Great, on the death of Margēus, in 328 B. C. (Curt. viii. 3 seq.).

Delānira, w. f. daughter of Cēnēus, king of Cālēdon, and wife of Hērēcles, who obtained her in return for breaking off one of the horns of Achēlōus. That hero afterwards resolved to go to Cēyx, king of Trāchis, and having swummed over Evēnus, the Phidari, he gave Delānira to Nēssus a centaur appointed, according to his own account, ferryman of that river, by the gods, for his justice. Nēssus, having attempted to injure Delānira in the passage, Hērēcles shot him through the heart with a poisoned arrow. Before he expired, Nēssus informed Delānira that his blood, mixed with a particular ingredient, the name of which it would be improper to mention, would act as a charm in securing or regaining the affections of her husband. She afterwards, dreading the loss of his attachment, and believing the truth of the declaration of Nēssus, sent him a tunic, infected with the composition above referred to, which had no sooner become warm on his body than he began to putrify, and such exquisite pain was occasioned, that he erected a funeral pile on Œta, Banina, stretched himself upon it, and with an unaltered countenance saw Phlōetētēs apply a burning torch to the wood by which he was reduced to ashes. From grief, at having unintentionally occasioned his death, Delānira hanged herself. From Pausānias we learn that she died at Trāchis, and was buried near Œta, Banina (ii. 23). She had three children to her husband, of whom the most distinguished was Hyllus q. v. Ovidius makes Dēxāmēnus her father (Ib. 404), and Hýginus has adopted the same opinion (31).

Dēlcōon, ōntis, m. a friend of Ænēas, son of Pērgēus, honoured by the Trojans like the sons of Priāmus. He was killed by Agāmēmon (Hom. II. v. 534 seq.).

Delānira, w. f. daughter of Lēcōmēdes, king of Scýros, Sciro, who had a son by Achilles, whilst he remained at her father's court, concealed in a woman's dress. To this child his parents gave the name of Pýrrhus, probably from his father's assuming the name of Pýrrha at that court.—2. Daughter of Eāclēs, king of the Mōlōssi, sister of Pýrrhus and wife of Dēmētrius (Just. xiv. 6).

Dēllēon, ōntis, m. a companion of Hērēcles, brother of Autōlēus and Phlōgius, who attached himself to the Argonauts at the city Sinōpē, where, after long wanderings, he, Autōlēus, and Phlōgius, had fixed their abodes (Val. Placc. v. 115).

Dēlōchus, i. m. a Theban, one of the fifty whom Etācleus sent to murder Týdēus, ambassador at his court from Argos, as he returned to that city, but fell by the hand of that hero, as did all his companions, except one (Stat. Th. ii. 608 seq.).—2. A man whom Týdēus mortally wounded in the Theban war (Stat. Th. viii. 697).

Dēlōces, is, m. son of Phrōrtes, a man of great wisdom, skilled in the law, who obtained the crown of Mēdia, and built Echātāna (Herod. i. 16 seq.).

Dēlōchus, i. m. a Grecian, who fought against Troy, killed by Pāris. He is the only Grecian mentioned by Hōmērus as being wounded in the back (Il. xv. 341).

Dēlōnē, es, f. the mother of Mīlētus by Apōllo. Dēlōnides, w. m. Mīlētus (Ov. Met. ix. 442).

Dēlōpēa, v. f. a nymph, one of the attendants of Cýrēnē. Virgīlius calls her Asia, probably meaning that she belonged to that division of the world (G. iv. 343). The same poet mentions another nymph of this name, whom Jūno promises to Æōlus, if he destroyed the Trojan fleet (Æn. i. 72).

Dēlōpites, w. m. a man in the Trojan army wounded by Ulysses (Hom. II. xi. 420 seq.).

Dējōtārus, i. m. a tetrarch of almost all Gallōgræcia, and had been called by the senate king of Armēnia Minor, commanded in person 500 cavalry, whom Cæsar calls Gālli, sent by that province to Pōmpēus during the civil war. He afterwards begged the forgiveness of the conqueror, which, in consequence of his age, past services, former friendship, and the solicitations of those who entreated for him, was granted. His son, who was of the same name, and one Philip-pus, were accused of plotting the death of Cæsar; but through the eloquence of Cicēro, he obtained sentence of acquittal. Cicēro's speech in his behalf is still extant.

Dēlphōbē, es, f. priestess of Apōllo and Diāna, was the daughter of Glaucus (Virg. Æn. vi. 36).

Dēlphōbus, i. m. son of Priāmus, king of Troy, described by Virgīlius as a brave warrior (Æn. vi. 495 seq.).

Dēlphylē, es, f. a daughter of Adrāstus and Amphithēa, the wife of Týdēus, to whom she bore Diōmēdes (Apol. i. 8 seq.).

Dēlpylus, i. m. a friend of Sthēnelus (Hom. II. v. 325).

Dēlia, w. f. a girl mentioned by Virgīlius, whom some have supposed to be Diāna, because it was one of her names, or rather epithets, than which conjecture it would be difficult to conceive any thing more foolish or absurd (B. iii. 67). It may be added, that Dēlia applied to that goddess, is not properly speaking a noun, but an adjective, Diāna v. dēa being understood, the same is true of Cýnthia, &c.

Dēllum, i. n. a town of Bēōtia, on the sea-coast, with a temple of Apōllo, built after the plan of that in Dēlos. It was thirty stadia distant from Aulis, and stood probably near the modern village, Arabthi. The temple and grove possessed the privileges of the sacred structures which the Greeks called Asyla (Liv. xxxi. 45 seq.).

Dēlmānium, i. n. a town of Dālmātia, burned by the Roman consul C. Mārcus Figūlus in 158 B. C. Its site is now doubtful. From this town some derive the name of the district Dālmātia (Flor. iv. 12).

Dēlos, i. f. Scythi, an island in Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, one of the Cýclādēs, which Nēptūnus, from pity to Lātōna whom Jūno would not suffer to remain on land, raised by a stroke of his trident from the bottom of the sea, where she bore Apōllo and Diāna. Some maintain that this island formerly floated on the surface of the sea, and that Nēptūnus only rendered it stationary.

This seems to have been the opinion of Ovid, who calls it Erratica Dēlos, and adds, tum cūm levis insula nabal. The etymology of the name (Δῆλος; manifest, perspicuous, visible), gives a preference to the former opinion, which is supported by Plinius and Aristotēles. Of Dēlos, the ancient names were Ortýgia, Cýnthia, Cýnethus, Lāgia, As-tēria, and Chlāmýdia. Ortýgia has been referred to quails (ορνυθία) having been first seen in that island; Cýnthia and Cýnethus, to hunting (οὐρετοῦ πνεύς ἐλ, αἰθῶ), from the ardour of the dogs of chase; Lāgia, to the great number of hares (λαγυαί) in Dēlos; As-tēria to the worship of Apōllo; and Chlāmýdia to the upper robe of the natives. It was also called Pýrplē, from fire having been first found there. Plinius adds, that it is the only island which cannot be shaken by earthquakes. From this island Apōllo is called Dēlius (Ov. Met. l. 454), and his sister Dēlia. Lātōnia Dēlos, from Lātōna having born Apōllo and Diāna on that island (Virg. G. iii. 6); on which account it is also called natālis Dēlos (Hor. Od. i. 21. 10). Adj. Dēliacus, et, Dēlius, a, um, of Apōllo, of Diāna, or of their soothsayers. Dēliacum æs, brass of Dēlos (Plin. v. 91). Dēlia fōlia, laurel leaves (Hor. Od. iv. 3. 6).

Dēlphi, orum, m. Castri, a city of Phōcis, on Párnāsus, about a mile up the hill, remarkable for the oracle of Apōllo, which was long held in high estimation. Of its origin and responses Lūcānus gives a spirited description (Phar. v. 71 seq.). The priestess was called Pýthia from Apōllo, who had the name of Pýthius on account of his having killed the huge serpent, Pýthon. In the midst of the temple of Apōllo was shown in ancient times the centre of the earth (Umbilicus orbis terrarum), i. e. a point exactly at equal distances from the east and west. It is manifest this opinion was founded on the false notion of the earth being a plane, not a globe. To ascertain this point, Jūpiter set off two eagles, some say crows, one from the east and the other from the west at the same instant, which met on the top of Párnāsus. There can be little doubt but the sovereign of Olympos, in his wisdom, select two of equal strength and swiftness, and, conscious both of the dignity and of the importance of their duty, the birds would, to fulfil their high behest, traverse equal spaces in equal times, so that the point may be considered as accurately determined! It would not be easy to imagine any thing more absurd and contemptible than this silly device, an incontrovertible proof of the gross ignorance of the king of the gods; nor does the human mind ever appear more degraded than when wandering in the childish mazes of heathen mythology. Claudīanus has dignified this fiction by recording it in verse, which claims higher praise for elegance of diction and harmony of numbers, than justice could bestow on the contemptible fable (xvi. 11—16). Dēlphi was built in a theatrical form, upon a series of circular terraces of great extent, rising one above another, of which the breastwork was of hewn stone. Considerable parts of it still remain upon the steep declivity of Párnāsus. Castri consists of ninety mud-built cottages, jointly possessed by man and beast; the inhabitants are Arnauts, and, though in general poor, most of them can read and write. The women are distinguished by their native beauty and unadorned elegance. It was likewise called Pýtho, Pýthon, Pýthia, and Dēlphi. It was eleven times plundered before the days of Nēro, that Emperor took five hundred bronze statues from the temple. The prophetic cavern at Dēlphi cannot be discovered; hence the statement of Dio Cassius is probably correct, that it was destroyed by Nēro, who put people to death at its mouth. Diōdōrus Sicīlus says it was in the Adytum of the temple, and Pýthia sat on the tripod, placed over the entrance, when she received her prophetic influence, which sometimes proved fatal to her. Mei Dēlphi, my Delphian responses, i. e. my doctrines which are as true as the answers of the Delphian oracle; my recondite science (Ov. Met. xv. 144). Inh. Dēlphi, orum, m. Dēlphis, idis, f. a priestess of Apōllo. Dēlphicōla, æ, et, Dēlphinus, i, m. Apōllo, from his dwelling at Dēlphi.

Dēlta, æ, f. a considerable part of Lower Egypt, which, from its flatness, difference of soil from the adjacent country, and from its projecting so far beyond the line of the coast, was probably formed by the alluvions of the Nile. It has increased in length and height; but lost about 70 British miles, measuring along the coast on the east, in consequence of three streams of the Nile on that side being now dry, and much of that space has now become desert. The most westerly branch (Ostium Canopicum), being likewise now dry, the Dēlta has thereby lost about 18 miles. Its base is reckoned at 70 miles; E. side 99 miles, W. side 96 miles. The top of the Dēlta is supposed by some to be 6 or 7 miles lower than in ancient times, a conjecture which wants proof. In the age of Mæris, 500 years before the Trojan war, the Nile rising 8 cubits, overflowed the Dēlta; and, in the time of Hērōdōtus, 15 were necessary to cover it, which laid the country under water, two days' journey to the E. and W. of Mētēlis, now Fōia (D'Anville), built by the Melesians. In the time of Psammētichus, it was a seaport, now nine leagues from the shore. But Major Rennel thinks that Mentabes was the ancient Mētēlis, and it is only about 8 miles from Rosetta. The Delta is not now in every place overflowed as in ancient times, partly from the streams being banked out, and partly from outlets to prevent inundation. It is exceedingly fertile, and the only part of Egypt which produces three crops annually. The first is of clover, the second of corn, and the third of rice. In modern times the population of the Delta is very considerable, although probably much less than in the flourishing ages of that celebrated country. On every side of both branches of the Nile, the eye meets only with rich fields of corn and rice, with beautiful groves, seeming to rise out of the watery plains, and to shade innumerable settlements in the Delta, amidst never-ending plantations of melons and all kinds of garden vegetables, so that, from the abundance of its harvest, Egypt appears one of the richest and most fertile countries in the world. It is, however, very unhealthy, and, upon the retiring of the Nile, is one vast swamp. The atmosphere, impregnated with every putrid and offensive exhalation, then stagnates like the filthy marshes over which it hovers. The plague then regularly begins, and seldom ceases, until the waters return again. The inhabitants are almost in the utmost state of wretchedness. See Ægyptus and Nilus.—2. Part of Thrācia, having on the north the Black Sea, on the east the Strait of Constantinople, and on the south the Sea of Marmora.

Dēmādes, i. m. an Athenian orator, who agreed with Phōcion in thinking that Athens should be delivered up to Antipāter, by which Dēmōsthēnes and his fellow patriots were banished from the city (Cor. Nep. Phoc. ii). Pausānias seems to consider him as a traitor (vii. 10).

Dēmānētus, i. m. an enemy of Timōlēon, who spoke slightly of his merits and achievements (Cor. Nep. Timol. 5).

Dēmārātus, i. m. son of Aristo, was a king of Spārta. Having been banished from his native city, he took refuge at the court of Xērxes. Love of country was a stronger passion in his mind than gratitude, and he discovered to the Greeks the plans of the Persian monarch, which enabled them to make preparations against so powerful an enemy. He communicated the information on wooden boards, which he covered with wax and gave them to a faithful servant who conveyed them to the Spartan magistrates, who were unable to conjecture for what purpose Dēmārātus had sent them. The sister of king Lēonidas had the merit of discovering the design of the writer, and, having removed the wax, laid open the plans of the Persian monarch (Just. ii. 10).—2. A rich Samian merchant, the father of the philosopher Pŷthagōras (Just. xx. 4).—3. See Dāmārātus.

Dēmārmēnus, i. m. the father of Prinētādas and Chilo (Herod. v. 41).

Dēmēter, tris, f. a name of Cēres (Hom. II. ii. 696).

Dēmētrias, iadis, f. Volo, the principal city of Māgnēsia, now in ruins. Māgnēsia was its most ancient name, but when rebuilt by Dēmētrius Pōliōrcētēs, it took that of Dēmētrias. From its natural strength and other circumstances, it was regarded as one of the fetters of Greece, as were also Chālceis and Corinthus. At the end of the war with Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, T. Quinctius Flāmiūnus, the Roman commander, retained these three cities, until the plans of Antiochus, king of Sŷria, were known. Notwithstanding the great strength of Dēmētrias, it was frequently taken (Liv. xxvii. 32 seq.). Adj. Dēmētriacus, a, um. Dēmētriacus sinus, the Gulf of Volo (Liv. xxviii. 54).

Dēmētrium, i. n. a town of Phthiōtis on the river Amphrŷsus (Liv. xxviii. 6).—2. A port of Sāmōthrācia, Samothraki (Liv. xlv. 6).

Dēmētrius, i. m. a man who conspired against Alexander the Great in 330 B. C. (Curt. vi. 7).—2. Son of Antigōnus, surnamed Pōliōrcētēs (i. e. the taker of cities). After the death of Alexander the Great, Antigōnus, by the happy terms in which he lived with his son Dēmētrius, became the most powerful of all the successors of that great warrior. Dēmētrius, in his first expedition against Ptolēmaeus, king of Egypt, sustained at Gēza a severe defeat, in 312 B. C., which he soon retrieved by carrying the camp of Cilles, general of Ptolēmaeus, in which he made himself and principal officers prisoners, and repaid the generosity which he had experienced from that monarch, by sending home that commander and his friends loaded with presents. After considerable success in Mēsōpōtāmia, and compelling Ptolēmaeus to raise the siege of Hālīcārnaŷsus, Bodroun, he rescued Athens from the slaves, by whom it was held, and restored the ancient form of government, for which the inhabitants paid him divine honours. Before he had completed the noble plan which he had formed for restoring the liberties of Greece, his father recalled him to fight against the Egyptian king, over whom he obtained a remarkable victory in a naval engagement off Cŷprus, besides taking his wives, friends, arms, machines, and money, which both added to the celebrity of the battle and the treasures of the conqueror. The people now proclaimed Antigōnus and Dēmētrius kings, when all the successors of Alexander soon after assumed the same title. The Rhodians had aided Ptolēmaeus against him on which account he next turned his arms against them; a long and bloody struggle ensued, which at last terminated in a treaty, by which they bound themselves to support him in all wars, except against the Egyptian king. A decisive victory over Cāsānder, who had again laid siege to Athens, restored liberty to the whole of Greece within the straits of Thērmōpŷlæ. A powerful union of the kings, against Antigōnus and Dēmētrius, obliged them to have recourse to arms; in the first engagement Antigōnus fell, and Dēmētrius lost the victory by pursuing too far the forces which he had routed. Reduced almost to poverty, he returned to Greece, when the Athenians ungratefully shut their gates against him. In Thrācia he gained over Lŷsimachus, some important advantages, which, added to Sēlēucus marrying his daughter, Stratōnicē, revived his hopes and raised him to a state resembling his former rank. When fortune put Athens again in his power, he showed a mind above retaliation, and the citizens attempted to gain his favour by the most servile adulation. At the request of Alexander, youngest son of Cāsānder, Dēmētrius and other Grecian princes marched against his brother Antipāter. In this expedition Dēmētrius put Alexander to death, because he had made an attempt on his life by treachery, and was declared king by the Macedonians. This kingdom, conjoined to the cities which he formerly commanded in Greece, rendered him a very powerful prince, nor did he lose a single opportunity of adding to his dignity and the grandeur of his empire. Naturally averse to cruelty, he ever made the most merciful use of his victory, rarely showing the least propensity to resentment. The fidelity of the Grecian states he did not long experience, and necessity obliged him to quit Greece. Having penetrated into the eastern part of Asia Minor, he fell into the hand of Sēlēucus, who kept him prisoner on the borders of the Black Sea till his death, which happened three years after, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. His ashes were conveyed to Greece in a golden urn, and deposited at Dēmētrias. He was a descendant of Miltiādes. His wives were Eurŷdicē, widow of Ophēltes, king of Cŷrēnē, Caren; Phīla, widow of Crātērus, by whom he had Antigōnus and Strātōnicē q. v.; Dēidāmia, who bore him a son called Alexander, after whose death he married Ptōlēmāis, daughter of Ptōlēmæus, king of Egypt, and Eurýdicē, by whom he had a son named Cōrrhæbus. Plūtarchus concludes a long life of Dēmētrius by drawing a comparison between him and M. Antōnius, whom he resembled in military talents and gross licentiousness (Just. xv. 1—xvi. 2).—3. Son of Phānōstrātus, and scholar of Thēophrastus, commonly called Dēmētrius Phālērēus, was a philosopher of great eminence. By his powerful eloquence, political knowledge, and disinterested patriotism he gained the favour of the Athenians, held the office of Archon for ten years, and exerted himself for the public good. Neither his improvements in the city, which he greatly ornamented, the purity of his manners, which even malevolence could not arraign, nor the rectitude of his intentions, which could not be disputed, secured him against the machinations of his enemies. The turbulence of a republic, and the caprice of the people, living under that form of government, were nowhere more conspicuous than at Athens. In their enthusiastic admiration of this good man, they erected to his honour three hundred and sixty brazen statues, many of them equestrian, and such ardour did they exhibit, that the whole was completed within three hundred days. This remarkable display of popular favour disappeared at once in a sentence of condemnation pronounced against him in his absence, for supposed impiety during his administration, through the artifice of his enemies, when the same people, with equal zeal, destroyed the whole statues, with a single exception, selling some, sinking others, and breaking others into pieces, on purpose to make them into waterpots. Having escaped their hands he fled to Egypt, obtained the favour of Ptōlēmæus Sōter, and appears to have been his chief adviser in all important matters. According to some ancient authors, that monarch consulted him respecting the succession. He recommended his giving the crown to a son of Eurýdicē in preference to the son of Bērēnicē. Ptōlēmæus, however, preferred Philādēlphus, son of Bērēnicē, who, after his father's death, sent Dēmētrius to a distance from the capital, where he passed his days in dejection, and died in consequence of having been bit in the hand by a serpent, when he was asleep. He was buried near Diospōlis. When Dēmētrius heard that the Athenians had broken down his statues, he said "They have not overturned virtue, in whose honour they had erected them." Diōgēnes Lācrtius has given a list of his works, all of which have perished. The same author informs us there were twenty distinguished characters of this name, of whom he has given a catalogue. Dēmētrius qui dictus est Phālērēus (Phæd. v. 1).—4. Son of Dēmētrius Pōliōrcētēs, and brother of Antigōnus Gonātas, went to Cýrenē at the request of Arsīnōē, the queen dowager of that kingdom, on purpose to marry Bērēnicē, her only daughter, but forming a criminal connexion with herself, the natives, for that crime, put him to death, but spared Arsīnōē at the request of her daughter (Just. xxvi. 3).—5. Son of Antigōnus Go-nātas and grandson of Dēmētrius, ascended the throne of Mācēdōnia, in 242 B. C., married a sister of Antiōchus, king of Sýria, and afterwards, while this wife was alive, Phthia, daughter of Pýrrhus, king of Epirus, and Olýmpias. He died in 232 B. C. (Just. xxvi. 2—xxviii. 3).—6. A native of Phāros, who had been governor of Cōrcýra, and had commanded the forces of Tēuta, queen of Illyricum, from whom he had deserted to the Romans, afterwards made peace with that queen, and excited the Illyrians to take up arms against the Romans. L. Emilius Paullus, the consul, conquered him, on which he fled to Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, to whom the senate sent ambassadors, in 219 B. C., to demand his being given up (Liv. xxii. 33).—7. Father of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xxxi. 28).—8. Son of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, and grandson of Dēmētrius, last mentioned, was given by his father as a hostage to T. Quinctius Flāminius, 193 B. C., and that general led him before his triumphal car; after which the Romans restored him without ransom, because his father had remained a steady ally, during the war with Antiōchus, king of Sýria. When a number of the allied states had sent ambassadors to Rome, to complain of the conduct of Philippus, with which the Romans themselves had reason to be dissatisfied, that monarch sent Dēmētrius to defend his actions, which that youth did with modesty and success. Regard for the son procured pardon for the father, whose measures would have met with merited censure, had not the favourite, Dēmētrius, pleaded his cause. From considering him the procurer of peace with the Romans, whose arms and vengeance excited general alarm, the Macedonians, on his return, honoured him with greater esteem, which exposed him to the suspicion both of his father and brother. The people designed him for the throne, instead of Pērseus, his senior by birth, but his inferior in every other respect. Jealousy on the part of Pērseus gradually sunk into hatred, and he at last preferred an accusation against him to his father, who seems to have been somewhat of the same opinion, both on account of his popularity with the nobles and his favour with the Romans. Dēmētrius successfully defended himself against the charges of his brother, still some suspicion appears to have remained in the breast of Philippus, who, in consequence of this opinion, and the various artifices of Pērseus, gave orders to put the innocent Dēmētrius to death. The agents employed in that nefarious transaction, executed their commission by means of poison, in the twenty-seventh year of his age, in 183 B. C. After his death the whole scheme was clearly traced to Pērseus, and the groundlessness of the charges completely proved, which embittered the latter days of Philippus, and probably contributed to hasten his dissolution (Liv. xxxiii. 13—xl. 56).—9. A king of the Indians, who besieged Eucrātides, king of the Bactrians, in 181 B. C., and was conquered by that monarch, who reduced India under his subjection (Just. xli. 6).—10. Surnamed Sōter, son of Sēlēucus, and grandson of Antiōchus Māgnus, ascended the throne of Sýria, in 164 B. C., having put to death his nephew, Antiōchus, infant son of Antiōchus Epi-phānes, and his tutor Lysias. By intrigue and power he drove from his kingdom Arinrāthes, king of Cappadocia, whom the Roman senate restored in 158 B. C. He was a very low and vicious character. Alexander Bala, a man wholly unknown, and of an unknown race, put him to death, about 147 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 46-52).—11. Son of the former, surnamed Nicānor, married Clēōpātra, daughter of Ptolēmeus Philōmētor, king of Egypt, and, by the assistance of his father-in-law, killed, in war, Alexander Bala, who had murdered his father and usurped the crown. He engaged in war with the Parthians, whom he frequently defeated in battle; but at last they treacherously got him into their hands, made a show of him, and then he was sent into Hyrcānia, where the Parthian king gave him his daughter in marriage. After making some unsuccessful efforts to escape, he was set at liberty, and, on the death of Antiōchus, regained the throne. The cruelty of this king excited an insurrection against him, headed by one Diōdōtus, by whom he was defeated, and compelled to fly. Diōdōtus then claimed the crown for a son of Alexander Bala, scarcely two years old. His queen procured his death, as she did also that of his son Sēlēucus, because he had assumed the crown on the murder of his father, without her consent (Liv. Ep. 52-60). Justinus says, that Dēmētrius was killed by the commander of a ship, on landing at Tȳrus, in expectation of being saved by the sanctity of the temple, in 126 B. C., twenty years after he had ascended the throne (xxxv. 2-xxxix. 1).—12. A man, whom Hōrātius ridicules as fond of love verses only. Some have supposed that he and Tigēllus were singing masters, by which they became favourites with the ladies; but others have conjectured that they were writers of songs, which were full of soft and tender sentiment. Dacier says, he was a comedian, and is the same person whom Hōrātius calls Simius, an ape, in the same satire (i. 10. 79).—13. A comedian, of great celebrity, whose merits, as an actor of comedy, Quintiliānus has praised, and drawn a comparison between his character and that of Strātōcles (xi. 3. 178).—14. A slave of Mār-tiālis, who acted as his amanuensis. The poet granted him his freedom on his death-bed, did all in his power for his recovery, and wrote some beautiful lines regretting his early death (i. 102).—15. A philosopher of the Cynic school, praised by Sēneca, who calls him not the teacher, but the witness, of truth (Ben. vii. 8 seq.). Pētus Thrasēa was conversing with this philosopher on the immortality of the soul, when a decree of the senate, in the year 66, dooming him to death, arrived. Tācītus blames his defence of a criminal, as displaying more ambition than virtue, which differs from the character given of him by Sēneca, as above quoted, who adds, that he was a man of consummate moral excellence.—16. A philosopher of Alēx-āndria, surnamed Chȳtrus, supposed to be called Chȳtron, by Jūliānus, in his oration to Hērāclius. From Ammōianus Mārcellinus, it may be inferred, that he was a Cynic (xix. 12).

Dēmōchāres, is, m. a freedman of Pompey the Great, who had a command in the fleet under Sēxtus Pōmpeius, and with Apōllō-phānes q. v. attacked and defeated Augūstus, so that he escaped with only one ship (Suet. Aug. 16).

Dēmōcēdes, is, m. a physician of Crōton, whose medical skill raised him to high distinction in his profession. Among those who benefited by his knowledge, was Dārius, king of Pērsia (Herod. iii. 131 seq.).

Dēmōcōon, ōntis, m. a reputed son of Pēriāmus, who herded the royal mares at Abȳdos. He fell by the hand of Ūlysses in the Trojan war (Hom. Il. iv. 500).

Dēmōcrātes, is, m. an Athenian who had served under Dārius, and, after his death, attached himself to the Greeks who fought for hire among the Persians. After the death of that monarch, he despaired of pardon from Alexander the Great, because he had been a violent opposer of the Macedonian interest, and, therefore, killed himself in 330 B. C. (Curt. vi. 5).—2. A commander of the Tarentine fleet, who gained a victory over that of the Romans, but fell fighting bravely when Tarentum was regained by the Romans in 211 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 39 seq.).

Dēmōcritus, i, m. an eminent philosopher who was born at Abdēra, a seaport town of Thrācia, about 460 B. C. His father was a man of so great wealth, that he entertained Xērxes and his whole army in his expedition against the Greeks. It has been said, that the Persian monarch left, in return for this kindness, some of his Māgi, who instructed Dēmōcritus in theology and astronomy. Some consider Dēmōcritus the inventor of the system of atoms, and a vacuum, whilst others say he received this theory from Lēucippus. On his father's death, he received a hundred talents as his patrimony, with that sum he travelled in quest of knowledge into Pērsia, India and Æthiōpia. That he visited distant countries in following out the bent of his own mind, the acquisition of science, admits of no doubt; but whether he penetrated so far east as India, and conversed with the Gymnosophists of Æthiōpia, may be questioned. In this pursuit, he spent the whole of his fortune, and, on his return to Abdēra, he would have incurred the penalty of the law which denied the honours of interment to such as had exhausted their family fortune, had not the citizens in admiration of his wisdom, collected for him five hundred talents. They bestowed on him every honour and mark of distinction, so that he governed the state solely by the superiority of his wisdom, without holding any office in the magistracy. They even erected statues to him in his lifetime, but his love of retirement, and study, made him withdraw wholly from public affairs. He spent all his time in deep contemplation, and may be considered the founder of experimental philosophy. He used commonly to laugh at the follies of mankind, considering human nature as a farce, on which account he has been called the laughing philosopher. Diōgēnes Lāērtius states that he died at the advanced age of one hundred and nine, in 351 B. C. To his carelessness respecting his property, and his deep contemplation Hōrātius alludes (Epis. i. 12. 12), and Jūvēnalis to his perpetual laughter at the vanities of life (Sat. x. 34). It has been stated that he put out his eyes to prevent his attention being withdrawn from the study and contemplation of truth, by means of external objects, a statement which Cicero doubts, and Plutarchus denies. His numerous writings, from which Epicurus borrowed liberally, have wholly perished. Cicero mentions several of his opinions, and seems to have considered him one of the most eminent of all the Grecian philosophers. Sancta sententia Dēmōcriti (Lucret. iii. 372). Dēmōcriticus, i. m. a follower of Dēmōcritus; one who embraced the opinions of that philosopher (Cic. Or. i. 10). Adj. Dēmōcriticus, a. um. Dēmōcritica vērā, truths taught by Dēmōcritus (Cic. de Div. ii. 13).—2. A distinguished character among the Naxii (Herod. viii. 46).—3. A native of Sicily, the intimate acquaintance of Cicero (Epis. Fam. xiii. 78).—4. The master of a Gymnasium, who was a native of Tyndaris, a town of Sicily, hence called Tyndaritanus. Some editions of Cicero have Dēmētrius (in Ver. iv. 42).

Dēmōdocus, i. m. a Trojan killed by Hēctor (Virg. Æn. x. 413).—2. A blind bard or minstrel at the court of Alcinoüs (Hom. Od. viii. 44—64).

Dēmōleōn, ōntis, m. a centaur whom Pēleüs mortally wounded with an ashen spear, after he had attempted to crush Thēseüs with a pine tree. Thēseüs retired out of the way of that weapon which struck Crāntor, separating his breast and left shoulder from his throat (Ov. Met. xii. 368).—2. Son of Antenor, killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xx. 395).

Dēmōlēns, i. m. a Grecian of great bravery, whom Ænēas had stripped of his coat of mail which, at an after period, he gave to Mēnēstheus. He must have been a man of great strength, since two men, Phēgeüs and Sāgāris, with difficulty carried the shield on their shoulders (Virg. Æn. v. 260).

Dēmōnāx, ācis, m. a commander of the Armenians, and governor of the country, who hazarded a battle with the Romans and Iberians, in which he was defeated in the year 46 (Tac. Ann. xi. 9).

Dēmōphilus, i. m. a Cyrenian, commended by Pindar (Pyth. iv. 500 seq.).

Dēmōphōon, ōntis, m. a Trojan killed by Cāmilla (Virg. Æn. xi. 675).—2. Another whose loves Virgilius sings (Cu. 130).—3. Son of Thēseüs, and Phædra, one of the Grecian commanders in the Trojan war. As he returned from that memorable contest, he landed in Thrācia, Romania, visited the court of Lēcūrgus, and courted his daughter Phyllis, whom he promised to marry. He suddenly quitted that country on hearing that Mnēstheus, king of Athens, was dead; but not before he had pledged his faith, that he would return in one month for his betrothed bride. Having been elected to the vacant throne, he violated his promise, and, after she had gone nine times to the shore, on the day of his expected arrival, grief at the disappointment overpowered her reason, and she terminated her life by plunging into the sea, or, according to others, by strangulation (Ov. Ep. Her. ii.). Justinus makes him the successor of Thēseüs (ii. 6). See Phyllis.—4. A soothsayer, or haruspex, in the army of Alexander the Great (Curt. ix. 4 seq.).

Dēmōptolēmus, i. m. one of the lovers of Pēnelōpē, killed by Ulysses (Hom. Od. xxii. 266).

Dēmōsthēnes, is, m. the greatest orator of antiquity, was the son of Dēmōsthēnes, an Athenian, by trade a swordmaker, or blacksmith (Vālerius Māximus says his father's name is unknown, iii. 4). His father died in 374 B. C., before he had completed his eighth year, and his large fortune came under the management of guardians unworthy of the charge. The delicacy of his constitution, added to the negligence of his tutors, allowed his early years to pass without acquiring those branches of education suited to that period of life, or to his inclination. He heard Cāllistrātus successfully plead a cause of great interest, and the approbation which he received from the audience, excited such an ardent desire for the study of oratory, that, neglecting every other branch of learning, he gave himself wholly to his favourite pursuit. The avarice or neglect of his tutors, instead of sending him to the school of Isocrātes, placed him at that of Isæus, of inferior reputation, and, consequently, lower in his charges. Here Dēmōsthēnes acquired those bad habits which he afterwards corrected with so great pains and difficulty. His first efforts at public speaking necessity obliged him to make against his own tutors Aphōbus and Onōtor, and although he succeeded in the action against them for embezzling and purloining his property, yet he recovered from them but a small part of his father's estate. Emboldened by the consequence of his first pleadings, he addressed himself to the popular assemblies, in which he was ridiculed for his inelegant delivery, his confused sentences, and inconclusive arguments. An indistinct articulation, and shortness of breath, heightened his other defects, and convinced him, that in order to secure success, he must acquire proper action, a graceful manner, and forcible delivery. His eagerness and unvaried application at last enabled him to overcome every natural defect, to compose orations which have been the admiration of every succeeding age, and to deliver speeches which excited the rapture and astonishment of all Greece. He overcame the difficulty of breathing, by declaiming as he walked up hill, his defect of utterance by haranguing with pebble stones in his mouth, and disregarded the uproar of republican assemblies by habituating himself to recitation on the coast, when the sea was tempestuous. His awkward gestures he rectified, and acquired an elegant manner by speaking before a mirror, in which he was assisted by an eminent comedian, from whom he learned accuracy of pronunciation, as well as the graces of attitude and action. To compel himself to seclusion and hard study, he used occasionally to shave the one half of his head, which prevented him from appearing in public, and thus obtained a store of useful knowledge, which enabled him to speak and reason with great accuracy and intelligence on any subject which presented itself. His first noble burst of eloquence, his love of country directed against Philip, king of Mācedōnia, in which he proved his patriotism by despising the gold, the threats, and the promises, of that monarch. Plutarchus says, that all the gold of Mācedōnia could not bribe him. His inveterate hatred of Philip, stimulated him by vigorous exertions to combine the united forces of Greece; but their whole strength proved unequal to the Macedonian forces. So far was Dēmōsthēnes from displaying the valour and courage which he recommended in his orations, he showed in battle the utmost cowardice, deserted his post, threw down his arms, and fled in such shameful trepidation, that, mistaking a bush, which had caught his coat, for an enemy, he roared lustily for quarter. Of this dastardly conduct his enemies accused him before the people, who found nothing to blame, and, therefore, acquitted him. On the death of Philippus, Dēmōsthēnes prosecuted the same designs against his son Alēxānder, delivered violent orations against Mācēdōnīa, and wrote letters to induce the officers under the Persian monarch in Asia, to make war on the Macedonian. Alēxānder having settled affairs in his own country, marched an army into Bōōtia, which annihilated the courage of the Athenians, and they appointed ambassadors, of whom Dēmōsthēnes was one, to treat with the young monarch. Dēmōsthēnes had not resolution to meet Alēxānder, and, therefore, quitted the embassy at Cithæron, Elatias, and returned to Athens. Alēxānder demanded ten of their orators to be delivered up to him, a condition from which the intercession of Dēmādes induced him to depart, and to give up his resentment against the Athenians. Dēmōsthēnes accepted twenty talents, with a piece of plate of great value, from Hārpalus, an officer of Alēxānder, who had fled to Athens, for having embezzled the revenues of his master, on which account he fell under suspicion, and Dinarchus accused him of bribery to the people, who, turning their admiration into contempt, would not allow him to speak in his own defence, but fined him fifty talents, and committed him to prison. He soon tired of his confinement, effected his escape, and, having been pursued and retaken, was banished. In his exile he discovered the most unmanly pusillanimity, and, like Ovidius, he would probably not have lived long, had not the decree been soon revoked, and he recalled to his native country. On hearing that Antipāter and Crātērus, after the death of Alēxānder, were coming to Athens, he and his party effected their escape from the city, and Dēmādes prevailed on the people to pronounce sentence of condemnation on them. Archias, at the head of a party sent by Antipāter, pursued them, and, hearing that Dēmōsthēnes had taken refuge in the temple of Nēptūnus in Cālābria, he crossed over, and endeavoured to prevail on the orator to give himself up to Antipāter. Dēmōsthēnes, who distrusted his flattering promises, swallowed the poison which he carried about with him in a quill, and, finding that it had seized his vitals, said to Archias, "Go, tell your master that Dēmōsthēnes will owe no obligation to the usurper of his country," and expired in the sixtieth year of his age. The Athenians bestowed on his memory the honours which he merited, erected to him a statue of brass, and decreed that the eldest of his family should be maintained in the Prytanæum.—2. An Athenian commander, sent with supplies to their army before Syracūse, and, having been defeated by Gylippus, the Lacedæmonian general, in 412 B. C., killed himself (Just. iv. 4 seq.).

Dēmōstrātus, i. m. an Athenian, whom Ephialtes brought to trial and condemned, notwithstanding the attachment which he had to his son Dēmōchāres (Val. Max. iii. 8).

Dēmūchus, i. m. son of Philētor, killed by Achilles. Philētorides, æ. m. Dēmūchus (Hom. Il. xx. 457).

Dēnthēlēti, orum, m. a people of Thrācia, against whom Philippus, king of Mācēdōnīa, marched, in 185 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 53). Adj. Dēnthēlētēus, a, um.

Dēnthēlīatis ager, the ground on which the temple of Diāna Līmniātis stood, which both the Messenians and Lacedæmonians claimed. The former succeeded in the year 25 (Tac. Ann. iv. 43). Perhaps the word is derived from Dentheloi, or, Denthallōi, a city of the Messenians, mentioned by Stephānus. In the common copies it is written Dēlthanōi, certainly a typographical error; and ought to be corrected from Tacitus.

Dēnto, ōnis, m. a glutton, whom Martiālis derides (v. 45). If the same person to whom the epigrammatist addresses viii. 31, he appears to have been a foreigner.

Dēōūs, a, um, of, or belonging to, Ceres, whom the Greeks called Deō (Δεω). Dēōia quercus, the oak sacred to Ceres (Ov. Met. viii. 758). Dēōis, idis, f. Prōserpina, daughter of Ceres, whom Jūpiter violated under the form of a speckled serpent (Ov. Met. vi. 114).

Dērbē, es, f. Alah-Dag, a town of Lyciānā. Inh. Dērbētes, um (Sing. Dērbēs, ētis), m. (Cic. Fam. xiii. 73).

Dērbēes, um, m. a people who appear to have lived near the river Oxus. Their numbers in the army of Dārius were considerable (Curt. iii. 2).

Dērcēnus, i. m. an ancient king of the Laurēntes, whose tomb was a large earthen mound, and shaded by a dark holm tree. On it Opis alighted before she slew Arruns, in revenge for killing Cāmilla (Virg. Æn. xi. 830).

Dērcētis, tis, voc. ti, et, Dērcēto, tis, f. a goddess of the Assyrians, said by some to be the daughter of Venus, and, by others, Venus herself. Diōdorus says that Dērcētis, having suffered violation at the suggestion of Venus, threw herself into the lake near Ascālon, and, on that account, the Syrians do not eat the fish of that lake. On its banks they built a temple to her, in which Lūciānus states that he saw a statue of her, having, from the middle upwards, the appearance of a woman; but the under part was that of a fish.

Dērcēllides, æ, m. a Spartan general, who fought against the Persians, commanded by Pharnabāzus and Tissaphernes, prefects of Artaxēxes, in 399 B. C. (Just. vi. 1).

Dērcēllus, i. m. appointed prefect of Attica by Antipāter. He informed Phōcion, that Nicānor, prefect of Cassānder, had a design upon Piræus, Porto Leone, and the neglect of this information lost that port to the city (Cor. Nep. Phoc. 2).

Dērtōna, æ, f. Tortona, a town in Ligūria (Vel. Pat. i. 15).

Dērtōsa, æ, f. Tortosa, a town of Spain, in the district called Catalonia (Suet. Gal. 10).

Dērūsici, orum, m. a people of Persia (Herod. i. 125).

Dēsītātes, ium, m. a people of Dalmātia, according to Vellēus Pāterculus, but Strābo refers them to Pannōnia (Vel. Pat. ii. 115).

Desudāba, æ, f. a city of Mēdica, in Thrācia, at which the Gauls on their march to join Persēus, king of Mācēdōnīa, in 170 B. C., halted, until they received the pay which he had promised them. His failure to fulfil his engagement, induced them to return to their own country (Liv. xlv. 26).

Deucalion, ōis, m. a son of Prōmēthēus, and, according to Apollōnius Rhōdus, a native of Emōnia, the first who built towns, and erected temples to the gods, and the first who assumed dominion among men (iii. 1087 seq.). He married Pýrrha, the daughter of his uncle Epimēthēus; hence patruelis origo (Ov. Met. i. 352). These two were the only persons saved from the flood. By the advice of the Oracle of Thēmis, they repaired the loss of mankind by throwing behind their backs the bones of their mother, i. e. the stones of the earth. Those thrown by Deucalion became men, and those by Pýrrha, women. Juvēnalis alludes to this event (Sat. i. 81 seq.), where he has servilely copied from Ovidius, and fallen short of the original. The graphic description of the Sulmonian bard exceeded his powers, and he has the demerit of vitiating what he could not equal, by throwing in an impure and reprehensible idea. According to Justinus, the flood was confined to Greece, and destroyed the greater part of the population; the survivors either fled to the mountains, or sailed to Deucalion, whom he makes king of Thessaly, and by whom, for this reason, the human race was said to be restored (il. 6). Prōmēthēus, m. a patronymic of Deucalion. Adj. Deucaliōneus, a, um. Deucaliōnea undæ, the waves of Deucalion, i. e. the waters of the flood (Ov. Met. vii. 356).—2. A Cretan, son of Minos and Pasiphæe; one of the Argonauts. He was the father of Idomēneus, who fought against Troy (Val. Flacc. i. 366).—3. A man killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xx. 478).

Deultum, i. n. a town of Thraciæ, anciently called Develton, which Ammianus Marcellinus writes Dibaltum (xxx. 8).

Deurōpus, i. m. a district of Pæoniæ, near the river Erigonus (Liv. xxxix. 53).

Dēus, i. a god; Plur. Dii, orum, m. gods, or, the gods. The character of Jupiter q. v. sufficiently proves that the heathen world had no just conception of a Divine Being. He possesses none of the essential attributes of Deity. He is neither self-existent, eternal, omnipresent, omniscient, nor omnipotent. So far from being the source of existence, and without beginning of days, he is the son of Saturnus, and grandson of Urānus, or, Cælus. How absurd, then, to call him "the Father of gods and men!" Instead of omnipresent, we find him only in one place at one time, and confined to the range of his own limited senses. His knowledge, like that of men, does not exceed the bounds of his own experience, and the information communicated to him by others; and his power, though it surpasses that of the other gods, which, by the bye, appears to have been matter of chance (Ov. Met. v. 529), is controlled by fate. It is manifest, if Jupiter had been endowed with the perfections which constitute Deity, that his appointments would have formed what is called the order of fate, and not he subjected to the decrees of that inexorable power. Even for the moral virtues in the character of the king of the gods, and of all the other heathen deities, we shall search in vain. But in the perusal of their history, the opposite vices, in connexion with the most abominable usages, very frequently occur. The gods of Greece and Rome had all the appellation of Pater, which originated, not only in reverence, but in the general belief that they were older than men; and that to them the human race was indebted for life, preservation, and sustenance. Their history satisfactorily establishes, that to this respect and veneration they had no claim. That the mythology of the Greeks, which the Romans adopted, with little variation or addition, is of eastern origin, has been generally admitted. Most of the Grecian states seem to have been peopled from Phœnicia and Egypt, and these emigrants would carry into their new settlements the customs and the worship of their ancestors. In after ages, their fables and allegories would naturally assume something of the cast and mode of thinking peculiar to that state of society; and the embellishment of succeeding poets, who adapted them to existing and local circumstances, would gradually disfigure, and, at last, totally destroy, every trace of Oriental descent. To the strong propensity of the Asiatic nations, particularly those in the southern regions, to personification, or the ascribing the qualities of a person to inanimate objects; to the hieroglyphic writings of the Egyptians and some other nations; and to the veneration of ancestry, may be referred many of the fables and allegories of the Greeks and Romans. These fictions gave rise to several of their deities: some, perhaps the greater number, of their gods, were mortals, who received divine honours after their death, originating in the gratitude of their countrymen for the benefits they had conferred on society, either by the discovery of the arts, or the improvement and just administration of the laws. The truth of deification the Cretans not only maintained, but proved, by showing the tomb of Jupiter in their island; and this very circumstance gave rise to the saying of Epimēnides, quoted by the Apostle Paul in his Epistle to Titus, "The Cretans are always liars;" because the other Greeks wished to exalt their national religion by concealing that fact, and others of a similar kind. But from whatever source or cause the mythology of Greece and Rome at first sprang, it cannot be denied, that, as it appears in the writings of these two nations, it is an immense accumulation of the most absurd and contradictory fables. Had contradiction and absurdity been the only charges to which mythology is exposed, the system would have claimed a higher rank than, in its real state, justice can sanction. The actions and passions attributed to most, if not to all, of the heathen deities, are most degrading and criminal—their characters should never be mentioned, unless to be held up to merited infamy and abhorrence. The ancients believed they propitiated Saturnus, Jupiter, Diāna, &c., by offering human victims on their altars. In later ages these horrid sacrifices ceased to be presented: still rites, though less shocking, yet most iniquitous, continued to be practised in the most refined periods of the Greek and Roman states. Respect for the purity of the youthful mind forbids entering into a detailed account either of the rites or characters of these gods. How could deities, whose adoration destroyed mental purity, and every humane affection, be objects of veneration? or how could their worship fail to sink and vitiate the minds of their devoted votaries? Hence the awful state of the moral world at the commencement of the Christian era. Contemptible and pernicious as the religious observances of the Greeks and Romans were, some advantages may be, and have been, derived from the study of them. Among the chief excellencies of their mythology, may be reckoned, its having given to poetry many apt illustrations, and many beautiful images. In the history of the human mind, it is of considerable importance, as descriptive of the moral character of the people by whom it was adopted and believed. But, in modern times, its great and principal use is, by contrasting it with the pure and sublime morality of the Holy Scriptures, to show the invaluable blessing of a Divine Revelation. Dii contubernales (dii cœnantes), two or more gods in one temple; originally only one of the heathen deities was worshipped in one temple. Dii majorum gentium; see Callicola.

Dexagoridas, æ, m. who, with Gorgopas g, v., commanded the city Gythium, which was besieged by the Romans, in 197 B. C. When every thing had been arranged for giving up the town to the Romans, agreeably to the proposal of Dexagoridas, Gorgopas put him to death as a traitor (Liv. xxxiv. 29).

Dexamenēs, es, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. II. xviii. 44).

Dexamenus, i, m. father of Dēlānira, the wife of Hercules, according to Ovidius (Ib. 404), and Hyginus (31). Apollodorus makes Encus her father.

Dexias, æ, m. father of Iphionus, hence called Dexiades (Hom. II. vii. 15).

Dia, æ, f. an ancient name of Naxos, one of the Cyclades (Ov. Met. iii. 690).—2. Stan-Dia, an island near the northern coast of Cræta, Candia.

Diabas, æ, m. a river of Assýria, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, but some maintain that Adiabas and Diabas should be written Zabas and Anzabas (xxiii. 6).

Diablites, ium, m. a people of Gallia Celta, on the river Mēdūāna, the Mayenne. Their chief town was Neodunum, afterwards Diablites, now Jublens (Cæs. B. G. iii. 9).

Diacra, æ, f. Hit, a town of Assýria (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 2), which Ptolémæus calls Idicra.

Diadumēnus, i, m. a man to whom Martialis inscribes several of his poems, which do greater credit to the personal beauty of Diadumēnus than to the purity of the poet (iii. 63 &c.).—2. Son of the emperor Mācrinus and the empress Nōlla Cēsa, whom his father invested with the title of Cæsar, and gave him the surname of Antōnius, in the ninth year of his age. He was afterwards declared Augustus, and killed at the same time with his father, when the troops of the boy Heliogabalus had obtained a decisive victory, before he had reached his eleventh year (Eutrop. viii. 21).

Dicus, i, m. the chief promoter of the insurrection among the Achæi, was chosen their commander on Critolæus putting himself to death, because he had been defeated at Thēr-mōpyle by Q. Cæcilius Mētellus. L. Mūm-matius, the consul, conquered him at Isthmos, and all Achæia submitted, in 148 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 52).

Diagoras, æ, m. a Rhodian nobleman, remarkable for his height, who gained the prize for boxing at the Olympic games (Pin. Ol. vii.).—2. A philosopher, whom the Athenians banished from their city, because he declared he did not know whether there were gods at all, and if there were, of what nature (Val. Max. i. 1).

Diālis. See Flāmen.

Diāna, æ, f. (called by the Egyptians Bubastis), the daughter of Lātōna, and sister of Apōllo, was the goddess of woods and hunting. From her aversion to marriage, she was considered as the protectress of virgins. We find this goddess represented in various ways, all of which had a relation to her favourite amusement, the chase. In heaven she was known by the name of Lūna, and the ancients early discovered that she shone by reflected light, hence Cātullus, addressing the moon, notho lūmine, of bastard light, i. e. borrowed light (xxxiv. 15); on earth she was called Diāna, and in the Infernal Regions, Prōsērpina, or, Hēcātē. Under these three characters her power and offices are neatly and accurately described in the following lines:

Tenet, lustrat, agit, Proserpina, Luna, Diana,
Ima, suprema, Ieras, sceptro, fulgore, sagitta.

Hence Dica triformis, triplex Diāna, tria virginis (hābentis) ora, the three-faced virgin (Virg. Æn. iv. 511), &c. Her statues stood at the junction of three ways, on which account she was called Trīcia. From the places where she was worshipped, and the offices which she performed, she derived a number of surnames. She had a grove near Aricia, Nemi, in which her fleet stags grazed, to which Ovidius alludes (Met. xiv. 331). The ancients in sacrifice offered to her a goat, a white kid, a boar pig, or an ox. On her altar at Sparta human victims were at first offered, afterwards it was annually besmeared by the blood which flowed from the stripes inflicted on young men (Paus. iii. 16). Among plants, the poppy and the dittany were sacred to her. Scythica Diāna, from her being worshipped in Taurica (Ov. Met. xiv. 331). Nocturna Diāna, the nightly moon (Ov. Met. xv. 196). Manālia Diāna, Atālānta (Stat. Th. xii. 125). Adj. Diānulus, a, um. Diānia turba, i. e. dogs, from her being the goddess of hunting (Ov. Fast. v. 141). Diānum (sacellum) (Liv. i. 48).

Diaulus, i, m. a man who had formerly been a surgeon, and afterwards an undertaker, who buried the dead at night (vespillo), the only way, says Martialis, he could become clinicus (i. 51).

Dicea, æ, f. Bourikhane, a town of Thræcia on the lake Bistōnis (Herod. vii. 109).

Dicæarchus, i, m. of Plātæa, who proposed that a treaty of friendship should be formed with the Romans, to which all the states of Bœōtia agreed, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 2).—2. Brother of Thōas, prætor of the Ætōli, who was sent to Antiochus, king of Syria, to excite him to war against the Romans. Mānius Acilius Glābrio, consul, on the submission of the Ætōli, demanded that Dicæarchus, Menētas of Epirus, and Amynder, should be given up to him, which Phœneas, prætor of the Ætōli, refused, and the war was continued (Liv. xxxvi. 28).

Dicālēdōnes, um, m. a Pictish nation, who inhabited part of Scotland. They are supposed to be the same with the Cālēdōnes (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 8).

Dicārchus, i, f. et, Dicārchia, ae, f. afterwards Puteoli, Puzzuolo, q. v., a town of Cāmpānia. Campagna, which had this name, according to Festus, from being governed with the greatest justice. It was also called Minor Dēlus. Iah. Dicārchēnses, ium (Sing. Dicārchēnsis, is), m. Adj. Dicārchēus, a, um. Dicārchēum profundum (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 3). Dicārchēa prōles (Sil. Ital. viii. 533).

Dicē, es, f. the goddess of justice (Pin. Ol. xiii. 8).

Dictātor, ōris, m. a Dictator, an extraordinary Magistrate at Rome, who possessed absolute authority over not only the lives and fortunes of his fellow-citizens, but even over the laws themselves. A free government could only admit of such an officer being appointed on important and alarming conjunctures. We find from Roman history, that the first Dictator was chosen during the wars with the Latins (499 B. C.), and that his appointment was a consequence of the Plebeians refusing to enlist, and of the consuls being unable to protect the state. C. Marcus Rūtillus was the first plebeian Dictator, in 355 B. C. (Liv. vii. 17). Unless when threatened with imminent danger, either from domestic sedition or foreign wars, the consuls held the highest office, and the laws set bounds to their powers; but the Dictator knew no restriction. Twenty-four Licitors preceded him, and, whilst he remained in office, the functions of the other Magistrates, with the exception of that of Tribunes of the people, were suspended. Livius says, that Sūlla was the first dictator that had twenty-four licitors (Ep. 89). The Dictator proclaimed war, levied forces, and marched against the enemy; or made peace or disbanded them whenever he pleased. Execution followed his decision, and from his judgment lay no appeal. At the expiry of his office, which could not exceed six months, he might be called to account for his conduct; but few instances of it occur in the annals of Rome. M. Fūrius Cāmillus held it for a whole year, in 388 B. C. (Liv. vi. 1). Bravery does not extirpate credulity, nor does greatness of mind obliterate the fictions of ignorance. Though a nation of intrepid warriors, the Romans were credulous and superstitious, hence; to avert a plague, to remove some dreadful calamity, or to stop the progress of an invading enemy, they sometimes named a Dictator to drive a nail into the temple of Jūpiter, which trivial and absurd ceremony, they foolishly thought possessed these virtues. These nails were driven into the right side of that edifice, where was the temple of Minēva. Some are of opinion that these nails were the number of the years, and that the law appointing this observance was published in her temple, because numbers were the invention of that goddess. The custom was afterwards dropt (Liv. vii. 3). They sometimes too appointed a Dictator to hold the comitia, or to celebrate public festivals, and once to choose Senators. But for these purposes, except on particular occasions, the state had seldom recourse to the election of that Magistrate.

When circumstances occurred, which, in the opinion of the senate, justified the appointment of a Dictator, they instructed one of the consuls to name the man who should fill that high office. The tribunes of the people appear to have had the power of compelling the consuls to name a dictator, and Q. Sērvilius Priscus called on them to exercise that authority, in 430 B. C., which they did (Liv. iv. 26). After taking the auspices, the consul chose any person of consular rank whom he deemed proper, and the time of appointment was most commonly the dead of night. Sometimes the senate insisted on the consul naming a particular person, an order which some refused to obey, maintaining that the appointment of a dictator, was vested solely in the consuls. In 212 B. C., the senate decreed that the consul should consult the people, and nominate to the dictatorship whomsoever the commons should order; that on the consul refusing, the praetor should consult the people, and if he also refused compliance, then the tribunes of the people should propose the question to the commons. This year the consul M. Valērius Lavinus refused to ask the judgment of the people, and forbade the praetor to do it. The plebeian tribunes then consulted the commons who ordered Q. Fūlvius Flaccus to be appointed, but the consul went off privately to Sicily, and his colleague, at the request of the senate, nominated the dictator fixed on by the people (Liv. xxvii. 5). See M. Lūcrilius. The first act of the dictator seems to have been the appointment of the Master of the horse. Besides commanding the cavalry, this officer waited on the dictator and executed his orders. In several instances the senate or the people elected the master of the horse, but these may be considered as deviations from common practice, since the Dictator had the power of that nomination. M. Fābius Butō was dictator in 218 B. C. without a master of the horse (Liv. xxiii. 22). It does not appear that the public money was at the disposal of the Dictator, unless by the authority of the senate, or an order from the people. Without the permission of the people he could not ride on horseback, and only one instance of a Dictator leaving Italy is mentioned in Roman history. For two of these restrictions strong arguments might be adduced. The residence of a magistrate invested with such extraordinary powers, propriety restricted to the capital or its vicinity; and an uncontrolled expenditure of the national funds would have violated rights long held sacred. But an appeal to the people for liberty to appear on horseback, must be referred to some prejudice unworthy of the general character of the Romans. The usurper Sūlla, trampling on the laws of his country, assumed the title of Perpetual Dictator, after that office had been discontinued a hundred and twenty years, i. e. from the time Hānnibal quitted Italy (Vel. Pat. ii. 28). And Jūlius Cēsar, actuated by the same lawless ambition, followed his example. The cruelties of the former, and the calamities brought on the State by the latter, rendered the name of Dictator detestable, and at last procured its final abolition. Dictātūra, ae, f. the Dictatorship, or, office of Dictator. Adj. Dictātōrius, a, um, of, or belonging to, a Dictator; dictatorial.

Dictē, es, f. Sitie, a mountain in Candia, where Jūpiter was nursed. Diodōrus Sicīlus mentions a city of the same name on this mountain, built by Jūpiter. Dictaēs, Idis, f. of Dictē, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Adj. Dictaēs, a, um, of Dictē, of Crēta, Cretan. Dictawm antrum, the cave, or den of Dictē, in which Jūpiter was concealed (Virg. G. iv. 152). Dictaa rura, the Cretan fields (Ov. Met. iii. 2).

Dictynna, ae, f. a name of Diāna, from dicta, nets, by which one of her nymphs was preserved; or from her delighting in hunting. This name appears to have been peculiar to the Cretans, according to Pausānias. Hērōdōtus says they received it from the Sāmii when they settled for some time in Crēta (Ov. Met. ii. 441. Virg. Cir. 245).—2. A nymph of Diāna, and a particular favourite of that goddess, on which account, some are of opinion she was called Dictynna.

Dictynna, ae, f. Cape Spada, a promontory of Candia.

Dictynnum, i, n. a place near Sparta, on which side the Romans attacked that town. It was open without a wall (Liv. xxxiv. 38).

Dictys, ōs, m. one of the pirates who carried away Bāchus, and was changed into a dolphin (Ov. Met. iii. 615).—2. A native of Sēriphus, Serpho, whose employment was fishing, hence Stātius, fluctuāgus Dictys. He found the boat in which Acrisius had exposed Dāniūc and her son Pērseus, floating near Serpho, rescued both from their perilous situation, and carried them to his own house, where he protected the mother and brought up her son (Stat. Syl. ii. 1. 95).

Didas, e, m. a native of Pēōnia, and one of the pretors of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, who adopted the interest of Pērseus, and accomplished the death of Dēmētrius by the most dishonourable means. He exerted himself to procure funds for his favourite, after he had ascended the throne, and had resolved to commence hostilities against the Romans (Liv. xl. 23 seq.).

Didius, a, um. Didia gens, a Roman clan. Didius, i, n. one of Caesar's officers, who commanded a squadron at Gādes, Cadiz, and pursued Cn. Pōmpēius who, after being defeated, was killed and his head brought to Caesar. Proud of this success, Didius hauled his ships ashore to be refitted, and retired himself into a neighbouring port, but the Lusitāni who had escaped from Mūnda attacked him, and at last drew him into an ambuscade, in which he was defeated, and slain, with the greater part of his followers.

Didius Jūlianus. See Sūlcus.

Didius Scæva, Didii Scævæ, m. one of the most distinguished of those who lost their lives when the soldiers of Vitēllius burned the capitol, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. iii. 73).

A. Didius Gallus, A. Didii Gālli, m. a Roman officer who succeeded Ostōrius, as governor of Britain, in the reign of the emperor Claudius, perhaps about the year 51. The Britons gained some advantages during the interval between the death of Ostōrius, and the arrival of Didius. The latter performed nothing memorable in Britain, merely retaining what his predecessors had acquired. He commanded a Roman army in the east against Mithridātes, king of Bōsphorus, and left Cōtys, a youth of little experience, on the throne (Tac. Ann. xii. 15—40).

T. Didius, T. Didii, m. was proprætor and gained some advantages over the Scīr-disci, in 114 B. C., and fourteen years after held the consulship with Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Nēpos. When proconsul, he conquered the Cēltibēri, in 98 B. C. Q. Sērtōrius served under him in the rank of a tribune of the soldiers. He and his colleague Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus, passed a law regulating the manner of proposing and passing laws, which was called from these consuls Lex Cæcilia Didia (Liv. Ep. 70). To him some suppose Ovidius refers (Fast. vi. 568), and he is mentioned by Sāllūstius (Frag. 1). Adj. Didius, a, um.

Dido, ūs, v. ōnis, f. a daughter of Bēlus, king of Phœnicia. Her proper name was Elissa, and Dido, which, in the language of Phœnicia, signifies virāgo, seems to have been given from the manly intrepidity with which she quitted her native country, and established a colony among a distant and unknown people. She was a woman of great beauty, and married Sichæus (whom Jūstīnus calls Acerbas), her maternal uncle, and priest of Hērclēs, whom her brother Pŷgmāllion murdered, on which she put her valuable property on board ships, and sailed in quest of a new settlement, accompanied by all who dreaded the cruelty or hated the tyranny of Pŷgmāllion. She touched at Cēprus, where the priest of Jūpiter, with his wife and children, offered, by the admonition of the gods, to accompany her, on condition that the priesthood should be continued to his posterity. This proposal, having been considered a favourable omen, was accepted, on which she seized eighty Cyprian girls, who were preparing to comply with one of the immoral practices of that island, and sailed for the African coast. She landed in a bay to the west of Bāgrāda, the Mejerda, where she is said to have bought, from the natives, as much ground as she could encompass with a bull's skin, which was hence called Bŷrsa, from Bōrsæ, a skin. See Bŷrsa. In this transaction she discovered both ingenuity and mathematical skill, for she not only cut the skin into very small thongs, but, after joining them, laid them in the form of a circle, a figure which encloses the largest space by the smallest bounding line. On that ground she built Carthage, one of the most celebrated cities of antiquity. This is the generally received account of her settlement in Africa, and the only one which occurs in the poetical writings of the Greeks and Romans. Nor do the historians differ materially in their narrative, although there is little doubt of its being fabulous, since it is certain that this Phœnician colony, for many years, paid an annual tribute to the natives for the lands which they occupied. Numbers flocked into the new city, which added both to its wealth and celebrity. Hīārbas, king of the Maurītāni, demanded Dido in marriage, threatening war in the event of a refusal. The ambassadors, fearing to make the proposal to her openly, had recourse to stratagem, by which she was ensnared, and at last answered that she would go where the fates of her city required. She spent three months in erecting a funeral pile, as if to appease the Mānes of her husband, before she entered into a second marriage, killed many victims, took a sword in her hand, ascended the pile, and, looking back on the people, said, "As you command, I go to my husband." When she had uttered these words, she ended her life with the sword. Virgil's account is, that, having been courted and deserted by Æneas, she terminated her life on the funeral pile, after her betrayer had sailed for Italy. As long as Carthage remained unconquered, she was worshipped as a goddess. According to Justinus, Carthage was founded seventy-two years before Rome, consequently upwards of three hundred years after the time in which Æneas is supposed to have lived. This anachronism of Virgilus has been often mentioned, and some fruitless attempts have been made to justify the poet against that charge, from the uncertainty of the period when Carthage was built. On this point the ancient historians differ widely, and Livius states, that Carthage was destroyed in its seven hundredth year, an event which took place in 147 B. C. According to this computation, that city was built ninety-four years before Rome. Now if Dionysius of Halicarnassus be correct, in his account of the reign of the Alban kings, Æneas died 331 before the foundation of Carthage, so that the Romans could not believe that their founder and Dido were contemporaries. The poet has thrown a number of good qualities into her character, which interest the reader in the fate of that unhappy princess. She is tenderhearted, affectionate, benevolent. To the dignity of a queen she adds the prudence of a legislator. Her own misfortunes made her compassionate the distresses of others, and neither the grandeur of riches, nor the sceptre of power, injure or conceal the amiable qualities of the woman in the stateliness of the queen. The fortitude with which she mounts the funeral pile, when deserted by her faithless and coldhearted lover, and the greatness of mind which made her despise life when calumny might blacken, and malignity stain, her reputation, exalts her in the opinion of every reader of her tragical story, who laments the unmerited fate of the Carthaginian queen. The injury which Virgilus has done to the character of Dido, detracts greatly from the merit of his poem. Phœnissa, and Sidon, Dido, from Sidon, her native city, being the capital of Phœnicia (Virg. Æn. i. 670, 446 seq.).

Didymæ, arum, f. an island in Mædægæum, the Archipelago (Ov. Met. vii. 469).

Didymæus, i, m. a name of Apollo among the Milesians. Adj. Didymæus, a, um. Didymæa limina, the thresholds of Apollo's temple at Miletus, Palatichia (Stat. Th. viii. 199).

Didymæon, ōis, m. an artist, of great ingenuity, whom Telamon killed (Virg. Æn. v. 359. Val. Placc. iii. 707).

Didymæ, es, f. Salini, one of the Liparean islands, which the Latins called Geniella, from its form. It has several craters, and abounds with vines, fruit trees, and grain (Ov. Fast. iv. 475. Plin. i. 349).

Didymæon, ōis, m. a temple of Apollo (Curt. vii. 5).

Didymus, i, m. a vicious character, mentioned by Martialis (iii. 31 &c.).—2. A freedman, who left, at his death, letters recording the enormous atrocity of the emperor Tib-rius, with respect to Drusus (Tac. Ann. vi. 24).—3. A writer, highly commended by Ammianus Marcellinus, for the variety of his knowledge. He censured Cicero in six books, to which Suetonius Tranquillus wrote a reply. From his indefatigable industry, he was surnamed Chalcenturus (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Diēgylles, is, m. a Thracian, father-in-law of Prusias, king of Bithynia (Ap. Bel. Mith. 174).

Dies, ei, c. g. a day, or that space of time which elapses from the first appearance of light in the morning, till the return of darkness at night. It is more generally used to denote the time the sun is visible, or above the horizon, which, strictly speaking, constitutes a solar day. The term has frequently a more extended signification, and corresponds to the Greek word Nychthemeron (night-day) which includes the night. This forms the astronomical day, and has also been called, in Britain, the natural or civil day. It exceeds the sidereal day, or a complete revolution of the earth on its axis, by three minutes and fifty-six seconds. Different nations begin the day at different times. Among the Romans the natural day began when the sun first appeared above the horizon, which was called the first hour, and ended with that luminary disappearing, which was the 12th hour. This mode of dividing that space of time during which the sun is visible into twelve parts, though still followed in Turkey, must have been attended with great inconvenience. The hours thus varied with the length of the day, and those of the night were subject to the same alteration. Besides, the hours of these two portions of time could only be equal twice a-year, viz., at the equinoxes (See Hora). The civil day began at midnight, when the third watch commenced. With us, and most of the nations of Europe, the day is reckoned from midnight to midnight. The Jews began their day at sunset, and, like the Romans, divided it into twelve hours; and the night with them also consisted of twelve hours. It may not be improper to observe, that astronomers generally compute from noon to noon, reckoning in a numerical succession from one to twenty-four hours, and not by two twelves, agreeably to common usage. The Planets, according to ancient belief, presided over the affairs of this world, of which each took the government for one hour in turn, in this order; Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Sol, or the Sun, Venus, Mercury, and Luna, or the Moon. The first hour of Saturday falling to the lot of Saturn, the first of Sunday would be under the direction of the Sun; the Moon would have the authority on the first of Monday; Mars, on Tuesday; Mercury, on Wednesday; Jupiter, on Thursday; and Venus, on Friday. This accounts for the days of the week receiving the Latin names, Dies Solis, Luna, Martis, Mercurii, Jovis, Veneris, et, Saturni. Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, are words of Saxon origin, and derived from deities whose attributes corresponded nearly to those of the Latin above-mentioned, whom ignorance fabled to preside over these days. The other three, Sunday, Monday, and Saturday, are evidently derived from Sun, Moon, and Saturn. The divisions of the day among the Romans were, 1st, Solis ortus, sunrise;

2d, Māne, the morning; 3d, Antēmeridiānum tempus, forenoon; 4th, Meridies, noon; 5th, Postmeridiānum, v. Postmeridiānum tempus, afternoon; 6th, Solis occūsus, sunset. A number of expressions conveying nearly the same idea occur in the Roman classics, of which a few, for the sake of the young student, are here subjoined, Primo sole, at the first sun, i. e. at the rising of the sun; so Sole oriente, and, Sole surgente: the last is poetical. Sole orto, the sun having risen; after the rising of the sun. Ab sole orto, from sunrise. Primo mane, early in the morning; multo mane, when the morning is well advanced. Medius dies, medium diēi, meridiānum tempus, mid-day, or noon, about noon. Multo die, when the day is far advanced; ad multum diem, and, de multo die, have nearly the same signification. Sub occūsum solis, towards sunset.

Diespiter, tris, m. a name of Jūpiter, as father of the day (Hor. Od. i. 34. 5).

Digētia, v. m. the Licenza, a rivulet, which passed by the villa of Hōrātius. The poet has described the spring of this stream as very cool and clear, and the waters of the Licenza as possessing the quality of curing headaches and disorders in the intestines (Epist. i. 18. 104). In the plain of the Licenza, about fourteen miles from Treoli, and five from Varia, Vico Vara, Abbé Capmartin de Chaupy has fixed the situation of the villa of Hōrātius, a subject which long divided the opinions of the learned. Wieland has assented to the conclusion of the Abbé, and a late inquirer, from ocular observation, is of the same opinion.

Sextus Digītius, Sexti Digītii, m. a Roman marine, who claimed the mural crown for having been the first who scaled the walls of Carthāgo Nōva, Carthagena, in 212 B. C., in which he was opposed by Q. Trēbēllius, a centurion of the fourth legion, who maintained, that he first reached the summit of the wall. The former was supported by the marines, and the latter by the legions, each party exerting themselves with an ardour that threatened a general mutiny, to prevent which P. Cōrnēlius Scipio, the commander-in-chief, appointed three commissioners to inquire into the merits of the two rivals. The witnesses appeared ready to support, by perjury, the cause which they had adopted; but on C. Lælius mentioning that circumstance to the commanders, they adjudged a mural crown to each, assigning, as a reason, that it appeared from the evidence, that the two claimants had gained the top of the wall at the same instant (Liv. xxvi. 48).—2. Elected prætor, on which the north of Spain became his province, in 196 B. C. To his successor he scarcely delivered the half of the troops which he had received, in consequence of his failure almost in every measure. By the consul, L. Cōrnēlius Scipio, he was appointed a lieutenant-general, and commanded, with other two of the same rank, to collect all the ships on the coast to Brūndisium, Brindisi, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 42 seq.).—3. Sent an ambassador, with other two, to Mācēdōnia, in 176 B. C. By order of the senate, Digītius and other two, next went to Apūlia, and Cālābria, to purchase grain for the army and navy. A tribune of the soldiers appears to have been the highest rank he attained (Liv. xli. 22 seq.).

Dii, orum, m. a powerful nation of Thrācia (Tac. Ann. iii. 38).

Dillius Aponiānus, Dillii Aponiāni, m. an officer in the Roman army, who commanded the third legion, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. iii. 10 seq.).

Dillius Vōcūla, Dillii Vōcūla, m. a brave officer in the Roman army, sent to the relief of the camp of Vētēra, gained two victories over Civilis, and obliged the Batavians to raise the siege. His inaction lost all the advantages which might have resulted from these victories, and he was obliged to effect his escape in disguise. Clāssicus betrayed him, and the legions which he had corrupted put Vōcūla to death (Tac. Hist. iv. 24—59).

Diluvium, i, n. a flood or deluge. That so remarkable an event as that of the universal deluge should have been transmitted for many ages by oral tradition, so as to be generally known, ought rather to command belief, than to excite surprise. Hence, we find some account of that supernatural occurrence in the history of almost all nations who have had any knowledge of letters, or who have attained to eminence either by extent of power, or progress in civilization. It is of importance to remark, that the wickedness of men has been uniformly the cause assigned for that catastrophe by all the poets, historians, and writers of antiquity, who have given any account of the general flood. There is not a single ancient author who attributes it to any other reason than that mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures—the corruption and depravity of mankind. The translations from the Sanscrit have, it may almost be affirmed, proved that the Menu of the Hindoos, and, it cannot be doubted, that the Deucalion of the Greeks, was the Noah of the Jews under different names. Ovid has disguised the Mosaic account of the flood by poetical embellishment and mythological fiction. The boat, or the ark, he says, of Deucalion, stopped on Parnāsus, the favourite mountain of the Greek and Roman poets; but the eastern account approaches to the truth, by making the ark rest on a mountain in Armēnia. As we become better acquainted with Oriental literature, it is probable the fact stated by Moses will receive additional confirmation; if the writings of an inspired penman can with propriety be said to admit of additional confirmation.

Dimallum, i, n. v. Dimallus, i, f. a town of the Pārthini, or in their neighbourhood. In the treaty with Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, it was to belong to the Romans (Liv. xxix. 12).

Dinārchus, i, m. an Ætolian, who commanded the horse in 171 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 22).

Dindymēnē, es, f. a name of Cūbēlē. See Dindymus.—2. The mother of the poet Pindārus, who dedicated a temple to her. Pausānias gives an account of her statue, and the sacrifices instituted by her son (ix. 25).

Dindymus, i, m. Plur. Dindyma, orum, n. a mountain of Phrygia, on which Cūbēlē was worshipped, and from which she had the name of Dindymēnē. Adj. Dindymēnus, a, um. Dindymēna dōmīna, Cūbēlē (Cat. lxiii. 13).

Dinias, arum, f. Bulawadin, a city of Phrygia (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Dinis, idis, m. a Thracian commander, who surrendered to the Roman army, in the year 26 (Tac. Ann. iv. 50).

Dino, ōnis, m. one of the principal men of the Rhōdii, who, with Pōlyārātus, authorized Metrodōrus to declare to Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, that the Rhōdii were ready to join him against the Romans, in 170 B. C. Next year he and Pōlyārātus were brought to Rome, to be delivered up to the Romans (Liv. xlv. 23 seq.).

Dinōcrātes, is, m. a commander of Philip-pus, king of Mācēdōnia, in Peræa, who, after being defeated by the combined army of the Rhōdii, under their prætor Pausistrātus, fled to Bārgillæ, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 18).—2. Prætor of the Mēssēni, in 185 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 49).—3. A Macedonian architect who, under Alexander the Great, planned Alexandriā. It is mentioned, that he proposed to Alexander to cut mount Athos into the figure of a man holding in the one hand a city, and in the other a reservoir, which would receive all the waters of the mountain. At the suggestion of Ptōlēmæus Philādēlphus he began to build a temple in honour of Arsinoë, in which he meant to suspend a statue of the queen by means of magnets. Death prevented the execution of the latter, and the judgment of Alexander rejected the former, as absurd and impracticable (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Dinōmāchē, es, f. a Grecian woman, probably of high rank, from whom Alcibiādes traced his descent; to which Pērsius sarcastically alludes (Sat. iv. 20).

Dinōmēnes, is, m. the father of Hērion, Gēlon, Pōlyzēlus, and Thrāsībūlus.—2. The son of Hērion just mentioned (Pin. Pyth. i. 154 seq.).—3. Was at the head of the conspiracy against Hērōnōmus, king of Sýracūse, and, having the charge of his person, opened a way to the assassins, who put him to death. He thence escaped with only two wounds, although the guards discharged their weapons at him. After this event he was elected prætor (Liv. xxiv. 7 seq.).

Dinon, ōnis, m. a historian in whom Cornelius Nepos put the greatest confidence respecting Persian affairs. His writings have all perished. He is said to have lived in the time of Dārius Ochus (Cor. Nep. Con. 5).

Diocēa, æ, f. the mother of the emperor Diocletianus (Aur. Vic. Ep. 39).

Diocēa, æ, f. a town of Dalmātia, at which the emperor Diocletianus was born (Aur. Vic. Ep. 39).

Diocēs, is, m. a son of Pisistrātus, who, having violated a virgin, was killed by her brother (Just. ii. 9). In history he is generally called Hipparchus.—2. Son of Orsilochus, and grandson of the river Alphæus. He was rich, and lived at Phææ. His two sons, Orsilochus and Crēthon, fell by the hand of Ænās (Hom. Il. v. 543: Od. iii. 489).—3. A principal Ætolian, who took possession of Dēmētrias, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 34).—4. An officer under Mithridātes, who deserted with his forces and the military chest to L. Licinius Lucullus (Ap. Bel. Mith. 224).

Diocletianus, i, m. succeeded to the Roman empire in 284, on the assassination of Nūmēriānus by Arrius Aper, whom he brought in chains to his tribunal, charged with the murder, and plunged his sword into the breast of the culprit, without allowing him time to offer any defence. The parents of this illustrious emperor were slaves in the house of Annulianus, a Roman senator, and he went at first by the name of Diocēs, which the Latins changed into Diocletianus. Prompted either by a love of arms, or ambition of power, in early life he entered the army, where his merit raised him in succession to the government of Mœsia, the consulship, and the command of the prætorian guards. To the daring courage of a hero, he added the powers of a vigorous mind, a knowledge of business, and the command of his own passions. Clemency induced him to withhold the application of force, whenever policy could effect his purpose. On Maximianus, whom he chose for his colleague, he bestowed first the title of Cæsar, and afterwards that of Augustus. In him he had an active, steady, and resolute soldier, insensible to pity, and regardless of the laws, who executed all his orders without the least respect to future consequences or popular opinion.

Diocletianus assumed the title of Jovius, and his colleague that of Herculeus. To secure the empire, every frontier required a powerful army, and, therefore, Diocletianus invested with a share of sovereign authority Galerius, surnamed Armenianus, from his being originally a herd, and Constantius, surnamed Chlorus, from the paleness of his complexion. Galerius received in marriage Valeria, daughter of Diocletianus. A princely dignity marked his whole conduct, and the wisdom of his plans ensured their success. In wars of great difficulty or of doubtful event, he employed the fiercer courage of his colleague Maximianus; but when necessity required, he placed himself at the head of the troops, and his martial abilities generally secured to him the victory. After a siege of eight months, he took Alexandria, and put to the sword many thousand of the inhabitants. Over Bœiris and Cœptos, which he utterly destroyed, Diocletianus and his colleague triumphed, in the year 303, after the former had gained a complete victory over the Persians, and this being the last triumph which Rome ever saw, rendered it more remarkable.

Diocletianus entertained an aversion to Rome, and likewise to its inhabitants. The familiarity of the latter disgusted this dignified emperor, who entertained high ideas of monarchy, and a consequent dislike of the vestiges of the republican government, which Rome still retained. On returning to Nicomœdia, which he had fixed on for the seat of government, he assumed all the pomp and retirement of Asiatic kings. The discontinuance of the republican offices, consuls, censors, tribunes, and ediles, rendered it necessary for him to adopt a new form of government. Following out his favourite idea, he formed a more splendid and costly establishment. Both Diocletianus and Maximianus resigned the imperial dignity on the same day, then building, planting, and gardening occupied his leisure hours, and restored his health, which business and confinement had injured. His splendid palace, which covered upwards of nine English acres, has been celebrated for its magnificence and grandeur. Scarcely a vestige of it now remains. His death, of which different accounts have been given, happened in the year 313. Most probably he died a natural death, unaccompanied rated either by discontent, fear, or violence, although all these have been advanced to account for the event (Eutrop. ix. 19-28).

Diōdōrus, i. m. prefect of Amphipolis, who, on hearing of the defeat of Perseus, king of Macedonia, feared that the two thousand Thracians who garrisoned the city, might plunder it, and, therefore, devised a plan for sending them out of the city. No sooner had they passed the river Strymon than he shut the gates against them, 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 44).—2. A man addicted to covetousness and litigation (Mart. i. 99).—3. A harper, to whom the emperor Vespasian gave a present of 200,000 sesterces (Suet. Vesp. 19).

Diōdōtus, i. m. surnamed Tryphon, headed an insurrection of the subjects of Demetrius, king of Syria, in consequence of his cruelty, compelled him to flee, and claimed the crown for a son, scarcely two years old, of Alexander, who had murdered the father of this Demetrius, and usurped the sovereignty, in 147 B. C. Of the young monarch Diōdōtus was tutor, and bribed the physicians to put him to death (Liv. Ep. 52. 55).—2. A Stoic philosopher, under whom the Roman orator, M. Tullius Cicero, studied various branches of literature, particularly logic (Tac. Orat. 30). He died in the house of Cicero, who informs us, that he taught geometry after he became blind.

Diōgēnes, is, m. the Cynic, was a native of Sinopē in Pontus, which he and his father, who was a banker, were compelled to quit for coining false money. On settling at Athens, he applied his mind to the study of philosophy under Antisthenes. From his writings being lost, the extent of his information, and his discoveries in science are unknown. That he possessed a vigorous mind, and had the reputation of a great genius, seems undeniable; although much of his celebrity may be referred to the strictness of his tenets, contempt of comfort, and oddity of manner. It must not be inferred, that because he despised riches he cultivated humility, for, on the contrary, he looked down with scorn on the whole world, censured with the dignity of a magistrate all mankind, and considered every philosopher as greatly his inferior. Extreme poverty, the result of his despising riches, obliged him to beg, a state to which his raiment was not superior, yet when Alexander the Great offered him riches he spurned at the proposal, and said, "All I ask is, do not stand between me and the sun." Other smart sayings of his are recorded by Valerius Maximus. In after life he was taken by pirates, who carried him into Crēta, Candia, and sold him to Xēniades, a Corinthian, in whose family he lived as tutor, and refused to be ransomed by his friends, giving as a reason, "that a lion was not the servant of his feeders, but their master." He lived to a great age. Of him Plāto may be said to have given a just character in a few words, "that he was Socrates run mad" (Val. Max. iv. 3).—2. A son of Mithridates, fell in battle near Orchomēnos under Archēlaus, who commanded against Sulla.—3. Son of Archēlaus, a general of Mithridates. Sulla defeated Archēlaus in Greece, killing nearly a hundred and twenty thousand of his men, and, having been reinforced by that monarch, Archēlaus came to a second engagement with Sulla, in which he lost twenty thousand, besides his son Diōgēnes (Eutrop. v. 6).—4. A grammarian in the island Rhodus, lectured every Sabbath. To Tibērius, who called out of the proper time, he refused admittance, desiring him to call that day seven days. After Tibērius had come to the empire, the grammarian waited at the gate, and requested permission to pay his respects to his sovereign, who, remembering the refusal with which he had met, desired the grammarian to call at the end of seven years (Suet. Tib. 32).

Diōmēdē, es, f. a beautiful woman, daughter of Phōrbas, a Lesbian, and concubine of Achilles (Hom. Il. ix. 661).

Diōmēdes, is, m. the son of Tydeus and Deiphyle, king of Aetolia (Aetolius Heros), was one of the Grecian chiefs, and distinguished for his bravery during the Trojan war. After the destruction of Troy he went to Apulia, where he built Argēripa, and refused to join Turnus against Aeneas (Ov. Met. xiv. 457 seq.). Virgilius puts into his mouth an elegant speech, which is repeated by Vēntilus, a Rutulian ambassador, in which he describes the calamities in consequence of the Trojan war, extols the bravery of the Trojans, particularly of Hector and Aeneas, and strenuously recommends the Rūtill and Lātini to conclude a peace with the illustrious exiles (Æn. xi. 242 seq.). Justinus says he founded Brundisium and Arpi (xii. 2: xx. 1). Campus Diōmēdis, et, Campi Argēvi Diōmēdis, a plain in Apulia near Cannā (Liv. xxv. 12). From his father he was called Tydides, æ. Adj. Diōmēdeus, a, um.—2. Son of Mars and Cyrenē, was king of the Bistōnes, the most warlike nation of the Thracians. His horses fed on human flesh. Hēracles killed Diōmēdes, and drove his horses to Eurystheus, a task imposed upon him by that monarch. The latter sent them to pasture on Olympus, Liakura, where wild beasts devoured them (Apol. ii. 5). Adj. Diōmēdeus, a, um. Diōmēdeia (fabūla) (Juv. Sat. i. 53). Diōmēdei agri (Mart. xiii. 93).—3. The steward of Augustus, with whom he was one day walking, when a wild boar suddenly rushed upon them. Consulting his own safety, the steward fled, leaving the emperor exposed to the fury of the animal, from which he effected his escape. Instead of being enraged at his servant's conduct, Augustus turned the whole into a jest, believing that Diōmēdes did not act from treachery but self-preservation (Suet. Aug. 67).

Diōmēdon, ōntis, m. one of the twelve Athenian commanders who gained a victory at Arginūsæ, but was condemned to die because he had not given orders for the burying of the dead. He yielded to his fate with great calmness and composure (Val. Max. i. 1).

Dion, ōnis, m. appointed by Arsinoë to treat with her brother Ptolēmaeus Ceraunus (Just. xxiv. 2).—2. A native of Syracuse, a man of noble family, inherited a great estate left by his father, whose name was Hipparinus. Diōnysius I. married Aristomachē, sister of Dion, by whom he had two sons, Hipparinus and Nysseus, and two daughters, Sophrosynē and Arētē. The former became the wife of Diōnysius II., and Dion married the latter. To great talents he added a love of literature, and to gratify his inclination, Dionysius invited Plato to his capital. The mutual esteem and attachment of master and scholar induced the former to return to Sicily, after the tyrant had ordered him to be sold for a slave. The hatred of cruelty which Dion exhibited at the iniquitous and tyrannical acts of Dionysius can scarcely be referred to the benevolent affections, since, on his assuming the government, he was not inferior to the tyrant himself in contempt of justice, and disregard of human life. Soon after Dionysius II. ascended the throne, he banished Dion, who raised troops in Peloponnēsus, the Morea, and easily possessed himself of the government, whilst the tyrant was in Italy. By indulging the son of Dion in every species of excess, he had endeavoured to procure his death, and had given his wife Arete to another. To recover the youth from his habits of dissipation and lewdness, he set keepers over him, but these vices had obtained a power which could not be overcome, and death was preferred to temperance and sobriety. The arbitrary and cruel nature of Dion's government excited the disaffection of his subjects, and one Callicrates, an Athenian, in whose fidelity he had perfect confidence, undertook and accomplished his assassination. The populace regretted his death, called him the deliverer of his country, and honoured his remains with a magnificent interment at the public expense. His biographer states that he was about fifty-five years of age, and that his death happened in the fourth year after his return from Peloponnēsus, the Morea (Cor. Nep. in vit.).

Dionē, es, f. the daughter of Oceanus and Tēthys, was the mother of Vēnus, who is frequently called by this name. Adj. Diōneus, a, um. Diōneus Caesar, as being a descendant of Anchises and Vēnus (Virg. B. ix. 47). Diōneā māter, Vēnus (Virg. Æn. iii. 19). Diōneum antrum, the grotto of Vēnus, i. e. a grotto sacred to Vēnus (Hor. Od. ii. 1. 59).

Dionysodorus, i, m. the ambassador of Attalus, king of Asia, at the conference held at Nicea, in Mallacus sinus, between Philippos, king of Mæcedonia, and T. Quinctius Flaminianus, with the Roman allies in those parts (Liv. xxxii. 32).

Dionysius, i, m. a historian born at Hali-carnassus, Bodrōn, the capital of Cária, whence to his name is generally added Hali-carnassēus, or, Hali-carnassēnsis. After the battle of Actium, he went to Rome where he continued twenty-two years, acquiring a knowledge of the origin, customs, and history of the Romans, which he recorded in twenty-two books, beginning with the traditional account of the first inhabitants of Rome and Italy, and ending with the year before the first Punic war. Of these twenty-two books eleven only now remain, the last is imperfect which brings down the history of that celebrated people till 440 B. C. His valuable work contains much accurate information, and every admirer of ancient history must regret the loss which Roman literature has sustained, from his writings not having been transmitted entire. Some of his critical works are extant, and show the versatility of his genius, as well as the correctness of his judgment.—2. A Grecian geographer, who has written a Periēgēsis in Hexameter verse. The period when he lived has been disputed, some supposing that he flourished in the reign of Augustus, and others in that of Sēvērus or M. Aurēlius.—3. A native of Athens, who, after he had made some progress in philosophy, went to Heliōpōlis in Egypt, where he saw that preternatural darkness at the crucifixion of our Saviour, when he exclaimed, if we may believe what has been reported, "either God suffers or sympathizes with the sufferer." On his return to Athens, he was admitted into the court of Arcōpāgus, on which account he is called in scripture the Areopagite (Acts xvii. 34). According to the generally received opinion, he suffered martyrdom, but at what age, and under what emperor, is not certainly known. The writings under his name now extant, the learned, in general, consider spurious.—4. A Scythian, who became abbot of a monastery at Rome, early in the sixth century, and wrote with considerable learning on the canon law. He had the merit of being the first who fixed the birth of Christ according to the vulgar era, and probably the first who computed time from that event. To distinguish him from others of this name, we find him generally denominated Dionysius the Less.

—5. A man who from a low rank in life became general and tyrant, not only of Syracūse, Saragossa, but of all Sicily. He afterwards carried his arms into Italy, took Locri, and formed an alliance with the Gauls who had burned Rome. Having by bribery gained the tragic prize at Athens, his excess at table, from immoderate joy, proved his death, in 368 B. C. Others state that his physicians poisoned him, and Justinus that he was killed by the treachery of his own men (xx. 5).—6. Son and successor of the former, killed his own brothers and their relations, and ruled with greater cruelty than his father, which induced his subjects to apply for assistance to the Corinthians, who sent reinforcements under Timoleon, to whom Dionysius surrendered himself, and was sent to Corinth in 343 B. C., where he lived in the most abject and unprincipled manner. Plutarchus states, that he held conversation in a butcher's shop, sat whole days in a perfumer's, drank the diluted wines of taverns, squabbled in the streets with lewd women, directed female musicians in their singing, and disputed with them about the harmony of certain airs which were sung in the theatre. Some referred these unworthy amusements to his natural indolence, effeminacy and dissipation, others think that he acted from policy, and affected meanness and stupidity, contrary to his nature, to prevent the Corinthians from fearing him, or suspecting an intention of regaining his crown. That biographer records several of his sayings, which do credit to the powers of his mind and the accuracy of his judgment. Many insulted him in his misfortunes, but others compassionated the fate of the man, who, from a throne, had fallen into the lowest state of society, had seen his sons die in their youth, his daughters violated, and his wife, who was his sister, exposed to the brutal lust of his enemies, slaughtered with her children, and then thrown into the sea. That author does not say he taught a school, and from the money which he carried with him there is no reason to suppose that he had to toil for daily bread. He held the crown for ten years, during the succeeding twelve, was continually engaged in war and troubles. The account of Justinus coincides in some particulars and differs in others, from the above statement (xxi. 1-5).—7. A king of Heraclea in Pontus. He lived in the reign of Alexander the Great, was remarkably corpulent, and slept so soundly, that it was necessary to pierce his skin with some pointed weapon, in order to waken him. His reign was marked by lenity to his subjects, who sincerely regretted his death.—8. A Stoic philosopher, who was of the same age with Cicero, and inserted verses in his speeches, but without either taste or elegance (Tusc. ii. 11).—9. A rhetorician of the same period, with whom Cicero, when a young man, spent much of his time in Asia (Cic. Brut. 91).—10. A slave of Cicero, who used to read to his master, but at last deserted him, because he had stolen books from his library. The orator seems to have treated him with kindness and respect.—11. A slave or freedman of Atticus, who arranged the library of Cicero. His full name was M. Pomponius Dionysius (Cic. Att. iv. 8).—12. A Theban musician, who excelled in a knowledge of that art, in which he gave instructions to Epaminondas (Cor. Nep. Epam. 2).—13. The name of a servant or slave (Hor. Sat. l. 6. 38).—Many other persons of this name are mentioned in the writings of the Greeks and Romans.

Dionysopolis, s. f. Dionysopolis, a town of Thracia (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).

Dionysus, i. m. a name of Bacchus q. v. Adj. Dionysæus, a. um. Dionysæi thyrsi (Sil. Ital. iii. 393).

Diphænes, s. m. a prætor of the Achæi, who fraudulently purchased Zæcynthus, Zante, from Hierocles q. v. who governed it for Amyntander, king of the Athamænes; but the Romans claimed it, and he did not attempt resistance. Under Philipæmen, he had studied the art of war, and, on being sent to the assistance of Attalus, gave proof of his abilities as a soldier, by compelling the Syrians to raise the siege of Pergamus, and obliging Seleucus to quit that territory. At a future period, he and Lycortas were at the head of an embassy sent to Rome, by the Achæi, on account of the difference between that nation and the Lacedæmonians. The answer of the senate was so obscure, that the two nations understood it differently, and the consequence was, the subjection of the Lacedæmonians to the Achæians (Liv. xxxvi. 31 seq.).

Diorea, s. m. a youth descended from the family of Priamus, who engaged in the foot race. He and his brother Amyceus were killed by Turnus (Virg. Æn. v. 297: xii. 509).—2. Father of Automédon, charioteer of Achilles (Hom. Il. xvii. 429).—3. Son of Ambrýnceus, hence called Ambrýncides, killed by Pirus (Hom. Il. iv. 517).

Dioscrides, s. m. an Egyptian, who with Scæpion, was sent by Ptolemy to Achilles at the time he was advancing with the king's army and all the cavalry to Alexandria, to forbid his approach. But Achilles, without hearing their message, ordered both to be apprehended and killed. The one was instantly put to death, and the other dangerously wounded, was carried off for dead by his attendants (Cæs. B. C. iii. 103).—2. An eminent seal-engraver, whom Augustus employed to make a seal, having for its figure his own head, which he afterwards used in diplomas, instructions, and letters (Suet. Aug. 50).

Dioscûri, orum, m. i. e. sons of Jüpiter, generally applied to Cæstor and Pollux. They were reckoned propitious to sailors, if both stars appeared at the same time in the form of fire, settling on the masts or sail-yards. If one only appeared, the omen was esteemed unfavourable. Among the Greeks, this appellation was not restricted to Cæstor and Pollux, although more commonly applied to them than to any other. Adj. Dioscûrtus, a. um.

Dioscûrias, adis, f. Iskuriah, a town of Cölchis, on the shore of the Black Sea, built by Amphitus and Cércius, the charioteers of Cæstor and Pollux, from whom the nation was called Hênôchî q. v. It is also known by the name of Sêbastôpôlis (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).—2. A town of Aràbia Félîx (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Dióxippus, i. m. a Trojan killed by Turnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 574).—2. An Athenian, distinguished for his pugilism, whom Horrtas, a Macedonian, insulted, and a battle ensued. The latter appeared on the ground completely armed, whilst Dióxippus had only a club, but with it he gained the victory, and was only prevented from killing his antagonist by the interference of Alexander the Great (Curt. ix. 7).—3. Commanded a cohort of mercenary soldiers in Athens, in 202 B. C., and assisted in defending that city against Philip, king of Macædonia (Liv. xxxi. 24).

Diphilus, i. m. a Grecian who wrote comedy after the manner of Mênander. From the terms in which he is mentioned by Velleius Pâtêrôulus he must have excelled in the new comedy (i. 16). Vâlêrius Máxîmus calls him trágadus (vi. 2).—2. A favourite of Dômîtîânus the emperor, supposed to have been by birth a Greek (Juv. Sat. iii. 120).

Dipylon, i. n. a gate of Athens, which, being the principal entrance, was of larger dimensions than the rest. The street, both within and without it, was wide, so that the Athenians formed their troops within their walls when they marched out against Philip in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 24).

Dircea, arum, f. one of the gates of Thêbe, Theba, commanded by Mênæceus in the Theban war. Adj. Dirceus, a. um. Dirceus culmina (Stat. Th. viii. 257).

Dircê, es, f. the wife of Lÿcus, king of Thêbe (Thebes, one syl. Eng.), whom he married after he had divorced Antiôpê, and by whom the latter was barbarously treated. Zêthes and Amphion, the sons of Antiôpê, resented the cruelties to which their mother had been subjected by Dircê, made war on Lÿcus, conquered him, and tied her to the tail of a wild bull, by which she was dragged over the country, and in this manner expiated her merciless conduct towards Antiôpê. The gods, to terminate the severe punishment of Dircê, at last changed her into a fountain of the same name near Thebes, on the southeast of the town, sacred to the Muses. Adj. Dirceus, a. um. of Thebes, Theban, Beotian. Dirceus Cÿceus, the Beotian swan i. e. Pindarus (Hor. Od. iv. 2. 25).

Dircêtiâ, s. f. a nymph of violent passions, who had, by a boy, Aláthreus. Some consider Lápithōnia to have been her name, and Dircētis a derivative from Dircē, a fountain of Boētia, expressive of her country (Stat. Th. vii. 298).

Dis, Ditis, m. the god of riches, Plūto. Niger Dis, grim Plūto (Ov. Met. iv. 438).

Disēnor, ōris, m. a Trojan commander (Hom. Il. xvii. 217).

Dium, i. n. Stan-Diu, a maritime town of Mācēdōnia. Strābo says that it was at the foot of Olympos, at the distance of seven stadia from Sinus Thermaicus, the Gulf of Saloniki. Here Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, collected his troops, fixed his standing camp, and waited the coming up of the Romans in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 3).

Dius, i. m. one of the nine sons of Priāmus, who survived the Trojan war (Hom. Il. xxiv. 251).

Divico, ōnis, m. a nobleman of great influence among the Hēlvēti, who commanded the army in the war against Cāsius, and was at the head of the embassy sent by that state to Cæsar, after three-fourths of their forces had crossed Arar, the Saone, and he had attacked and killed a great part of the other fourth (Cæs. B. G. i. 13).

Divitiācus, i. m. a nobleman of the Ædūi, who had great influence with Cæsar, in consequence of his steady attachment to the Romans (Cæs. B. G. i. 3 seq.).

Divodūrum, i. n. Metz, a town of the Mēdiomātrici, on Mōsella, the Moselle. It was afterwards called Metis, whence the modern name (Tac. Hist. i. 63).

Dmētor, ōris, m. a king of Cyprius, son of Iāsus (Hom. Od. xvii. 443).

Dōbēres, um, m. a people of Pæōnia (Herod. v. 16).

Dōclis, is, m. an eminent gladiator, mentioned by Horātius, along with Cæstor, who was of the same profession (Epis. l. 18. 19).

Dōdōna, æ, v. Dōdōnē, es, f. a town of Mōlōssis in Epirus, Lower Albania, so called from Dōdōnē, one of the Oecēanides, or from Dōdōnus, a son of Jūpiter and Eurōpa, or from Dou, a river. Near this town was a famous grove of oaks (beech, Apol. Rhod.), which not only spoke, but gave oracular responses. Doves which alighted on these trees were likewise said to communicate the will of the gods by speech. The pigeons at Dōdōna were black (Herod. ii. 55). Here was a fountain which, when cold, extinguished torches plunged into it, and lighted them when extinguished if brought near it, and a temple of Jūpiter distinguished for its responses (Plin. i. 251, 404). Part of the ship Argō, about the middle, was constructed of wood from Dōdōna, and to the extraordinary powers of speech and prophecy, possessed by that timber, the Argonauts were indebted for useful advice and directions (Apol. Rhod. iv. 583). Dōdōnis, idis, f. applied to females or nouns feminine. Dōdōnis terra, the district of Epirus (Ov. Met. xiii. 716). Dōdōnis quercus (Sil. Ital. iii. 680). Dōdōnides, um, f. the Hēades (Hyg. 182). Adj. Dōdōneus, et, Dōdōnius, a, um. Dōdōneus Jūpiter, from his having a temple there (Pom. Mel. ii. 3. Plin. i. 404). Dōdōnæi lebetes, chaldrons, such as were in the temple of Jūpiter at Dōdōna. These chaldrons or vases always emitted a sound which Plinius attributes to the wind (v. 305), as does also Strābo, hence Dōdōneum æx. Dōdōnæa quercus (Cland. xxxiii. 31).

Dōlābēlla. See Cōrnēlius.

Dōlēhāon, ōnis, m. the father of Hēbrus, whom Mēzēntius slew (Virg. Æn. x. 696).

Dōlēhē, es, f. a town of Mācēdōnia, in the district called Trīpōllis, from it, Azōrus, and Pēthium (Liv. xlii. 53 seq.).

Dōlōnes, um (Sing. Dōlōn, ōnis), m. the inhabitants of Cyzicus, Chizico, of which the ancient name was Dōlōnis (Plin. i. 623). Adj. Dōlōnius, a, um. Dōlōbanus rex, Cyzicus, king of Chizico (Val. Flacc. v. 7).

Dōltius, i. m. a servant of Ulysses, who remained faithful to his master during his absence, as did all his children, except Mēlanthius and Mēlantho q. v. (Hom. Od. xxiv. 386).

Dōlon, ōnis, acc. ōna, m. a Trojan, son of Eumēdes, who is said to have had a countenance remarkably unpleasant. He was distinguished for his swiftness. Hector sent him during night to spy the Grecian camp, for which service he, should the subsequent attack, in consequence of his information, be successful, demanded the horses of Achilles (Ov. Met. xiii. 253). But he was taken by Diomēdes and Ulysses, to whom he instantly disclosed the plans of his countrymen, and offered a large sum of money for the preservation of his life. Hence the epithet imbellem (Ov. Met. xiii. 98). They were not, however, induced to accede to his request, but punished his infidelity and treachery by death. He was the father of Eumēdes. Antiquus Dōlon, ancient or noble Dōlon, whom Virgilius represents very differently from Ovidius (Æn. xii. 347).

Dōlōpia, æ, f. a district of Thessaly, near mount Pindus, according to Strābo and Livius, and of Ætōlia according to Plinius and Xēnophon. Inh. Dōlōpes, um (Sing. Dōlōp, ōpis), m. who, at the end of the war with Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, were declared free by the Romans, but that monarch subdued them again by force of arms in 193 B. C. Two years after, they yielded to the Ætōli to whom they had not formerly been subject. Perhaps this may account for their being reckoned in Thessaly by some, and in Ætōlia by others (Liv. xxxvi. 33 seq.). Adj. Dōlōpēus, a, um. Dōlōpēa busta, the monument of Dōlōps, son of Mērcūrius, which was erected at the city Māgnēsia, and from whom the Dōlōpes are supposed to have been descended (Val. Flacc. ii. 10).

Dōlōpiōn, ōnis, m. father of Hēpsēnor, and priest of the Scamander (Hom. Il. v. 76).

Dōlōps, ōpis, m. son of Clētius, hence called Clētiades, a Grecian chief killed by Hector (Hom. Il. xi. 302).—2. Son of Lāmpus, a brave warrior on the side of the Trojans, killed by Mēnelāus (Hom. Il. xv. 241 seq.). Lāmpētiades, æ, m. Dōlōps (ib. xv. 525).—3. Son of Mērcūrius. See Dōlōpia.

Dōlus, i. m. the god of stratagem or deceit (Val. Flacc. ii. 206).

Dōmītia Dēclidiāna, Dōmītia Dēclidiāne, f. the wife of Agrīcola. Their union, founded on mutual affection and esteem, continued to the end of life to heighten their happiness, and to increase their respectability. To noble birth she added great abilities, spotless integrity, and unsullied virtue (Tac. Agric. 6).

Dömütia Lépida, Dömütia Lépida, m. daughter of L. Dömütius Ahēnōbārbus and Antōnia, the younger, was grand-niece of Augustus, paternal aunt of the emperor Nēro, and the enemy of Agrippina. She was the wife of Valērius Mēssāla Bārbātus, and mother of Mēssālina. When sickness had confined Dömütia to her bed, Nēro paid her a visit, and she, having put her hand to his chin, said, "I shall be content to die when I receive the hair of this young beard." The only return which he made to her fondness was an order to her physicians to hasten her death by strong medicines, and they servilely obeyed his barbarous injunction. Tacitus omits this fact, but Dio records it. Whilst Mēssālina flourished in prosperity, she had no intercourse with her, but in adversity a mother's tenderness overcame the aversion which her daughter's vices had excited, and she was sitting by her when the executioners arrived to put an end to her life. Dömütia, with the spirit of a Roman matron, advised Mēssālina to die by her own hand, a counsel which the latter had not courage to obey (Tac. Ann. xi. 37).

Dömütia Lōngina, Dömütia Lōngina, f. wife of Aelius Lamia, whom the Emperor Dömütianus took from her husband and married (Suet. Dom. 1).

Dömütianus. See Flāvius.
Dömütilla, as f. a freedwoman, the mother of the Emperor T. Flāvius Vēspāsianus (Aur. Vic. Ep. 10).

Dömütius, a, um. Dömütia gens, the family or clan of the Dömütii. Dömütia fāmilia (Vel. Pat. ii. 10).

Dömütius, i, m. a lieutenant-general in the army of Q. Cassellius Mētellus Pius in Spain (Flor. iii. 22).—2. A centurion in the army of M. Licinius Crassus, who, in the war against the Dalmatians, struck terror into the enemy by carrying a small chafing dish full of fire upon his helmet, which emitted a flame, and this flame increased with the rapidity of his motion so that his head appeared to be on fire (Flor. iv. 12).

Dömütius Afer, Dömütii Afri, m. an orator whom Quintilianus highly commends. In his opinion, Dömütius and Jūlius Africānus surpassed beyond comparison, all the orators who flourished in his time. Tacitus says that his eloquence raised him to the highest civil honours, but condemns his morals, which appear to have been of the very worst kind. He was in haste, says the historian, to obtain distinction and honour by any kind of crime (Ann. iv. 52 seq.).

Dömütius Ahēnōbārbus, Dömütii Ahēnōbārbī, m. the colleague of L. Licinius Crassus, in the censorship 92 B. C. (Tac. Orat. 35).—3. An officer in Pompey's army, whom Caesar besieged in Corfinium, Perina, and when attempting to escape from that town, was seized by his soldiers and delivered to Caesar, who set him at liberty. Soon after, he went to Massilia, Marcellis, and advised the inhabitants to build a fleet, with which he engaged Decimus Brūtus, one of Caesar's officers, but was defeated. Having effected his escape from the harbour and eluded the vigilance of Caesar's ships during a storm, before the town surrendered to that general, he fortunately did not a second time fall into his enemy's hands. Adj. Dömütianus, a, um.

Dömütius Bālbis, Dömütii Bālbī, m. a man of praetorian rank, and without issue. In advanced life, Valērius Fabiānus q. v. forged his will (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40).

Dömütius Ceciliānus, Dömütii Ceciliāni, m. an intimate friend of Petus Thrāsēa, and the first who informed that great man, of the capital sentence pronounced against him by the senate (Tac. Ann. xvi. 84).

Dömütius Celer, Dömütii Celēris, m. an intimate friend of Cn. Cālpurnius Piso, at whose order he sailed for Sýria, on the death of Gērmānicus, and arrived at Lāodicēa, Latakia, a town of Sýria (Tac. Ann. ii. 77—79).

Dömütius Cōrbūlo, Dömütii Cōrbulōnis, m. a man of great bravery and prodigious strength, in the time of the emperor Nēro. Tacitus, who has mentioned his uncommon size and strength, describes him as holding a military commission under both Claudius and Nēro, and records his military operations on the banks of the Rhine, and of the El-Prat. Nēro caused him to be put to death (Tac. Ann. iii. 31 seq.). Some think that Cōrbūlo, whose name occurs in Jūvenālis (Sat. iii. 251), was a wrestler of remarkable strength, who had no other name; a conjecture which appears unsupported. Statius describes him as carrying on a cruel war (Syl. v. 2. 35).

Dömütius Mārsus, Dömütii Mārsi, m. a poet contemporary with Ovidius, of whose writings only four lines on the death of Tibullus, and a single line on a teacher named Orbilius remain (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 16. 5).

Dömütius Pōllio, Dömütii Pōllionis, m. a noble Roman, who, in the year 19, offered his daughter to supply the place of Occlia, who had presided over the rites of Vesta for fifty-seven years. The daughter of Dömütius was appointed, in preference to the daughter of Fonteius Agrippa, in consequence of her mother's conjugal fidelity (Tac. Ann. ii. 86).

Dömütius Sābinus, Dömütii Sābinī, m. a centurion of the first rank in the Roman army (Tac. Hist. i. 31).

Dömütius Silus, Dömütii Sili, m. the husband of Arria Gālla q. v. (Tac. Ann. xv. 59).

C. Dömütius Cālvinus, C. Dömütii Cālvini, m. consul with C. Cassius Lōnginus, according to Eutrōpius (iv. 22); but in the consular calendar, he is called C. Sēxtius Cālvinus q. v.

Cn. Dömütius, Cn. Dömütii, m. (surnamed Cālvinus), appointed consul with A. Cōrnēlius Cōssus, in 331 B. C. They were both superseded by the creation of a dictator, as a war was expected with the Gauls (Liv. viii. 17).

—2. Or. C. Dömütius (con. cal.), son of the former, a curule edile in 301 B. C. (Liv. x. 9).—3. The first plebeian who was elected to the office of censor. He held a lustrum in 282 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 13).

Cn. Dömütius Ahēnōbārbus, Cn. Dömütii Ahēnōbārbī, m. a Roman who, on being elected plebeian edile in 197 B. C., built, with the concurrence of his colleague C. Scribōnius, a temple to Faunus, in the island in Tiber, the Tevere, out of the fines imposed on the farmers of the public revenues for misconduct. In succession he obtained the offices of praetor, consul, and proconsul; but performed nothing memorable (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).—2. Chosen pontiff in room of Q.

Fulvius Flaccus in 174 B. C., when he was very young. Livius mentions his being twice sent an ambassador to Mæcedonia (xlii. 23 seq.).—3. Was consul at Rome with C. Fannius Strabo in 124 B. C. and next year, when proconsul, he defeated the Allobroges at Vindalium. Velleius Paterecius says the Arverni (ii. 10). He was the first Roman who erected stone pillars, and placed trophies on them, adorned with the arms of the enemy, in order to perpetuate his victory over the Allobroges, contrary to the practice of the Romans, who never upbraided the vanquished with their subjection to the Roman arms (Flor. iii. 2). L. Cæcilius Metellus and he were censors, and expelled thirty-two senators in 117 B. C. Ten years afterwards, the votes of the people raised him to the office of pontifex maximus. Having been proscribed by Sulla, he fled to Africa, where he was defeated and killed by Cn. Pompeius Magnus, in 83 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 61—89). Eutropius calls him the general of the party of Marius (v. 9).—4. Was consul with C. Cassius Longinus in 98 B. C. To him Valerius Maximus refers (vi. 5).—5. A tribune of the people, who passed a law, by which the people elected the priests, formerly chosen by their respective colleges (Vel. Pat. ii. 12).—6. Son of Dömütius Ahënöbärbus and Marcia, sister of Cato Uticensis. He was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and fought by his father's side in the army of Cn. Pompeius. Cicero mentions him among the conspirators against C. Julius Cæsar, on which account Augustus proscribed him; but Suetonius maintains his innocence of that death. Before the formation of the second triumvirate, he had joined Brutus and Cæsius in Greece, where his zeal and activity raised him high in the favour of these patriots, whose army he strengthened by prevailing on a body of cavalry, marching to join Döläbëlla, to desert that party, and to enter the ranks of the republican army. In the command of the fleet, consisting of fifty ships, which he had received to intercept the supplies of Octavius and Antönius, he acted with vigour, and, after the battle of Philippi, he annoyed the enemy by reinforcements from the army of Brutus, which voluntarily flocked to his standard. By the advice of Asinius Pöllio, he afterwards attached himself to Antönius, and thus regained his rights as a citizen of Rome, which none of the other conspirators ever did. With C. Sösius he obtained the office of consul 34 B. C., the year in which the dissembled friendship of Octavius and Antönius terminated in avowed hatred, and both made preparations for a final appeal to the sword. During that year too, T. Pömponius Atticus starved himself to death. From history it appears, both consuls preferred Antönius to Octavius, quitted Rome to join him, but Dömütius soon saw that the situation of Antönius was desperate, and deserted to his rival. The death of this Roman has been attributed, by some, to remorse for his treachery to Antönius, and by others, to disease. In his character we shall look in vain for that invincible love of country, which distinguished some of his relations, and which has transmitted their names with honour to modern times (Cor. Nep. in Vit.).—7. Was the son of L. Dömütius Ahënöbärbus bus who fell at Pharsalia. During the civil wars, he remained master of the seas, until he joined M. Antönius, whom he afterwards deserted, and followed the fortunes of Augustus. He was the great-grandfather of the emperor Nero (Tac. Ann. iv. 44).—8. Son of L. Dömütius Ahënöbärbus and Antönia the elder. He married Agrippina, daughter of Germänicus and Agrippina, by whom he had Nero the Roman emperor, and used to say of himself and his wife, that nothing good could be born from such parents. He held the consulship with M. Furius Cämillus Scribönianus, called by Suetonius, Arruntius, in the year 32. His life may be considered almost one continued act of wickedness (Tac. Ann. iv. 55 seq.).

Cn. Dömütius Cälvinus, Cn. Dömütius Cälvinus, m. an officer in Cæsar's army, to whom he, in the Alexandrian war, intrusted the government of Asia. He was defeated in a pitched battle by Phärnäces, but effected, with the remains of his forces, a safe retreat into Asia (Cæs. B. G. ii. 42 seq.).—2. Obtained the government of Spain as proconsul, when he conquered the Cæretani, who had rebelled. Velleius Paterecius commends him for the severity of his discipline, because he had beaten with rods the first captain of a legion for having fled from the field of battle. He had been consul with C. Asinius Pöllio 42 B. C. (Vel. Pat. ii. 78).

L. Dömütius Ahënöbärbus, L. Dömütius Ahënöbärbus, m. held the consulship with C. Cælius Cäldus in 96 B. C. When propretor in Sicily he put a shepherd to death for no other reason than that he had killed a boar with a hunting spear, intending by that example of severity to put an end to the robberies with which that island was then infested (Val. Max. vi. 3).—2. Was elected consul with Appius Claudius Pulcher (56 B. C.), and to his lot the province of Gallia fell. He appears to have been haughty, unsteady, and severe. Cicero mentions him among the orators of that period. He was one of the first and most inveterate enemies of C. Julius Cæsar, probably foreseeing the unbounded ambition of that able general, and the calamities which it would bring on the state. Accordingly, in the Civil war, he attached himself to the forces of the Republic under Pompeius. After the defeat of his party at Pharsalia, the plain of Pharsa, in attempting to escape from the camp to the mountains, he fell into the hands of Cæsar's cavalry, by whom he was killed. He was the great-grandfather of Cn. Dömütius Ahënöbärbus, who married Agrippina, and became the father of the emperor Nero.—3. Son of Cn. Dömütius Ahënöbärbus, one of the conspirators against C. Julius Cæsar. He married Antönia the elder, by whom he had Cn. Dömütius Ahënöbärbus, the father of the emperor Nero. He held the consulship with P. Cörnélius Scipio, about 16 B. C., commanded the army in Germany after the death of Drusus, crossed Albi, the Elbe, and penetrated farther into Germany than any Roman had done before him, on which account he obtained the honour of a triumph. He formed the long bridges, as they are called, in the marshes through Lankvoorde, Lichtvoorde, Ausseen, and Kocvoorde. In his temper and conduct he discovered many of the defects and vices which rendered his grandson both contemptible and detestable. He died in the year 25 (Tac. Ann. i. 63 seq. Suet. Ner. 4).—4. Generally known in history by the name of Néro, was the son of Cn. Dömütius Ahénöbärbus and Jülia Agrippina, daughter of Gërmanicus. At Antium, Azzo, this infamous Roman was born, on the fourteenth of December, in the year 34. Before he had completed his fourth year, his father died, leaving him the third part of his property, of which his co-heir Caius prevented his getting possession, by seizing the whole, and his mother was, soon after, banished. His aunt Lépida received him into her house, where he lived in great poverty, under the tuition of a dancingmaster and a barber. On the recall of Agrippina, she obtained a powerful interest at court, when Néro came into notice, was adopted by Claudius, on which he took the name of Néro, and placed under Annäus Sëneca at that time a senator. From this period he despised the family name. His progress in learning appears to have merited higher praise than the qualities of his heart. He made an excellent speech in Latin for the Bononians, another in Greek for the Rhodians and Ilienses. On his aunt Lépida being brought to trial, he appeared as evidence against her, merely to gratify his mother, her virulent enemy. He married Octävia, and succeeded to the empire in the eighteenth year of his age. Of the immense accumulation of honourable titles conferred on him by the senate, he had the modesty to decline one, the Father of his country. The beginning of his reign indicated a sound judgment, good dispositions, and a desire to promote the public happiness. Besides, he enacted a number of useful laws, and discovered no ambition for extending the empire. The lenity which marked his conduct on ascending the throne was repugnant to the feelings of his heart, and tended to aggravate the cruelty which has rendered his name odious. In frivolous, vicious, or barbarous pursuits, he spent most of his time, and was more ambitious to acquire distinction as a musician, a comedian, a singer, and a charioteer, than as an emperor. The natural bent of his mind was turned to poetry; his poems, Suetonius allows, had considerable merit; he had a great taste for painting and for the moulding of images. By the folly of his mother, who thought learning below an emperor, and by the selfishness of his tutor Sëneca, who discouraged him from reading the ancient orators, to keep him longer in admiration of himself, the education of Néro was cramped and limited. To enumerate his crimes would surpass our limits, and even to hint at some of his vices would be reckoned a violation of moral duty. The persecution of the Christians, the murder of his own mother, aunt, and brother, as well as that of his tutor, Sëneca, need only be mentioned to excite the reader's abhorrence. On Lécüsta, for the poisoning of Britänicus, he bestowed an estate, and placed scholars with her to acquire a knowledge of her trade. The constitution of Agrippina was fortified by antidotes against poison, and therefore he caused her to be put to death by violence, pretending she had destroyed herself. For this atrocious act, the stings of his own conscience rendered him miserable, he frequently declared that a ghost

